LARES, gods of inferior power at Rome who preſided over houſes and families. They were two in number, ſons of Mercury by Lara. [Vid. Lara.] In proceſs of time their power was extended not only over houſes but alſo over the country and the ſea, and we find Lares Urbani to preſide over the cities, Familiares over houſes, Ruſtici over the country, Compitales over croſs ways, Marini over the ſea, Viales over the roads, Paſſellarii, &c. According to the opinion of ſome, the worſhip of the gods Lares, whom whom ſome ſuppoſe to be the manes, ariſes for the ancient cuſtom among the Romans and other nations of burying their dead in their houſe, and from their belief that their ſpirit continually hovered over the houſes, for the protection of its inhabitants. The ſtatues of the Lares reſembling monkeys, and covered with the ſkin of a dog, were placed in a niche behind the doors of the houſes, or around the hearths. At the feet of the Lares was the figure of a dog barking to intimate their care and vigilance. Incenſe was burnt on their altars, and a ſow was alſo offered on particular days. Their feſtivals were obſerved at Rome in the month of May, when their ſtatues were crowned with garlands of flowers, and offerings of fruit preſented. The word Lares ſeems to be derived from the Etruſcan word Lars, which ſignifies conductor, or leader. Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 129.—Plut. in quæſt. Rom.—Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Horat. 3, od. 23.—Plaut. in. Aul. & Ciſt.

LARGA, a well known proſtitute in Juvenal's age. Juv. 4, v. 25.

LARGUS, a Latin poet who wrote a poem on the arrival of Antenor in Italy, where he built the town of Padua. He compoſed with eaſe and elegance. Ovid. et Pont. 4, ep. 16 v. 17.

LARIDES, a ſon of Daucus or Daunus who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas, and had his hand cut off with one blow by Pallas the ſon of Evander. Virg. Æn. 10. v. 391.

LARINA, a virgin of Italy, who accompanied Camilla in her war againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 655.

LARINUM or LARINA, a town of Italy, whoſe inhabitants are called Larinates, Ital. 15. v. 565.

LARISSA, a daughter of Pelaſgus, who gave her name to ſome cities in Greece. Pauſ. 2. c. 23.——A city between Paleſtine and Egypt, where Pompey was murdered and buried, according to ſome accounts.——A large city on the banks of the Tigris. It had a ſmall pyramid near it, greatly inferior to thoſe of Egypt.——A city of Aſia minor, on the ſouthern confines of Troas.——Another in Æolia. 70 ſtadia from Cyme. It is ſirnamed Phriconis by Strabo, by way of diſtinction.——Another near Epheſus.——Another on the borders of the Peneus in Theſſaly, the moſt famous of all the cities of that name. It was here that Acriſius was inadvertently killed by his grandſon Perſeus. Jupiter had there a famous temple, on account of which he is called Lariſſæus. The ſame epithet is alſo applied to Achilles, who reigned there. It is ſtill extant, and bears the ſame name. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 542.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 197.—Lucan. 6.——A citadel of Argos built by Danaus.

LARISSUS, a river of Peloponneſus flowing between Elis and Achaia. Strab. 8.

LARIUS, a large lake in Italy. Virg. G. 2, v. 159.

LARNOS, a ſmall deſolate iſland on the coaſt of Thrace.

LARONIA, a ſhameleſs courteſan in Juvenal's age. Juv. 2, v. 86.

LARS TOLUMNIUS, a king of the Veientes conquered by the Romans, and put to death, A. U. C. 329. Liv. 4, c. 17 & 19.

LARTIUS FLORUS, a conſul, who appeaſed a ſedition raiſed by the poorer citizens, and was the firſt dictator ever choſen at Rome, B. C. 498. He made Spurius Caſſius his maſter of horſe, Liv. 2, c. 18.——One of the three Romans, who alone withſtood the fury of Porſenna's army at the head of a bridge while the communication was cutting down behind them. His companions were Cocles and Herminius. Vid. Cocles. Liv. 2, c. 10 & 18.—Dionyſ. Hal.—Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—The name of Lartius has been common to many Romans.

LARTOLÆTANI, a people of Spain.

LARVÆ, a name given to the wicked ſpirits and apparitions which, according to the notions of the Romans, iſſued from their graves in the night and came to terrify the world. As the word larva ſignifies a maſk, whoſe horrid and uncouth appearance often ſerves to frighten children, that name has been given to the ghoſts or ſpectres which ſuperſtition believes to hover around the graves of the dead. Some call them Lemures. Servius in Virg. Æn. 5, v. 64. L. v. 152.

LARYMNA, a town of Bœotia, where Bacchus had a temple and a ſtatue.—Another in Ciria.

LARYSIUM, a mountain of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 22.

LASSIA, an antient name of Andros.

LASSUS, or LASUS, a dithyrambic poet born at Hermione in Peloponneſus, about 500 years before Chriſt, and reckoned among the wiſe men of Greece by ſome. He is particularly known by the anſwer he gave to a man who aſked him what could beſt render life pleaſant and comfortable? Experience. He was acquainted with muſic. Some fragments of his poetry are to be found in Athenæus. He wrote an ode upon the Centaurs and an hymn to Ceres without inſerting the letter S in the compoſition. Athen. 10.

LASTHENES, a governor of Olynthus corrupted by Philip king of Macedonia.——A Cretan demagogue conquered by Metellus the Roman general.—A cruel miniſter at the court of the Seleucidæ, kings of Syria.

LASTHENIA, a woman who diſguiſed herſelf to come and hear Plato's leſſons. Diog.

LATAGUS, a king of Pontus who aſſiſted

Æetes against his enemies, &c. Flacc. 5, &c.——One of the companions of Æneas killed by Mezentius. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 697.

LATERANUS PLAUTUS, a Roman consul elect A. D. 65. A conspiracy with Piso against the emperor Nero proved fatal to him. He was led to execution, where he refused to confess the associates of the conspiracy, and did not even frown at the executioner who was as guilty as himself, but when a first blow could not sever his head from his body, he looked at the executioner and shaking his head he returned it to the hatchet with the greatest composure and it was cut off. There exists now a celebrated palace at Rome which derives its name from its antient possessors, the Laterani.

LATERIUM, the villa of Q. Cicero at Arpinum. Cic. ad Attic. 4 & 7.

LATIALIS, a surname of Jupiter who was worshipped by the inhabitants of Latium upon mount Albanus at stated times. The festivals which were first instituted by Tarquin the Proud, lasted 15 days. Liv. 21. ——Vid. Feriæ Latinæ.

LATINI, the inhabitants of Latium. Vid. Latium.

LATINIUS LATIARIS, a celebrated informer. &c. Tacit.

LATINUS, a son of Faunus by Marica, king of the Aborigines in Italy, who from him were called Latini. He married Amata by whom he had a son and a daughter. The son died in his infancy, and the daughter called Lavinia, was secretly promised in marriage by her mother to Turnus king of the Rutuli, one of her most powerful admirers. The gods opposed this union and the oracles declared that Lavinia must become the wife of a foreign prince. The arrival of Æneas in Italy seemed favorable to this prediction, and Latinus, by offering his daughter to the foreign prince and making him his friend and ally, seemed to have fulfilled the commands of the oracle. Turnus however disapproved of the conduct of Latinus, he claimed Lavinia as his lawful wife, and prepared to support his cause by arms. Æneas took up arms in his own defence, and Latium was the seat of the war. After mutual losses it was agreed, that the quarrel should be decided by the two rivals, and Latinus promised his daughter to the conqueror. Æneas obtained the victory and married Lavinia. Latinus soon after died and was succeeded by his son in law. Virg. Æn. 9, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, &c. Fast. 2, &c. —Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 13.—Liv. 1, c. 1, c, &c. —Justin 43, c. 1.——A son of Sylvius Æneas surnamed also Sylvius. He was the 5th king of the Latins and succeeded his father. He was father to Alba his successor. Dionys. 1, c. 15.—Liv. 2, c. 3.

LATIUM, a country of Italy near the river Tiber. It was originally very circumscribed, but afterwards it comprehended the territories of the Volsci, Æqui, Hernici, Ausones, Umbri, and Rutuli. The first inhabitants were called Aborigines, and received the name of Latini from Latinus their king. According to others the word is derived from lateo, to conceal, because Saturn concealed himself there when flying the resentment of his son Jupiter. Laurentum was the capital of the country in the reign of Latinus; Lavinium under Æneas and Alba under Ascanius, (Vid. Alba.) The Latins, though originally known only among their neighbours, soon rose in consequence when Romulus had founded the city of Rome in their country. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 322—Strab. 5.—Dionys. Hal.—Justin 20, c. 1.—Plut. in Romul.—Plin. 3, c. 12.

LATIUS, a surname of Jupiter at Rome. Stat. 5. Sylv. 2, v. 392.

LATMUS, a mountain of Caria near Miletus. It is famous for the residence of Endymion whom the moon regularly visited in the night, whence he is often called Latmius Heros. [Vid. Endymion] Mela. 1, c. 17.—Ovid Trist. 2.—Art. Am. 3.

LATOUS, a name given to Apollo as son of Latona.—Ovid. Met. 6. fab. 9.

LABORIUS, the god of health among the Corinthians.

LABOTRIGI, a people of Belgic Gaul.

LATOIS, a name of Diana as being the daughter of Latona.—A country house near Ephesus.

LATONA, a daughter of Cœus the Titan and Phœbe, or, according to Homer, of Saturn. She was admired for her beauty, and celebrated for the favors which she granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her husband's amours, made Latona the object of her vengeance, and sent the serpent Python to disturb her peace and persecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra, influenced by Juno refused to give her a place where she might rest and bring forth. Neptune, moved with compassion, struck with his trident, and made immoveable, the island of Delos which before wandered in the Ægean, and appeared sometimes above, and sometimes below, the surface of the sea. Latona changed into a quail by Jupiter, came to Delos, where she resumed her original shape, and gave birth to Apollo and Diana, leaning against a palm tree or an olive. Her repose was of short duration, Juno discovered the place of her retreat and obliged her to fly from Delos. She wandered over the greatest part of the world, and in Caria, where where her fatigue compelled her to ſtop, ſhe was inſulted and ridiculed by peaſants of whom ſhe aſked for water while they were weeding a marſh. Their refuſal and inſolence provoked her, and ſhe entreated Jupiter to puniſh their barbarity. They were all changed into frogs. She was expoſed to greater violence by Niobe, who boaſted herſelf greater than the mother of Apollo and Diana, and ridiculed the preſents which the piety of her neighbours had offered to Latona. [Vid. Niobe.] Her beauty proved fatal to the giant Tityus, whom Apollo and Diana put to death. [Vid. Tityus.] At laſt, Latona, though perſecuted and expoſed to the reſentment of Juno, became a powerful deity, and ſaw her children receive divine honors. Her worſhip was generally eſtabliſhed where her children received adoration particularly at Argos, Delos, &c. where ſhe had temples. She had an oracle in Egypt, celebrated for the true deciſive anſwers which it gave. Diod. 5.—Herodot. 2, c. 155.—Pauſ. 2 & 3.—Homer, Il. 21. Hymn. in Ap. & Dian.—Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 3. c. 5 & 10. Ovid. Met. 6. v. 160.—Hygin. fab. 140.

LAUDĂMIA, a daughter of Alexander king of Epirus and Olympias daughter of Pyrrhus, killed in a temple of Diana, by the enraged populace. Juſtin, 28, c. 3.

LAVERNA, the goddeſs of thieves and diſhoneſt perſons at Rome. She did not only preſide over robbers, but ſhe protected ſuch as deceived others, or formed their ſecret machinations in obſcurity and ſilence. Her worſhip was very popular, and the Romans raiſed her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which, from that circumſtance, was called the gate of Laverna. She was generally repreſented by a head without a body. Horat. 1. ep. 16, v. 60.—Varro de L. L. 4——A place mentioned by Plut. &c.

LAUFELLA, a wanton woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 319.

LAVIANA, a province of Armenia Minor.

LĂVINIA, a daughter of king Latinus and Amata. She was betrothed to her relation king Turnus, but becauſe the oracle ordered her father to marry her to a foreign prince, ſhe was given to Æneas after the death of Turnus. [Vid. Latinus.] At her huſband's death ſhe was left pregnant, and being fearful of the tyranny of Aſcanius her ſon-in law, ſhe fled into the woods, where ſhe brought forth a ſon called Æneas Sylvius. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6 & 7.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 507.—Liv. 1. c. 1.

LAVĪNIUM or LAVĪNUM, a town of Italy, built by Æneas, and called by that name in honor of Lavinia, the founder's wife. It was the capital of Latium during the reign of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 262.—Strab. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Juſtin. 43, c. 2.

LAUSA, a place near Alexandria, in Egypt.

LAURENTĂLIA, certain feſtivals celebrated at Rome in honor of Laurentia, in the calends of January. They were, in proceſs of time, part of the Saturnalia. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 57.

LAURENTES AGRI, the country in the neighbourhood of Laurentum. Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 41.

LAURENTIA. Vid. Acca.

LAURENTINI, the inhabitants of Latium. They received this name from the great number of laurels which grew in the country. King Latinus found one of uncommon largeneſs and beauty, when he was going to build a temple to Apollo, and the tree was conſecrated to the god. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 59.

LAURENTUM, the capital of the kingdom of Latium in the reign of Latinus. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

LAURENTIUS, belonging to Laurentum or Latium. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 709.

LAURION, a place of Attica, where was a gold mine. Thucyd. 2.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1.

LAURON, a town of Spain, where Pompey's ſon was conquered by Cæſar's army.

LAUS POMPEIA, a town of Italy, founded by a colony ſent thither by Pompey.

LAUSUS, a ſon of Numitor, and brother of Ilia. He was put to death by his uncle Amulius, who uſurped his father's throne. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 54.——A ſon of Mezentius, king of the Tyrrhenians, killed by Æneas in the war which his father and Turnus made againſt the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 649, l. 10, v. 426, &c.

LAUTIUM, a city of Latium.

LEADES, a ſon of Aſtacus, who killed Eteoclus. Apollod.

LEÆI, a nation of Pæonia, near Macedonia.

LEÆNA, an Athenian harlot, who bit off her tongue, not to betray the aſſociates in the conſpiracy of Ariſtogiton and Harmodius.

LEANDER, a youth of Abydos, famous for his amours with Hero. Vid. Hero.——A Mileſian, who wrote an hiſtorical commentary upon his country.

LEANDRE, a daughter of Amyclas, who married Arcas. Apollod.

LEANDRIAS, a Lacedæmonian refugee at Thebes, who declared, according to an ancient oracle, that Sparta would loſe the ſuperiority over Greece, when conquered by the Thebans at Leuctra. Diod. 15.

LEARCHUS, a ſon of Athamas and Ino, crushed to death against a wall by his father in a fit of madness. [Vid. Athamas.] Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 490.

LEBADEA, a town of Bœotia, near mount Helicon. It received this name from the mother of Aspledon, and became famous for the oracle and cave of Trophonius. No mules could live there, according to Pliny. Strab. 9.—Plin. 24, c. 9.—Paus. 9, c. 39.

LEBEDUS or LEBEDOS, a town of Ionia, at the north of Colophon, where festivals were yearly observed in honor of Bacchus. Lysimachus destroyed it, and carried part of the inhabitants to Ephesus. It had been founded by an Athenian colony, under one of the sons of Codrus. Strab. 14.—Horat. 1, ep. 11.—Herodot. 1, c. 142.

LEBENA, a commercial town of Crete, with a temple sacred to Æsculapius. Paus. 2, c. 26.

LEBINTHOS & LEBYNTHOS, an island in the Ægean sea, near Patmos. Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

LECHÆUM, a port of Corinth, in the bay of Corinth. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 381.

LECYTHUS, a town of Eubœa.

LEDA, a daughter of king Thespius and Eurythemis, who married Tyndarus, king of Sparta. She was seen bathing in the river Eurotas by Jupiter, when she was some few days advanced in her pregnancy, and the god, struck with her beauty, resolved to deceive her. He persuaded Venus to change herself into an eagle, while he assumed the form of a swan; and, after this metamorphosis, Jupiter, as if fearful of the tyrannical cruelty of the bird of prey, fled through the air into the arms of Leda, who willingly sheltered the trembling swan from the assaults of his superior enemy. The caresses with which the naked Leda received the swan, enabled Jupiter to avail himself of his situation, and, nine months after this adventure, the wife of Tyndarus brought forth two eggs, of one of which sprang Pollux and Helena, and of the other Castor and Clytemnestra. The two former were deemed the offspring of Jupiter, and the others claimed Tyndarus for their father. Some mythologists attribute this amour to Nemesis, and not to Leda; and they further mention, that Leda was entrusted with the education of the children which sprang from the eggs brought forth by Nemesis. [Vid. Helena.] To reconcile this diversity of opinions, others maintain that Leda received the name of Nemesis after death. Homer and Hesiod make no mention of the metamorphosis of Jupiter into a swan, whence some have imagined that the fable was unknown to these two ancient poets, and probably invented since their age. Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3. c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 109.—Hesiod. 17, v. 55.—Hygin. fab. 77.—Lycor. in Hel.—Homer. Od. 11.—Eurip. in Hel.—A famous dancer in the age of Juvenal 6, v. 63.

LEDÆUS, an epithet given to Hercules, &c. as related to Leda. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 564.

LEDUS, a river of Gaul. Mela. 2, c. 5.

LEGIO, a corps of soldiers in the Roman armies, whose numbers have been different at different times. The legion under Romulus consisted of 3000 foot and 300 horse, and was soon after augmented to 4000, after the admission of the Sabines into the city. When Annibal was in Italy it consisted of 5000 soldiers, and afterwards it was decreased to 4000, or 4500. Marius made it consist of 6100, besides 700 horse. This was the period of its greatness in numbers. Livy speaks of ten, and even eighteen, legions kept at Rome. During the consular government it was usual to levy and fit up four legions, which were divided between the two consuls. This number was, however, often increased, as time and occasion required. Augustus maintained a standing army of twenty-three or twenty-five legions, and this number was seldom diminished. In the reign of Tiberius there were 27 legions, and the peace establishment of Adrian maintained no less than 30 of these formidable brigades. They were distributed over the Roman empire, and their stations were settled and permanent. The peace of Britain was protected by three legions; fifteen were stationed on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, viz. two in Lower, and three in Upper, Germany; one in Noricum, one in Rhætia, three in Mœsia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia. Eight were stationed on the Euphrates, six of which remained in Syria, and two in Cappadocia, while the remote provinces of Egypt, Africa, and Spain, were guarded each by a single legion. Besides these, the tranquillity of Rome was preserved by 20,000 soldiers, who, under the titles of city cohorts and of prætorian guards, watched over the safety of the monarch and of the capital. The legions were distinguished by different appellations, and generally borrowed their name from the order in which they were first raised, as prima, secunda, tertia, quarta, &c. Besides this distinction, another more expressive was generally added, as from the name of the emperor who embodied them, as Augusta, Claudiana, Galbiana, Flavia, Ulpia, Trajana, Antoniana, &c. from the provinces or quarters where they were stationed, as Britannica, Cyrenica, Gallica, &c. from the provinces which had been subdued by their valor, as Parthica, Scythica, Arabica, Africana, &c. from the names of the deities whom their generals particularly worshipped, as Minervia, Apollinaris, &c. or from more trifling accidents, as Martia, Fulminatrix, Rapax, Adjutrix, &c. Each legion was divided into ten cohorts, each cohort into three manipuli, and every every maniple into three centuries or ordines. The chief commander of the legion was called legatus; lieutenant. The ſtandards born by the legions were various. In the firſt ages of Rome a wolf was the ſtandard, in honor of Romulus; afterwards a hog, becauſe that animal was generally ſacrificed at the concluſion of a treaty, and therefore it indicated that war is undertaken for the obtaining of peace. A minotaur was ſometimes the ſtandard, to intimate the ſecrecy with which the general was to act in commemoration of the labyrinth. Sometimes a horſe or a boar were uſed, till the age of Marius, who changed all theſe for the eagle, being a repreſentation of that bird in ſilver, holding ſometimes a thunderbolt in its claws. The Roman eagle ever after remained in uſe, though Trajan made uſe of the dragon.

LEITUS, one of the five Bœotian generals who came to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2. ——One of the Argonauts, ſon of Alector. Apollod. 2, c. 9.

LELAPS, a dog that never failed to ſeize and conquer whatever animal he was ordered to purſue. It was given to Procris by Diana, and Procris reconciled herſelf to her huſband by preſenting him with that valuable preſent. According to ſome, Procris had received it from Minos, as a reward for the dangerous wounds of which ſhe had cured him. Hygin. fab. 128.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 771.—Pauſ. 9, c. 19.—One of Actæon's dogs.

LELEGES, (a λεγω, to gather) a wandering people, compoſed of different unconnected nations. They were originally inhabitants of Caria, and went to the Trojan war with Altes their king. Achilles plundered their country, and obliged them to retire to the neighbourhood of Halicarnaſſus, where they fixed their habitation. The inhabitants of Laconia and Megara bore this name for ſome time, from Lelex, one of th ir kings. Strab. 7 & 8.—Homer. Il. 21.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 725. —Pauſ. 3, c. 1.

LELEX, an Egyptian, who came with a colony to Megara, where he reigned about 200 years before the Trojan war. His ſubjects were called from him Leleges, and the place Lelegia mœnia. Pauſ. 3, c. 1.——A Greek, who was the firſt king of Laconia, in Peloponneſus. His ſubjects were alſo called Lelrges, and the country where he reigned Lelegia. Id.

LEMANNUS, a lake in the country of the Allobroges, through which the Rhone flows. Lucan. 1, v. 396.—Mela. 2, c. 5.

LEMNOS, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, between Tenedos, Imbros and Samothrace. It was ſacred to Vulcan, called Lemnius pater, who fell there when kicked down from heaven by Jupiter. (Vid. Vulcanus.) It was celebrated for two horrible maſſacres, that of the Lemnian women murdering their huſbands, (Vid. Hipſipyle.) and that of the Lemnians, or Pelaſgi, in killing all the children they had had by ſome Athenian women, whom they had carried away to become their wives. Theſe two acts of cruelty have given riſe to the proverb of Lemnian actions, which is applied to all barbarous and inhuman deeds. The firſt inhabitants of Lemnos were the Pelaſgi, or rather the Thracians, who were murdered by their wives. After them came the children of the Lemnian widows by the Argonauts, whoſe deſcendants were at laſt expelled by the Pelaſgi, about 1200 years before the Chriſtian era. Lemnos is about 112 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, who ſays, that it is often ſhadowed by mount Athos, though at the diſtance of 87 miles. It has been called Hipſipyle, from queen Hipſipyle. It is famous for a certain kind of earth or chalk, called terra Lemnia, or terra ſigillata, from the ſeal or impreſſion which it can bear. As the inhabitants were blackſmiths, the poets have taken occaſion to fix the forges of Vulcan in that iſland, and to conſecrate the whole country to his divinity. Lemnos is alſo celebrated for a labyrinth, which, according to ſome traditions, ſurpaſſed thoſe of Crete and Egypt. Some remains of it were ſtill viſible in the age of Pliny. The iſland of Lemnos, now called Stalimene, was reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades, and the Carians, who then inhabited it, obliged to emigrate. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 454. *Homer. LEMOVII, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ.

LEMURES, the manes of the dead. The ancients ſuppoſed that the ſouls, after death, wandered all over the world, and diſturbed the peace of its inhabitants. The good ſpirits were called lares familiares, and the evil ones were known by the name of Larvæ, or Lemures. They terrified the good, and continually haunted the wicked and impious; and the Romans had the ſuperſtition to celebrate feſtivals in their honor, called Lemuria or Lemuralia, in the month of May. They were firſt inſtituted by Romulus to appeaſe the manes of his brother Remus, from whom they were called Remuria, and, by corruption, Lemuria. Theſe ſolemnities continued three nights, during which the temples of the gods were ſhut, and marriages prohibited. It was uſual for the people to throw black beans on the graves of the deceaſed, or to burn them, as the ſmell was ſuppoſed to be inſupportable to them. They alſo muttered magical words, and, by beating kettles and drums, they believed that the ghoſts would depart, depart, and no longer come to terrify their relations upon earth. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 421, &c.

LEMŪRIA & LEMŪRĀLIA. Vid. Lemures.

LENÆUS, a ſirname of Bacchus, from ληνος, a wine preſs. There was a feſtival, called Lenæa, celebrated in his honor, in which the ceremonies obſerved at the other feſtivals of the god chiefly prevailed. There were, beſides, poetical contentions, &c. Pauſ.—Virg. G. 2, v. 4. Æn. 4, v. 207.—*Ovid. He joined in Catiline's conſpiracy, and aſſiſted in corrupting the Allobroges. He was convicted in full ſenate by Cicero, and put in priſon, and afterwards executed. ——A conſul who triumphed over the Samnites.——Cn. Lentulus, ſirnamed Gætulicus, was made conſul, A. D. 26, and was, ſome time after, put to death by Tiberius, who was jealous of his great popularity. He wrote an hiſtory, mentioned by Suetonius, and attempted alſo poetry.——L. Lentulus, a friend of Pompey, put to death in Africa.——P. Corn. Lentulus, a prætor, defeated by the rebellious ſlaves in Sicily. —— Lentulus Spinther, a ſenator, kindly uſed by J. Cæſar, &c.——A tribune at the battle of Cannæ. ——P. Lentulus, a friend of Brutus.——Beſides theſe, there are a few others, whoſe name is only mentioned in hiſtory, and whoſe life was not marked by any common event. The conſulſhip was in the family of the Lentuli in the years of Rome 428, 577, 415, 526, 551, 553, 594, 596, &c. Tacit. Ann. —Liv.—Flor.—Plin.—Plut.—Eutrop.

LEO, a native of Byzantium, who floriſhed about 350 years before the Chriſtian æra. His philoſophical and political talents endeared him to his countrymen, and he was always ſent upon every important occaſion as ambaſſador to Athens, or to the court of Philip, king of Macedonia. This monarch, well acquainted with the abilities of Leo, was ſenſible that his views and claims to Byzantium would never ſucceed while it was protected by the vigilance of ſuch a patriotic citizen. To remove him he had recourſe to artifice and perfidy. A letter was forged, in which Leo made ſolemn promiſes of betraying his country to the king of Macedonia for money. This was no ſooner known than the people ran enraged to the houſe of Leo, and the philoſopher, to avoid their fury, and without attempting his juſtification, ſtrangled himſelf. He had written ſome treatiſes upon phyſic and hiſtory, which have been loſt. Plut.——A Corinthian at Syracuſe, &c.——A king of Sparta.——A ſon of Eurycrates. Athen. 12.—Philoſtr.——An emperor of the eaſt, ſirnamed the Thracian. He reigned 17 years, and died A. D. 474, being ſucceeded by Leo the Second for 10 months, and afterwards by Zeno.

LEOCORION, a monument erected by the Athenians to Paſithea, Theope, and Eubule, daughters of Leo, who immolated themſelves when an oracle had ordered that, to ſtop the raging peſtilence, ſome of the blood of the citizens muſt be ſhed.

LEOCRĀTES, an Athenian general, who floriſhed B. C. 460, &c. Diod. 11.

LEODĀMAS, a ſon of Eteocles, one of the ſeven Theban chiefs who defended the city againſt the Argives. He killed Ægialeus, and was himſelf killed by Alcmæon.—— A ſon of Hector and Andromache. Dict. Cret.

LEOGŌRAS, an Athenian debauchee, who maintained the courtezan Myrrhina.

LEON, a king of Sparta, Herodot. 7, c. 204. ——A town of Sicily, near Syracuſe. Liv. 24, c. 25.

LEONA, a courtezan, who was concerned in the conſpiracy of Ariſtogiton and Harmodius, &c.

LEONĀTUS, one of Alexander's generals. His father's name was Eunus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Alexander's conqueſt of Aſia, and once ſaved the king's life in a dangerous battle. After the death of Alexander, at the general diviſion of the provinces, he received for his portion that part of Phrygia which borders on the Helleſpont. He was empowered by Perdiccas to aſſiſt Eumenes in making himſelf maſter of the province of Cappadocia, which had been allotted to him. Like the reſt of the generals of Alexander, he was ambitious of power and dominion. He aſpired to the ſovereignty of Macedonia, and ſecretly communicated to Eumenes the different plans he meant to purſue to execute his deſigns. He paſſed from Aſia into Europe to aſſiſt Antipater againſt the Athenians, and was killed in a battle which was fought ſoon after his arrival. Hiſtorians have mentioned, as an inſtance of the luxury of Leonatus, that he employed a number of camels to procure ſome earth from Egypt to wreſtle upon, as, in his opinion, it ſeemed better calculated for that purpoſe. Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Diod. 18.—C. Nep. in Eum.——A Macedonian with Pyrrhus in Italy againſt the Romans.

LEONIDAS,

LEONIDAS, a celebrated king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, sent by his countrymen to oppose Xerxes, king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with about five millions of souls. He was offered the kingdom of Greece by the enemy, if he would not oppose his views; but Leonidas heard the proposal with indignation, and observed, that he preferred death for his country, to an unjust though extensive dominion over it. Before the engagement Leonidas exhorted his soldiers, and told them all to dine heartily, as they were to sup in the realms of Pluto. The battle was fought at Thermopylæ, and the 300 Spartans, who alone had refused to abandon the scene of action, withstood the enemy with such vigor, that they were obliged to retire, wearied and conquered during three successive days, till Ephialtes, a Trachinian, had the perfidy to conduct a detachment of Persians by a secret path up the mountains, whence they suddenly fell upon the rear of the Spartans, and crushed them to pieces. Only one escaped of the 300; he returned home, where he was treated with insult and reproaches, for flying ingloriously from a battle in which his brave companions, with their royal leader, had perished. This celebrated battle, which happened 480 years before the Christian era, taught the Greeks to despise the numbers of the Persians, and to rely upon their own strength and intrepidity. Temples were raised to the fallen hero, and festivals, called Leonidea, yearly celebrated at Sparta, in which free-born youths contended. Leonidas, as he departed for the battle from Lacedæmon, gave no other injunctions to his wife, but, after his death, to marry a man of virtue and honor, to raise from her children deserving of the name and greatness of her first husband. Herodot. 7, c. 120, &c.—C. Nep. in Them. Justin. 2.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—Paus. 3, c. 4.—Plut. in Lyc. & Cleom.——A king of Sparta after Areus II. 257 years before Christ. He was driven from his kingdom by Cleombrotus, his son-in-law, and afterwards re-established.——A preceptor to Alexander the Great.——A friend of Parmenio, appointed commander, by Alexander, of the soldiers who lamented the death of Parmenio, and who formed a separate cohort. Curt. 7, c. 2.——A learned man of Rhodes, greatly commended by Strabo, &c.

LEONTIUM & LEONTINI, a town of Sicily, about five miles distant from the sea shore. It was built by a colony from Chalcis, in Eubœa, and was, according to some accounts, once the habitation of the Læstrygones, for which reason the neighbouring fields are often called Læstrygonii campi. The country was extremely fruitful, whence Cicero calls it the grand magazine of Sicily. The wine which it produced was the best of the island. The people of Leontium implored the assistance of the Athenians against the Syracusans, B. C. 427. Thucyd. 6.—Polyb. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 467.—Stat. 14, v. 126.

LEONTIUM, a celebrated courtezan of Athens, who studied philosophy under Epicurus, and became one of his warmest pupils. She prostituted herself to the philosopher's scholars, and even to Epicurus himself, if we believe the reports which were raised by some of his enemies. [Vid. Epicurus.] Metrodotus shared her favors in the most unbounded manner, and by him she had a son, to whom Epicurus was so partial that he recommended him to his executors on his dying bed. Leontium not only professed herself a warm admirer and follower of the doctrines of Epicurus, but she even wrote a book in support of them against Theophrastus. This book was valuable, if we believe the testimony and criticism of Cicero, who praised the purity and elegance of its style, and the truly Attic turn of the expressions. Leontium had also a daughter called Danae, who married Sophron. Cic. de nat. D. 1, c. 33.

LEONTON or LEONTOPOLIS, a town of Phœnicia.

LEONTYCHIDES. Vid. Leotychides.

LEOS, a son of Orpheus, who immolated his three daughters for the good of Athens. Vid. Leocorion.

LEOSTHENES, an Athenian general, who, after Alexander's death, drove Antipater to Thessaly, where he besieged him in the town of Lamia. The success which for a while attended his arms was soon changed by a fatal blow which he received from a stone thrown by the besieged, B. C. 323. The death of Leosthenes was soon followed by a total defeat of the Athenian forces. The funeral oration over his body was pronounced at Athens by Hyperides, in the absence of Demosthenes, who had been lately banished for taking a bribe from Harpalus. [Vid. Lamiacum.] Diod. 17 & 11.—Strab. 9.——Another general of Athens, condemned on account of the bad success which attended his arms.

LEOTYCHIDES, a king of Sparta, son of Menares, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was set over the Grecian fleet, and, by his courage and valor, he put an end to the Persian war at the famous battle of Mycale. It is said that he cheared the spirits of his fellow soldiers at Mycale, who were anxious for their countrymen in Greece, by raising a report that a battle had been fought at Platæa, in which the barbarians had been defeated. This succeeded, and though the information was false, yet a battle was fought at Platæa, in which the Greeks obtained the victory the same ſame day that the Perſian fleet was deſtroyed at Mycale. Leotychides was accuſed of a capital crime by the Ephori, and, to avoid the puniſhment which his guilt ſeemed to deſerve, he fled to the temple of Minerva at Tegea, where he periſhed, B. C. 469, after a reign of 22 years. He was ſucceeded by his grandſon Archidamus. Pauſ. 3, c. 7 & 8.—Diod. 11.——A ſon of Agis, king of Sparta, by Timæa. The legitimacy of his birth was diſputed by ſome, and it was generally believed that he was the ſon of Alcibiades. He was prevented from aſcending the throne of Sparta by Lyſander, though Agis had declared him upon his death-bed his lawful ſon and heir, and Ageſilaus was appointed in his place. C. Nep. in Ageſ.—Plut.—Pauſ. 3, c. 8.

Lepida, a noble woman, accuſed of attempts to poiſon her huſband, from whom ſhe had been ſeparated for 20 years. She was condemned under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 22.——A woman who married Scipio.——Domitia, a daughter of Antonia, great niece to Auguſtus, and aunt to the emperor Nero. She is deſcribed by Tacitus as a common proſtitute, infamous in her manners, violent in her temper, and yet celebrated for her beauty. She was put to death by means of her rival Agrippina, Nero's mother. Tacit.——A wife of Galba the emperor.——A wife of Caſſius, &c.

Lepidus M. Æmilius, a Roman, celebrated as being one of the triumvirs with Auguſtus and Antony. He was of an illuſtrious family, and, like the reſt of his contemporaries, he was remarkable for his ambition, to which was added a narrowneſs of mind, and a great deficiency of military abilities. He was ſent againſt Cæſar's murderers, and, ſome time after, he leagued with M. Antony, who had gained the heart of his ſoldiers by artifice, and that of their commander by his addreſs. When his influence and power among the ſoldiers had made him one of the triumvirs, he ſhewed his cruelty, like his colleagues, by his proſcriptions, and even ſuffered his own brother to be ſacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirate. He received Africa as his portion in the diviſion of the empire; but his indolence ſoon rendered him deſpicable in the eyes of his ſoldiers and of his colleagues; and Auguſtus, who was well acquainted with the unpopularity of Lepidus, went to his camp and obliged him to reſign the power to which he was entitled as being a triumvir. After this degrading event, he ſunk into obſcurity, and retired, by order of Auguſtus, to Cerceii, a ſmall town on the coaſt of Latium, where he ended his days in peace, B. C. 13, and where he was forgotten as ſoon as out of power. Appian.—Plut. in Aug.—Flor. 4, c. 6 & 7.——A Roman conſul, ſent to be the guardian of young Ptolemy Epiphanes, whom his father had left to the care of the Roman people. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 67.—Juſtin. 30, c. 3.——A ſon of Julia, the grand-daughter of Auguſtus. He was intended by Caius as his ſucceſſor in the Roman empire. He committed adultery with Agrippina when young. Dion. 59.——An orator, mentioned by Cicero in Brut.——A cenſor, A. U. C. 734.

Lephyrium, a city of Cilicia.

Lepinus, a mountain of Italy. Calum. 10.

Leponti, a people at the ſources of the Rhine.

Lepreos, a ſon of Pyrgeus, who built a town in Elis, which he called after his own name. He laid a wager that he would eat as much as Hercules; upon which he killed an ox and eat it up. He afterwards challenged Hercules to a trial of ſtrength, and was killed. Pauſ. 5, c. 5.

Leprium, a town of Elis. Plin. 4, c. 5.

Leptines, a general of Demetrius, who ordered Cn. Octavius, one of the Roman ambaſſadors, to be put to death.——A ſon of Hermocrates, of Syracuſe, brother to Dionyſius. He was ſent by his brother againſt the Carthaginians, and experienced ſo much ſucceſs that he ſunk fifty of their ſhips. He was afterwards defeated by Mago, and baniſhed by Dionyſius. He always continued a faithful friend to the intereſts of his brother, though naturally an avowed enemy to tyranny and oppreſſion. Diod. 15.——A famous orator at Athens, who endeavoured to unload the people from oppreſſive taxes. He was oppoſed by Demoſthenes.——A tyrant of Apollonia, in Sicily, who ſurrendered to Timoleon. Diod. 16.

Leptis, the name of two cities of Africa, one of which, called Major, was near the Syrtes, and had been built by a Tyrian or Sidonian colony. The other, called Minor, was about eighteen Roman miles from Adrumetum. It paid every day a talent to the republic of Carthage, by way of tribute. Lucan. 2, v. 252.—Plin. 5, c. 19.—Salluſt. in Jug.—Mela. 1, c. 8.—Strab. 3, p. 256.

Lerna, an iſland in the Ægean Sea, on the coaſt of Caria, about eighteen miles in circumference. Its inhabitants were very diſhoneſt. Strab. 10.—Herodot. 5, c. 125.

Lerina or Planasia, a ſmall iſland in the Mediterranean, on the coaſt of Gaul. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.

Lerna, a country of Argolis, celebrated for a grove and a lake, where, according to the poets, the Danaides threw the heads of their murdered huſbands. It was there alſo that Hercules killed the famous hydra. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 803. & lib. 12. Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 597.—Lucret. 5.—*Stat. there in honor of Bacchus, Proſerpine, and Ceres. The Argives uſed to carry fire to this ſolemnity from a temple upon mount Crathis, dedicated to Diana. Pauſ.

Lero, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Gaul.

Leros. Vid. Leria.

Lesbos, a large iſland in the Ægean ſea, now known by the name of Metelin; 168 miles in circumference. It has been ſeverally called Pelaſgia, from the Pelaſgi by whom it was firſt peopled, Macaria from Macareus who ſettled in it, and Leſbos from the ſon-in-law and ſucceſſor of Macareus who bore the ſame name. The chief towns of Leſbos were Methymna and Mitylene. Leſbos was originally governed by kings, but they were afterwards ſubjected to the neighbouring powers. The wine which it produced was greatly eſteemed by the antients, and ſtill is in the ſame repute among the moderns. The Leſbians were ſo debauched and diſſipate, that the epithet of Leſbian was often uſed to ſignify debauchery and extravagance. Leſbos has given birth to many illuſtrious perſons, ſuch as Arion, Terpander, &c. The beſt verſes were by way of eminence often called Leſboum carmen, from Alcæus and Sappho who diſtinguiſhed themſelves for their poetical compoſitions, and were alſo natives of the place. Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. G. 2, v. 90.—Horat. 1. ep. 11.—Herodot. 1, c. 160.

Lesbus or Lesbos, a ſon of Lapithas, grandſon of Æolus, who married Methymna daughter of Macareus. He ſucceeded his father-in-law, and gave his name to the iſland over which he reigned.

Lesches, a Greek poet of Leſbos, who floriſhed, B. C. 600. Some ſuppoſe him to be the author of the little Iliad, of which only few verſes remain quoted by Pauſ. 10, c. 25.

Lestrygŏnes. Vid. Læſtrygones.

Letănum, a town of Propontis, built by the Athenians.

Lethæus, a river of Lydia flowing by Magneſia into the Mæander. Strab. 10, &c. ——Another of Macedonia.

Lethe, one of the rivers of hell, whoſe waters the ſouls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain ſpace of time in Tartarus. It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, ſeen, or heard before, as the name implies, λήθη, oblivion.——Lethe is a river of Africa, near the Syrtes, which runs under the ground, and ſome time after riſes again, whence the origin of the fable of the Lethean ſtreams of oblivion.——There is alſo a river of that name in Spain.——Another in Bœotia, whoſe waters were drunk by thoſe who conſulted the oracle of Trophonius. Lucan. 9, v. 355.—Ovid. Triſt. 4, el. 1. v. 47.—Virg. G. 4, v. 545. Æn. 6. v. 714.—Ital. 5, v. 235. l. 10, v. 535. Pauſ. 9, c. 39.

Letus, a mountain of Liguria. Liv. 41. c. 18.

Levana, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over the action of the perſon who took up from the ground a newly born child, after it had been placed there by the midwife. This was generally done by the father, and ſo religiouſly obſerved was this ceremony, that the legitimacy of a child could be diſputed without it.

Leuca, a town of the Salentines Lucan. 5, v. 376.——A town of Ionia——of Crete——of Argolis. Strab. 6, &c.

Leucas or Leucadia, an iſland of the Ionian ſea now called St. Maura, near the coaſt of Epirus, famous for a promontory where deſponding lovers threw themſelves into the ſea. Sappho had recourſe to this leap called Leucates to free herſelf from the violent paſſion which ſhe entertained for Phaon. The word is derived from λευκος, white, on account of the whiteneſs of its rocks. Apollo had a temple on the promontory, whence he is often called Leucadius. Ovid. Heroid. 15, v. 171.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ital. 15, v. 302.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 274. l. 8. v. 677.——A town of Phœnicia.

Leucasion, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 25.

Leucaspis, a Lycian, one of the companions of Æneas, drowned in the Tyrrhene ſea. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 334.

Leuce, a ſmall iſland in the Euxine ſea of a triangular form, between the mouths of the Danube and the Boryſthenes. According to the poets, the ſouls of the antient heroes were placed there as in the Elyſian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repoſe to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, ſeemed to entitle them. From that circumſtance it has often been called the iſland of the bleſſed, &c. According to ſome accounts Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and ſhared the pleaſures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ammian. 22.—Q. Calab. 3, v. 773.——One of the Oceanides whom Pluto carried into his kingdom.

Leuci, a people of Gaul, &c.

Leucippe, one of the Oceanides.

Leucippides, the daughters of Leucippus. Vid. Leucippus.

Leucippus, a celebrated philoſopher of Abdera, about 428 years before Chriſt. diſciple to Zeno. He was the firſt who invented the famous ſyſtem of atoms and of a vacuum, which was afterwards more fully fully explained by Democritus and Epicurus. Many of his hypotheſes have been adopted by the moderns, with advantage. Diogenes has written his life.——A brother of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who married Philodice daughter of Inachus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilaira and Phœbe, known by the patronymic of Leucippides. They were carried away by their couſins Caſtor and Pollux, as they were going to celebrate their nuptials with Lynceus and Idas. Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 701.—Apollod. 3, c. 10. &c.—Pauſ. 3, 17 & 26.——A ſon of Xanthus, deſcended from Bellerophon. He became deeply enamoured of one of his ſiſters, and when he was unable to check or reſtrain his unnatural paſſion, he reſolved to gratify it. He acquainted his mother with it, and threatened to murder himſelf if ſhe attempted to oppoſe his views or remove his affection. The mother, rather than loſe a ſon whom ſhe tenderly loved, cheriſhed his paſſion, and by her conſent her daughter yielded herſelf to the arms of her brother. Some time after the father reſolved to give his daughter in marriage to a Lycian prince. The future huſband was informed that the daughter of Xanthus ſecretly entertained a lover, and he communicated the intelligence to the father. Xanthus upon this ſecretly watched his daughter, and when Leucippus had introduced himſelf to her bed, the father in his eagerneſs to diſcover the ſeducer, occaſioned a little noiſe in the room. The daughter was alarmed, and as ſhe attempted to eſcape ſhe received a mortal wound from her father, who took her to be the lover. Leucippus came to her aſſiſtance, and ſtabbed his father in the dark, without knowing who he was. This accidental parricide obliged Leucippus to fly from his country. He came to Crete, where the inhabitants refuſed to give him an aſylum, when acquainted with the atrociouſneſs of his crime, and he at laſt came to Epheſus, where he died in the greateſt miſery and remorſe. Hermeſianax apud Parthen. c. 5.——A ſon of Œnomaus, who became enamoured of Daphne, and to obtain her confidence diſguiſed himſelf in a female dreſs, and attended his miſtreſs as a companion. He gained the affections of Daphne by his obſequiouſneſs and attention, but his artifice at laſt proved fatal, for when Daphne and her attendants were bathing in the Ladon, the ſex of Leucippus was diſcovered, and he periſhed by the darts of the females. Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.—Pauſ. 8, c. 20.—A ſon of Hercules by Marſe, one of the daughters of Theſpius. Apollod. 3, c. 7.

Leucŏla, a part of Cyprus.

Leucon, a tyrant of Boſphorus, who lived in great intimacy with the Athenians. He was a great patron of the uſeful arts, and greatly encouraged commerce. Strab.—Diod. 14.——A ſon of Athamas and Themiſto. Pauſ. 6, c. 22.——A king of Pontus killed by his brother, whoſe bed he had defiled. Ovid. in Ib. 3.——A town of Africa near Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 160.

Leucōne, a daughter of Aphidas, who gave her name to a fountain of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 44.

Leucōnes, a ſon of Hercules. Apollod.

Leuconoe, a daughter of Lycambes. The Leuconoe to whom Horace addreſſes his 1 od. 11, ſeems to be a fictitious name.

Leucopĕtra, a place on the iſthmus of Corinth, where the Achæans were defeated by the conſul Mummius.

Leucŏphrys, a temple of Diana, with a city of the ſame name, near the Mæander.—An antient name of Tenedos. Pauſ. 10, c. 14.

Leucopolis, a town of Caria.

Leucos, a river of Macedonia near Pydna.—A man, &c. Vid. Idomeneus.

Leucosia, a ſmall iſland in the Tyrrhene ſea. It received its name from one of the companions of Æneas, who was drowned there, or from one of the Sirens, who was thrown there by the ſea. Strab. 5.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708.

Leucosўrii, a people of Aſia Minor, called afterwards Cappadocians.

Leucŏthoe or Leucothea, the wife of Athamas, changed into a ſea deity. [Vid. Ino.] She was called Matuta by the Romans, who raiſed her a temple, where all the people, particularly women, offered vows for their brother's children. They did not entreat the deity to protect their own children, becauſe Ino had been unfortunate in her's. No female ſlaves were permitted to enter the temple, or if their curioſity tempted them to tranſgreſs this rule, they were beaten away with the greateſt ſeverity. To this ſupplicating for other people's children, Ovid alludes in theſe lines; Faſt. 6.

Non tamen hanc pro ſtirpe ſuâ pia mater adorat, Ipſa parum felix viſa fuiſſe parens.

——A daughter of king Orchamus by Eurynome. Apollo became enamoured of her, and to introduce himſelf to her with greater facility, he aſſumed the ſhape and features of her mother. Their happineſs was complete, when Clytia, who tenderly loved Apollo, and was jealous of his amours with Leucothoe, diſcovered the whole intrigue to her father, who ordered his daughter to be buried alive. The lover unable to ſave her from death, ſprinkled nectar and ambroſia on her tomb, which penetrating as far far as the body changed it into a beautiful tree which bears the frankincenſe. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 196.——An iſland of the Tyrrhene ſea, near Capreæ.—A fountain of Samos.—A town of Egypt,—of Arabia. Mela. 2, c. 7.——A part of Aſia which produces frankincenſe.

LEUCTRA, a village of Bœotia, between Platæa and Theſpia, famous for the victory which Epaminondas the Theban general obtained over the ſuperior force of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, on the 8th of July, B. C. 371. In this famous battle 4000 Spartans were killed, with their king Cleombrotus, and no more than 300 Thebans. From that time the Spartans loſt the empire of Greece, which had they obtained for near 500 years. Plut. in Pelop. & Ageſ.—C. Nep. in Epam.—Juſtin 6, c. 6.—*Xenoph. Hiſt. LEUTYCHIDES, a Lacedæmonian, made king of Sparta of the expulſion of Demaratus. Herodot. 6, v. 65, &c.—Vid. Leotychides.

LEXOVI, a people of Gaul, conquered with great ſlaughter by a lieutenant of J. Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. G.

LIBANIUS, a celebrated ſophiſt of Antioch in the age of the emperor Julian. He was educated at Athens, and opened a ſchool at Antioch, which produced ſome of the beſt and moſt of the literary characters of the age. Libanius was naturally vain and arrogant, and he contemptuouſly refuſed the offers of the emperor Julian, who wiſhed to purchaſe his friendſhip and intimacy by raiſing him to offices of the greateſt ſplendor and affluence in the empire. When Julian had impriſoned the ſenators of Antioch for their impertinence, Libanius undertook the defence of his fellow citizens, and paid a viſit to the emperor, in which he aſtoniſhed him by the boldneſs and independence of his expreſſions, and the firmneſs and reſolution of his mind. Some of his orations, and above 1600 of his letters are extant; they diſcover much affectation and obſcurity of ſtile, and we cannot perhaps much regret the loſs of writings which afforded nothing but a diſplay of pedantry, and quotations from Homer. Julian ſubmitted his writings to the judgment of Libanius with the greateſt confidence, and the ſophiſt freely rejected or approved, and ſhowed that he was more attached to the perſon than the fortune and greatneſs of his prince. The time of his death is unknown.——The beſt edition of Libanius ſeems to be that of Paris, fol. 1606, with a ſecond volume publiſhed by Morell, 1627. His epiſtles have been edited by Wolf. fol. 1738.

LIBANUS, a high mountain of Syria, famous for its cedars. Strab. 6.

LIBENTINA, a ſirname of Venus. She had a temple at Rome, where the young women uſed to dedicate the toys and childiſh amuſements of their youth, when arrived at nubile years. Varro.

LIBER, a ſirname of Bacchus, which ſignifies free. He received this name from his delivering ſome cities of Bœotia from ſlavery, or according to others, becauſe wine, of which he was the patron, delivered mankind from their cares, and made them ſpeak with freedom and unconcern. The word is often uſed for wine itſelf. Senec. de tranq. anim.

LIBERA, a goddeſs, the ſame as Proſerpine. Cic. in Ver. 4. c. 48.——A name given to Ariadne by Bacchus, or Liber, when he had married her. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 513.

LIBERALIA, feſtivals yearly celebrated in honor of Bacchus the 17th of March. Slaves were then permitted to ſpeak with freedom, and every thing bore the appearance of independence. They are much the ſame as the Dionyſia of the Greeks. Varro.

LIBERTAS, a goddeſs of Rome, who had a temple on mount Aventine, raiſed by T. Gracchus. She was repreſented as a woman in a light dreſs, holding a rod in one hand and a cap in the other, both ſigns of independence, as the former was uſed by the magiſtrates in the manumiſſion of ſlaves, and the latter was worn by ſlaves, who were ſoon to be ſet at liberty. Sometimes a cat was placed at her feet, as this animal is very fond of liberty, and very impatient when confined. Liv. 24, c. 16. l. 25, c. 7, —Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 1, v. 72.—Plut. in Grac.—Dio. Caſs. 44.

LIBETHRA, a fountain of Magneſia, or Bœotia according to ſome, ſacred to the Muſes, who from thence are called Libethrides. Virg. Ecl. 7.—Plin. 4. c. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9 & 10.

LIBETHRIDES, a name given to the Muſes from the fountain Libethra, or from mount Libethrus in Thrace.

LIBICI, LIBECII or LIBRI, a people of Gaul who paſſed into Italy, A. U. C. 364. —Liv. 5, c. 35.

LIBITINA, a goddeſs at Rome who preſided over funerals. According to ſome, ſhe is the ſame as Venus, or rather Proſerpine. Servius Tullius firſt raiſed her a temple at Rome, where every thing neceſſary for funerals was expoſed to ſale, and where the regiſters of the dead were uſually kept.

Diony.

Dionyſ. Hal. 4.—Liv. 40, c. 19.—Val. Max. 5, c. 2.—Plut. Quæſt. Rom.

LIBO, a friend of Pompey, who watched over the fleet, &c. Plut.——A Roman citizen, &c. Horat. 1, ep. 19.——A friend of the firſt triumvirate, who killed himſelf and was condemned after death.

LIBON, a Greek architect who built the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius. He floriſhed about 450 years before the chriſtian era.

LIBOPHŒNICES, the inhabitants of the country near Carthage.

LIBURNA, a town of Dalmatia.

LIBURNIA, a country of Illyricum, between Iſtria and Dalmatia, whence a colony came to ſettle in Apulia in Italy. It is now called Croatia. Mela. 2, c. 3 —Strab. 7.

LIBURNIDES, an iſland on the coaſt of Liburnia, in the Adriatic. Strab. 5.

LIBURNUM MARE, the ſea which borders on the coaſts of Liburnia.

LIBURNUS, a mountain of Campania.

LIBYA, a daughter of Epaphus and Caſſiopea, who became mother of Agenor and Belus by Neptune. Apollod. 2, c. 1, l. 3. c. 1.—Pauſ. 1, 44 ——A name given to Africa one of the three quarters of the ancient globe. Libya, properly ſpeaking, is only a part of Africa, bounded on the eaſt by Ægypt, and on the weſt by that part called by the moderns the kingdom of Tripoli. The ancients, according to ſome traditions, mentioned by Herodotus, and others, ſailed round Africa, by ſteering weſtward from the red ſea, and entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, after a perilous navigation of three years. From the word Libya, are derived the epithets of Libys, Libyſſa, Libyſis, Libyſtis, Libycus, Libyſticus, Libyſtinus, Libyſtæus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 106. l. 5, v. 37.—Lucan. 4.—Salluſt. &c.

LIBYCUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coaſt of Cyrene. Strab. 2.

LIBYCUS & LIBYSTIS. (Vid. Libya.)

LIBYS, a ſailor, &c. Ovid. Met. 3.

LIBYSSA, a river of Bithynia, with a town of the ſame name, where was the tomb of Annibal ſtill extant in the age of Pliny.

LICATES, a people of Vindelicia.

LICHA, a city near Lycia.

LICHAS, a ſervant of Hercules who brought him the poiſoned tunic from Dejanira. He was thrown by his maſter into the ſea with great violence, and changed into a rock in the Euboean ſea, by the compaſſion of the gods. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 211.

LICHES, an Arcadian, who found the bones of Oreſtes buried at Tegea, &c. Herodot.

LICINIA LEX, was enacted by L. Licinius Craſſus, and Q. Mutius, conſuls, A. U. C. 657. It ordered all the inhabitants of Italy to be enrolled on the liſt of citizens in their reſpective cities.——Another by C. Licinius Craſſus, the tribune A. U. C. 608. It transferred the right of chuſing prieſts from the college to the people. It was propoſed but did not paſs——Another by C. Licinius Stolo the tribune. It forbad any perſon to poſſeſs 500 acres of land, or keep more than 100 head of large cattle, or 500 of ſmall. ——Another by P. Licinius Varus, A. U. C. 545, to ſettle the day for the celebration of the Ludi Apollinares, which was before uncertain.——Another by P. Licinius Craſſus Dives, B. C. 110. It was the ſame as the Fannian law, and farther required that no more than 30 aſſes ſhould be ſpent at any table on the calends, nones or nundinæ, and only three pounds of freſh and one of ſalt meat, on ordinary days. None of the fruits of the earth were forbidden——Another de ſodalitiis, by M. Licinius the Conſul 690. It impoſed a ſevere penalty on party clubs, of ſocieties aſſembled or frequented for election purpoſes, as coming under the definition of ambitus, and of offering violence in ſome degree to the freedom and independence of the people.——Another called alſo Æbutia, by Licinius and Æbutius the tribunes. It enacted, that when any law was preferred with reſpect to any office or power, the perſon who propoſed the bill, as well as his colleagues in office, his friends and relations ſhould be declared incapable of being inveſted with the ſaid office or power.

LICINIA, the wife of C. Gracchus, who attempted to diſſuade her huſband from his ſeditious meaſures by a pathetic ſpeech. She was deprived of her dowry after the death of Caius. ——A veſtal virgin accuſed of incontinence, but acquitted. A. U. C. 636.——Another veſtal, put to death for her laſciviouſneſs under Trajan.——The wife of Mecænas diſtinguiſhed for conjugal tenderneſs. She was ſiſter to Proculeius, and bore alſo the name of Terentia. Horat. 2, od. 12 v. 13.

C. LICINIUS, a tribune of the people celebrated for the conſequence of his family, for his intrigues and abilities. He was a plebeian, and was the firſt of that body who was raiſed to the office of a maſter of horſe to the dictator. He was ſirnamed Stolo, or uſeleſs ſprout, on account of the law, which he had enacted during his tribuneſhip. (Vid. Licinia lex by Stolo.) He afterwards made a law which permitted the plebeians to ſhare the conſular dignity with the patricians, A. U. C. 388. He reaped the benefits of this law, and was one of the firſt plebeian conſuls. This law was propoſed and paſſed by Licinius, as it is reported, at the inſtigation of his ambitious wife, who was jealous of her ſiſter who who had married a patrician, and who seemed to be of a higher dignity in being the wife of a consul. Liv. 6, c. 34.—Plut.——C. Calvus, a celebrated orator and poet in the age of Cicero. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the forum, and his poetry, which some of the ancients have compared to Catullus. His orations are greatly commended by Quintilian. Some believe that he wrote annals quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. He died in the 30th year of age. Quintil.—Cic. in Brut. 81.——Macer, a Roman accused by Cicero when prætor. He derided the power of his accuser, but when he saw himself condemned he grew so desperate that he killed himself Plut.——P. Crassus, a Roman sent against Perseus king of Macedonia. He was at first defeated, but afterwards repaired his losses and obtained a complete victory, &c.——A consul sent against Annibal.——Another who defeated the robbers that infested the Alps.——A high priest.——A consul, &c.——Lucullus. Vid. Lucullus.——Crassus. Vid. Crassus.——Mucianus, a Roman who wrote about the history and geography of the eastern countries, often quoted by Pliny. He lived in the reign of Vespasian.——P. Tegula, a comic poet of Rome about 200 years before Christ. He is ranked as the fourth of the best comic poets which Rome produced. Few lines of his compositions are extant. He wrote an ode which was sung all over the city of Rome by nine virgins during the Macedonian war. Liv. 31, c. 12.——Varro Muræna, a brother of Proculeius, who conspired against Augustus with Fannius Cæpio and suffered for his crime. Horace addressed his 2 od. 10 to him and recommended equanimity in every situation. Dio. 54.——C. Flavius Valerianus a celebrated Roman emperor. His father was a poor peasant of Dalmatia, and himself a common soldier in the Roman armies. His valor recommended him to the notice of Galerius Maximianus, who had once shared with him the inferior and subordinate offices of the army, and had lately been invested with the imperial purple by Diocletian. Galerius loved him for his friendly services, particularly during the Persian war, and he showed his regard for his merit by taking him as a colleague in the empire, and appointing him over the province of Pannonia and Rhætia. Constantine, who was also one of the emperors, courted the favor of Licinius, and made his intimacy more durable by giving him his sister Constantia in marriage, A. D. 313. The continual successes of Licinius, particularly against Maximinus, encreased his pride, and rendered him jealous of the greatness of his brother-in-law. The persecutions of the Christians, whose doctrine Constantine followed, soon caused a rupture, and Licinius had the mortification to lose two battles one in Pannonia, and the other near Adrianopolis. Treaties of peace were made between the contending powers, but the restless ambition of Licinius soon broke them; after many engagements a decisive battle was fought near Chalcedonia. Ill-fortune again attended Licinius, he was conquered, and fled to Nicomedia, where soon the conqueror obliged him to surrender, and to resign the imperial purple. The tears of Constantia obtained forgiveness for her husband, yet Constantine knew what turbulent and active enemy had fallen into his hands, therefore he ordered him to be strangled at Thessalonica A. D. 324. His family was involved in his ruin. The avarice, licentiousness and cruelty of Licinius, are as conspicuous as his misfortunes. He was an enemy to learning, and this aversion totally proceeded from his ignorance of letters, and the rusticity of his education. His son by Constantia, bore also the same name. He was honored with the title of Cæsar, when scarce 20 months old. He was involved in his father's ruin, and put to death by order of Constantine.

Licinus, a barber and freedman of Augustus, raised by his master to the rank and dignity of a senator, merely because he hated Pompey's family. Horat. Art. P. 301.

Licymnius, a son of Electryon and brother of Alcmena. He was so infirm in his old age, that when he walked he was always supported by a slave. Triptolemus, son of Hercules seeing the slave inattentive to his duty threw a stick at him, which unfortunately killed Licymnius. The murderer fled to Rhodes. Apollod. 2, c. 7. Diod. 5.—Homer. Il. 2.—Pind. Olymp. 7.

Lide, a mountain of Caria. Herodot. 1, c. 175.

Q. Ligarius, a Roman pro-consul of Africa, after Considius. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, and was pardoned when Cæsar had conquered over his enemies. Cæsar, however, and his adherents were determined on the ruin of Ligarius, but Cicero, by an eloquent oration, still extant, defeated his accusers and he was pardoned. He became afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers. Cic. pro Lig.—Plut. in Cæsar.

Ligea, one of the Nereides. Virg. G. 4.

Liger, a Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10. v. 576.

Liger or Ligeris, a large river of Gaul falling into the ocean, now called la Loire. Strab. 4.—Plin. 4. c. 18.

Liodas, an officer of Antiochus king of Syria, who took the town of Sardis by ſtratagem, &c.

Ligŭres, the inhabitants of Liguria. Vid. Liguria.

Ligŭria, a country at the weſt of Italy, bounded on the eaſt by the river Macra, on the ſouth by part of the Mediterranean called the Liguſtic ſea, on the weſt by the Varus, and on the north by the Po. The commercial town of Genua was antiently and is now the capital of the country. The origin of the inhabitants is not known. According to ſome, they were deſcended from the antient Gauls or Germans, or, as others ſupport, they were of Greek origin, perhaps the poſterity of the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus. Liguria was ſubdued by the Romans, and its chief harbour now bears the name of Leghorn. Mela. 2, c. 1.—Strab. 4, &c.—Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 15.—Plin. 2, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 39, c. 6, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann.—Flor. 2, c. 8.

Ligurīnus, a poet. Martial. 3, ep. 50. A beautiful youth in the age of Horace 4, od. 1, v. 33.

Ligus, a woman who inhabited the Alps. She concealed her ſon from the purſuit of Otho's ſoldiers, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. c. 13.

Ligustĭcæ Alpes, a part of the Alps, which borders on Liguria, ſometimes called Maritimi.

Ligyes, a people of Aſia who inhabited the country between Caucaſus and the river Phaſis. Some ſuppoſe them to be a colony of the Ligyes of Europe, more commonly called Ligures. Herodot. 7, c. 72.

Ligyrgum, a mountain of Arcadia.

Lilæa, a town of Achaia near the Cephiſus. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 348.

Lilybæum, a promontory of Sicily, with a town of the ſame name near the Ægates. The town was ſtrong and very conſiderable, and it maintained long ſieges againſt the Carthaginians, Romans, &c. It had a port large and capacious, which the Romans, in the wars with Carthage, endeavoured in vain to ſtop and fill up with ſtones, on account of its convenience and vicinity to the coaſt of Africa. Nothing now remains of this once powerful city, but the ruins of temples and aqueducts. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 706.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Cic. in Verr. 5.—Cæſ. de bell. Afric.—Diod. 22.

Limæa, a river of Luſitania. Strab. 3.

Limenia, a town of Cyprus. Id. 14.

Limnæ, a fortified place on the borders of Laconia and Meſſenia. Pauſ.——A town of the Thracian Cherſoneſus.

Limnæum, a temple of Diana at Limnæ.

Limnatidia, a feſtival in honor of Diana, ſirnamed Limnatis, from Limne, a ſchool of exerciſe at Trœzene, where ſhe was worſhipped, or from λιμναι, ponds, becauſe ſhe preſided over fiſhermen.

Limniăce, the daughter of the Ganges, mother of Atys. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 48.

Limnonia, one the Nereides. Homer. Il. 18.

Limon, a place of Campania between Neapolis and Puteoli. Stat. 3. Sylv. 1.

Lincasii, a people of Gaul Narbonenſis.

Lindus, a city at the ſouth-eaſt part of Rhodes, built by Cercaphus ſon of Sol and Cydippe. The Danaides built there a temple to Minerva. One of its colonies built Gela in Sicily. It gave birth to Cleobulus, one of the ſeven wiſe men, and to Chares and Laches, who were employed in making and finiſhing the famous Coloſſus of Rhodes. Strab. 14.—*Homer. Linterna palus, a lake of Campania. Ital. 7, v. 278.

Linternum, a town of Campania where Scipio Africanus died and was buried, Liv. 34, c. 45.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 713.

Linus, This name is common to different perſons whoſe hiſtory is confuſed, who are often taken one for the other. One was ſon of Urania and Amphimarus the ſon of Neptune. Another was ſon of Apollo by Pſammathe daughter of Crotopus king of Argos. Martial mentions him in his 78, ep. l. 9. The third ſon of Iſmenius and born at Thebes in Bœotia, taught muſic to Hercules, who, in a fit of anger, ſtruck him on the head with his lyre and killed him. He was ſon of Mercury and Urania according to Diogenes, who mentions ſome of his philoſophical compoſitions, in which he aſſerted that the world had been created in an inſtant. He was killed by Apollo, for preſuming to compare himſelf to him. Apollodorus, however, and Pauſanias mention, that his ridicule of Hercules on his awkwardneſs in holding the lyre was fatal to him. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diog. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 4.—Pauſ. 2, c. 15. l. 9, c. 29.——A fountain in Arcadia, whoſe waters prevent abortion. Plin. 31, c. 2.

Liodes, one of Penelope's ſuitors, killed by Ulyſſes. Homer. Od. 22. &c.

Lipăra, the largeſt of the Æolian iſlands on the coaſt of Sicily, now called the Lipari. It had a city of the ſame name, which according to Diodorus it received from Liparus the ſon of Auſon, king of theſe iſlands, whoſe daughter Cyane was married by his ſucceſſor Æolus, according to Pliny. The inhabitants of this iſland were powerful by ſea, and from the great tributes which they paid to Dionyſius, the tyrant of Syracuſe, they may be called very opulent. The iſland was celebrated for the variety of its fruits, and its raiſins are ſtill in general repute. It had ſome convenient harbours, and a fountain whoſe waters were much frequented on account of their medicinal powers. According to Diodorus, Æolus reigned at Lipara before Liparus. Plin. 3, c. 9.—Ital. 14, v. 57.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56. l. 8, v. 417.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.——A town of Etruria.

Lipăris, a river of Cilicia, whoſe waters are like oil. Plin. 5, c. 27.

Liphlum, a town of the Æqui, taken by the Romans.

Lipodorus, one of the Greeks ſettled in Aſia by Alexander, &c.

Liquentia, a river of Ciſalpine Gaul, falling into the Adriatic ſea.

Lircæus, a fountain near Nemæa. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 711.

Liriŏpe, one of the Oceanides, mother of Narciſſus by the Cephiſus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 311.——A fountain of Bœotia on the borders of Theſpis, where Narciſſus was drowned according to ſome accounts.

Liris, a river of Campania, which it ſeparates from Latium. It falls into the Mediterranean ſea. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Horat. 3, od. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 424.——A warrior killed by Camilla, &c. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 670.

Lisinias, a town of Theſſaly. Liv. 32, c. 14.

Lisson, a river of Sicily.

Lissus, a town of Macedonia on the confines of Illyricum. Lucan. 5, v. 719.——A river of Thrace, falling into the Ægean ſea, between Thaſos and Samothracia. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes, when he invaded Greece. Strab. 7. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Liternum, a town of Campania.

Lithobŏlia, a feſtival celebrated at Trœzene in honor of Lamia and Auxeſia, who came from Crete, and were ſacrificed by the fury of the ſeditious populace, and ſtoned to death. Hence the name of the ſolemnity, λιθοβολια lapidation.

Lithrus, a town of Armenia Minor.

Litŭbium, a town of Liguria. Liv. 32, c. 29.

Lityersas, the legitimate ſon of Midas king of Phrygia. He made ſtrangers prepare his harveſt, and afterwards put them to death.

Lĭvia Lex de ſociis, propoſed to make all the inhabitants of Italy free citizens of Rome. M. Livius Druſus who framed it, was found murdered in his houſe before it paſſed.——Another by M. Livius Druſus the tribune A. U. C. 662, which required that the judicial power ſhould be lodged in the hands of an equal number of knights and ſenators.

Livia Drusilla, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of L. Druſus Calidianus. She married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom ſhe had the emperor Tiberius and Druſus Germanicus. The attachment of her huſband to the cauſe of Antony was the beginning of her greatneſs. Auguſtus ſaw her as ſhe fled from the danger which threatened her huſband, and he reſolved to marry her, though ſhe was then pregnant. He divorced his wife Scribonia, and, with the approbation of the augurs, he celebrated his nuptials with Livia. She now took advantage of the paſſion of Auguſtus, in the ſhare that ſhe enjoyed of his power and imperial dignity. Her children by Druſus were adopted by the complying emperor; and, that ſhe might make the ſucceſſion of her ſon Tiberius more eaſy and undiſputed, Livia, is accuſed of murdering all the parents of Auguſtus, and ſecretly involving all his relations in the common ruin. Her cruelty and ingratitude are ſtill more ſtrongly marked, when ſhe is charged with having murdered her own huſband, to haſten the elevation of Tiberius. If ſhe was anxious for the aggrandizement of her ſon, Tiberius proved ungrateful, and hated a woman to whom he owed his life, his elevation, and his greatneſs. Livia died in the 86th year of her age, A. D. 29. Tiberius ſhowed himſelf as undutiful after her death as before, for he neglected her funeral, and expreſſively commanded, that no honors, either private or public, ſhould be paid to her memory. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.—Suet. in Aug. & Tib.—Dion. Caſſ.——Another [Vid. Druſilla.]——Another called Horeſtilla, &c. She was debauched by Galba, as ſhe was going to marry Piſo. Suet. in Cal. 25.——Another, called alſo Ocellina. She was Galba's ſtepmother, and committed adultery with him. Id. ib. 3.

Livineius, a friend of Pompey, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 11, &c.

Livilla, a daughter of Druſus.—A ſiſter of Caligula, &c Vid. Julia.

Livius Andronicus, a dramatic poet who floriſhed at Rome about 240 years before the Chriſtian era. He was the firſt who turned the perſonal ſatyres and feſcennine verſes ſo long the admiration of the Romans, into the form of a proper dialogue and regular play. Though the character of a player ſo valued and applauded in Greece was reckoned vile and deſpicable among the Romans, Andronicus acted a part in his dramatical compoſitions and engaged the attention of his audience, by repeating what he had labored after the manner of the Greeks. Andronicus was the freedman of M. Livius Salinator, whoſe children he educated. His poetry was grown obſolete in the age of Cicero, whoſe nicety and judgment would not even recommend the reading of it.——Some few of his verſes are perſerved in the Corpus Poetarum. ——M. Salinator, a Roman conſul ſent againſt the Illyrians. The ſucceſs with which he finiſhed his campaign, and the victory which ſome years after he obtained over Aſdrubal, who was paſſing into Italy with a reinforcement for his brother Annibal, ſhow how deſerving he was to be at the head of the Roman armies. Liv.—— Druſus, a tribune who joined the patricians in oppoſing the ambitious views of C. Gracchus. Plut. in Grace.——An uncle of Cato of Utica. Plut.——Titus, a native of Padua, celebrated for his writings. He paſſed the greateſt part of his life at Naples and Rome, but more particularly at the court of Auguſtus, who liberally patronized the learned, and encouraged the progreſs of literature. Few particulars of his life are known, yet his fame was ſo univerſally ſpread even in his life time that an inhabitant of Gades traverſed Spain, Gaul, and Italy, merely to ſee the man whoſe writings had given him ſuch pleaſure and ſatisfaction in the peruſal. Livy died at Padua in his 67th year, and, according to ſome, on that ſame day Rome was alſo deprived of another of its brighteſt ornaments by the death of the poet Ovid, A. D. 17. It is ſaid, that Livia had appointed Livy to be the preceptor to young Claudius the brother of Germanicus, but death prevented the hiſtorian from enjoying an honor to which he was particularly entitled by his learning and his univerſal knowledge. The name of Livy is rendered immortal by his hiſtory of the Roman empire. Beſides this he wrote ſome philoſophical treatiſes and dialogues, with a letter addreſſed to his ſon, on the merit of authors which ought to be read by young men. This letter is greatly commended by Quintilian, who expatiates with great warmth on the judgment and candor of the author. His Roman hiſtory was comprehended in 140 books of which only 35 are extant. It began with the foundation of Rome, and was continued till the death of Druſus in Germany. The merit of this hiſtory is well known, and the high rank which Livy holds among hiſtorians will never be diſputed. He is always great, his ſtile is clear and intelligible, labored without affectation, diffuſive without tediouſneſs, and argumentative without pedantry. In his harangues he is bold and animated, and in his narrations and deſcriptions, he claims a decided ſuperiority. He is always elegant, and though many have branded his provincial words with the name of Patavinity, yet the expreſſions, or rather the orthography of words, which in Livy are ſuppoſed to diſtinguiſh a native of a province of Italy from a native of Rome, are not loaded with obſcurity, and the perfect claſſic is as familiarly acquainted with the one as with the other. Livy has been cenſured and perhaps with juſtice, for being too credulous and burdening his hiſtory with vulgar notions and ſuperſtitious tales. He may diſguſt when he mentions that milk and blood were rained from heaven, or that an ox ſpoke or a woman changed her ſex, yet he candidly confeſſes that he recorded only what made an indelible impreſſion upon the minds of a credulous age. His candor has alſo been called in queſtion, and he has ſometimes ſhown himſelf too partial to his countrymen, but every where he is an indefatigable ſupporter of the cauſe of juſtice and virtue. The works of Livy have been divided by ſome of the moderns into 14 decades, each conſiſting of ten books. The firſt decade comprehends the hiſtory of 460 years. The ſecond decade is loſt, and the third comprehends the hiſtory of the ſecond Punic war which includes about 18 years. In the fourth decade, Livy treats of the wars with Macedonia and Antiochus which contains about 23 years. For the firſt five books of the fifth decade, we are indebted to the reſearches of the moderns. They were found at Worms, A. D. 1431. Theſe are the books that remain of Livy's hiſtory, and the loſs which this celebrated work has ſuſtained by the ravages of time, has in ſome meaſure been compenſated by the labors of J. Freinſhemius, who with great attention and induſtry has made an epitome of the Roman hiſtory, which is now incorporated with the remaining books of Livy. The third decade ſeems to be ſuperior to the others, yet the author has not ſcrupled to copy from his contemporaries or predeceſſors, and we find many paſſages taken word for word from Polybius, bius, in which the latter has ſhown himſelf more informed in military affairs and ſuperior to his imitator. The beſt editions of Livy, will be found to be thoſe of Maittaire, 6 vols. 12vo. London, 1722; of Drakenborch, 7 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1738, and of Ruddiman, 4 vols. 12vo. Edin. 1751.——A governor of Tarentum who delivered his truſt to Annibal, &c.——A high prieſt who devoted Decius to the Dilmanes.——A commander of a Roman fleet ſent againſt Antiochus in the Helleſpont.

Lixus, a river of Mauritania with a city of the ſame name. Antæus had a palace there, and according to ſome accounts it was in the neighbourhood that Hercules conquered him. Ital. 3, v. 258.—Mela. 3, c. 10.—Strab. 2.——A ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod.

Loceus, a man who conſpired againſt Alexander with Dymnus, &c. Curt. 6, c. 7.

Locha, a large city of Africa, taken and plundered by Scipio's ſoldiers.

Lochias, a promontory and citadel of Egypt near Alexandria.

Locri, a town of Magna Græcia in Italy on the Adriatic not far from Rhegium. It was founded by a Grecian colony about 757 years before the Chriſtian era, as ſome ſuppoſe. The inhabitants were called Locrenſes. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 399.—Strab. Plin.——A town of Locris in Greece.

Locris, a country of Greece, whoſe inhabitants are known by the name of Ozolæ, Epicnemidii, and Opuntii. The country of the Ozolæ, called alſo Zephyrii from their weſterly ſituation, was ſituate at the north of the bay of Corinth and extended above 12 miles northward. On the weſt it was ſeparated from Ætolia by the Evenus, and it had Phocis at the eaſt. Their chief city was called Naupactus. The Epicnemidii were at the north of the Ozolæ, and had the bay of Malia at the eaſt, and Œta on the north. They receive their name from the ſituation of their reſidence near a mountain called Cnemis. They alone of all the Locrians, had the privilege of ſending members to the council of the Amphictyons. The Opuntii received their name from their chief city called Opus. They were ſituated on the borders of the Euripus, and near Phocis, and Eubœa. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ptol.—Mela.—Pauſ. Ach. & Phoc.

Locusta, a celebrated woman at Rome in the favors of Nero. She poiſoned Claudius and Briannicus, and at laſt attempted to deſtroy Nero himſelf, for which ſhe was executed. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 66, &c.—Suet. in Ner. 33.

Locutius, Vid. Aius.

Lollia Paullina, a beautiful woman who married Cãius Cæſar, and afterwards Caligula. She was divorced, and put to death by means of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 1, &c.

Lollianus Spurius, a general proclaimed emperor by his ſoldiers in Gaul and ſoon after murdered, &c.——A conſul, &c.

M. Lollius, a companion and tutor of C. Cæſar the ſon-in-law of Tiberius. He was conſul and offended Auguſtus by his rapacity in the provinces. Horace had addreſſed two of his epiſtles to him, &c. Tacit. An. 3.

Londinum, the capital of Britain founded as ſome ſuppoſe between the age of Julius Cæſar and Nero. It has been ſeverally called Londinium, Lundinum, &c. Ammianus calls it vetuſtum oppidum. It is repreſented as a conſiderable, opulent, and commercial town, in the age of Nero. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 33.—Ammian.

Longārēnus, a man guilty of adultery with Fauſta Sylla's daughter. Horat. 1. Sat. 2, v. 67.

Longimānus, a ſirname of Artaxerxes from his having one hand longer than the other. The Greeks called him Macrochir. C. Nep. in Reg.

Longinus, Dionyſius Caſſius, a celebrated Greek philoſopher and critic of Athens. He was preceptor of the Greek language, and afterwards miniſter, to Zenobia, the famous queen of Palmyra, and his ardent zeal, and ſpirited activity in her cauſe proved, at laſt, fatal to him. When the emperor Aurelian entered victorious the gates of Palmyra, Longinus was ſacrificed to the fury of the Roman ſoldiers, A. D. 273. At the moment of death he ſhowed himſelf great and reſolute, and with a philoſophical and unparalled firmneſs of mind, he even repreſſed the tears and ſighs of the ſpectators who pitied his miſerable end. Longinus rendered his name immortal by his critical remarks on antient authors. His treatiſe on the ſublime, gives the world reaſon to lament the loſs of his valuable compoſitions. The beſt editions of this author are that of Tollius, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen, 1694, and that of Toup, 8vo. Oxon, 1778.——Caſſius, a tribune driven out of the ſenate for favoring the intereſt of J. Cæſar. He was made governor of Spain by Cæſar, &c.——A governor of Judæa——A proconſul.—A lawyer whom, though blind and reſpected, Nero, ordered to be put to death, becauſe he had in his poſſeſſion a picture of Caſſius, one of Cæſar's murderers. Juv. 10. v. 16.

Longobardi a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ.

Longŭla, a town of Latium on the borders of the Volſci. Liv. 2, c. 33.

Longuntĭca, a maritime city of Spain Tarraconenſis. Liv. 22, c. 20.

Longus, a Roman conſul, &c.——A Greek author who wrote a novel called the amours of Daphnis and Chloe. The age in which he lived is not preciſely known. The beſt editions of this pleaſing writer are that of Paris, 4to. 1754, and that of Villoiſon, 8vo. Paris, 1778.

Lordi, a people of Illyricum.

Loryma, a town of Doris. Liv. 37, c. 17.

Lotis or Lotos, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Neptune. Priapus offered her violence, and to ſave herſelf from his importunities ſhe implored the gods, who changed her into a tree called Lotus. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 348.

Lotophăgi, a people on the coaſt of Africa near the Syrtes. They received this name from their living upon the lotus. Ulyſſes viſited their country, at his return from the Trojan war. Herodot. 4, c. 177.—Strab. 17.—Mela. 1, c. 7.—Plin. 5 & 23.

Lous & Aous, a river of Macedonia near Apollonia.

Lua, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over things which are reviewed.

Luca, a city of Etruria.

Lucagus, one of the friends of Turnus killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 575.

Lucāni, a people of Italy, deſcended from the Samnites, or from the Brutii.

Lucānia, a country of Italy between the Tyrrhene and Sicilian ſeas, and bounded by Picenum, Pucetia, and the country of the Brutii. The country was famous for its grapes. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 178.

Q. Lucanius, a centurion in Cæſar's army, &c. Cæſar. bell. G. 5.

Lucānus, M. Annæus, a native of Corduba in Spain. He was early removed to Rome, where his riſing talents and more particularly his laviſhed praiſes and panegyrics, recommended him to the emperor Nero. This intimacy was ſoon productive of honor, and Lucan was raiſed to the dignity of an augur and quæſtor before he had attained the proper age. The poet had the imprudence to enter the liſts againſt his imperial patron; he choſe for his ſubject Orpheus, and Nero took the tragical ſtory of Niobe. Lucan obtained an eaſy victory, but Nero became jealous of his poetical reputation, and reſolved upon revenge. The inſults to which Lucan was daily expoſed, provoked at laſt his reſentment, and he joined Piſo in a conſpiracy againſt the emperor. The whole was diſcovered, and the poet had nothing left but to chuſe the manner of his execution. He had his veins opened in a warm bath, and as he expired he pronounced with great energy the lines which, in his Pharſalia, l. 3, v. 639.—642, he had put into the mouth of a ſoldier, who died in the ſame manner as himſelf. Some have accuſed him of puſillanimity at the moment of his death, and ſay that to free himſelf from the puniſhment which threatened him, he accuſed his own mother, and involved her in the crime of which he was guilty. This circumſtance, which throws an indelible blot upon the character of Lucan, is not mentioned by ſome writers, who obſerve that he expired with all the firmneſs of a philoſopher. He died in his 26th year, A. D. 65. Of all his compoſitions none but his Pharſalia remains. This poem, which is an account of the civil wars of Cæſar and Pompey, is unfiniſhed. Opinions are various as to the merit of his poetry. He poſſeſſes neither the fire of Homer, nor the melodious numbers of Virgil. If he had lived to a greater age, his judgment and genius would have matured, and he might have claimed a greater rank among the poets of the Auguſtan age. His expreſſions, however, are bold and animated, his poetry entertaining, and his irregularities may be called numerous, and, to uſe the words of Quintilian, he is more an orator than a poet. He wrote a poem upon the burning of Rome, now loſt. It is ſaid that his wife Polla Argentaria, not only aſſiſted him in the compoſition of his poem, but, even corrected it after his death. Scaliger ſays, that Lucan rather barks that ſings. The beſt editions of Lucan are thoſe of Oudendorp, 4to. L. Bat. 1728, of Bentley, 4to. printed at Strawbery-hill, 1760, and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1767. Quintil. 10.—Suet.—Tacit. Ann. 15, &c.—Martial 7, ep. 20.——Ocellus or Ucellus, an antient Pythagorean philoſopher, whoſe age is unknown. He wrote in the Attic dialect, a book on the nature of the univerſe which he deemed eternal, and from it were drawn the ſyſtems adopted by Ariſtotle, Plato and Philo Judæus. This work was firſt tranſlated into Latin by Nogarola. Another book of Ocellus on laws, written in the Doric dialect, was greatly eſteemed by Archytas and Plato, a fragment of which has been preſerved by Stobæus, of which, however, Ocellus is diſputed to be the author. There is an edition of Ocellus, with a learned commentary, by C. Emman. Vizzanius, Bononiæ, 1646, in 4to.

Lucăria or Lucĕria, feſtivals at Rome, celebrated in a large grove between the Via Salaria and the Tyber, where the Romans hid themſelves when beſieged by the Gauls. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 77.

L. Luccius,

L. Lucceius, a celebrated hiſtorian, aſked by Cicero to write a hiſtory of his conſulſhip. He favored the cauſe of Pompey, but was afterwards pardoned by J. Cæſar. Cic. ad. Fam. 5, ep. 12, &c.

Lucceius Albinus, a governor of Mauritania after Galba's death, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 58.

Lŭcĕres, a body of horſe compoſed of Roman knights, firſt eſtabliſhed by Romulus and Tatius. It received its name from the lucus, a grove where Romulus had erected an aſylum, or a place of refuge for all fugitives, ſlaves, homicides, &c. that he might people his city. The Luceres were ſome of theſe men, and they were incorporated with the legions. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 31.

Lucĕria, a town of Apulia, famous for wool. Horat. 3, od. 15, v. 14.

Lucetius, a Rutulian, killed by Ilioneus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 570.

Lucianus, a celebrated writer of Samoſata. His father was poor in his circumſtances, and Lucian was early bound to one of his uncles, who was a ſculptor. This employment highly diſpleaſed him, he made no proficiency in the art, and reſolved to ſeek his livelihood by better means. A dream in which Learning ſeemed to draw him to her, and to promiſe fame and immortality, confirmed his reſolutions, and he began to write. The artifices and unfair dealings of a lawyer, a life which he had embraced, diſguſted him, and he began to ſtudy philoſophy and eloquence. He viſited different places, and Antioch, Ionia, Greece, Italy, Gaul, and more particularly Athens, became ſucceſſively acquainted with the depth of his learning and the power of his eloquence. The emperor M. Aurelius was ſenſible of his merit, and appointed him regiſter to the Roman governor of Egypt. He died, A. D. 180, in his 90th year, and ſome of the moderns have aſſerted that he was torn to pieces by dogs for his impiety, particularly for ridiculing the religion of Chriſt. The works of Lucian, which are numerous, and written in the Attic dialect, conſiſt partly of dialogues, in which he introduces different characters, with much dramatic propriety. His ſtile is eaſy, ſimple, elegant and animated, and he has ſtored his compoſitions with many lively ſentiments, and much of the true Attic wit. His frequent obſcenities, and his manner of expoſing to ridicule not only the religion of his country, but alſo that of every nation, have deſervedly drawn upon him the cenſure of every age, and branded him with the appellation of atheiſt and blaſphemer. He alſo wrote the life of Soſtrates, a philoſopher of Bœotia, as alſo that of the philoſopher Demonax. Some have alſo attributed to him, with great falſity, the life of Apollonius Thyaneus. The beſt editions of Lucan are that of Grævius, 2 vols. 8vo. Amſt. 1687, and that Reitzius, 4 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1743.

Lucifer, the name of the planet Venus, or morning ſtar. It is called Lucifer, when appearing in the morning before the ſun; but when it follows it, and appears ſome time after its ſetting, it is called Heſperus. According to ſome mythologiſts, Lucifer was ſon of Jupiter and Aurora.——A chriſtian writer whoſe work was edited by the Coleti, fol. Venet. 1778.

Lucifĕri fanum, a town of Spain.

C. Lucilius, a Roman knight born at Aurunca. He lived in the greateſt intimacy with Scipio the firſt Africanus, and even attended him in his war againſt Numantia. He is looked upon as the founder of ſatire, or firſt ſatirical writer among the Romans. He was ſuperior to his poetical predeceſſors at Rome, and though he wrote with great roughneſs and inelegance, but with much facility, he gained many admirers, whoſe praiſes have been often laviſhed with too liberal a hand. Horace compares him to a river which rolls upon its waters precious ſand, with much dirt and filth. Of the thirty ſatires which he wrote, nothing but few verſes remain. He died at Naples, in the 46th year of his age, B. C. 103. His fragments have been collected and publiſhed with notes by Fr. Douſa, 4to. L. Bat. 1597, and laſtly by the Vulpii, 8vo. Patav. 1735. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. de Orat. 2.—Horat.——Lucinus, a famous Roman, who fled with Brutus after the battle of Philippi. They were ſoon after overtaken by a party of horſe, and Lucilius ſuffered himſelf to be ſeverely wounded by the dart of the enemy, exclaiming that he was Brutus. He was taken, and carried to the conquerors, whoſe clemency ſpared his life. Plut.——A tribune who attempted in vain to elect Pompey to the dictatorſhip.——A centurion, &c.——A governor of Aſia under Tiberius.——A friend of Tiberius.

Lucilla, a daughter of M. Aurelius, celebrated for the virtues of her youth, her beauty, debaucheries, and misfortunes. At the age of ſixteen her father ſent her to Syria to marry the emperor Verus, who was then employed in a war with the Parthians and Armenians. The conjugal virtues of Lucilla were great at firſt, but when ſhe ſaw Verus plunge himſelf into debauchery and diſſipation, ſhe followed his example, and proſtituted herſelf. At her return to Rome ſhe ſaw the inceſtuous commerce of her huſband with her mother, &c. and at laſt poiſoned him. She afterwards married an old but virtuous ſenator, by order of her father, and was not aſhamed ſoon to proſtitute herſelf to her brother Commodus. The coldneſs and indifference with which Commodus treated her afterwards determined her on revenge, and ſhe conſpired againſt his life, with many illuſtrious ſenators, A. D. 185. The plot was diſcovered, Lucilla was baniſhed, and ſoon after put to death by her brother, in the 38th year of her age.

Lūcīna, a goddeſs, daughter of Jupiter and Juno. As her mother brought her into the world without pain, ſhe became the goddeſs whom women in labor invoked, and ſhe preſided over the birth of children. She receives this name either from lucus, or from lux, as Ovid explains it:

Gratia Lucinæ, dedit hæc tibi nomine lucus;
Aut quia principium tu, Dea, lucis habes.

Some ſuppoſe her to be the ſame as Diana and Juno, becauſe theſe two goddeſſes were alſo ſometimes called Lucina, and preſided over the labors of women. She is called Ilithya by the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Rome, raiſed A. U. C. 396. Varr. de L. L. 4.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 449.—Horat. Carm. Sec.

Lucius, a Roman ſoldier killed at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, by ſaving in his arms a man who jumped down from one of the walls. Joſeph.——A brother of M. Antony. [Vid. L. Antonius.]——A Roman general, who defeated the Etrurians, &c.——A relation of J. Cæſar.——A Roman ambaſſador, murdered by the Illyrians.——A conſul, &c.——A writer, called by ſome Saturantius Apuleius. He was born in Africa, on the borders of Numidia. He ſtudied poetry, muſic, geometry, &c. at Athens, and warmly embraced the tenets of the Platoniſts. He cultivated magic, and ſome miracles are attributed to his knowledge of enchantments. He wrote in Greek and Latin, with great eaſe and ſimplicity; but his ſtile is ſometimes affected. His eloquence was greatly celebrated in his age. Some fragments of his compoſitions are ſtill extant. He floriſhed in the reign of M. Aurelius.——A brother of Vitellius, &c.——A ſon of Agrippa adopted by Auguſtus.——A man put to death for his incontinence, &c.——The word Lucius is a prænomen common to many Romans, of whom an account is given under their family names.

Lūcrētia, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. Her accompliſhments proved fatal to her, and the praiſes which a number of young noble Romans at Ardea, among whom were Collatinus and the ſons of Tarquin, beſtowed upon the domeſtic virtues of their wives at home, was productive of a revolution in the ſtate. While every one was warm with the idea, it was univerſally agreed to leave the camp and to go to Rome, to aſcertain the veracity of their reſpective aſſertions. Collatinus had the pleaſure to ſee his expectations fulfilled in the higheſt degree, and, while the wives of the other Romans were involved in the riot and diſſipation of a feaſt, Lucretia was found at home, employed in the midſt of her female ſervants, and eaſing their labor by ſharing it herſelf. The beauty and innocence of Lucretia inflamed the paſſion of Sextus, the ſon of Tarquin, who was a witneſs of her virtues and induſtry. He cheriſhed his flame, and he ſecretly retired from the camp, and came to the houſe of Lucretia, where he met with a kind reception. He ſhowed himſelf unworthy of ſuch a treatment, and, in the dead of night, he introduced himſelf to Lucretia, who refuſed to his entreaties what her fear of ſhame granted to his threats. She yielded to her raviſher, when he threatened to murder her, and to ſlay one of her ſlaves, and put him in her bed, that this apparent adultery might ſeem to have met with the puniſhment it deſerved. Lucretia, in the morning, ſent for her huſband and her father, and, after ſhe had revealed to them the indignities ſhe had ſuffered from the ſon of Tarquin, and entreated them to avenge her wrongs, ſhe ſtabbed herſelf with a dagger, which ſhe had previouſly concealed under her cloaths. This fatal blow was the ſign of rebellion, the body of the virtuous Lucretia was expoſed to the eyes of the ſenate, and the violence and barbarity of Sextus, joined with the unpopularity and oppreſſion of his father, ſo irritated the Roman populace, that that moment they expelled the Tarquins for ever from Rome. Brutus, who was preſent at the tragical death of Lucretia, kindled the flames of rebellion, and the republican or conſular government was eſtabliſhed at Rome A. U. C. 244. Liv. 1, c. 57, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 741.—Val. Max. 6, c. 1.—Plut.——The wife of Numa. Plut.

Lūcrētĭlis, a mountain in the country of the Sabines, hanging over a pleaſant valley, near which the houſe of Horace was ſituate. Horat. 1, od. 17.

T. Lūcrētius Carus, a celebrated Roman poet and philoſopher, who was early ſent to Athens, where he ſtudied under Zeno and Phædrus. The tenets of Epicurus and Empedocles, which then prevailed at Athens, were warmly embraced by Lucretius, and when united with the infinite of Anaximander det, and the atoms of Democritus, they were explained and elucidated in a poem, in ſix books, which is called De rerum naturâ. In this poem the maſterly genius and unaffected elegance of the poet are every where conſpicuous; but the opinions of the philoſopher are juſtly cenſured, who gives no exiſtence of power to a Supreme Being, but is the devoted advocate of atheiſm and impiety. This compoſition, which has little claim to be called a heroic poem, was written and finiſhed while the poet labored under a violent delirium, occaſioned by a philtre, which the jealouſy of his miſtreſs or his wife Lucilia had adminiſtered. It is ſaid that he deſtroyed himſelf in the 44th year of his age, about 54 years before Chriſt. Cicero, after his death, reviſed and corrected his poems, which had been partly written in the lucid intervals of reaſon and of ſenſe. Lucretius, whoſe poem ſhows that he wrote Latin better than any other man ever did, would have proved no mean rival to Virgil, had he lived in the poliſhed age of Auguſtus. The beſt editions of his works are that of Creech, 8vo. Oxon. 1695; that of Havercamp, 2 vols. 4to. Lug. Bat. 1725; and that of Glaſgow, 12mo. 1759. Paterc. 2, c. 36.—Quintil. 3, c. 1. l. 10, c. 1.——Quintus, a Roman, who killed himſelf becauſe the inhabitants of Sulmo, over which he was appointed with a garriſon, ſeemed to favor the cauſe of J. Cæſar. Caſ. bell. civ. 1, c. 18. He is alſo called Veſpillo.——Sp. Tricipitinus, the father-in-law of Collatinus. He was made conſul after the death of Brutus, and ſoon after died himſelf. Horatius Pulvillus ſucceeded him. Liv. 1, c. 58.——An inter-rex at Rome.——A conſul.——Oſella, a Roman, put to death by Sylla becauſe he had applied for the conſulſhip without his permiſſion. Plut.

Lucrīnum, a town of Apulia.

Lūcrīnus, a ſmall lake of Campania, oppoſite Puteoli. Some believed that it was made by Hercules when he paſſed through Italy with the bulls of Geryon. It abounded with excellent oyſters. Strab. 5 & 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.——Horat. 2, od. 15.

C. Luctātius Catūlus, a Roman, conſul with Marius. He aſſiſted his colleague in conquering the Cimbrians. [Vid. Cimbricum bellum.] He was eloquent as well as valiant, and his hiſtory of his conſulſhip, which he wrote with great veracity, convinces us of his literary talents. That hiſtory is loſt. Cic. de orat.—Varro de L. L.—Flor. 2, c. 2.——C. Catulus, a Roman conſul, who deſtroyed the Carthaginian fleet. Vid. Catulus.

Lucullea, a feſtival eſtabliſhed by the Greeks in honor of Lucullus, who had behaved with great prudence and propriety in his province. Plut. in Luc.

Lucullus, Lucius Licinius, a Roman celebrated for his fondneſs of luxury and for his military talents. He was born about 115 years before the Chriſtian era, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his proficiency in the liberal arts, particularly eloquence and philoſophy. His firſt military campaign was in the Marſian war, where his valor and cool intrepidity recommended him to public notice. His mildneſs and conſtancy gained him the admiration and confidence of Sylla, and from this connection he derived honor, and during his quæſtorſhip in Aſia, and pretorſhip in Africa, he rendered himſelf more conſpicuous by his juſtice, moderation, and humanity. He was raiſed to the conſulſhip A. U. C. 678, and entruſted with the care of the Mithridatic war, and firſt diſplayed his military talents in reſcuing his colleague Cotta, whom the enemy had beſieged in Chalcedonia. This was ſoon followed by a celebrated victory over the forces of Mithridates, on the borders of the Granicus, and by the conqueſt of all Bithynia. His victories by ſea were as great as thoſe by land, and Mithridates loſt a powerful fleet near Lemnos. Such conſiderable loſſes weakened the enemy, and Mithridates retired with precipitation towards Armenia, to the court of king Tigranes, his father-in-law. His flight was perceived, and Lucullus croſſed the Euphrates with great expedition, and gave battle to the numerous forces which Tigranes had already aſſembled to ſupport the cauſe of his ſon-in-law. According to the exaggerated account of Plutarch no leſs than 100,000 foot, and near 55,000 horſe, of the Armenians, loſt their lives in that celebrated battle. All this carnage was made by a Roman army amounting to no more than 18,000 men, of whom only five were killed and 100 wounded during the combat. The taking of Trigranocerta the capital of Armenia, was the conſequence of his immortal victory, and Lucullus there obtained the greateſt part of the royal treaſures. This continual ſucceſs, however, was attended with ſerious conſequences. The ſeverity of Lucullus, and the haughtineſs of his commands, offended his ſoldiers, and diſpleaſed his adherents at Rome. Pompey was ſoon after ſent to ſucceed him, and to continue the Mithridatic war, and the interview which he had with Lucullus began with acts of mutual kindneſs, and ended in the moſt inveterate reproaches, and open enmity. Lucullus was permitted to retire to Rome, and only 1600 of the ſoldiers who had ſhared his fortune and his glories were ſuffered to accom-accompany him. He was received with coldness at Rome, and he obtained with difficulty a triumph which was deservedly claimed by his fame, his success and his victories. In this ended the days of his glory; he retired to the enjoyment of ease and peaceful society, and no longer interested himself in the commotions which disturbed the tranquillity of Rome. He dedicated his time to studious pursuits, and to the conversation of the learned. His house was enriched with a valuable library, which was opened for the service of the curious, and of the learned. Lucullus fell into a dilirium in the last part of his life, and died in the 67 or 68th year of his age. The people showed their respect for his merit, by their wish to give him an honorable burial in the Campus Martius; but their offers were rejected, and he was privately buried, by his brother, in his estate at Tusculum. Lucullus has been admired for his many accomplishments, but he has been censured for his severity and extravagance. The expences of his meals were immoderate, his halls were distinguished by the different names of the gods, and, when Cicero and Pompey attempted to surprise him, they were astonished at the costliness of a supper which had been prepared upon the word of Lucullus, who had merely said to his servant that he would sup in the hall of Apollo. In his retirement Lucullus was fond of artificial variety; subterraneous caves and passages were dug under the hills on the coast of Campania, and the sea water was conveyed round his house and pleasure grounds, where the fishes flocked in such abundance that not less than 25,000 pounds worth were sold at his death. In his public character Lucullus was humane and compassionate, and he showed his sense of the vicissitudes of human affairs by shedding tears at the sight of one of the cities of Armenia, which his soldiers reduced to ashes. He was a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages, and he employed himself for a time to write a concise history of the Marsi in Greek hexameters. Such are the striking characteristics of a man who meditated the conquest of Parthia, and, for a while, gained the admiration of all the inhabitants of the east, by his justice and moderation, and who might have disputed the empire of the world with a Cæsar or Pompey, had not, at last, his fondness for retirement withdrawn him from the reach of ambition. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Strab.—Appian in Mithr. &c.—Orosius 6, &c.——A consul, who went to Spain, &c.——A Roman, put to death by Domitian.—A brother of Lucius Lucullus, lieutenant under Sylla.—A prætor of Macedonia.

Lucumo, the first name of Tarquinius Priscus, afterwards changed into Lucius The word is Etrurian, and signifies prince or chief.

Lucus, a king of ancient Gaul.——A town of Gaul, at the foot of the Alps.

Lugdunensis Gallia, a part of Gaul, which received its name from Lugdunum, the capital city of the province. It was anciently called Celtica. Vid. Gallia.

Lugdūnum, a town of Gallia Celtica, built at the confluence of the Rhone and the Arar, or Saone, by Manutius Plancus, when he was governor of the province. This town, now called Lyons, is the second city of France in point of population. Strab. 4.——Batavorum, a town on the Rhine, just as it falls into the ocean. It is now called Leyden, and is famous for its university.

Lūna, (the moon) was daughter of Hyperion and Terra, and was the same, according to some mythologists, as Diana. She was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of the earth with many superstitious forms and ceremonies. It was supposed that magicians and enchanters, particularly those of Thessaly, had an uncontrolable power over the moon, and that they could draw her down from heaven at pleasure by the mere force of their incantations. Her eclipses, according to their opinion, proceeded from thence; and, on that account, it was usual to beat drums and cymbals to ease her labors, and to render the power of magic less effectual. The Arcadians believed that they were older than the moon. Ovid Met. 12, v. 263, &c.—Tibull. 1, el. 8, v. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. Ecl. 8, v. 69.——A maritime town of Etruria, famous for the white marble which it produced. It contained a fine capacious harbour, and abounded in wine, cheese, &c. The inhabitants were naturally given to augury, and the observation of uncommon phænomena. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 586.—Plin. 14. c. 6.

Lupa, (a she-wolf) was held in great veneration at Rome, because Romulus and Remus, according to an ancient tradition, were suckled and preserved by one of these animals. This fabulous story arises from the surname of Lupa, prostitute, which was given to the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, to whose care and humanity these children owed their preservation. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 415.—Plut. in Romul.

Lupercal, a place at the foot of mount Aventine, sacred to Pan, where festivals called Lupercalia were yearly celebrated. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 343.

Lupercālia, a yearly festival observed at Rome the 15th of February, in honor of the god Pan. It was usual first to sacrifice two goats and a dog, and to touch with the bloody knife the foreheads of two illustrious youths, who always were obliged to smile while they were touched. The blood was wiped away with soft wool dipped in milk. After this the skins of the victims were cut into into thongs, with which whips were made for the youths. With these whips the youths ran about the streets all naked except the middle, and whipped freely all those they met. Women in particular were fond of receiving the lashes, as they superstitiously believed that they removed barrenness, and eased the pains of child-birth. This excursion in the streets of Rome was performed by naked youths, because Pan is always represented naked, and a goat was sacrificed, because that deity was supposed to have the feet of a goat. A dog was added, as a necessary and useful guardian of the sheepfold. This festival, as Plutarch mentions, was first instituted by the Romans in honor of the she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. This opinion is controverted by others, and Livy, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, observes, that they were introduced in Italy by Evander. The name seems to be borrowed from the Greek name of Pan, Lycæus, from λυκος, a wolf, because Pan, as god of shepherds, protected the sheep from the rapacity of the wolves. The priests which officiated at the Lupercalia were called Luperci. Augustus forbad any person under the age of fourteen to appear naked, or to run about the streets during the Lupercalia. Cicero, in his Philippics, reproaches Antony for having disgraced the dignity of the consulship by running naked, and armed with a whip, about the streets. It was during the celebration of these festivals that Antony offered a crown to J. Cæsar, which the indignation of the populace obliged him to refuse.

Luperci, a number of priests at Rome, who assisted at the celebration of the Lupercalia, in honor of the god Pan, to whose service they were dedicated. This order of priests was the most ancient and respectable of all the sacerdotal offices. It was divided into two separate colleges, called Fabiani & Quintiliani, from Fabius and Quintillus, two of their high priests. The former were instituted in honor of Romulus, and the latter of Remus. To these two sacerdotal bodies J. Cæsar added a third, called, from himself, the Julii, and this action contributed not a little to render his cause unpopular, and to betray his ambitious and aspiring views. [*Vid. Lupus, a general of the emperor Severus. —— A governor of Britain.——A quæstor in the reign of Tiberius, &c.——A comic writer of Sicily, who wrote a poem on the return of Menelaus and Helen to Sparta, after the destruction of Troy. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 16, v 26.——P. Rut. a Roman, who, contrary to the omens, marched against the Marsi, and was killed with his army. He has been taxed with impiety, and was severely censured in the Augustan age. Horat. 2 Sat 1, v. 68.

Lusitania, a part of Spain, whose extent and situation have not been accurately defined by the ancients. According to the better descriptions it extended from the Tagus to the sea of Calabria. The inhabitants were warlike, and were at last conquered by the Roman army under Dolabella. B.C. 99. with great difficulty. They generally lived upon plunder, and were rude and unpolished in their manners. It was usual among them to expose their sick in the high roads, that their diseases might be cured by the directions and advice of travellers. They were very moderate in their meals, and never eat but of one dish. Their cloaths were commonly black, and they generally warmed themselves by means of stones heated in the fire. Strab. 3, —Mela. 2, c. 6. l. 3, c. 1.

Lycæa, feſtivals in Arcadia, in honor of Pan, the god of ſhepherds. They are the ſame as the Lupercalia of the Romans.——A feſtival at Argos in honor of Apollo Lycæus, who delivered the Argives from wolves, &c.

Lycæum, a celebrated place near the banks of the Iliſſus, in Attica. It was there that Ariſtotle taught philoſophy, and as he gentrally inſtructed his pupils in walking, they were called Peripatetics, a περιπατεω, ambulo.

Lycæus, a mountain of Arcadia, ſacred to Jupiter, where a temple was built in honor of the god Lycæus, by Lycaon, the ſon of Pelaſgus. It was alſo ſacred to Pan, whoſe feſtivals, called Lycæa, were celebrated there. Virg. G. 1, v. 16. Æn. 8, v. 343.—Strab. 8.

Lycambes, the father of Neobule. He promiſed his daughter in marriage to the poet Archilochus, and afterwards refuſed to fulfil his engagement when ſhe had been courted by a man whoſe opulence had more influence than the fortune of the poet. This irritated Archilochus; he wrote a bitter invective againſt Lycambes and his daughter, and rendered them both ſo deſperate by the ſatire of his compoſition that they hanged themſelves. Horat. ep. 6, v. 13. Ovid. in Ib. 52.

Lycāon, the firſt king of Arcadia, ſon of Pelaſgus and Meliboea. He built a town called Lycoſura on the top of mount Lycæus, in honor of Jupiter. He had many wives, by whom he had a daughter, called Callito, and fifty ſons. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Nyctimus, the eldeſt of his ſons. He lived about 1820 years before the Chriſtian era. Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 176.—Catull. ep. 76.—Pauſ. 8, c. 2, &c.——Another king of Arcadia, celebrated for his cruelties. He was changed into a wolf by Jupiter, becauſe he offered human victims on the altars of the god Pan. Some attribute this metamorphoſis to another cauſe. The ſins of mankind, as they relate, were become ſo enormous, that Jupiter viſited the earth to puniſh wickedneſs and impiety. He came to Arcadia, where he was announced as a god, and the people began to pay proper adoration to his divinity. Lycaon, however, who uſed to ſacrifice all ſtrangers to his wanton cruelty, laughed at the pious prayers of his ſubjects, and, to try the divinity of the god, he ſerved up human fleſh on his table. This impiety ſo irritated Jupiter, that he immediately deſtroyed the houſe of Lycaon, and changed him into a wolf. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 198, &c.——Theſe two monarchs are often confounded together, though it appears that they were two different characters, and that not leſs than an age elapſed between their reigns.——A ſon of Priam and Laothe. Lychnīdes, a city, with a lake of the ſame name, in Macedonia.

Lycia, a country of Aſia Minor, bounded by the Mediterranean on the ſouth, Caria on the weſt, Pamphylia on the eaſt, and Phrygia on the north. It was anciently called Milyas, and Tremile, from the Milyæ or Solymi, a people of Crete, who came to ſettle there. The country received the name of Lycia from Lycus, the ſon of Pandion, who eſtabliſhed himſelf there. The inhabitants have been greatly commended by all the ancients for their ſobriety and juſtice. They were conquered by Cræſus, king of Lydia, and afterwards by Cyrus. Though they were ſubject to the power of Perſia, yet they were governed by their own kings, and only paid a yearly tribute to the Perſian monarch. They became part of the Macedonian empire when Alexander came into the eaſt, and afterwards were ceded to the houſe of the Seleucidæ. The country was reduced into a Roman province by the emperor Claudius. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 816.—Stat. Theb. 6, v. 686.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 13.

Lycimnia, a ſlave, mother of Helenor by a Lydian prince. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 446.

Lycĭscus, an Athenian archon.——A Meſſenian of the family of the Æpytidæ. When his daughters were doomed by lot to be ſacrificed for the good of their country, he fled with them to Sparta, and Ariſtodemus upon this chearfully gave his own children, and ſoon after ſucceeded on the throne. Pauſ. 4, c. 9.——A youth of whom Horace was enamoured.

Lycius, a ſon of Hercules and Toxicreta. ——A ſon of Lycaon.——An epithet given to Apollo from his temple in Lycia, where he gave oracles, particularly at Patara, where the appellation of Lyciæ ſortes was given to his anſwers, and even to the will of the Fates. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 346.——A ſirname of Danaus.

Lycŏmēdes, a king of Scyros, an iſland in the Ægean Sea, ſon of Apollo and Parthenope. He was ſecretly entruſted with the care of young Achilles, whom his mother Tethis had diſguiſed in woman's cloaths, to remove him from the Trojan war, where ſhe knew he muſt unavoidably periſh. Lycomedes has rendered himſelf famous for his treachery to Theſeus, who had implored his protection when driven from his throne of Athens by the uſurper Mneſtheus. Lycomedes, as it is reported, either envious of the fame of his illuſtrious gueſt, or bribed by the emiſſaries of Mneſtheus, led Theſeus to an elevated place, on pretence to ſhew him the extent of his dominions, and perfidiouſly threw him down a precipice, where he was killed. Plut. in Theſ.—Pauſ. 1, c. 17, l. 7, c. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.——An Arcadian, who, with 500 choſen men, put to flight 1000 Spartans, and 500 Argives, &c. Diod. 15.——A ſeditious perſon at Tegea.——A Mantinean general, &c.——An Athenian, the firſt who took one of the enemy's ſhips at the battle of Salamis. Plut.

Lycone, a city of Thrace.——A mountain of Argolis. Pauſ. 2, c. 24.

Lycŏphron, a ſon of Periander, king of Corinth. The murder of his mother Melliſſa by his father had ſuch an effect upon him, that he reſolved never to ſpeak to a man who had been ſo wantonly cruel againſt his relations. This reſolution was ſtrengthened by the advice of Procles, his maternal uncle, and Periander at laſt baniſhed to Corcyra a ſon whoſe diſobedience and obſtinacy had rendered him odious. Cypſelus, the eldeſt ſon of Periander, being incapable of reigning, Lycophron was the only ſurviving child who had any claim to the crown of Corinth. But, when the infirmities of Periander obliged him to look for a ſucceſſor, Lycophron refuſed to come to Corinth while his father was there, and he was induced to leave Corcyra, only on promiſe that Periander would come and dwell there while he remained the maſter of Corinth. This exchange, however, was prevented. The Corcyreans, who were apprehenſive of the tyranny of Periander, murdered Lycophron before he left that iſland. Herodot. 3. Ariſtot. ——A brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ. He went to the Trojan war with Ajax, the ſon of Telamon, after the accidental murder of one of his citizens. He was killed, &c. Homer. Il. 15.——A famous Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He was one of the poets who floriſhed under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and, from their number, obtained the name of Pleiades. Lycophron died by the wound of an arrow. He wrote tragedies, the titles of twenty of which have been preſerved. The only remaining compoſition of this poet is called Caſſandra or Alexandra. It contains 1474 verſes, whoſe obſcurity has procured the epithet of Tenebroſus to its author. It is a mixture of prophetical effuſions, which, as he ſuppoſes, were given by Caſſandra during the Trojan war. The beſt editions of Lycophron are that of Baſil, 1546, fol. enriched with the Greek commentary of Tzetzes; that of Canter, 8vo. apud Commelin, 1596; and that of Potter, fol. Lycŏris, a freedwoman of the ſenator Volumnius, alſo called Cytheris, and Volum-

nia, from her master. She is celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. The poet Gallus was greatly enamoured of her, and his friend Virgil comforts him in his 10th eclogue for the loss of the favors of Cytheris, who followed M. Antony's camp, and was become the Aspasia of Rome. The charms of Cleopatra, however, prevailed over those of Cytheris, and the unfortunate courtezan lost the favors of Antony and of all the world at the same time. Lycoris was originally a comedian. Virg. Ecl. 10.

Lycurgus, a king of Nemæa, in Peloponnesus. He was raised from the dead by Æsculapius. Stat. Theb. 5, v. 638.——A giant killed by Osiris in Thrace. Diod. 1. ——A king of Thrace, son of Dryas. He has been represented as cruel and impious, on account of the violence which he offered to Bacchus. He, according to the opinion of the mythologists, drove Bacchus out of his kingdom, and abolished his worship, for which impiety he was severely punished by the gods. He put his own son Dryas to death in a fury, and he cut off his own legs, mistaking them for vine boughs. He was put to death in the greatest torments by his subjects, who had been informed by the oracle that they should not taste wine till Lycurgus was no more. This fable is explained by observing, that the aversion of Lycurgus for wine, over which Bacchus presided, arose from the filthiness and disgrace of intoxication, and therefore the monarch wisely ordered all the vines of his dominions to be cut down, that himself and his subjects might be preserved from the extravagance and debauchery which are produced by too free an use of wine. Hygin. fab. 132.—*Homer. He was one of the thirty orators whom the Athenians refused to deliver up to Alexander. Some of his orations are extant, He died about 330 years before Christ. Diod. 16.——A king of Tegea, son of Aleus, by Neæra, the daughter of Perseus. He married Cleophile, called also Eurynome, by whom he had Amphidamas, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Homer. Il. 7.——A celebrated lawgiver of Sparta, son of king Eunomus, and brother to Polydectes. He succeeded his brother on the Spartan throne; but, when he saw that the widow of Polydectes was pregnant, he kept the kingdom not for himself, but till Charilaus, his nephew, was arrived to years of maturity. He had previously refused to marry his brother's widow, who wished to strengthen him on his throne by destroying her own son Charilaus, and leaving him in the peaceful possession of the crown. The integrity with which he acted, when guardian of his nephew Charilaus, raised him many enemies, and he at last yielded to their satire and malevolence, and retired to Crete. He travelled like a philosopher, and visited Asia and Egypt without suffering himself to be corrupted by the licentiousness and luxury which prevailed there. The confusion which followed his departure from Sparta, now had made his presence totally necessary, and he returned home at the earnest solicitations of his countrymen. The disorder which reigned at Sparta, induced him to reform the government, and the more effectually to execute his undertaking he had recourse to the oracle of Delphi. He was received by the priestess of the god with every mark of honor, his intentions were warmly approved by the divinity, and he was called the friend of gods, and himself rather god than man. After such a reception from the most celebrated oracle of Greece, Lycurgus found no difficulty in reforming the abuses of the state, and all were equally anxious in making a revolution which had received the sanction of heaven. This happened 884 years before the Christian era. Lycurgus first established a senate, which was composed of 28 senators, whose authority preserved the tranquillity of the state, and maintained a due and just equilibrium between the kings and the people, by watching over the intrusions of the former, and checking the seditious convulsions of the latter. All distinction was destroyed, and, by making an equal and impartial division of the land among the members of the commonwealth, Lycurgus banished luxury, and encouraged the useful arts. The use of money, either of gold or silver, was totally forbidden, and the introduction of of heavy braſs and iron coin brought no temptations to the diſhoneſt, and left every individual in the poſſeſſion of his effects without any fears of robbery or violence. All the citizens dined in common, and no one had greater claims to indulgence or luxury than another. Their intercourſe with other nations was forbidden, and few were permitted to travel. The youths were entruſted to the public maſter, as ſoon as they had attained their ſeventh year, and their education was left to the wiſdom of the laws. They were taught early to think, to anſwer in a ſhort and laconic manner, and to excel in ſharp repartee. They were inſtructed and encouraged to carry things by ſurpriſe, but if ever the theft was diſcovered they were ſubjected to a ſevere puniſhment. Lycurgus was happy and ſucceſsful in eſtabliſhing and enforcing theſe laws, and by his prudence and adminiſtration the face of Lacedæmon was totally changed, and it gave riſe to a ſet of men diſtinguiſhed for their intrepidity, their fortitude, and their magnanimity. After this Lycurgus retired from Sparta to Delphi, or according to others to Crete, and before his departure he bound all the citizens of Lacedæmon by a ſolemn oath, that neither they nor their poſterity, would alter, violate, or aboliſh the laws which he had eſtabliſhed, before his return. He ſoon after put himſelf to death, and he ordered his aſhes to be thrown into the ſea, fearful leſt if they were carried to Sparta the citizens ſhould call themſelves freed from the oath which they had taken, and impowered to make a revolution. The wiſdom and the good effect of the laws of Lycurgus, has been firmly demonſtrated at Sparta, where for 700 years they remained in full force, but the legiſlator has been cenſured as cruel and impolitic. He has ſhown himſelf inhumane in ordering the mothers to deſtroy their children, whoſe feebleneſs or deformity in their youth ſeemed to promiſe incapability of action in maturer years, and to become a burden to the ſtate. His regulations about marriage, muſt neceſſarily be cenſured, and no true conjugal felicity can be expected from the union of a man with a perſon whom he, perhaps, never knew before, and whom he was compelled to choſe in a dark room, where all the marriageable women in the ſtate aſſembled on ſtated occaſions. The peculiar dreſs which was appointed for the females, might be termed improper, and the law muſt, for ever, be called injudicious, which ordered them to appear naked on certain days of feſtivity, and wreſtle in a public aſſembly promiſcuouſly with boys of equal age with themſelves. Theſe things might contribute as much to corrupt the morals of the Lacedæmonians, as the other regulations ſeemed calculated to baniſh diſſipation, riot, and debauchery. Lycurgus has been compared to Solon the celebrated legiſlator of Athens, and it has been judiciouſly obſerved that the former gave his citizens morals conformable to the laws which he had eſtabliſhed, and that the latter had given the Athenians laws, which coincided with their cuſtoms and manners. The office of Lycurgus demanded reſolution, and he ſhowed himſelf inexorable and ſevere. In Solon artifice was requiſite, and he ſhowed himſelf mild and even voluptuous. The moderation of Lycurgus is greatly commended, particularly when we recollect that he treated with the greateſt humanity and confidence Alcander, a youth who had put out one of his eyes in a ſeditious tumult. Lycurgus had a ſon called Antiorus, who left no iſſue. The Lacedæmonians ſhewed their reſpect for their great legiſlator by yearly celebrating a feſtival in his honor, called Lycurgidæ or Lycurgides. The introduction of money into Sparta in the reign of Agis the ſon of Archidamus, was one of the principal cauſes which corrupted the innocence of the Lacedæmonians, and rendered them the prey of intrigue and of faction. The laws of Lycurgus were abrogated by Philopœmen B. C. 188, but only for a little time, as they were ſoon after re-eſtabliſhed by the Romans. Plut. in vitâ.—Juſtin. 3, c. 2, &c.—Strab. 8, 10, 15, &c.——Dionyſ. Hal. 2.——Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

Lycus, a king of Bœotia, ſucceſſor to his brother Nycteus, who left no male iſſue. He was entruſted with the government only during the minority of Labdacus the ſon of the daughter of Nycteus. He was farther enjoined to make war againſt Epopeus, who had carried away by force Antiope the daughter of Nycteus. He was ſucceſsful in this expedition, Epopeus was killed, and Lycus recovered Antiope and married her though ſhe was his niece. This new connection highly diſpleaſed his firſt wife Dirce and Antiope was delivered to the unfeeling queen and tortured in the moſt cruel manner. Antiope at laſt eſcaped, and entreated her ſons Zethus and Amphion, to avenge her wrongs. The children incenſed, on account of the cruelties which their mother had ſuffered, beſieged Thebes, killed Lycus, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull who dragged her till ſhe died. Pauſ. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.——A king of Libya, who ſacrificed whatever ſtrangers came upon his coaſt. LĪDIA, a celebrated kingdom of Aſia minor, whoſe boundaries were different at different times. It was at firſt bounded by Myſia major, Caria, Phrygia major, and Ionia, but in its more floriſhing times it contained the whole country, which lies between the Halys and the Ægean ſea. It was anciently called Mæonia, and received the name of Lydia from Lydus one of its kings. It was governed by monarchs who after the fabulous ages reigned for 249 years in the following order: Ardyſus began to reign, 797, B. C. Alyattes, 761; Meles, 747; Candaules, 735; Gyges, 718; Ardyſus 2d, 680; Sadyattes 631; Alyattes 2d, 619, and Crœſus 562, who was conquered by Cyrus, B. C. 548, when the kingdom became a province of the Perſian empire. There were three different races that reigned in Lydia, the Atyadæ, Heraclidæ, and Mermnadæ. The hiſtory of the firſt is obſcure and fabulous, the Heraclidæ began to reign about the Trojan war, and the crown remained in their family for about 505 years, and was always tranſmitted from father to ſon. Candaules was the laſt of the Heraclidæ; and Gyges the firſt, and Crœſus, the laſt, of the Mermnadæ. The Lydians were great warriors in the reign of the Mermnadæ. They invented the art of coining gold and ſilver, and were the firſt who exhibited public ſports, &c. Herodot. 1, &c. Strab. 2, 5 & 13.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—*Dionyſ. LYSANDER, a celebrated general of Sparta, in the laſt years of the Peloponneſian war. He drew Epheſus from the intereſt of Athens, and gained the friendſhip of Cyrus the younger. He gave battle to the Athenian fleet conſiſting of 120 ſhips, at Ægoſpotamos, and deſtroyed it all, except three ſhips, with which the enemy's general fled to Evagoras king of Cyprus. In this celebrated battle, which happened 405 years before the Chriſtian era, the Athenians loſt 3000 men, and with them their empire and influence among the neighbouring ſtates. Lyſander, well knew how to take advantage of his victory, and the following year Athens, worn out by a long war of 27 years, and diſcouraged by its misfortunes, gave itſelf up to the power of the enemy, and conſented to deſtroy the Piræus, to deliver all its ſhips, except 12, to recall all thoſe that had been baniſhed, and in ſhort to be ſubmiſſive in every degree to the power of Lacedæmon. Beſides theſe humiliating conditions the government of Athens was totally changed, and 30 tyrants were ſet over it by Lyſander. This glorious ſucceſs and the honor of having put an end to the Peloponneſian war, encreaſed the pride of Lyſander. He had already begun to pave his way to univerſal power, by eſtabliſhing ariſtocracy in the Grecian cities of Aſia, and now he attempted to make the crown of Sparta elective. In the purſuit of his ambition, he uſed prudence and artifice; and as he could not eaſily aboliſh a form of government which ages and popularity had confirmed he had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the gods. His attempt, however, to corrupt the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter Ammon, proved ineffectual, and he was even accuſed of uſing bribes by the prieſts of the Libyan temple. The ſudden declaration of war againſt the Thebans, ſaved him from the accuſations of his adverſaries, and he was ſent, together with Pauſanias, againſt the enemy. The plan of his military operations was diſcovered, and the Haliartians whoſe ruin he ſecretly meditated, attacked him unexpectedly, and he was killed in a bloody battle, which ended in the defeat of his troops, 394 years before Chriſt. His body was recovered by his colleague Pauſanias and honored with a magnificent funeral. Lyſander has been commended for his bravery, but his ambition deſerves the ſevereſt cenſure, and his cruelty and his duplicity have greatly ſtained his character. He was arrogant and vain in his public as well as private conduct, and he received and heard with the greateſt avidity the hymns, which his courtiers and flatterers ſung to his honor. Yet in the midſt of all his pomp, his ambition and intrigues, he died extremely poor, and his daughters were rejected by two opulent citizens of Sparta, to whom they had been betrothed during the life of their father. This behaviour of the lovers was ſeverely puniſhed by the Lacedæmonians, who protected from injury the children of a man whom they hated for his ſacrilege, his contempt of religion, and his perfidy. The father of Lyſander, whoſe name was Ariſtoclites or Ariſtocrates, was deſcended from Hercules, though not one of the race of the Heraclidæ. *Plut. & C. LYSIAS, a celebrated orator, ſon of Cephalus, a native of Syracuſe. His father left Sicily and went to Athens where Lyſias was born and carefully educated. In his 15th year he accompanied the colony which the Athenians ſent to Thurium, and after a long reſidence there he returned home in his 47th year. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, the ſimplicity, correctneſs, and purity of his orations, of which he wrote no leſs than 425 according to Plutarch, though the number may with more probability be reduced to 230. Of theſe 34 are extant, the beſt editions of which are that of Taylor, 8vo. Cantab. 1740 and that of Auger, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1783. Lysimachus, a ſon of Agathocles, who was among the generals of Alexander. After the death of that monarch, he made himſelf maſter of part of Thrace, where he built a town which he called Lyſimachia. He ſided with Caſſander and Seleucus againſt Antigonus and Demetrius, and fought with them at the celebrated battle of Ipſus. He afterwards ſeized Macedonia, after expelling Pyrrhus from the throne B. C. 286; but his cruelty rendered him odious, and the murder of his ſon Agathocles ſo offended his ſubjects, that the moſt opulent and powerful revolted from him and abandoned the kingdom. He purſued them to Aſia and declared war againſt Seleucus, who had given them a kind reception. He was killed in a bloody battle, 281 years before Chriſt, in the 80th year of his age, and his body was found in the heaps of ſlain only by the fidelity of a little dog, who had carefully watched near it. It is ſaid that the love and reſpect of Lyſimachus for his learned maſter Calliſthenes proved nearly fatal to him. He, as Juſtin mentions, was thrown into the den of a hungry lion, by order of Alexander, for having given Calliſthenes poiſon, to ſave his life from ignominy and inſult; and when the furious animal darted upon him, he wrapped his hand in his mantle, and boldly thruſted it into the lion's mouth, and by twiſting his tongue, killed an adverſary who was ready to devour him. This act of courage in his ſelf-defence, recommended him greatly to Alexander. He was pardoned, and ever after eſteemed by the monarch. Juſtin. 15, c. 3, &c.—Diod. 19, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 10.——Acarnanian, preceptor to Alexander the Great. Lysippe, a daughter of Prœtus. [Vid. Prœtides.]——A daughter of Theſpius.

Lysippus, a famous ſtatuary of Sicyon. He was originally a white-ſmith, and afterwards applied himſelf to painting, till his talents and inclination taught him that he was born to excel in ſculpture. He floriſhed about 325 years before the Chriſtian era, in the age of Alexander the Great. The monarch was ſo partial to the artiſt, that he forbad any ſculptor but Lyſippus to make his ſtatue. Lyſippus excelled in expreſſing the hair, and he was the firſt who made the head of his ſtatues leſs large, and the body ſmaller than uſual, that they might appear taller. This was obſerved by one of his friends, and the artiſt gave for anſwer, that his predeceſſors had repreſented men in their natural form, but that he repreſented them ſuch as they appeared. Lyſippus made no leſs than 600 ſtatues, the moſt admired of which were thoſe of Alexander; one of Apollo of Tarentum 40 cubits high; one of a man coming out of a bath, with which Agrippa adorned his baths; one of Socrates; and thoſe of the 25 horſemen who were drowned in the Granicus. Theſe were ſo valued, that, in the age of Auguſtus, they were bought for their weight in gold. Plut. in Alex.——Cic. in Brut. ad Her.——Paterc. 1, c. 11. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 240. A comic poet——A general of the Achæan league.

Macaria, a daughter of Hercules and Dejanira. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus made war against the Heraclidæ, whom the Athenians supported, and the oracle declared, that the descendants of Hercules should obtain the victory, if any one of them devoted himself to death. This was cheerfully accepted by Macaria, and the Athenians obtained a victory. Great honors were paid to the patriotic Macaria, and a fountain of Marathon was called by her name. Paus. 1, c. 32.——An ancient name of Cyprus.

Macaris, an ancient name of Crete.

Macednus, a son of Lycaon. Apollod.

Macedonia, a celebrated country, situated between Thrace, Epirus, and Greece. Its boundaries have been different at different periods. Philip encreased it by the conquest of Thessaly and of part of Thrace. According to Pliny it contained no less than 150 different nations. The kingdom of Macedonia, first founded B. C. 814, by Caranus, a descendant of Hercules, and a native of Argos, continued in existence 646 years till the battle of Pydna. The family of Caranus remained in possession of the crown until the death of Alexander the Great, and began to reign in the following order: Caranus after a reign of 28 years was succeeded by Cœnus who ascended the throne 786 B. C. Thurimas 774, Perdiccas 720, Argæus 678, Philip 640, Æropas 602, Alcetas or Alcetas 576, Amyntas 547, Alexander 497, Perdiccas 454, Archelaus 413, Amyntas 399, Pausanias 398, Amyntas 2d, 397, Argæus the tyrant 390, Amyntas restored 390, Alexander 2d, 371, Ptolemy Alorites 370, Perdiccas 3d, 366, Philip son of Amyntas 360, Alexander the Great 336, Philip Aridæus 323. Cassander 316, Antipater and Alexander 298, Demetrius king of Asia 294, Pyrrhus 287, Lysimachus 286, Ptolemy Ceraunus 280, Meleager 2 months, Antipater the Etesian 45 days, Antigonus Gonatas 277, Demetrius 243, Antigonus Doson 232, Philip 221, Perseus 179, conquered by the Romans 168 B. C. at Pydna. Macedonia has been severally called Æmonia, Mygdonia, Pæonia, Edonia, Æmathia, &c. The inhabitants of Macedonia were naturally warlike, and though in the infancy of their empire they were little known beyond the borders of their country, yet they signalized themselves greatly in the reign of Philip, and added the kingdom of Asia to their European dominions by the valor of Alexander. The Macedonian phalanx, or body of soldiers, was always held in the highest repute, and it resisted the repeated attacks of the bravest and most courageous enemies. Liv. 44.—Justin. 6. c. 9. l. 7, c. 1, &c.—Strab. 7.—Mela. 1, c. 3, &c.—Plin. c. 4, 10, &c.—Curt. 3 & 4.—Paus. 8, c. 7.

Macedonicum bellum was undertaken by the Romans against Philip king of Macedonia some few months after the second Punic war, B. C. 200. The cause of this war originated in the hostilities which Philip had exercised against the Achæans, the friends and allies of Rome. The conſul Flamininus had the care of this war, and he conquered Philip on the confines of Epirus, and afterwards in Theſſaly. The Macedonian fleets were alſo defeated; Eubœa was taken; and Philip, after continual loſſes, ſued for peace, which was granted him in the fourth year of the war. The ambition and cruelty of Perſeus, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Philip, ſoon irritated the Romans. Another war was undertaken, in which the Romans ſuffered two defeats. This, however, did not diſcouage them, Paulus Æmylius was choſen conſul in the 60th year of his age, and entruſted with the care of the war. He came to a general engagement near the city of Pydna. The victory ſided with the Romans, and 20,000 of the Macedonian ſoldiers were left on the field of battle. This deciſive blow put an end to the war, which had already continued for three years, 168 years before the Chriſtian era. Perſeus and his ſons Philip and Alexander were taken priſoners, and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. About fifteen years after, new ſeditions were raiſed in Macedonia, and the falſe pretenſions of Andriſcus, who called himſelf the ſon of Perſeus, obliged the Romans to ſend an army to quell the commotions. Andriſcus at firſt obtained many conſiderable advantages over the Roman forces, till at laſt he was conquered and delivered to the conſul Metellus, who carried him to Rome. After theſe commotions, which are ſometimes called the third Macedonian war, Macedonia was finally reduced into a Roman province, and governed by a regular proconſul, about 148 years before the Chriſtian era.

MACEDONĪCUS, a ſirname given to Metellus, from his conqueſts in Macedonia. It was alſo given to ſuch as had obtained any victory in that province.

MACRA, a river flowing from the Apennines, and dividing Liguria from Etruria Lucan. 2, v. 426.

MACRIĂNUS, Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian of obſcure birth, who, from a private ſoldier, roſe to the higheſt command in the army, and proclaimed himſelf emperor when Valerian had been made priſoner by the Perſians, A. D. 260. His liberality ſupported his uſurpation; his two ſons Macrianus and Quietus were inveſted with the imperial purple, and the enemies of Rome were ſeverally defeated either by the emperors or their generals. When he had ſupported his dignity for a year in the eaſtern parts of the world, Macrianus marched towards Rome, to cruſh Gallienus, who had been proclaimed emperor. He was defeated in Illyricum by the lieutenant of Gallienus, and put to death with his ſon, at his own expreſſive requeſt, A. D. 262.

MACRĪNUS, M. Opilius Severus, a native of Africa, who roſe from the moſt ignominious condition to the rank of præfect of the prætorian guards, and at laſt of emperor, after the death of Caracalla, whom he inhumanly ſacrificed to his ambition, A. D. 217. The beginning of his reign was popular; the abolition of the taxes, and an affable and complaiſant behaviour, endeared him to his ſubjects. Theſe promiſing appearances did not long continue, and the timidity which Macrinus betrayed in buying the peace of the Perſians by a large ſum of money, ſoon rendered him odious; and while he affected to imitate the virtuous Aurelius, without poſſeſſing the good qualities of his heart, he became contemptible and inſignificant. This affectation irritated the minds of the populace, and when ſevere puniſhments had been inflicted on ſome of the diſorderly ſoldiers, the whole army mutinied; and their tumult was encreaſed by their conſciouſneſs of their power and numbers, which Macrinus had the imprudence to betray, by keeping almoſt all the military force of Rome encamped together in the plains plains of Syria. Heliogabalus was proclaimed emperor, and Macrinus attempted to save his life by flight. He was, however, seized in Cappadocia, and his head was cut off and sent to his successor, June 7th, A. D. 218. Macrinus reigned about two months and three days. His son called Diadumenianus, shared his father's fate.——A friend of the poet Persius, to whom his second satire is inscribed.

Macro, a favorite of the emperor Tiberius, celebrated for his intrigues, perfidy, and cruelty. He destroyed Sejanus, and raised himself upon the ruins of that unfortunate favorite. He was accessary to the murder of Tiberius, and conciliated the good opinion of Caligula, by prostituting to him his own wife called Ennia. He soon after became unpopular, and was obliged by Caligula to kill himself together with his wife, A. D. 38.

Macrŏbii, a people of Æthiopia, celebrated for their justice and the innocence of their manners. They generally lived to their 120th year; and, indeed, from their longevity they have obtained their name (μακρος βιος, long life) to distinguish them more particularly from the other inhabitants of Æthiopia. Herodot. 3, c. 17.—Mela. 3, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 48.—Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

Macrobius, a Latin writer who died A. D. 415. Some suppose that he was chamberlain to the Emperor Theodosius II. but this appears groundless, when we observe that Macrobius was a follower of paganism, and that none were admitted to the confidence of the emperor, or to the enjoyment of high stations except such as were of the Christian religion, Macrobius has rendered himself famous for a composition called Saturnalia, a miscellaneous collection of antiquities and criticisms supposed to have been the result of a conversation of some of the learned Romans during the celebration of the Saturnalia. This was written for the use of his son, and the bad latinity which the author has often introduced, proves that he was not born in a part of the Roman empire where the Latin tongue was spoken, as he himself candidly confesses. The Saturnalia are useful for the learned reflections they contain, and particularly for some curious observations on the two greatest epic poets of antiquity. Besides this Macrobius wrote a commentary on Cicero's somnium Scipionis which is likewise composed for the improvement of the author's son, and dedicated to him, the best editions are that of Gronovius 8vo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Lipsi. 8vo. 1777.

Macrŏchir, a Greek name of Artaxerxes, the same as Longimanus. This surname arises from his having one hand longer than the other. C. Nep. in Reg.

Macrŏnes, a nation of Pontus, on the confines of Colchis and Armenia. Flac. 5, v. 152.—Herodot.

Mactorium, a town of Sicily.

Măcŭlōnus, a rich and penurious Roman, &c. Juv. 7, v. 40.

Madetes, a general of Darius, who bravely defended a place against Alexander The conqueror resolved to put him to death, though thirty orators pleaded for his life. Sisygambis prevailed over the almost inexorable Alexander, and Madetes was pardoned. Curt. 5, c. 3.

Madyes, a Scythian prince who pursued the Cimmerians in Asia and conquered Cyaxares, B. C. 623. He held for some time the supreme power of Asia Minor. Herodot. 8, c. 103.

Madystes, a town of Thrace.

Mæander, a son of Oceanus and Tethys.—A celebrated river of Asia Minor, rising near Celænæ and flowing through Caria and Ionia into the Ægean sea between Miletus and Priene, after it has been encreased by the waters of the Marsyas, Lycus, Eudon, Lethæus, &c. It is celebrated among the poets for its windings, which amount to no less than 600, and from which all obliquities have received the name of Mæanders. It forms in its course, according to the observation of some travellers, the Greek letters ζ ξ ς & ω and from its windings Dædalus had the first idea of his famous labyrinth. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 145, &c.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 254.—Lucan. 3 & 6.—Homer Il. 2.—Herodot. 2, c. 29.—Strab. 12, &c.—Mela. 1, c. 17.

Mæandria, a city of Epirus.

Mæcenas. Vid. Mecænas.

Mædi, a people of Thrace near Rhodope. Liv. 26, c. 25.

Mælius, a Roman, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, for aspiring to tyranny at Rome, in the early ages of the republic.

Mæmacteria, sacrifices offered to Jupiter at Athens in the winter month Mæmacterion. The god surnamed Mæmactes, was entreated to send mild and temperate weather, as he presided over the seasons, and was the god of the air.

Mænădes, a name of the Bacchantes, or priestesses of Bacchus. The word is derived from μαινομαι, to be furious, because in the celebration of the festivals their gestures and actions were those of mad women. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 458.

Mænala, a town of Spain.

Mænălus, (plur. Mænala) a mountain of Arcadia sacred to the god Pan, and greatly frequented by shepherds. It received its name from Mænalus, a son of Lycaon. It was covered with pine trees, whose echo and shade have been greatly celebrated by all the ancient poets. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 216.—Virg. G. 1, v. 17. Ecl. 8, v. 24.—Pans. 8, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.——A town of Arcadia.—A son of Lycaon.—The father of Atalanta.

MÆNIUS a Roman consul.—A dictator accused and honorably acquitted, &c.—A spendthrift at Rome. Horat. 1, ep. 15, v. 26.

MÆNON, a tyrant of Sicily. B. C. 285.

MÆONIA, a country of Asia Minor, the same as Lydia. It is to be observed, that only part of Lydia, was known by the name of Mæonia, that is, the neighbourhood of mount Tmolus, and the country watered by the Pactolus. The rest on the sea coast was called Lydia. Strab. 12.—Ovid. Met.

MÆONIDÆ, a name given to the Muses, because Homer their greatest and worthiest favourite was supposed to be a native of Mæonia.

MÆONIDES, a surname of Homer, because according to the opinion of some writers he was born in Mæonia, or because his father's name was Mæon. Ovid.

MÆONIS, an epithet applied to Omphale as queen of Lydia or Mæonia. Ovid.

MÆOTÆ, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia.

MÆOTIS PALUS, a large lake, or part of the sea between Europe and Asia, at the north of Euxine, to which it communicates by the Cimmerian Bosporus, now called the sea of Azoph or Zaback. It was worshipped as a deity by the Massagetæ. It extends about 390 miles from south west to north east, and is about 600 miles in circumference. Strab.—Mela. 1, c. 1, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 1.—Curt. 5, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 3, el. 12.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 739.

MÆSIA SYLVA, a wood in Etruria. Liv. 1, c. 33.

MÆVIA, an immodest woman. Juv. 1, v. 22.

MÆVIUS, a poet of inferior note in the Augustan age, who made himself known by his illiberal attacks on the character of the first writers of his time, as well as by his affected compositions. His name would have sunk in oblivion if Virgil had not ridiculed him in his third eclogue, and Horace in his 10th epode.

MAGAS, a king of Cyrene in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 257. Polyæn. 2.

MAGELLA, a town of Sicily.

MAGETÆ, a people of Africa.

MAGI, a religious sect among the eastern nations of the world, and particularly in Persia. They had great influence in the political as well as religious affairs of the state, and a monarch seldom ascended the throne without their previous approbation. Zoroaster was founder of their sect. They paid particular homage to fire, which they deemed a deity, as pure in itself, and the purifier of all things. In their religious tenets they had two principles, one good, source of every thing good, and the other evil, from whence sprung all manner of ills. Their professional skill in the mathematics and philosophy rendered every thing familiar to them, and from their knowledge of the phænomena of the heavens, the word Magi was applied to all learned men, and in process of time, the Magi from their experience and profession were confounded with the magicians who impose upon the superstitious and credulous. Hence the word Magi and magicians became synonymous among the vulgar. Smerdis, one of the Magi, usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses, and the fraud was not discovered till the seven noble Persians conspired against the usurper, and elected Darius king. From this circumstance there was a certain day on which none of the Magi were permitted to appear in public, as the populace had the privilege of murdering whomsoever of them they met. Strab.—Cic. de Div. 1.—Herodot. 3, c. 62, &c.

MAGIUS, a lieutenant of Piso, &c.—A man in the interest of Pompey, &c. Paterc. 2, c. 115.

MAGNA GRÆCIA, a part of Italy. Vid. Græcia Magna.

MAGNA MATER, a name given to Cybele.

MAGNENTIUS, an ambitious Roman who distinguished himself by his cruelty and perfidy. He conspired against the life of Constans, and murdered him in his bed. This cruelty was highly resented by Constantius; and the assassin, unable to escape from the fury of his antagonist, murdered his own mother and the rest of his relations, and afterwards killed himself by falling upon a sword, which he had thrust against a wall. He was the first of the followers of Christianity who ever murdered his lawful sovereign, A. D. 353.

MAGNES, a young man who found himself detained by the iron nails which were under his shoes as he walked over a stone mine. This was no other than the magnet, which received its name from the person who had been first sensible of its power.——A son of Æolus and Anaretta, who married Nais, by whom he had Pierus. &c. Apollod. 1, c. 7.——A poet and musician of Smyrna, in the age of Gyges king of Lydia.

MAGNESIA, a town of Asia Minor on the Mæander, about 15 miles from Ephesus. It is celebrated for the death of Themistocles, and for a battle which was fought there 187 years before the Christian era, between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria.

The

The forces of Antiochus amounted to 70,000 men according to Appian, or 70,900 foot and 12,000 horſe according to Livy, which have been exaggerated by Florus to 300,000 men; the Roman army conſiſted of about 28, or 30,000 men, 2000 of which were employed in guarding the camp. The Syrians loſt 50,000 foot and 4000 horſe, and the Romans only 300 killed with 25 horſe. It was founded by a colony from Magneſia in Theſſaly and was commonly called Magneſia ad Mæandrum to diſtinguiſh it from another called Magneſia ad Sipylum, in Lydia, at the foot of mount Sipylus. This laſt was deſtroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius.—A country on the eaſtern parts of Theſſaly, at the ſouth of Oſſa. It was ſometimes called Æmonia and Magnes Campus. The capital was alſo called Magneſia.—A promontory of Magneſia in Theſſaly. Liv. 37.——Flor. 2.——Appian.

MAGO, a Carthaginian general ſent againſt Dionyſius tyrant of Sicily. He obtained a victory and granted peace to the conquered. In a battle which ſoon after followed this treaty of peace, Mago was killed. His ſon of the ſame name ſucceeded to the command of the Carthaginian army, but he diſgraced himſelf by flying at the approach of Timoleon who had come to aſſiſt the Syracuſans. He was accuſed in the Carthaginian ſenate, and he prevented by ſuicide the execution of the ſentence juſtly pronounced againſt him. His body was hung on a gibbet, and expoſed to public ignominy.—A brother of Annibal the Great. He was preſent at the battle of Cannæ, and was deputed by his brother to carry to Carthage the news of the celebrated victory which had been obtained over the Roman armies. His arrival at Carthage was ſudden, and more powerfully to aſtoniſh his countrymen on account of the victory of Cannæ, he emptied in the ſenate houſe the three buſhels of golden rings which had been taken from the Roman knights ſlain in battle. He was afterwards ſent to Spain where he defeated the two Scipios, and was himſelf, in another engagement totally ruined. He retired to the Baleares which he conquered, and one of thoſe cities ſtill bears his name and is called Portus Magonis, Port Mahon. After this he landed in Italy with an army, and took poſſeſſion of part of Inſubria. He was defeated in a battle by Quintilius Varus, and died of a mortal wound 203 years before the Chriſtian era. Liv. 30, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann. 8, gives a very different account of his death, and ſays he either periſhed in a ſhipwreck or was murdered by his ſervants. Perhaps Annibal had two brothers of that name.——A Carthaginian more known by his writings than by his military exploits. He wrote 28 volumes upon huſbandry; theſe were preſerved by Scipio at the taking of Carthage, and preſented to the Roman ſenate. They were tranſlated into Latin, though Cato had already written ſo copiouſly upon the ſubject, and the Romans, as it has been obſerved, conſulted the writings of Mago with greater earneſtneſs than the books of the Sibylline verſes, Columella.—A Carthaginian ſent by his countrymen to aſſiſt the Romans againſt Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, with a fleet of 120 ſail. This offer was politely refuſed by the Roman ſenate. Val. Max.

MAGONTIACUM, a large city of Germany. Tacit. 4, Hiſt. 15.

MAGUS, an officer of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10. v. 522.

MAHERBAL, a Carthaginian who was at the ſiege of Saguntum, and who commanded the cavalry of Annibal at the battle of Cannæ. He adviſed the conqueror immediately to march to Rome, but Annibal required time to conſider on ſo bold a meaſure, upon which Maherbal obſerved, that Annibal knew how to conquer but not how to make a proper uſe of victory.

MAIA, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione. She was the mother of Mercury by Jupiter. She was one of the Pleiades, the moſt luminous of the ſeven ſiſters. [Vid. Pleiades.] Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 301.—— A ſirname of Cybele.

MAJESTAS, a goddeſs among the Romans, daughter of Honor and Reverence. Ovid. 5, Faſt. 5, v. 25.

MAJORIANUS, Jul. Valerius, an emperor of the weſtern Roman empire, raiſed to the imperial throne, A. D. 457. He ſignalized himſelf by his private as well as public virtues. He was maſſacred after a reign of 37 years by one of his generals, who envied in his maſter the character of an active, virtuous and humane emperor.

MAJORCA, the greateſt of the iſlands called Baleares, on the coaſt of Spain in the Mediterranean. Strab.

MALA FORTUNA, the goddeſs of evil fortune was worſhipped among the Romans. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

MALEA, a promontory of Leſbos.—Another in Peloponneſus, at the ſouth of Laconia. The ſea is ſo rough and boiſterous there, that the dangers which attended a voyage round it gave riſe to the proverb of Cum ad Malcam deflexeris, obliviſcere quæ ſunt domi. Strab. 8 & 9.—Lucan. 6, v. 58.—Plut. in Arat.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 193.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ. 3, c. 23.

MALIA, a city of Phthiotis near mount Œta and Thermopylæ. There were in its neighbourhood ſome hot mineral waters which the poet Catullus has mentioned. From Malia a gulf or ſmall bay in the neighbourhood, at the weſtern extremities of the iſland of Eubœa, has received the name of the gulf of Malia, Maliacum freţum or Maliacus Sinus. Some call it the gulf of Lamia from its vicinity to Lamia. It is often taken for the Sinus Pelaſgicus of the antients. Panſ. 1, c. 4. Herodot.

MALHO or MATHO, a general of an army of Carthaginian mercenaries, 238 B. C.

MALII, a people of Meſopotamia.

MALIS, a ſervant maid of Omphale, beloved by Hercules.

MALLEA or MALLIA AQUA. Vid. Malia.

MALLIUS, a Roman conſul defeated by the Gauls, &c.

MALLOS, a town of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

MALTHĪNUS, a name under which Horace has laſhed ſome of his friends or enemies. 1 Sat. 2, v. 27.

MAMAUS, a river of Peloponneſus.

MAMERCUS, a tyrant of Catana, who ſurrendered to Timoleon. His attempts to ſpeak in a public aſſembly at Syracuſe were received with groans and hiſſes, upon which he daſhed his head againſt a wall, and endeavoured to deſtroy himſelf. The blows were not fatal, and Mamercus was ſoon after put to death as a robber, B. C. 340. Polyæn. 5.—C. Nep. in Tim—A Dictator at Rome, B. C. 437.

MAMERTHES, a Corinthian who killed his brother's ſon in hopes of reigning, upon which he was torn to pieces by his brother. Ovid. in Ib.

MAMERTĪNA, a town of Campania, famous for its wines.——A name of Meſſana in Sicily. Martial. 13, ep. 117.—Strab. 7.

MAMERTĪNI, a mercenary band of ſoldiers which paſſed from Campania into Sicily, at the requeſt of Agathocles. When they were in the ſervice of Agathocles, they claimed the privilege of voting at the election of magiſtrates at Syracuſe, and had recourſe to arms to ſupport their unlawful demands. The ſedition was appeaſed by the authority of ſome leading men, and the Campanians were ordered to leave Sicily. In their way to the coaſt they were received with great kindneſs by the people of Meſſana, and ſoon returned perfidy for hoſpitality. They conſpired againſt the inhabitants, murdered all the males in the city, and married their wives and daughters, and rendered themſelves maſters of the place. After this violence they aſſumed the name of Mamertini, and called their city Mamertina, from a provincial word, which, in their language, ſignified martial, or warlike. The Mamertines were afterwards defeated by Hiero, and totally diſabled to repair their ruined affairs. Plut. in Pyrrh. &c.

MAMILIA LEX de limitibus, by the tribune Mamilius. It ordained, that in the boundaries of the lands five or ſix feet of land ſhould be left uncultivated, which no perſon could convert into private property. It alſo appointed commiſſioners to ſee it carried into execution.

MAMILII, a plebeian family at Rome, deſcended from the Aborigines. They firſt lived at Tuſculum, from whence they came to Rome. Liv. 3, c. 29.

MAMILIUS, a ſon-in-law of Tarquin, who behaved with uncommon bravery at the battle of Regillæ. Vid. Manilius.

MAMMEA, the mother of the emperor Severus, who died A. D. 235.

MAMŪRIUS VETURIUS, a worker in braſs in Numa's reign. He was ordered by the monarch to make a number of ancylia or ſhields, like that one which had fallen from heaven, that it might be difficult to diſtinguiſh the true one from the others. He was very ſucceſsful in his undertaking, and he aſked for no other reward, but that his name might be frequently mentioned in the hymns which were ſung by the Salii in the feaſt of the Ancylia. This requeſt was granted. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 392.

MAMURRA, a Roman knight born at Formiæ. He followed the fortune of J. Cæſar in Gaul, where he greatly enriched himſelf. He built a magnificent palace on mount Cœlius, and was the firſt who incruſted his walls with marble. Catullus has attacked him in his epigrams.

MANASTĂBAL, ſon of Maſiniſſa, who was father to the celebrated Jugurtha, Salluſt. Jug. bell.

MANCĪNUS, a Roman general, who though at the head of army of 30,000 men, was defeated by 4000 Numantians, B. C. 138.

MANDĀNE, a daughter of king Aſtyages married by her father to Cambyſes, an ignoble perſon of Perſia. The monarch had dreamed that his daughter's urine had drowned all his city, which had been interpreted in an unfavorable manner by the ſoothſayers, who aſſured him that his daughter's ſon would dethrone him. The marriage of Mandane with Cambyſes would in the monarch's opinion prevent the effects of the dream, and the children of this connection would be poor and unnoticed. The expectations Aſtyages were fruſtrated. He was dethroned by his grandſon. Vid. Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 107.

MANDĀNIS, an Indian prince and philoſopher, whom Alexander invited by his ambaſſadors, on pain of death to come to his banquet, as being the ſon of Jupiter. The philoſopher ridiculed the threats and promiſes of Alexander, &c. Strab. 15.

MANDĒLA,

MANDELA, a village in the country of the Sabines. Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 105.

MANDONIUS, a prince in Spain, who for some time favored the cause of the Romans. When he heard that Scipio the Roman commander was ill, he raised commotions in the provinces, for which he was severely reprimanded and punished.

MANDROCLES, a general of Artaxerxes, &c. C. Nep. in Dat.

MANDRON, a king of the Bebryces, &c. Polyæn. 8.

MANDUBII, a people of Gaul, in Cæsar's army, &c. Cæs. bell. G. 7, c. 78.

MANDUBRATIUS, a young Briton who came over to Cæsar in Gaul. His father Immanuentius was king in Britain, and had been put to death by order of Cassivelaunus. Cæs. bell. G. 5, c. 20.

MANES, a son of Jupiter and Tellus, who reigned in Mæonia. He was father of Cotys by Callirrhoe, the daughter of Oceanus.

MANES, a name generally applied by the antients to the souls when separated from the body. They were reckoned among the infernal deities, and generally supposed to preside over the burying places, and the monuments of the dead. They were worshipped with great solemnity, particularly by the Romans. The augurs always invoked them when they proceeded to exercise their sacerdotal offices. Virgil introduces his hero as sacrificing to the infernal deities, and to the Manes, a victim whose blood was received in a ditch. The word manes, is supposed to be derived from Mania, who was by some reckoned the mother of those tremendous deities. Others derive it from manare quod per omnia æthærea terrenaque manabant, because they filled the air, particularly in the night, and were intent to molest and disturb the peace of mankind. Some say, that manes comes from manis, an old Latin word which signified good or propitious. The word manes, is differently used by antient authors, sometimes it is taken for the infernal regions, sometimes it is applied to the deities of Pluto's kingdom, whence the epitaphs of the Romans were always superscribed with D. M. Dis Manibus, to remind the sacrilegious and profane, not to molest the monuments of the dead, which were guarded with such sanctity. Propert. 2, el. 19.—Virg. 4, G. v. 469. Æn. 3, &c.—Horat. 1. Sat. 8, v. 28. ——A river of Locris.

MANETHO, a celebrated priest of Heliopolis in Egypt, B. C. 261. He wrote in Greek an history of Egypt, which has been often quoted and recommended by the antients, particularly by Josephus. It was chiefly collected from the writings of Mercury, and from the journals and annals, which were preserved in the Egyptian temples. This history has been greatly corrupted by the Greeks. The author supported, that all the gods of the Egyptians had been mere mortals, and had all lived upon earth. This history is lost, it had been epitomized, and some fragments of it are still extant. There is extant a Greek poem ascribed to Manetho, in which the power of the stars, which preside over the birth and fate of mankind, is explained. The Apotelesmata of this author were edited in 4to. by Gronovius, L. Bat. 1698.

MANIA, a goddess, supposed to be the mother of the Lares and Manes.—A female servant of queen Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy.

MANILIA LEX, by Manilius the tribune, A. U. C. 678. It required that all the forces of Lucullus and his province together with Bithynia, which was then under the command of Glabrio, should be delivered to Pompey, and that this general should, without any delay, declare war against Mithridates, and still retain the command of the Roman fleet, and the empire of the Mediterranean, as before.——Another which permitted all those whose father had not been invested with public offices, to be employed in the management of affairs.——A woman famous for her debaucheries. Juv. 6, v. 242.

MANILIUS, a Roman who married the daughter of Tarquin. He lived at Tusculum, and received his father-in-law in his house, when banished from Rome, &c. Liv. 2, c. 15.——Caius, a celebrated mathematician and poet of Antioch, who wrote a poetical treatise on astronomy, of which five books are extant, treating of the fixed stars. The stile is not elegant. The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose, that he flourished in the Augustan age. No author, however, in the age of Augustus has made mention of Manilius. The best editions of Manilius are those of Bentley, 4to. London, 1739, and Stoeberus, 8vo. Argentor. 1767.——Titus a learned historian in the age of Sylla and Marius. He is greatly recommended by Cicero, pro Roscio.

MANIMI, a people in Germany. Tacit. G. 43.

MANLIA LEX, by the tribune P. Manlius, A. U. C. 557. It revived the office of treviri epulones, first instituted by Numa. The epulones were priests, who prepared banquets for Jupiter and the gods at public festivals, &c.

MANLIUS TORQUATUS, a celebrated Roman, whose youth was distinguished by a lively and chearful disposition. These promising talents were, however, impeded by by a difficulty of ſpeaking, and the father unwilling to expoſe his ſon's ruſticity at Rome, detained him in the country. The behaviour of the father was publicly cenſured, and Marius Pomponius the tribune cited him to anſwer for his unfatherly behaviour to his ſon. Young Manlius was informed of this, and with a dagger in his hand he entered the houſe of the tribune, and made him ſolemnly promiſe that he would drop the accuſation. This action of Manlius endeared him to the people, and ſoon after he was choſen military tribune. In a war againſt the Gauls, he accepted the challenge of one of the enemy, whoſe gigantic ſtature, and ponderous arms had rendered him terrible and almoſt invincible in the eyes of the Romans. The Gaul was conquered, and Manlius ſtripped him of his arms, and from the collar (torquis) which he took from the enemy's neck, he was ever after ſirnamed Torquatus. Manlius was the firſt Roman who was raiſed to the dictatorſhip, without having been previouſly conſul. The ſeverity of Torquatus to his ſon, has been deſervedly cenſured. This father had the courage and heart to put to death his ſon, becauſe he had engaged one of the enemy, and obtained an honorable victory, without his leave and permiſſion. This uncommon rigor diſpleaſed many of the Romans, and, though Torquatus was honored with a triumph, and commended by the ſenate for his ſervices, yet, the Roman youth ſhowed their diſapprobation of the conſul's ſeverity, by refuſing him at his return the homage, which every other conqueror received. Some time after the cenſorſhip was offered to him, but he refuſed it, obſerving, that the people could not bear his ſeverity, nor he the vices of the people. From the rigor of Torquatus, all edicts and actions of ſeverity and juſtice, have been called manliana edicta. Liv. 7, c. 10.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.——Marcus, a celebrated Roman, whoſe valor was diſplayed in the field of battle, even at the early age of 16. When Rome was taken by the Gauls, Manlius with a body of his countrymen fled into the capitol, which he defended when it was ſuddenly ſurpriſed in the night by the enemy. This action gained him the ſirname of Capitolinus and the geeſe, which by their clamor had awakened him to arm himſelf in his own defence, were ever after held ſacred among the Romans. A law which Manlius propoſed to aboliſh the taxes on the common people, raiſed the ſenators againſt him. The dictator, Corn. Coſſus, ſeized him as a rebel, but the people put on mourning, and delivered from priſon their common father. This did not, in the leaſt, check his ambition, he continued to raiſe factions, and even ſecretly to attempt to make himſelf abſolute, till at laſt the tribunes of the people themſelves became his accuſers. He was tried in the Campus Martius, but when the diſtant view of the capitol which Manlius had ſaved, ſeemed to influence the people in his favor, the court of juſtice was removed, and Manlius was condemned. He was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, A. U. C. 371, and to render his ignominy ſtill greater, none of his family were afterwards permitted to bear the ſirname of Marcus, and the place where his houſe had ſtood was deemed unworthy to be inhabited. Liv. 5, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 13 & 26.—Val. Max. 6. c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.——Imperioſus, father of Manlius Torquatus. He was made dictator. He was accuſed for detaining his ſon at home. Vid. Manlius Torquatus.——Vulſo, a Roman conſul who received an army of Scipio in Aſia, and made war againſt the Gallo-grecians, whom he conquered. He was honored with a triumph at his return, though it was at firſt ſtrongly oppoſed. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 38, c. 12, &c.——Another called alſo Cincinnatus. He made war againſt the Etrurians and Veientes with great ſucceſs. He died of a wound he had received in a battle.——Another, who in his prætorſhip reduced Sardinia. He was afterwards made dictator.——Another, who was defeated by a rebel army of ſlaves in Sicily.——A prætor in Gaul, who fought againſt the Boii, with very little ſucceſs.——Another, called Atilius, who defeated a Carthaginian fleet, &c.——Another, who conſpired with Catiline againſt the Roman republic.——Another, in whoſe conſulſhip the temple of Janus was ſhut.——Another, who was baniſhed under Tiberius for his adultery.——A Roman appointed judge between his ſon Silanus and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father ſaid, "it is evident that my ſon has ſuffered himſelf to be bribed, therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my houſe, and I order him to depart from my preſence." Silanus was ſo ſtruck at the rigor of his father, that he hanged himſelf. Val. Max. 5, c. 5.——A learned man in the age of Cicero.

MANNUS, the ſon of Thiaſto both famous divinities among the Germans. Tacit. de Germ. c. 2.

J. MANSUETUS, a friend of Vitellius, who entered the Roman armies, and left his ſon then very young at home. The ſon was promoted by Galba, and ſoon after met a detachment of the partizans of Vitellius in which his father was. A battle was fought and Manſuetus was wounded by the hand of his ſon, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 3, c. 25.

MANTINEA, a town of Arcadia in Peloponneſus. It is was taken by Aratus and Antigonus, and on account of the latter it was afterwards called Antigonia. The emperor Adrian built there a temple in honor of his favorite Alcinous. It is famous for the battle, which was fought there between Epaminondas at the head of the Thebans, and the combined force of Lacedæmon, Achaia, Elis, Athens, and Arcadia, about 363 years before Chriſt. The Theban general was killed in the engagement, and from that time Thebes loſt its power and conſequence among the Grecian ſtates.

MANTINEUS, the father of Ocalea, who married Abas the ſon of Lynceus and Hypermneſtra. Apollod. 2, c. c.

MANTIUS, a ſon of Melampus.

MANTO, a daughter of the prophet Tireſias, endowed with the gift of prophecy. She was made priſoner by the Argives when the city of Thebes fell into their hands, and as ſhe was the worthieſt part of the booty, the conquerors ſent her to Apollo, the god of Delphi, as the moſt valuable preſent they could make. Manto, often called Daphne, remained for ſome time at Delphi, where ſhe officiated as prieſteſs, and where ſhe gave oracles. From Delphi ſhe came to Claros in Ionia, where ſhe eſtabliſhed an oracle of Apollo. Here ſhe married Rhadius the ſovereign of the country, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Mopſus. Manto afterwards viſited Italy, where ſhe married Tiberinus the king of Alba, or, as the poets mention, the god of the river Tyber. From this marriage ſprang Ocnus, who built a town in the neighbourhood, which, in honor of his mother, he called Mantua. Manto, according to a certain tradition, was ſo ſtruck at the misfortunes which afflicted Thebes, her native country, that ſhe gave way to her ſorrow, and was turned into a fountain. Some ſuppoſe her to be the ſame who conducted Æneas into hell, and who ſold the Sibylline books to Tarquin the Proud. She received divine honors after death. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 199. l. 10. v. 199.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 157.—Died. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 7.—Strab. 14 & 16.—Pauſ. 9, c. 10.

MANTUA, a town of Italy beyond the Po, founded about 300 years before Rome by Bianor or Ocnus, the ſon of Manto. It was the antient capital of Etruria. When Cremona, which had followed the intereſt of Brutus, was given to the ſoldiers of Octavius, Mantua alſo, which was in the neighbourhood, ſhared the common calamity, and many of the inhabitants were tyrannically deprived of their poſſeſſions. Virgil, who was among them, and a native of the town, applied for redreſs to Auguſtus, and obtained it by means of his poetical talents. Strab. 5.—Virg. Ecl. 1. &c. G. 3, v. 12. Æn. 10, v. 180.—Ovid. Amor. 3, el. 15.

MARACANDA, a town of Sogdiana.

MARATHA, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

MARATHON, a village of Attica, 10 miles from Athens, celebrated for the victory which the 10,000 Athenians and 1000 Platæans, under the command of Miltiades, gained over the Perſian army, conſiſting of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horſe or, according to Val. Maximus, of 300,000, or, as Juſtin ſays, of 600,000, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes on the 28th of Sept. 490, B. C. In this battle, according to Herodotus, the Athenians loſt only 192 men, and the Perſians 6,300. Juſtin has raiſed the loſs of the Perſians, in this expedition and in the battle, to 200,000 men. It was alſo in the plains of Marathon that Theſeus overcame a celebrated bull, which plundered the neighbouring country. C. Nep. in Mil.—Herodot. 6, &c. Juſtin. 2, c. 9.—Val. Max. 5, c. 3.—Plut. in parall.——A king of Attica, who gave his name to a ſmall village. Pauſ. 2, c. 1.——A king of Sicyon.

MARATHOS, a town of Phœnicia. Mela. 1, c. 12.

MARCELLA, a daughter of Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus by Marcellus. She married Agrippa.

MARCELLINUS AMMIANUS, a celebrated hiſtorian who carried arms under Conſtantius, Julian, and Valens, and wrote an hiſtory of Rome from the reign of Domitian, where Suetonius ſtops, to the emperor Valens. His ſtile is neither elegant nor labored, but it is greatly valuable for its veracity, and in many of the actions it mentions the author was nearly concerned. This hiſtory was compoſed at Rome, where Ammianus retired from the noiſe and troubles of the camp, and does not betray that ſeverity againſt the Chriſtians which other writers have manifeſted, though the author was warm in favor of Paganiſm, the religion which for a while ſat on the throne. It was divided into thirty-one books, of which only the eighteen laſt remain, beginning at the death of Magnentius. Ammianus has been liberal in his encomiums upon Julian, whoſe favors he enjoyed, and who ſo eminently patronized his religion. The negligence with which ſome facts are ſometimes mentioned, has induced many to believe that the hiſtory of Ammianus has ſuffered much from the ravages of time, and that it is deſcended to us maimed and imperfect. The beſt editions editions of Ammianus, are thoſe of Gronovius, fol. and 4to. L. Bat. 1693, and of Erneſti, 8vo. Lipſ. 1773.——An officer under Julian.

MARCELLUS, Marcus Claudius, a famous Roman general, who, after the firſt Punic war, had the management of an expedition againſt the Gauls, where he obtained the Spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Viridomarus the king of the enemy. Such ſucceſs rendered him popular, and ſoon after he was entruſted to oppoſe Annibal in Italy. He was the firſt Roman who obtained ſome advantage over this celebrated Carthaginian, and ſhowed his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible. The troubles which were raiſed in Sicily by the Carthaginians at the death of Hieronymus, alarmed the Romans, and Marcellus, in his third conſulſhip, was ſent with a powerful force againſt Syracuſe. He attacked it by ſea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, and the invention and induſtry of a philoſopher [Vid. Archimedes.] were able to baffle all the efforts, and to deſtroy all the great and ſtupendious machines and military engines of the Romans, during three ſucceſſive years. The perſeverance of Marcellus at laſt obtained the victory. The inattention of the inhabitants during their nocturnal celebration of the feſtivals of Diana, favored his operations; he forcibly entered the town, and made himſelf maſter of it. The conqueror enriched the capital of Italy with the ſpoils of Syracuſe, and when he was accuſed of rapaciouſneſs, for ſtripping the conquered city of all its paintings and ornaments, he confeſſed, that he had done it to adorn the public buildings of Rome, and to introduce a taſte for the fine arts and elegance of the Greeks among his countrymen. After the conqueſt of Syracuſe, Marcellus was called upon by his country to oppoſe a ſecond time Annibal. In this campaign he behaved with greater vigor than before; the greateſt part of the towns of the Samnites, which had revolted, were recovered by force of arms, and 3000 of the ſoldiers of Annibal made priſoners. Some time after an engagement with the Carthaginian general proved unfavorable; Marcellus had the diſadvantage: but on the morrow a more ſucceſsful ſkirmiſh vindicated his military character, and the honor of the Roman ſoldiers. Marcellus, however, was not ſufficiently vigilant againſt the ſnares of his adverſary. He imprudently ſeparated himſelf from his camp, and was killed in an ambuſcade in the 60th year of his age, in his 5th conſulſhip, A. U. C. 544. His body was honored with a magnificent funeral by the conquerer, and his aſhes were conveyed in a ſilver urn to his ſon. Marcellus claims our commendation for his private as well as public virtues; and the humanity of a general will ever be remembered, who, at the ſurrender of Syracuſe wept at the thought that many were going to be expoſed to the avarice and rapaciouſneſs of an incenſed ſoldiery, which the policy of Rome and the laws of war rendered inevitable. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 855.—Plut. in vitâ, &c.——One of his deſcendants, who bore the ſame name, ſignalized himſelf in the civil wars of Cæſar and Pompey, by his firm attachment to the latter. He was baniſhed by Cæſar, but afterwards recalled at the requeſt of the ſenate. Cicero undertook his defence in an oration which is ſtill extant.——The grandſon of Pompey's friend rendered himſelf popular by his univerſal benevolence and affability. He was ſon of Marcellus by Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus. He married Julia that emperor's daughter and was publicly intended as his ſucceſſor. The ſuddenneſs of his death, at an early age, was the cauſe of much lamentation at Rome, particularly in the family of Auguſtus, and Virgil procured himſelf great favors by celebrating the virtues of this amiable prince. [Vid. Octavia.] Marcellus was buried at the public expence. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 883.—Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Marcell.—Senec. Conſol. ad Marc.—Paterc. 2, c. 93.——The ſon of the great Marcellus who took Syracuſe, was caught in the ambuſcade which proved fatal to his father, but he forced his way from the enemy and eſcaped. He received the aſhes of his father from the conqueror. Plut. in Marcell.——A man who conſpired againſt Veſpaſian.——The huſband of Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus.——A conqueror of Britain.——An officer under the emperor Julian.——A man put to death by Galba.——A man who gave Cicero information of Catiline's conſpiracy.——A colleague of Cato in the quæſtorſhip.——A native of Pamphylia, who wrote an heroic poem on phyſic, divided into 42 books. He lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.——A Roman drowned in a ſtorm, &c.

MARCIA LEX, by Marcius Cenſorinus. It forbad any man to be inveſted with the office of cenſor more than once.

MARCIA, the wife of Regulus, when ſhe heard that her huſband had been put to death at Carthage in the moſt excruciating manner, ſhe retorted the puniſhment, and ſhut up ſome Carthaginian priſoners in a barrel, which ſhe had previouſly filled with ſharp nails. The ſenate was obliged to ſtop her wantonneſs and cruelty. Diod 24.——A favorite of the emperor Commodus, whom he poiſoned.——A veſtal virgin, puniſhed for her incontinence.——A daughter of Philip, who married Cato the cenſor. MARCIĀNA, a ſiſter of the emperor Trajan, who, on account of her public and private virtues and her amiable diſpoſition, was declared Auguſta and empreſs by her brother. She died A. D. 113.

MARCIANOPŌLIS, the capital of Lower Mœſia in Greece. It receives its name in honor of the empreſs Marciana.

MARCIĀNUS, a native of Thrace, born of an obſcure family. After he had for ſome time ſerved in the army as a common ſoldier, he was made private ſecretary to one at the officers of Theodoſius. His winning addreſs and uncommon talents raiſed him to higher ſtations; and on the death of Theodoſius the 2d, A. D. 450, he was inveſted with the imperial purple in the eaſt. The ſubjects of the Roman empire had reaſon to be ſatisfied with their choice. Marcianus ſhowed himſelf active and reſolute, and when Attila, the barbarous king of the Huns, aſked of the emperor the annual tribute, which the indolence and cowardice of his predeceſſors had regularly paid, the ſucceſſor of Theodoſius firmly ſaid, that he kept his gold for his friends, but that iron was the metal which he had prepared for his enemies. In the midſt of univerſal popularity Marcianus died, after a reign of ſix years, in the 69th year of his age, as he was making warlike preparations againſt the barbarians that had invaded Africa. His death was lamented, and indeed his merit was great, ſince his reign has been diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the golden age. Marcianus married Pulcheria the ſiſter of his predeceſſor. It is ſaid, that in the years of his obſcurity he found a man who had been murdered, and that he had the humanity to give him a private burial, for which circumſtance he was accuſed of the homicide and impriſoned. He was condemned to loſe his life, and the ſentence would have been executed, had not the real murderer been diſcovered, and convinced the world of the innocence of Marcianus.——Capella, a writer. Vid. Capella.

M. MARCIUS SABINUS, was the progenitor of the Marcian family at Rome. He came to Rome with Numa, and it was he who adviſed Numa to accept of the crown, which the Romans offered to him. He attempted to make himſelf king of Rome, in oppoſition to Tullus Hoſtilius, and when his efforts proved unſucceſsful, he killed himſelf. His ſon, who married a daughter of Numa, was made high prieſt by his father-in-law. He was father of Ancus Martius. Plut. in Numa.——A Roman who accuſed Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, of miſdemeanor, in the Roman ſenate.——A Roman conſul, defeated by the Samnites. He was more ſucceſsful againſt the Carthaginians, and obtained a victory, &c.——Another conſul, who obtained a victory over the Etrurians.——Another, who defeated the Hernici.——A Roman who fought againſt Aſdrubal.——A man whom Catiline hired to aſſaſſinate Cicero.

MARIS, a river of Scythia.

MARISUS, a river of Dacia.

C. MARIUS, a celebrated Roman, who, from a peaſant, became one of the moſt powerful and cruel tyrants that Rome ever beheld during the conſular government. He was born at Arpinum, of obſcure and illiterate parents. His father bore the ſame name as himſelf, and his mother was called Fulcinia. He forſook the meaner occupations of the country for the camp, and ſignalized himſelf under Scipio at the ſiege of Numantia. The Roman general ſaw the courage and intrepidity of young Marius, and foretold the era of his future greatneſs. By his ſeditions and intrigues at Rome, while he exerciſed the inferior offices of the ſtate, he rendered himſelf known, and his marriage with Julia, who was of the family of the Cæſars, contributed in ſome meaſure to raiſe him to conſequence. He paſſed into Africa as lieutenant to the conſul Metellus againſt Jugurtha, and, after he had there ingratiated himſelf with the ſoldiers, and raiſed enemies to his friend and benefactor, he returned to Rome, and canvaſſed for the conſulſhip. The extravagant promiſes he made to the people, and his malevolent inſinuations about the conduct of Metellus, proved ſucceſsful. He was elected, and appointed to finiſh the war againſt Jugurtha. He ſhowed himſelf capable in every degree to ſucceed to Metellus. Jugurtha was defeated, and afterwards betrayed into the hands of the Romans by the perfidy of Bocchus. No ſooner was Jugurtha conquered than new honors and freſh trophies awaited Marius. The provinces of Rome were ſuddenly invaded by an army of 300,000 barbarians, and Marius was the only man whoſe activity and boldneſs could reſiſt ſo powerful an enemy. He was elected conſul, and ſent againſt the Teutones. The war was prolonged, and Marius was a third and fourth time inveſted with the conſulſhip. At laſt two engagements were fought, and not leſs that 200,000 of the barbarian forces of the Ambrones and Teutones were ſlain in the field of battle, and 90,000 made priſoners. The following year was alſo marked by a total overthrow of the Cimbri, another horde of barbarians, in which 140,060 were ſlaughtered by the Romans, and 60,000 taken priſoners. After ſuch honorable victories, Marius, with his colleague Catulus, entered Rome in triumph, and, for his eminent ſervices, he deſerved the appellation of the third founder of Rome. He was elected conſul a ſixth time, and, as his intrepidity had delivered his country from its foreign enemies, he ſought employment at home, and his reſtleſs ambition began to raiſe ſeditions, and to oppoſe the power of Sylla. This was the cauſe and the foundation of a civil war. Sylla refuſed to deliver up the command of the forces with which he was empowered to proſecute the Mithridatic war, and he reſolved to oppoſe the authors of a demand which he conſidered as arbitrary and improper. He advanced to Rome, and Marius was obliged to ſave his life by flight. The unfavorable winds prevented him from ſeeking a ſafer retreat in Africa, and he was left on the coaſts of Campania, where the emiſſaries of his enemy ſoon diſcovered him in a marſh, where he had plunged himſelf in the mud, and left only his mouth above the ſurface for reſpiration. He was violently lently dragged to the neighbouring town of Minturnæ, and the magiſtrates, all devoted to the intereſt of Sylla, paſſed ſentence of immediate death on their magnanimous priſoner. A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the ſtern countenance of Marius diſarmed the courage of the executioner, and, when he heard the exclamation of Tune, homo, audes occidere Caium Marium, the dagger dropped from his hand. Such an uncommon adventure moved the compaſſion of the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They releaſed Marius from priſon, and favored his eſcape to Africa, where he joined his ſon Marius, who had been arming the princes of the country in his cauſe. Marius landed near the walls of Carthage, and he received no ſmall conſolation at the ſight of the venerable ruins of a once powerful city, which, like himſelf, had been expoſed to calamity, and felt the cruel viciſſitude of fortune. This place of his retreat was ſoon known, and the governor of Africa, to conciliate the favors of Sylla, compelled Marius to fly to a neighbouring iſland. He ſoon after learned that Cinna had embraced his cauſe at Rome, when the Roman ſenate had ſtripped him of his conſular dignity and beſtowed it upon one of his enemies. This intelligence animated Marius; he ſet ſail to aſſiſt his friend, only at the head of a thouſand men. His army, however. was ſoon encreaſed, and he entered Rome like a conqueror. His enemies were inhumanly ſacrificed to his fury, Rome was filled with blood, and he who once had been called the father of his country, marched through the ſtreets of the city, attended by a number of aſſaſſins, who immediately ſlaughtered all thoſe whoſe ſalutations were not anſwered by their leader. Such were the ſignals for bloodſhed. When Marius and Cinna had ſufficiently gratified their reſentment, they made themſelves conſuls; but Marius, already worn out with old age and infirmities, died ſixteen days after he had been honored with the conſular dignity for the ſeventh time, B. C. 86. His end was probably haſtened by the uncommon quantities of wine which he drank when laboring under a dangerous diſeaſe, to remove, by intoxication, the ſtings of a guilty conſcience. Such was the end of Marius, who rendered himſelf conſpicuous by his victories, and by his cruelty. As he was brought up among poverty and among peaſants, it will not appear wonderful that he always betrayed ruſticity in his behaviour, and deſpiſed in others thoſe poliſhed manners and that ſtudied addreſs which education had denied him. He hated the converſation of the learned, only becauſe he was illiterate, and, if he appeared an example of ſobriety and temperance, he owed theſe advantages to the years of obſcurity, which he paſſed at Arpinum. His countenance was ſtern, his voice firm and imperious, and his diſpoſition untractable. He always betrayed the greateſt timidity in the public aſſemblies, as he had not been early taught to make eloquence and oratory his purſuit. He was in the 70th year of his age when he died, and Rome ſeemed to rejoice at the fall of a man whoſe ambition had proved fatal to ſo many of her citizens. His only qualifications were thoſe of a great general, and with theſe he rendered himſelf the moſt illuſtrious and powerful of the Romans, becauſe he was the only one whoſe ferocity ſeemed capable to oppoſe the barbarians of the north. The manner of his death, according to ſome opinions, remains doubtful, though ſome have charged him with the crime of ſuicide. Among the inſtances which are mentioned of his firmneſs, this may be recorded: a ſwelling in the leg obliged him to apply to a phyſician, who urged the neceſſity of cutting it off. Marius gave it, and ſaw the operation performed without a diſtortion of the face, and without a groan. The phyſician aſked the other, and Marius gave it with equal compoſure. Plut. in vitâ. —Patere. 2, c. 9.—Flor. 3, c. 3.—Juv. 8, v. 245, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 69.——Caius, the ſon of the great Marius, was as cruel as his father, and ſhared his good and his adverſe fortune. He made himſelf conſul in the 25th year of his age, and murdered all the ſenators who oppoſed his ambitious views. He was defeated by Sylla, and fled to Præneſte, where he killed himſelf. Plut. in Mario.——Priſcus, a governor of Africa, accuſed of extortion in his province by Pliny the Younger, and baniſhed from Italy. Plin. 2, ep. 11.—Juv. 1, v. 48.——A lover, &c. Vid. Hellas.——One of the Greek fathers of the 5th century, whoſe works were edited by Garner, 2 vols. fol. Aurelius, a native of Gaul, who, from the mean employment of a blackſmith, became one of the generals of Gallienus, and at laſt cauſed himſelf to be ſaluted emperor. Three days after this elevation, a man who had ſhared his poverty without partaking of his more proſperous fortune, publicly aſſaſſinated him, and he was killed by a ſword which he himſelf had made in the time of his obſcurity. Marius has been often celebrated for his great ſtrength, and it is confidently reported that he could ſtop with one of his fingers only the wheel of a chariot in its moſt rapid courſe. ——Maximus, a Latin writer, who publiſhed an account of the Roman emperors from Trajan to Alexander, now loſt. His compoſitions were entertaining, and executed with great exactneſs and fidelity. Some Marpeſſa was tenderly loved by her huſband, and when Apollo endeavoured to carry her away, Idas followed the raviſher with a bow and arrows, reſolved on revenge. Apollo and Idas were ſeparated by Jupiter, who permitted Marpeſſa to go with that of the two lovers whom ſhe moſt approved of. She returned to her huſband. *Homer. MARRŪVIUM or MARRŪBIUM, a place near the Liris, in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 750.

MARS, the god of war amongſt the ancients, was the ſon of Jupiter and Juno, or of Juno alone, according to Ovid. This goddeſs, as the poet mentions, wiſhed to become a mother without the aſſiſtance of the other ſex, like Jupiter, who had produced Minerva all armed from his head, and ſhe was ſhown a flower by Flora in the plains near Olenus, whoſe very touch made women pregnant. [Vid. Juno.] The education of Mars was entruſted by Juno to the god Priapus, who inſtructed him in dancing and every manly exerciſe. His trial before the celebrated court of the Areopagus, according to the authority of ſome authors, for the murder of Halirrhotius, forms an intereſting epoch in hiſtory. [Vid. Areopagita.] The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. The god of war gained the affections of Venus, and obtained the gratification of his deſires, but Apollo, who was conſcious of their familiarities, informed Vulcan of his wife's debaucheries, and awakened his ſuſpicions. Vulcan ſecretly laid a net around the bed, and the two lovers were expoſed, in each others arms, to the ridicule and ſatire of all the gods, till Neptune prevailed upon the huſband to ſet them at liberty. This unfortunate diſcovery ſo provoked Mars that he changed into a cock his favorite Alectryon, whom he had ſtationed at the door to watch againſt the approach of the ſun, [Vid. Alectryon] and Venus alſo ſhowed her reſentment by perſecuting with the moſt inveterate fury the children of Apollo. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was ſeized by Orus and Ephialtes, and confined for fifteen months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. During the Trojan war Mars intereſted himſelf on the ſide of the Trojans, and defended the favorites of Venus with uncommon activity. The worſhip of Venus was not very univerſal among the ancients; his temples were not numerous in Greece, but in Rome he received the moſt unbounded honors, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they eſteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the firſt of their monarchs. His moſt celebrated temple at Rome was built by Auguſtus after the battle of Philippi. It was dedicated to Mars ultor, or the avenger. His prieſts among the Romans were called Salii; they were firſt inſtituted by Numa, and their chief office was to guard the ſacred Ancylia, one of which, as was ſuppoſed, had fallen down from heaven. Mars was generally repreſented in the naked figure of an old man, armed with a helmet, a pike, and a ſhield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dreſs, and with a long flowing beard, and ſometimes without. He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horſes, which the poets called Flight and Terror. His altars were ſtained with the blood of the horſe, on account of his warlike ſpirit, and of the wolf, on account of his ferocity. Magpies and vultures were alſo offered to him, on account of their greedineſs and voracity. The Scythians generally nerally offered him aſſes, and the people of Caria dogs. The weed called dog graſs was ſacred to him, becauſe it grows, as it is commonly reported, in places which are fit for fields of battle, or where the ground has been ſtained with the effuſion of human blood. The ſirnames of Mars are not numerous. He was called Gradivus, Mavors, Quirinus, Saliſubſulus, among the Romans. The Greeks called him Ares, and he was the Enyalus of the Sabines, the Camulus of the Gauls, and the Mamers of Carthage. Mars was father of Cupid, Anteros, and Harmonia, by the goddeſs Venus. He had Aſcalaphus and Ialmenus by Aſtyoche, Alcippe by Agraulos, Molus, Pylus, Evenus, and Theſtius, by Demonice, the daughter of Agenor. Beſides theſe, he was the reputed father of Romulus, Œnomaus, Bythis, Thrax, Diomedes of Thrace, &c. He preſided over gladiators, and was the god of hunting, and of whatever exerciſes or amuſements have ſomething manly and warlike. Among the Romans it was uſual for the conſul, before he went on an expedition, to viſit the temple of Mars, where he offered his prayers, and in a ſolemn manner ſhook the ſpear which was in the hand of the ſtatue of the god, at the ſame time exclaiming, "Mars vigila! god of war, watch over the welfare and ſafety of this city." *Ovid. MARSI, a nation of Germany, who afterwards came to ſettle in Italy, in a country chequered with foreſts abounding with wild boars, and other ferocious animals. They at firſt proved very inimical to the Romans, but, in proceſs of time, they became their firmeſt ſupporters. They are particularly celebrated for the civil war in which they were engaged, and which from them has received the name of the Marſian war. The large contributions they made to ſupport the intereſt of Rome, and the number of men which they continually ſupplied to the republic, rendered them bold and aſpiring, and they claimed, with the reſt of the Italian ſtates, a ſhare of the honor and privileges which were enjoyed by the citizens of Rome, B. C. 91. This petition, though ſupported by the intereſt, the eloquence, and the integrity of the tribune Druſus, was received with contempt by the Roman ſenate; and the Marſi, with their allies, ſhowed their diſſatisfaction by taking up arms. Their reſentment was increaſed when Druſus, their friend at Rome, had been baſely murdered by the means of the nobles, and they erected themſelves into a republic, and Corfinium was made the capital of their new empire. A regular war was now begun, and the Romans led into the field an army of 100,000 men, and were oppoſed by a ſuperior force. Some battles were fought in which the Roman generals were defeated, and the allies reaped no inconſiderable advantages from their victories. A battle, however, near Aſculum, proved fatal to their cauſe, 4000 of them were left dead on the ſpot, their general Francus, a man of uncommon experience and abilities, was ſlain, and ſuch as eſcaped from the field periſhed by hunger in the Appennines, where they had ſought a ſhelter. After many defeats, and the loſs of Aſculum, one of their principal cities, the allies, grown dejected, and tired of hoſtilities which had already continued for three years, ſued for peace one by one, and tranquillity was at laſt re-eſtabliſhed in the republic, and all the ſtates of Italy were made citizens of Rome. The armies of the allies conſiſted of the Marſi, the Peligni, the Veſtini, the Hirpini, Pompeiani, Marcini, Picentes, Venuſini, Ferentanæ, Apuli, Lucani, and Samnites. Appian.—*Val. MARSYABA, a town of Arabia.

MARSYAS, a celebrated piper of Celænæ, in Phrygia, ſon of Olympus, or of Hyagnis, or Œagrus. He was ſo ſkilful in playing on the flute, that he is generally deemed the inventor of it. According to the opinion of ſome, he found it when Minerva had thrown it aſide on account of the diſtortion of her face when ſhe played upon it. Marſyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nyſa, where he had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his ſkill as a muſician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated ſhould be flead alive by the conqueror. The Muſes, or, according to Diodorus, the inhabitants of Nyſa were appointed umpires. Each exerted his utmoſt ſkill, and the victory, with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo. The god, upon this, tied his antagoniſt to a tree, and flead him alive. The death of Marſyas was univerſally lamented; the Fauns, Satyrs, and Dryads, wept at his fate, and, from their abundant tears, roſe a river of Phrygia, well known by the name of Marſyas. The unfortunate Marſyas is often repreſented on monuments as tied, his hands behind his back, to a tree, while Apollo ſtands before him with his lyre in his hands. In independent cities among the ancients the ſtatue of Marſyas was generally erected in the forum, to repreſent the intimacy which ſubſiſted between Bacchus and Marſyas, as the emblems of liberty. It was alſo erected at the entrance of the Roman forum, as a ſpot where uſurers and merchants reſorted to tranſact buſineſs, being principally intended in terrorem litigatorum; a circumſtance to which Horace ſeems to allude, 1 Sat. 6. v. 120. At Celænæ, the ſkin of Marſyas was ſhown to travellers for ſome time; it was ſuſpended in the public place in the form of a bladder or a foot-ball. Hygin. fab. 165 —*Ovid. MARTIĀLES LUDI, games celebrated at Rome in honor of Mars.

MARTIĀLIS, Marcus Valerius, a native of Bilbilis, in Spain, who came to Rome about the 20th year of his age, where he recommended himſelf to notice by his poetical genius. As he was the panegyriſt of the emperors, he gained the greateſt honors, and was rewarded in the moſt liberal manner. Domitian gave him the tribuneſhip, but the poet, unmindful of the favors he received after the death of his benefactor, expoſed to ridicule the vices and cruelties of a monſter, whom, in his life time, he had extolled as the pattern of virtue, goodneſs, and excellence. Trajan treated the poet with coldneſs, and Martial, after he had paſſed 35 years in the capital of the world, in the greateſt ſplendor and affluence, retired to his native country, where he had the mortification to be the object of malevolence, ſatire, and ridicule. He received ſome favors from his friends, and his poverty was alleviated by the liberality of Pliny the younger, whom he had panegyrized in his poems. Martial died about the 104th year of the Chriſtian era, in the 75th year of his age. He is now well known by the fourteen books of epigrams which he wrote, and whoſe merit is now beſt deſcribed by the candid confeſſion of the author in this line, Sunt bona, ſunt quædam mediocria, ſunt mala plura.

But the genius which he diſplays in ſome of his epigrams deſerves commendation, though many critics are liberal in their cenſure upon his ſtile, his thoughts, and particularly upon his puns, which are often low and deſpicable. In many of his epigrams the poet has ſhown himſelf a declared enemy to decency, and the book is to be read with caution which can corrupt the purity of morals, and initiate the votaries of virtue in the myſteries of ſinful vice. It has been obſerved of Martial, that his talent was epigrams. Every thing he did was the ſubject of an epigram. He wrote inſcriptions upon monuments in the epigrammatic ſtile, and even a new-year's gift was accompanied with a diſtich, and his poetical pen was employed in begging a favor as well as ſatirizing a fault. The beſt editions of Martial are thoſe of Rader, fol. Mogunt. 1627, of Schriverius, 12mo. L. Bat. 1619; and of Smids, 8vo. Amſt. 1701.——A friend of Otho.——A man who conſpired againſt Caracalla.

MASÆSYLII, a people of Libya.

MASINISSA, a king of a ſmall part of Africa, who aſſiſted the Carthaginians in their wars againſt Rome. He proved a moſt indefatigable and courageous ally, but an act of generosity rendered him amicable to the interests of Rome. After the defeat of Asdrubal, Scipio, the first Africanus, who had obtained the victory, found, among the prisoners of war, one of the nephews of Masinissa. He sent him back to his uncle loaded with presents, and conducted him with a detachment for the safety and protection of his person. Masinissa was struck with the generous action of the Roman general, he forgot all former hostilities, and joined his troops to those of Scipio. This change of sentiments was not the effect of a wavering or unsettled mind, but Masinissa shewed himself the most attached and the firmest ally the Romans ever had. It was to his exertions they owed many of their victories in Africa, and particularly in that battle which proved fatal to Asdrubal and Syphax. The Numidian conqueror, charmed with the beauty of Sophonisba, the captive wife of Syphax, carried her to his camp and married her; but when he perceived that this new connection displeased Scipio, he sent poison to his wife, and recommended her to destroy herself, since he could not preserve her life in a manner which became her rank, her dignity, and fortune, without offending his Roman allies. In the battle of Zama, Masinissa greatly contributed to the defeat of the great Annibal, and the Romans, who had been so often spectators of his courage and valor, rewarded his fidelity with the kingdom of Syphax, and some of the Carthaginian territories. At his death Masinissa shewed the confidence he had in the Romans, and the esteem he entertained for the rising talents of Scipio Æmilianus, by entrusting him with the care of his kingdom, and impowering him to divide it among his sons. Masinissa died in the 97th year of his age, after a reign of above sixty years, 149 years before the Christian era. He experienced adversity as well as prosperity, and, in the first years of his reign, he was exposed to the greatest danger, and obliged often to save his life by seeking a retreat among his savage neighbours. But his alliance with the Romans was the beginning of his greatness, and he ever after lived in the greatest affluence. He is remarkable for the health he long enjoyed. In the last years of his life he was seen at the head of his armies, behaving with the most indefatigable activity, and he often remained for days together on horseback, without a saddle under him, or a covering upon his head, and without shewing the least marks of fatigue. This strength of mind and body he chiefly owed to the temperance which he observed. He was seen eating brown bread at the door of his tent, like a private soldier, the day after he had obtained an immortal victory over the armies of Carthage. He left fifty-four sons, three of whom were legitimate, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Manastabal. The kingdom was fairly divided among them by Scipio, and the illegitimate children received, as their portion, very valuable presents. The death of Gulussa and Manastabal soon after left Micipsa sole master of the large possessions of Masinissa. Strab. 17.—Polyb.—Appian. Lybic.—Cic. de Senect.—*Val. MAURŪSII, the people of Mauruſia, a country near the columns of Hercules. It is alſo called Mauritania. Vid. Mauritania. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 206.

MAUSŌLUS, a king of Caria. His wife Artemiſia was ſo diſconſolate at his death, which happened B. C. 353, that ſhe drank up his aſhes, and reſolved to erect one of the grandeſt and nobleſt monuments of antiquity, to celebrate the memory of a huſband whom ſhe tenderly loved. This famous monument which paſſed for one of the ſeven wonders of the world, was called Mauſoleum, and, from it, all other magnificent ſepulchres and tombs have received the ſame name. It was built by four different architects. Scopas had the ſide which faced the eaſt, Timotheus had the ſouth, Leochares had the weſt, and Bruxis the north. Pithis was alſo employed in raiſing a pyramid over this ſtately monument, and the top was adorned by a chariot drawn by four horſes. The expences of this edifice were immenſe, and this gave an occaſion to the philoſopher Anaxagoras to exclaim, when he ſaw it, How much money changed into ſtone! [*Vid. MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a ſon of the emperor Maximianus Hercules. Some ſuppoſe him to have been a ſuppoſitious child. The voluntary abdication of Diocletian, and of his father, raiſed him to the ſtate, and he declared himſelf independent emperor, or Auguſtus, A. D. 306. He afterwards incited his father to re-aſſume his imperial authority, and in a perfidious manner deſtroyed Severus, who had delivered himſelf into his hands, and relied upon his honor for the ſafety of his life. His victories and ſucceſſes were impeded by Galerius Maximianus, who oppoſed him with a powerful force. The defeat and voluntary death of Galerius ſoon reſtored peace to Italy, and Maxentius paſſed into Africa, where he rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty and oppreſſion. He ſoon after returned to Rome, and was informed that Conſtantine was come to dethrone him. He gave his adverſary battle near Rome, and, after he had loſt the victory, he fled back to the city. The bridge over which he croſſed the Tiber was in a decayed ſituation, and he fell into the river and was drowned, on the 24th of September, A. D. 312. The cowardice and luxuries of Maxentius are as conſpicuous as his cruelties. He oppreſſed his ſubjects with heavy taxes to gratify the cravings of his pleaſures, or the avarice of his favorites. He was debauched in his manners, and neither virtue nor innocence were ſafe whenever he was inclined to voluptuous purſuits. He was naturally deformed, and of an unwieldy body. To viſit a pleaſure ground, or to exerciſe himſelf under a marble portico, or to walk on a ſhady terrace, was to him a Herculean labor, which required the greateſt exertions of ſtrength and reſolution.

CORN. MAXIMILIĀNA, a veſtal virgin buried alive for incontinency, A. D. 92.

MAXIMIĀNUS, Herculius Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a native of Sirmium, in Pannonia, who ſerved as a common ſoldier in the Roman armies. When Diocletian had been raiſed to the imperial throne, he remembered the valor and courage of his fellow ſoldier Maximianus, and rewarded his fidelity by making him his colleague in the empire, and by ceding to him the command of the provinces of Italy, Africa, and Spain, and the reſt of the weſtern territories of Rome. Maximianus ſhowed the juſtneſs of the choice of Diocletian by his victories over the Barbarians. In Britain ſucceſs ſucceſs did not attend his arms, but in Africa he defeated and put to death Aurelius Julianus, who had proclaimed himſelf emperor. Soon after Diocletian abdicated the imperial purple, and obliged Maximianus to follow his example, on the 1ſt of April, A. D. 304. Maximianus reluctantly complied with the command of a man to whom he owed his greatneſs; but, before the firſt year of his reſignation had elapſed, he was rouſed from his indolence and retreat by the ambition of his ſon Maxentius. He re-aſſumed the imperial dignity, and ſhowed his ingratitude to his ſon by wiſhing him to reſign the ſovereignty, and to ſink into a private perſon. This propoſal was not only rejected with the contempt it deſerved, but the troops mutinied againſt Maximianus, and he fled for ſafety to Gaul, to the court of Conſtantine, to whom he gave his daughter Fauſtina in marriage. Here he again acted a perfidious character, and re-aſſumed the imperial power, which his misfortunes had obliged him to relinquiſh. This offended Conſtantine. But, when open violence ſeemed to fruſtrate the ambitious views of Maximianus, he had recourſe to artifice. He prevailed upon his daughter Fauſtina, to leave the doors of her chamber open in the dead of night, and, when ſhe promiſed faithfully to execute his commands, he ſecretly introduced himſelf to her bed; where he ſtabbed to the heart the man who ſlept by the ſide of his daughter. This was not Conſtantine: Fauſtina, faithful to her huſband, had apprized him of her father's machinations, and an eunuch had been placed in his bed. Conſtantine watched the motions of his father-in-law, and, when he heard the fatal blow given to the eunuch, he ruſhed in with a band of ſoldiers, and ſecured the aſſaſſin. Conſtantine reſolved to deſtroy a man who was ſo inimical to his neareſt relations, and nothing was left to Maximianus but to chooſe his own death. He ſtrangled himſelf at Marſeilles, A. D. 310, in the 60th year of his age. His body was found freſh and entire in a leaden coffin about the middle of the eleventh century.——Galerius Valerius, a native of Dacia, who, in the firſt years of his life, was employed in keeping his father's flocks. He entered the army, where his valor and bodily ſtrength recommended him to the notice of his ſuperiors, and particularly to Diocletian, who inveſted him with the imperial purple in the eaſt, and gave him his daughter Valeria in marriage. Galerius deſerved the confidence of his benefactor. He conquered the Goths, the Dalmatians, and checked the inſolence of the Perſians. In a battle, however, with the king of Perſia, Galerius was defeated, and, to complete his ignominy and render him more ſenſible of his diſgrace, Diocletian obliged him to walk behind his chariot arrayed in his imperial robes. This humiliation ſtung Galerius to the quick. He aſſembled another army, and gave battle to the Perſians. He gained a complete victory, and took the wives and children of his enemy. This ſucceſs elated Galerius to ſuch a degree, that he claimed the moſt dignified appellations, and ordered himſelf to be called the ſon of Mars. Diocletian himſelf dreaded his power, and even abdicated the imperial dignity by means of his threats. This reſignation is attributed by ſome to a voluntary act of the mind, and to a deſire of enjoying ſolitude and retirement. As ſoon as Diocletian had abdicated, Galerius was proclaimed Auguſtus, A. D. 304, but his cruelty ſoon rendered him odious, and the Roman people, offended at his oppreſſion, raiſed Maxentius to the imperial dignity the following year, and Galerius was obliged to yield to the torrent of his unpopularity, and to fly before his more fortunate adverſary. He died in the greateſt agonies, A.D. 311. The bodily pains and ſufferings which preceded his death, were, according to the Chriſtian writers, the effects of the vengeance of an offended Providence for the cruelty which he had exerciſed againſt the followers of Chriſt. In his character Galerius was wanton and tyrannical, and he often feaſted his eyes with the ſight of dying wretches, whom his barbarity had delivered to bears and wild beaſts. His averſion to learned men aroſe from his ignorance of letters; and, if he was deprived of the benefits of education, he proved the more cruel and the more inexorable.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Julius Verus, the ſon of a peaſant of Thrace. He was originally a ſhepherd, and, by heading his countrymen againſt the frequent attacks of the neighbouring barbarians and robbers, he inured himſelf to the labors and to the fatigues of a camp. He entered the Roman armies, where he gradually roſe to the firſt offices. On the death of Alexander Severus he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, A. D. 235. The popularity which he had gained when general of the armies, was at an end when he aſcended the throne. He was delighted with acts of the greateſt barbarity, and no leſs than 400 perſons loſt their lives on the falſe ſuſpicion of having conſpired againſt the emperor's life. They died in the greateſt torments, and, that the tyrant might the better entertain himſelf with their ſufferings, ſome were expoſed to wild beaſts, others expired by blows, ſome were nailed on croſſes, while others were ſhut up in the bellies of animals juſt killed. The nobleſt of the Roman citizens were the objects of his cruelty, and, as if they were more conſcious than others of his mean origin, he reſolved to ſpare no means to remove from his preſence a number of men whom he looked upon with an eye of envy, and who, as he imagined, hated him for his oppreſſion, and deſpiſed him for the poverty and obſcurity of his early years. Such is the character of the ſuſpicious and tyrannical Maximinus. In his military capacity he acted with the ſame ferocity, and, in an expedition in Germany, he not only cut down the corn, but he totally ruined and ſet fire to the whole country, to the extent of 450 miles. Such a monſter of tyranny at laſt provoked the people of Rome. The Gordians were proclaimed emperors, but their innocence and pacific virtues were unable to reſiſt the fury of Maximinus. After their fall, the Roman ſenate inveſted twenty men of their number with the imperial dignity, and entruſted into their hands the care of the republic. Theſe meaſures ſo highly irritated Maximinus that, at the firſt intelligence, he howled like a wild beaſt, and almoſt deſtroyed himſelf by knocking his head againſt the walls of his palace. When his fury was abated, he marched to Rome, reſolved on ſlaughter. His bloody machinations were ſtopped, and his ſoldiers, aſhamed of accompanying a tyrant whoſe cruelties had procured him the name of Buſiris, Cyclops, and Phalaris, aſſaſſinated him in his tent before the walls of Aquileia, A. D. 236, in the 65th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greateſt rejoicings at Rome, public thankſgivings were offered, and whole hecatombs flamed on the altars. Maximinus has been repreſented by hiſtorians as of a gigantic ſtature, he was eight feet high, and the bracelets of his wife ſerved as rings to adorn the fingers of his hand. His voracity was as remarkable as his corpulence, he generally eat forty pounds of fleſh every day, and drank 18 bottles of wine. His ſtrength was proportionable to his gigantic ſhape; he could alone draw a loaded waggon, and, with a blow of his fiſt, he often broke the teeth in a horſe's mouth; he broke the hardeſt ſtones between his fingers, and cleft trees with his hand. Herodianus.—Jornand. de reb. Get.—Capitol. Maximinus made his ſon of the ſame name emperor as ſoon as he was inveſted with the purple, and his choice was unanimouſly approved by the ſenate, by the people, and by the army.——Galerius Valerius, a ſhepherd of Thrace, who was raiſed to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, A. D. 305. He was nephew to Galerius Maximianus, by his mother's ſide, and to him he was indebted for his riſe and conſequence in the Roman armies. As Maximinus was ambitious and fond of power, he looked with an eye of jealouſy upon thoſe who ſhared the dignity of emperor with himſelf. He declared war againſt Licinius, his colleague on the throne, but a defeat which ſoon after followed, on the 30th of April, A. D. 313, between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, left him without reſources and without friends. His victorious enemy purſued him, and he fled beyond mount Taurus, forſaken and almoſt unknown. He attempted to put an end to his miſerable exiſtence, but his efforts were ineffectual, and, though his death is attributed by ſome to deſpair, it is more univerſally believed that he expired in the greateſt agonies, of a dreadful diſtemper which conſumed him day and night with inexpreſſible pains, and conſumed him to a mere ſkeleton. This miſerable end, according to the eccleſiaſtical writers, was the viſible puniſhment of heaven, for the barbarities which Maximinus had exerciſed againſt the followers of Chriſtianity, and for the many blaſphemies which he had uttered. Lactant.—Euſeb.—— A miniſter of the emperor Valerian.——One of the ambaſſadors of young Theodoſius, to Attila, king of the Huns.

MAXIMUS, MAGNUS, a native of Spain, who proclaimed himſelf emperor, A. D. 383. The unpopularity of Gratian favored his uſurpation, and he was acknowledged by his troops. Gratian marched againſt him, but he was defeated, and ſoon after aſſaſſinated. Maximus refuſed the honors of a burial to the remains of Gratian, and, when he had made himſelf maſter of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, he ſent ambaſſadors into the eaſt, and demanded of the emperor Theodoſius to acknowledge him as his aſſociate on the throne. Theodoſius endeavored to amuſe and delay him, but Maximus reſolved to ſupport his claim by arms, and croſſed the Alps. Italy was laid deſolate, and Rome opened her gates to the conqueror. Theodoſius now determined to revenge the audaciouſneſs of Maximus, and had recourſe to artifice. He began to make a naval armament, and Maximus, not to appear inferior to his adverſary, had already embarked his troops, when Theodoſius, by ſecret and haſtened marches, fell upon him, and beſieged him at Aquileia. Maximus was betrayed by his ſoldiers, and the conqueror, moved with compaſſion at the ſight of his fallen and dejected enemy, granted him life; but the multitude refuſed him mercy, and inſtantly ſtruck off his head, A. D. 388. His ſon Victor, who ſhared the imperial dignity with him, was ſoon after ſacrificed to the fury of the ſoldiers.——Petronius, a Roman, deſcended of an illuſtrious family. He cauſed Valentinian III. to be aſſaſſinated, and aſcended the throne; and, to ſtrengthen his uſurpation, he married the empreſs, to whom he had the weakneſs and imprudence to betray that he had ſacrificed her huſband to his love for her perſon. This declaration irritated the empreſs; ſhe had recourſe to the barbarians to avenge the death of Valentinian, and Maximus was ſtoned to death by his ſoldiers, and his body thrown into the Tyber, A. D. 455. He reigned only 77 days.——Pupianus. Vid.

Pupianus.

Pupianus.——A celebrated cynic philoſopher and magician of Epheſus. He inſtructed the emperor Julian in magic, and, according to the opinion of ſome hiſtorians, it was in the converſation and company of Maximus that the apoſtacy of Julian originated. The emperor not only viſited the philoſopher, but he even ſubmitted his writings to his inſpection and cenſure. Maximus refuſed to live in the court of Julian, and the emperor, not diſſatisfied with the refuſal, appointed him high pontif in the province of Lydia, an office which he diſcharged with the greateſt moderation and juſtice. When Julian went into the eaſt, the philoſopher promiſed him ſucceſs, and even ſaid that his conqueſts would be more numerous and extenſive than thoſe of the ſon of Philip. He perſuaded his imperial pupil that, according to the doctrine of Metempſychoſis, his body was animated by the ſoul which once animated the hero whoſe greatneſs and victories he was going to eclipſe. After the death of Julian, Maximus was almoſt ſacrificed to the fury of the ſoldiers, but the interpoſition of his friends ſaved his life, and he retired to Conſtantinople. He was ſoon after accuſed of magical practices before the emperor Valens, and beheaded at Epheſus, A. D. 366. He wrote ſome philoſophical and rhetorical treatiſes, ſome of which were dedicated to Julian. They are all now loſt. Ammian.——Tyrius, a Platonic philoſopher, in the reign of M. Aurelius. This emperor, who was naturally fond of ſtudy, became one of the pupils of Maximus, and paid great deference to his inſtructions. There are extant of Maximus forty-one diſſertations on moral and philoſophical ſubjects, written in Greek. The beſt editions of which are that of Davis, 8vo. Cantab. 1703; and that of Reiſke, 2 vols, 8vo. Lipſ. 1774.——One of the Greek fathers of the 7th century, whoſe works were edited by Combefis, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1675.——Paulus Fabius, a conſul with M. Antony's ſon. Horace ſpeaks of him, 4 od. 1, v. 10, as of a gay, handſome youth, fond of pleaſure, yet induſtrious and indefatigable.——An epithet applied to Jupiter, as being the greateſt and moſt powerful of all the gods.——A native of Sirmium, in Pannonia. He was originally a gardener, but, by enliſting in the Roman army, he became one of the military tribunes, and his marriage with a woman of rank and opulence ſoon rendered him independent. He was father to the emperor Probus.——A general of Trajan, killed in the eaſtern provinces.——One of the murderers of Domitian, &c.——A philoſopher, native of Byzantium, in the age of Julian the emperor.

Mazăca, a large city of Cappadocia, the capital of the province. It was called Cæſarea by Tiberius, in honor of Auguſtus.

Mazăces, a Perſian, governor of Memphis. He made a ſally againſt the Grecian ſoldiers of Alexander, and killed great numbers of them. Curt. 4, c. 1.

Mazæus, a ſatrap of Cilicia, under Artaxerxes Ochus.——A governor of Babylon, ſon-in-law to Darius. He ſurrendered to Alexander, &c. Curt. 5, c. 1.

Mazăres, a ſatrap of Media, who reduced Priene under the power of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 161.

Mazeras, a river of Hyrcania, falling into the Caſpian Sea. Plut.

Mazices and Mazўces, a people of Libya, very expert in the uſe of miſſile weapons. The Romans made uſe of them as couriers, on account of their great ſwiftneſs. Suet. in Ner. 30.—Lucan. 4, v. 684.

Mechaneus, a ſirname of Jupiter, from his patronizing undertakings.

Mecœnas or Mecænas, C. Cilnius, a celebrated Roman knight, deſcended from the kings of Etruria. He has rendered himſelf immortal by his liberal patronage of learned men and of letters; and to his prudence and advice Auguſtus acknowledged himſelf indebted for the ſecurity he enjoyed. His fondneſs for pleaſure removed him from the reach of ambition, and he preferred to die, as he was born, a Roman knight, to all the honors and dignities which either the friendſhip of Auguſtus, or his own popularity, could heap upon him. It was from the reſult of his advice againſt the opinion of Agrippa, that Auguſtus reſolved to keep the ſupreme power in his hands, and not, by a voluntary reſignation, to plunge Rome into civil commotions. The emperor received the private admonitions of Mecœnas in the ſame friendly manner as they were given, and he was not diſpleaſed with the liberty of his friend, who threw a paper to him with theſe words, Deſcend from the tribunal, thou butcher! while he ſat in the judgment-ſeat, and betrayed revenge and impatience in his countenance. He was ſtruck with the admonition, and left the tribunal without paſſing ſentence of death on the criminals. To the interference of Mecœnas, Virgil owed the retribution of his lands, and Horace was proud to boaſt that his learned friend had obtained his forgiveneſs from the emperor, for joining the cauſe of Brutus at the battle of Philippi. Mecœnas was himſelf fond of literature, and, according to the moſt received opinion, he wrote an hiſtory of animals, a journal of the life of Auguſtus, a treatiſe on the different natures and kinds of precious ſtones, beſides the two tragedies of Octavia and Prometheus, and other things, all now loſt. He died eight years before Chriſt; and, on his death-bed, he particularly recommended his poetical friend Horace to the care and confidence of Auguſtus. Seneca, who has liberally commended the genius and abilities of Mecænas, has not with-held his cenſure from his diſſipation, indolence, and effeminate luxury. From the patronage and encouragement which the princes of heroic and lyric poetry, among the Latins, received from the favorite of Auguſtus, all patrons of literature have ever ſince been called Mecænates. Virgil dedicated to him his Georgics, and Horace his Odes. Suet. in. Aug. 66, &c. Plut. in Aug.—Herodian. 7.—Senec. ep. 19 & 92.

Mecisteus, one of the companions of Ajax. He was killed by Polydamas. Homer. Il. 6.——A ſon of Lycaon. Apollod.

Mecrida, the wife of Lyſimachus. Polyæn. 6.

Medea, a celebrated magician, daughter of Æetes, king of Cholcis. Her mother's name, according to the more received opinion of Heſiod and Hyginus, was Idyia, or, according to others, Ephyre, Hecate, Aſterodia, Antiope, and Neæra. She was the niece of Circe. When Jaſon came to Colchis in queſt of the golden fleece, Medea became enamoured of him, and it was to her well-directed labors that the Argonauts owed their preſervation. [Vid. Jaſon & Argonautæ.] Medea had an interview with her lover in the temple of Hecate, where they bound themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths, and promiſed eternal fidelity. No ſooner had Jaſon overcome all the difficulties which Æetes had placed in his way, than Medea embarked with the conquerors for Greece. To ſtop the purſuit of her father ſhe tore to pieces her brother Abſyrtus, and left his mangled limbs in the way, through which Æetes was to paſs. This act of barbarity, ſome have attributed to Jaſon, and not to her. When Jaſon reached Iolchos, his native country, the return and victories of the Argonauts were celebrated with univerſal rejoicings, but Æſon, the father of Jaſon, was unable to aſſiſt at the ſolemnity, on account of the infirmities of his age. Medea, at her huſband's requeſt, removed the weakneſs of Æſon, and by drawing away the blood from his veins, and filling them again with the juice of certain herbs, ſhe reſtored him to the vigor and ſprightlineſs of youth. This ſudden change in Æſon aſtoniſhed the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias were alſo deſirous to ſee their father reſtored, by the ſame power, to the vigor of youth. Medea, willing to revenge the injuries which her huſband's family had ſuffered from Pelias, increaſed their curioſity, and by cutting to pieces an old ram and making it again, in their preſence, a young lamb, ſhe totally determined them to try the ſame experiment upon their father's body. They accordingly killed him of their own accord, and boiled his fleſh in a cauldron, but Medea refuſed to perform the ſame friendly offices to Pelias which ſhe had done to Æſon, and he was conſumed by the heat of the fire, and even deprived of a burial. This action greatly irritated the people of Iolchos, and Medea, with her huſband, fled to Corinth to avoid the reſentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for ten years with much conjugal tenderneſs, but the love of Jaſon for Glauce, the king's daughter, ſoon interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jaſon by cauſing the death of Glauce, and the deſtruction of her family. [Vid. Glauce.] This action was followed by another ſtill more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's preſence, and, when Jaſon attempted to puniſh the barbarity of the mother, ſhe fled through the air upon a chariot drawn by winged dragons. From Corinth Medea came to Athens, where, after ſhe had undergone the neceſſary purification of her murder, ſhe married king Ægeus, or, according to others, lived in an adulterous manner with him. From her connection with Ægeus Medea had a ſon, who was called Medus. Soon after, when Theſeus wiſhed to make himſelf known to his father, [Vid. Ægeus.] Medea, jealous of his fame, and fearful of his power, attempted to poiſon him at a feaſt which had been prepared for his entertainment. Her attempts, however, failed of ſucceſs, and the ſight of the ſword which Theſeus wore by his ſide convinced Ægeus that the ſtranger againſt whoſe life he had ſo baſely conſpired was no leſs than his own ſon. The father and the ſon were reconciled, and Medea, to avoid the puniſhment which her wickedneſs deſerved, mounted her fiery chariot, and diſappeared through the air. She came to Colchis, where, according to ſome, ſhe was reconciled to Jaſon, who had ſought her in her native country after her ſudden departure from Corinth. She died at Colchis, as Juſtin mentions, when ſhe had been reſtored to the confidence of her family. After death, ſhe married Achilles in the Elyſian fields, acording to the traditions mentioned by Simonides. The murder of Mermerus and Pheres, the youngeſt of Jaſon's children by Medea, is not attributed to the mother, according to Ælian, but the Corinthians themſelves aſſaſſinated them in the temple of Juno Acræa. To avoid the reſentment of the gods, and to deliver themſelves from the peſtilence which viſited their country after ſo horrid a maſſacre, they engaged the poet Euripides, for five talents, to write a tragedy, gedy, which cleared them of the murder, and represented Medea as the cruel assassin of her own children. And, besides, that this opinion might be the better credited, festivals were appointed, in which the mother was represented with all the barbarity of a fury murdering her own sons. *Vid. Heraa. MEDIA, a celebrated country of Asia, bounded on the north by the Caspian Sea, west by Armenia, south by Persia, and east by Parthia and Hyrcania. It was originally called Aria till the age of Medus, the son of Medea, who gave it the name of Media. The province of Media was first raised into a kingdom by its revolt from the Assyrian monarchy, B. C. 820; and, after it had for some time enjoyed a kind of republican government, Deioces, by his arts, procured himself to be called king, 700 B. C. After a reign of 53 years he was succeeded by Phraortes, B. C. 647; who was succeeded by Cyaxares, B. C. 625. His successor was Astyages, B. C. 585, in whose reign Cyrus became master of Media, B. C. 551; and ever after the empire was transferred to the Persians. The Medes were warlike in the primitive ages of their power; they encouraged polygamy, and were remarkable for the homage they paid to their sovereigns, who were stiled kings of kings. This title was afterwards adopted by their conquerors, the Persians, and it was still in use in the age of the Roman emperors. Justin. 1, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Polyb. 5 & 10.—Curt. 5, &c.—*Diod. MEDIAS, a tyrant of Mysia, &c.

MEDICUS, a prince of Larissa, in Thessaly, who made war against Lycophron, tyrant of Pheræ. Diod. 14.

MEDIOMATRICES, a nation that lived on the borders of the Rhine. Strab. 4.—Cæs. bell. G. 4, c. 10.

MEDITERRANEUM MARE, a sea which divides Europe and Asia Minor from Africa. It receives its name from its situation, medio terra, situate in the middle of the land. It has a communication with the Atlantic by the columns of Hercules, and with the Euxine through the Ægean. It is sometimes called internum, and is frequently denominated in Scripture the Great Sea. The first naval power that ever obtained the command of it, as recorded in the fabulous epochs of the writer Castor, is Crete, under Minos. Afterwards it passed into the hands of the Lydians, B. C. 1179; of the Pelasgi, 1058; of the Thracians, 1000; of the Rhodians, 916; of the Phrygians, 893; of the Cyprians, 868; of the Phœnicians, 820; of the Egyptians, 787; of the Milesians, 753; of the Carians, 734; and of the Lesbians, 676, which they retained for 69 years.

MEDITRINA, the goddess of medicines, whose festivals, called Meditrinalia, were celebrated at Rome the last day of September, when they made offerings of fruits. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

MEDOACUS or MEDUACUS, a river in the country of the Veneti, falling into the Adriatic Sea. Liv. 10, c. 2.

MEDOBITHYNI, a people of Thrace.

MEDOBRIGA, a town of Lusitania.

MEDON, son of Codrus the 17th and last king of Athens, was the first archon that was appointed with regal authority, B. C. 1070. In the election Medon was preferred to his brother Neleus, by the oracle of Delphi, and he rendered himself popular by the justice and moderation of his administration. His successors were called from him Medontidæ, and the office of archon remained for above 200 years in the family of Codrus under 12 perpetual archons. Paus. 7, c. 2.—Paterc. 1, c. 2.——A man killed in the Trojan war. Æneas saw him in the infernal regions. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.——A statuary of Lacedæmon, who made a famous statue of Minerva. Paus. 5, c. 17.——One of the Centaurs, &c. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 303.——One of the Tyrrhene sailors changed into dolphins by Bacchus. Id. Heroid. 1.——A man of Cyzicus, killed by the Argonauts.——A king of Argos, who died about 990 years B. C.

MEDONTIAS, a woman of Abydos, with whom Alcibiades cohabited as with a wife. She had a daughter, &c.

MEDUANA, a river flowing into the Ligeris. Lucan. 1, v. 438.

MEDULLINA, a Roman virgin ravished by her father, &c. Plut. in Parall.——An infamous courtezan in Juvenal's age. 6, v. 321.

MEDUS, a river of Media, falling into the Araxes.——A son of Ægeus and Medea, who gave his name to a country of Asia. Medus, when arrived to years of maturity, went to seek his mother, whom the arrival of Theseus in Athens had driven away. [Vid. Medea.] He came to Colchis, where he was seized by his uncle Perses, who usurped the throne of Æetes, his mother's father, because the oracle had declared that Perses should be murdered by one of the grandsons of Æetes. Medus assumed another name, and and called himself Hippotes, son of Creon. Mean while Medea arrived in Colchis disguised in the habit of a priestess of Diana, and when she heard that one of Creon's children was imprisoned, she resolved to hasten the destruction of a person whose family she detested. To effect this with more certainty, she told the usurper, that Hippotes was really a son of Medea, sent by his mother to murder him. She begged Perses to give her Hippotes, that she might sacrifice him to her resentment. Perses consented. Medea discovered that it was her own son and she instantly armed him with the dagger which she had prepared against his life, and ordered him to stab the usurper. He obeyed and Medea discovered who she was, and made her son Medus sit on his grandfather's throne. Hesiod. Theog. Paus. 2.—Apollod. 1.—Justin. 42—Senec. in Med.—Diod.

MEDUSA, one of the three Gorgons, daughter of Phorcys and Ceto. She was the only one of the Gorgons, who was subject to mortality. She is celebrated for her personal charms and the beauty of her locks. Neptune became enamoured of her, and obtained her favors in the temple of Minerva. This violation of the sanctity of the temple provoked Minerva, and she changed the beautiful locks of Medusa, which had inspired Neptune's love, into serpents. According to Apollodorus and others, Medusa and her sisters came into the world with snakes on their heads, instead of hair, with yellow wings and brazen hands. Their body was also covered with impenetrable scales, and their very looks had the power of killing or turning to stones. Perseus rendered his name immortal by the conquest of Medusa. He cut off her head, and the blood that dropped from the wound produced the innumerable serpents that infest Africa. The conqueror placed Medusa's head on the ægis of Minerva, which he had used in his expedition. The head still retained the same petrifying power as before, as it was fatally known in the court of Cepheus. (Vid. Andromeda.) Some suppose, that the Gorgons were a nation of women, whom Perseus conquered. Vid. Gorgones. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—*Hesiod. Theog. Ovid. MEGABIZI, certain priests in Diana's temple at Ephesus. They were all eunuchs. Quintil. 5, c. 12.

MEGABYZUS, one of the noble Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. He was set over an army in Europe by king Darius, where he took Perinthus and conquered all Thrace. He was greatly esteemed by his sovereign. Herodot. 3, &c.——A son of Zopyrus, satrap to Darius. He conquered Egypt, &c. Herodot. 3, c. 160.——A satrap of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his king, and defeated two large armies that had been sent against him. The interference of his friends restored him to the king's favor, and he shewed his attachment to Artaxerxes by killing a lion which threatened his life in hunting. This act of affection in Megabyzus was looked upon with envy by the king. He was discarded and afterwards reconciled to the monarch by means of his mother. He died in the 76th year of his age B. C. 447, greatly regretted. Ctesias.

MEGACLES, an Athenian archon who involved the greatest part of the Athenians in the sacrilege which was committed in the conspiracy of Cylon. Plut. in Sol.——A brother of Dion, who assisted his brother against Dionysius, &c.——A son of Alcmæon, who revolted with some Athenians after the departure of Solon from Athens. He was ejected by Pisistratus.——A man who exchanged dress with Pyrrhus when assisting the Tarentines in Italy. He was killed in that disguise.——A native of Messana in Sicily, famous for his inveterate enmity to Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse.——A man who destroyed the leading men of Mitylene, because he had been punished.——A man who wrote an account of the lives of illustrious persons.——The maternal grandfather of Alcibiades.

MEGACLIDES, a peripatetic philosopher in the age of Protagoras.

MEGÆRA, one of the furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron. The word is derived from μεγαιρειν invidere, odisse. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 846. Vid. Eumenides.

MEGALEAS, a seditious person of Corinth. He was seized for his treachery to king Philip of Macedonia, upon which he destroyed himself to avoid punishment.

MEGALESIA, games in honor of Cybele instituted by the Phrygians, and introduced at Rome in the second Punic war, when the statue of the goddess was brought from Pessinus Liv. 29, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 337.

MEGALIA, a small island of Campania, near Neapolis. Stat. 2. Sylv. v. 80.

MEGALOPOLIS, a town of Arcadia in Peloponnesus, built by Epaminondas. It joined the Achæan league B. C. 232, and was taken and ruined by Cleomenes, king of Sparta. Strab. 8.—Paus. 9, c. 14.

MEGAMEDE, the wife of Thestius. Apollod.

MEGANIRA, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis in Attica. She was mother to Triptolemus, to whom Ceres, as she travelled over Attica, taught agriculture. She received ceived divine honors after death, and she had an altar raised to her, near the fountain where Ceres had first been seen when she arrived in Attica. Paus. 1, c. 39.——The wife of Arcas. Apollod.

MEGAPENTHES, an illegitimate son of Menelaus, who, after his father's return from the Trojan war, was married to a daughter of Alector, a native of Sparta. His mother's name was Teridae, a slave of Menelaus. Homer. Od. 4.—Apollod. 3.

MEGĂRA, a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, given in marriage to Hercules, because he had delivered the Thebans from the tyranny of the Orchomenians. [Vid. Erginus.] When Hercules went to hell by order of Eurystheus, violence was offered to Megara by Lycus, a Theban exile, and she would have yielded to her ravisher, had not Hercules returned that moment and punished him with death. This murder displeased Juno, and she rendered Hercules so delirious, that he killed Megara and the three children he had by her in a fit of madness, thinking them to be wild beasts. Some say that Megara did not perish by the hand of her husband, but that he afterwards married her to his friend Iolas. The names of Megara's children by Hercules were Creontiades, Therimachus, and Deicoon. Hygin. fab. 82.—Senec. in Herc.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

MEGĂRA, a city of Achaia, the capital of a country called Megaris founded about 1131 B. C. It is situate nearly at an equal distance from Corinth and Athens, on the Sinus Saronicus. It was built upon two rocks, and is still in being, and preserves its ancient name. It was called after Megareus the son of Neptune, who was buried there, or from Megareus a son of Apollo. It was originally governed by twelve kings, but became afterwards a republic, and fell into the hands of the Athenians, from whom it was rescued by the Heraclidæ. There was here a sect of philosophers called the Megaric, who held the world to be eternal. Paus. 1, c. 39.—Strab. 6.—Mela 2, c. 3.——A town of Sicily founded by a colony from Megara in Attica, about 728 years before the Christian era. It was destroyed by Gelon, king of Syracuse, and before the arrival of the Megarean colony it was called Hybla. Strab. 26, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 689.

MEGARUS, the father of Hippomenes, was son of Onchestus. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 605.——A son of Apollo.

MEGĂRIS, a small country of Achaia, between Phocis on the west and Attica on the east. Its capital city was called Megara. Vid. Megara.

MEGARSUS, a town of Sicily,—of Cilicia.——A river of India.

MEGASTHĔNES, a Greek historian in the age of Seleucus Nicanor, about 300 years before Christ. He wrote about the oriental nations, and particularly the Indians. His history is often quoted by the antients. What now passes as his composition is spurious.

MEGES, one of Helen's suitors. He went with forty ships to the Trojan war. Hom. Il. 2.

MEGILLA a native of Locris remarkable for beauty and mentioned by Horat. 2. od. 27, v. 11.

MEGISTA, and island of Lycia, with an harbour of the same name. Liv. 37, c. 22.

MELA, POMPONIUS, a Spaniard who flourished about the year of the Christian era, and distinguished himself by his geography divided into three books, and written with elegance, with great perspicuity and brevity. The best editions are those of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat, 1722, and Reinhold, 4to Eton, 1761.

MEGISTIA, a soothsayer who told the Spartans that defended Thermopylæ, that they all should perish, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 219, &c.

MELÆNÆ, a village of Attica. Stat. Theb. 12. v. 619.

MELAMPUS, a celebrated soothsayer and physician of Argos, son of Amythaon and Idomenea, or Dorippe. He lived at Pylos in Peloponnesus. His servants once killed two large serpents who had made their nests at the bottom of a large oak, and Melampus paid so much regard to these two reptiles, that he raised a burning pile and burned them upon it. He also took particular care of their young ones, and fed them with milk. Some time after this the young serpents crept to Melampus as he slept on the grass near the oak, and, as if sensible of the favors of their benefactor, they wantonly played around him, and softly licked his ears. This awoke Melampus, who was astonished at the sudden change which his senses had undergone. He found himself acquainted with the chirping of the birds and with all their rude notes, as they flew around him. He took advantage of this supernatural gift, and soon made himself perfect in the knowledge of futurity, and Apollo also instructed him in the art of medicine. He had soon after the happiness of curing the daughters of Prœtus, by giving them ellebore, which from this circumstance has been called melampodium, and as a reward for his troubles he married the eldest of these princesses. [Vid. Prœtides.] The tyranny of his uncle Neleus, king of Pylos, obliged him to leave his native country, and Prœtus to shew himself more sensible of his services gave him part of his kingdom, over which he established himself. About this time the personal charms of Pero, the daughter of Neleus, had gained many admirers; but the father promised his daughter only to him who brought into his hands the oxen of Iphiclus. This condition displeased many, but Bias, who was also one of her admirers, engaged his brother Melampus to steal the oxen, and deliver them to him. Melampus was caught in the attempt, and imprisoned, and nothing but his services as a loothsayer and physician to Iphiclus would have saved him from death. All this pleaded in the favor of Melampus, but when he had taught the childless Iphiclus how to become a father, he not only obtained his liberty, but also the oxen, and with them he compelled Neleus to give Pero in marriage to Bias. A severe distemper which had rendered the women of Argos insane, was totally removed by Melampus, and Anaxagoras, who then sat on the throne, rewarded his merit by giving him part of his kingdom, where he established himself, and where his posterity reigned during six successive generations. He received divine honors after death, and temples were raised to his memory.—Homer. Od. 11.—Herodot. 2 & 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Paus. 2, c. 18. l. 4, c. 3.—Virg. G. 3, v. 550.——The father of Cisseus and Gyas. Virg. Æn. 10.——A son of Priam. Apollod. 3.—One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3.

Melanchlæni, a people near the Cimmerian Bosphorus.

Melanchrus, a tyrant of Lesbos who died about 612, B. C.

Melane, the same as Samothrace.

Melaneus, a son of Eurytus, from whom Eretria has been called Melaneis. ——A centaur. Ovid. Met. 12.——One of Actæon's dogs. Id. 3.——An Æthiopian killed at the nuptials of Perseus. Id. 5.

Melanida, a surname of Venus.

Melanion, the same as Hippomenes, who married Atalanta according to some mythologists. Apollod. 3.

Melanippe, a daughter of Æolus who had two children by Neptune, for which her father put out both her eyes, and confined her in a prison. Her children, who had been exposed and preserved, delivered her from confinement, and Neptune restored her to her eye-sight. She afterwards married Metapontus. Hygin. fab. 186.——A nymph who married Itonus, son of Amphictyon, by whom she had Bœotus, who gave his name to Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 1.

Melanippides, a Greek poet about 520 years before Christ. His grandson of the same name flourished about 60 years after at the court of Perdiccas the second, of Macedonia. Some fragments of their poetry are extant.

Melanippus, a priest of Apollo, at Cyrene, killed by the tyrant Nicocrates. Polyæn. 8.——A son of Astapus one of the Theban chiefs who defended the gates of Thebes against the army of Adrastus king of Argos. He was opposed by Tydeus, whom he slightly wounded. He was killed by Amphiaraus, who carried his head to Tydeus. Tydeus to take revenge of the wound he had received, bit the head with such barbarity that he swallowed the brains, and Minerva, offended with his conduct, took away the herb which she had given him to cure his wound, and he died. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Æschyl. ante Theb.—Paus. 9 c. 18. ——A son of Mars, who became enamoured of Cometho, a priestess of Diana Triclaria. He concealed himself in the temple, and ravished his mistress, for which violation of the sanctity of the place, the two lovers soon after perished by a sudden death. Paus. 7, c. 19.——A Trojan killed by Antilochus in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 15.——Another killed by Patroclus.—Another killed by Teucer.—A son of Agrius.—Another of Priam.—A son of Theseus.

Melanosyri, a people of Syria.

Melanthii, rocks near the island of Samos.

Melanthius, a man who wrote an history of Attica.—A famous painter of Sicyon. Plin. 35.——A tragic poet of a very malevolent disposition. He lived in the age of Phocion. Plut.——A Trojan killed by Eurypylus in the Trojan war. Homer. Od. ——A shepherd in Theocrit. Idyll.——A goat-herd killed by Telemachus after the return of Ulysses. Ovid. 1 Heroid.——An elegiac poet. Plut.

Melantho, a daughter of Proteus, ravished by Neptune under the form of a dolphin. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 12.——One of Penelope's women. Homer. Il. 18, &c.

Melanthus, Melanthes, or Melanthius, a son of Andropompus, whose ancestors were kings of Pylos. He was driven from his paternal kingdom by the Heraclidæ, and came to Athens, where king Thymœtes resigned the crown to him, provided he fought a battle against Xanthus, a general of the Bœotians, who made war against him. He fought and conquered, [Vid. Apaturia] and his family, surnamed the Neleidæ, sat on the throne of Athens, till the age of Codrus. He succeeded to the crown 1128 years B.C. and reigned 37 years. Paus. 2, c. 18.—— A man of Cyzicus. Flacc.——A river of European Sarmatia falling into the Borysthenes. Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 10, v. 55.

Melas, a river of Peloponnesus.—— Of Thrace, at the west of the Thracian Chersonesus.—Another in Thessaly,—in Achaia,—in Bœotia,—in Sicily,—in Ionia,—in Cappadocia.——A son of Neptune.—Another, son of Proteus.—A son of Phryxus.

Meleager, a celebrated hero of antiquity, son of Œneus, king of Ætolia by Althæa, daughter of Thestius. The Parcæ were present at the moment of his birth, and and predicted his future greatneſs. Clotho ſaid, that he would be brave and courageous; Lacheſis foretold his uncommon ſtrength and Atropos declared that he ſhould live as long as that fire brand which was on the fire, remained entire and unconſumed. Althæa, no ſooner heard this, than ſhe ſnatched the ſtick from the fire, and kept it with the moſt jealous care, as the life of her ſon totally depended upon its preſervation. The fame of Meleager increaſed with his years, he ſignalized himſelf in the Argonautic expedition, and afterwards delivered his country from the neighbouring inhabitants, who made war againſt his father at the inſtigation of Diana, whoſe altars Œneus had neglected. [Vid. OEneus.] No ſooner were they deſtroyed than Diana puniſhed the negligence of Œneus by a greater calamity. She ſent a huge wild boar, which laid waſte all the country, and ſeemed invincible on account of its immenſe ſize. It became ſoon a public concern, all the neighbouring princes aſſembled to deſtroy this terrible animal, and nothing became more famous in mythological hiſtory, than the hunting of the Calydonian boar. The princes and chiefs that aſſembled, and which are mentioned by mythologiſts, are Meleager ſon of Œneus, Idas and Lynceus, ſons of Aphareus, Dryas ſon of Mars, Caſtor and Pollux, ſons of Jupiter and Leda, Pirithous, ſon of Ixion, Theſeus ſon of Ægeus, Anceus and Cepheus, ſons of Lycurgus, Admetus ſon of Pheres, Jaſon ſon of Æſon, Peleus and Telamon, ſons of Æacus, Iphicles, ſon of Amphitryon, Eurytrion, ſon of Actor, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, Iolas the friend of Hercules, the ſons of Theſtius, Amphiaraus ſon of Oileus, Protheus, Cometes, the brothers of Althæa, Hippothous ſon of Cercyon, Leucippus, Adraſtus, Ceneus, Phileus, Echeon, Lelex, Phœnix ſon of Amyntor, Panopeus, Hyleus, Hippaſus, Neſtor, Menœtius, the father of Patroclus, Amphicides, Laertes the father of Ulyſſes, and the four ſons of Hippocoon. This troop of armed men, attacked the boar, with uncommon fury, and it was at laſt killed by Meleager. The conqueror gave the ſkin and the head to Atalanta, who had firſt wounded the animal. This partiality to a woman, irritated the others, and particularly Toxeus and Plexippus, the brothers of Althæa, and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the honorable preſent. Meleager defended a woman, of whom he was enamoured, and killed his uncles in the attempt. Mean time the news of this celebrated conqueſt had already reached Calydon and Althæa went to the temple of the gods to return thanks for the victory which her ſon had gained. As ſhe went ſhe met the corpſes of her brothers that were brought from the chace, and at this mournful ſpectacle ſhe filled the whole city with her lamentations. She was ſoon informed that they had been killed by Meleager, and in the moment of reſentment to revenge the death of her brothers, ſhe threw into the fire the fatal ſtick, on which her ſon's life depended, and Meleager died as ſoon as it was conſumed. Homer does not mention the fire-brand, whence ſome have imagined that this fable is poſterior to that poet's age. But, he ſays, that the death of Toxeus and Plexippus ſo irritated Althæa, that ſhe uttered the moſt horrible curſes and imprecations upon the head of her ſon. Meleager married Cleopatra, the daughter of Idas and Marpeſſa, as alſo Atalanta, according to ſome accounts. Apollod. 2, c. 8.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Flacc. 1 & 6.—Pauſ. 10, c. 31.—Hygin. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8.—Homer. Il. 9.——A general, who ſupported Aridæus when he had been made king after the death of his brother Alexander the Great.——A brother of Ptolemy, made king of Macedonia B. C. 280 years. He was but two months inveſted with the regal authority.——A Greek poet in the reign of Seleucus, the laſt of the Seleucidæ. He was born at Tyre and died at Cos. It is to his well directed labors, that we are indebted for the anthologia, or collection of Greek epigrams, which he ſelected from 46 of the beſt and moſt eſteemed poets. The original collection of Meleager has been greatly altered by ſucceeding editors. The beſt edition of the anthologia is that of Brunck in three vols. 4to. and 8vo. Argentor. 1772.

Meleagrides, the ſiſters of Meleager, daughters of Œneus and Althæa. They were ſo diſconſolate at the death of their brother Meleager, that they refuſed all aliments, and were at the point of death changed into birds called Meleagrides, whoſe feathers and eggs, as it is ſuppoſed, are of a different color. The youngeſt of the ſiſters Gorge and Dejanira, who had been married eſcaped this metamorphoſis, Apollod. 2, c. 8.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 540.—Plin.

Meleander, an Athenian general who died B. C. 414.

Meles (-tis,) a river of Aſia minor, in Ionia near Smyrna. Some of the ancients ſuppoſed that Homer was born on the banks of that river, from which circumſtance they call him Meleſigenes, and his compoſitions Meletæ chartæ. It is even ſupported that he compoſed his poems in a cave near the ſource of that river. Strab. 12.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 7, v. 34.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 201.—Pauſ. 7, c. 5.——A beautiful Athenian youth, greatly beloved by Timagoras, whoſe affections he repaid with the the greateſt coldneſs and indifference. He even ordered Timagoras to leap down a precipice, from the top of the citadel of Athens, and Timagoras, not to diſoblige him, obeyed, and was killed in the fall. This token of true friendſhip and affection had ſuch an effect upon Meles, that he threw himſelf down from the place, to atone by his death for the ingratitude which he had ſhown to Timagoras. Pauſ. 1, c. 30.——A king of Lydia, who ſucceeded his father Alyattes, about 747 years before Chriſt. He was father to Candaules.

MELESIGĔNES or MELESIGĔNA, a name given to Homer. Vid. Meles.

MELIA, a daughter of Oceanus, who married Inachus.——A nymph, &c. Apollod.——A daughter of Oceanus, ſiſter to Cranthus. She became mother of Iſmarus and Tenerus by Apollo. Tenerus was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and the river Ladon in Bœotia, aſſumed the name of Iſmarus. Pauſ. 9, c. 10.——One of the Nereides.——A daughter of Agenor.

MELIBŒA, a daughter of Oceanus, who married Pelaſgus.——A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Apollod.——A maritime town of Magneſia in Theſſaly, at the foot of mount Oſſa, famous for dying wool. The epithet of Melibœus is applied to Philoctetes becauſe he reigned there. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 401. l. 5, v. 251.——Herodot. 7, c. 188.

MELIBŒUS, a ſhepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues.

MELICERTA, Melicertes, or Melicertus, a ſon of Athamas and Ino. He was ſaved by his mother, from the fury of his father, who prepared to daſh him againſt a wall as he had done his brother Learchus. The mother was ſo terrified that ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, with Melicerta in her arms. Neptune had compaſſion on the misfortunes of Ino and her ſon and changed them both into ſea deities. Ino was called Leucothoe or Matuta, and Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palæmon, and among the Latins by that of Portumnus. Some ſuppoſe that the Iſthmian games, were in honor of Melicerta. Vid. Iſthmia. Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 4.—Pauſ. 1, c. 44.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 529, &c.—Plut. de Symp.

MELIGŪNIS, one of the Æolian iſlands near Sicily.

MELINA, a daughter of Theſpius.

MELISA, a town of Magna Græcia.

MELISSA, a daughter of Meliſſus, king of Crete, who with her ſiſter Amalthæa, fed Jupiter with the milk of goats. She firſt found out the means of collecting honey whence ſome have imagined that ſhe was changed into a bee, as her name is the Greek word for that inſect. Columell.——One of the Oceanides, who married Inachus by whom ſhe had Phoroneus and Ægialus.——A daughter of Procles, who married Periander, the ſon of Cypſelus. Pauſ. 1, c. 28.——A woman of Corinth, who refuſed to initiate others in the feſtivals of Ceres, after ſhe had received admiſſion. She was torn to pieces upon this diſobedience, and the goddeſs made a ſwarm of bees riſe from her body.

MELISSUS, a king of Crete, father to Meliſſa and Amalthæa.——An admiral of the Samian fleet B. C. 441. He was defeated by Pericles, &c. Plut. in Per.——A philoſopher of Samos, who maintained that the world was infinite, immoveable, and without a vacuum. According to his doctrines, no one could advance any argument upon the power or attributes of providence, as all human knowledge was weak and imperfect. Themiſtocles was among his pupils. He floriſhed about 440 years before the Chriſtian era. Diog.——A freed man of Mecænas, appointed librarian to Auguſtus. He wrote ſome comedies. Ovid. Pont. 4. ep. 16, v. 30.—Sueton. de Gram.

MELITA, an iſland in the Libyan ſea, between Sicily and Africa now called Malta. The ſoil was fertile, and the country famous for its wool. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Cic. in Ver. 4, c. 46.——One of the Nereides. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825.

MELITENE, a province of Armenia.

MELITUS, a poet and orator of Athens, who became one of the principal accuſers of Socrates. After his eloquence had prevailed, and Socrates had been put ignominiouſly to death, the Athenians relented of their ſeverity to the philoſopher, and condemned his accuſers. Melitus periſhed among them. His character was mean and inſidious and his poems had nothing great or ſublime. Diog.

SP. MELIUS, a Roman knight accuſed of aſpiring to tyranny, on account of his uncommon liberality, to the populace. He was ſummoned to appear by the dictator L. Q. Cincinnatus, and when he refuſed to obey, he was put to death by Ahala, the maſter of horſe, A. U. C. 314.—Varro de L. L. 4.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.

MELIXANDRUS, a Mileſian, who wrote an account of the wars of the Lapithæ and Centaurs. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 2.

MELLA, a river of Ciſalpine Gaul, Virg. G. 4, v. 278.

MELLA ANNÆUS, the father of Lucan. He was accuſed of being privy to Piſo's conſpiracy againſt Nero, upon which he opened his veins. Tacit. 16. Ann. c. 17.

MELOBOSIS, one of the Oceanides.

MELON, an aſtrologer, who feigned madneſs

nals and burnt his house that he might not go to an expedition, which he knew would be attended with great calamities.——An interpreter of king Darius. Curt. 5, c. 13.

MELOS, an island between Crete and Peloponnesus, about 24 miles from Scyllæum, about 60 miles in circumference and of an oblong figure. It enjoyed its independance for above 700 years before the time of the Peloponnesian war. This island was originally peopled by a Lacedæmonian colony, 1116 years before the Christian era. From this reason the inhabitants refused to join the rest of the islands and the Athenians against the Peloponnesians. This refusal was severely punished. The Athenians took Melos, and put to the sword all such as were able to bear arms. The women and children were made slaves and the island left desolate. An Athenian colony repeopled it, till Lysander reconquered it and re-established the original inhabitants in their possessions. Strab. 7.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12.——Thucyd. 2, &c.

MELPIA, a village of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c, 38.

MELPŎMĔNE, one of the muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over tragedy. Horace has addressed the finest of his odes to her, as to the patroness of lyric poetry. She was generally represented as a young woman with a serious countenance. Her garments were splendid she wore a buskin, and held a dagger in one hand and in the other a sceptre and crowns. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Hesiod. Theog.

MEMACENI, a powerful nation of Asia. &c. Curt.

MEMMIA SULPITIA, a woman who married the emperor Alexander Severus. She died when young.

MEMMIA LEX, ordained that no one should be entered on the calendar of criminals who was absent on the public accounts.

MEMMIUS, a Roman citizen, accused of ambitus. Cic. ad fratrem. 3.——A Roman knight, who rendered himself illustrious for his eloquence and poetical talents. He was made tribune, prætor, and afterwards governor of Bithynia. He was accused of extortion in his province and banished by J. Cæsar, though Cicero undertook his defence. Lucretius dedicated his poem to him. Cic. in Brut.——A Roman of whom Nero observed, that he deserved to be invested with the imperial purple. Tacit. ann. 14, c. 47.——A Roman who accused Jugurtha before the Roman people.——A lieutenant of Pompey, &c.——The family of the Memmii were plebeians. They were descended, according to some accounts, from Mnestheus the friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 117.

MEMNON, a king of Æthiopia, son of Tithonus and Aurora. He came with a body of 10,000 men to assist his uncle Priam, during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Nestor's son. The aged father challenged the Æthiopian monarch, but Memnon refused it on account of the venerable age of Nestor, and accepted that of Achilles. He was killed in the combat in the sight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. Aurora was so disconsolate at the death of her son, that she flew to Jupiter all bathed in tears, and begged the god to grant her son such honors as might distinguish him from other mortals. Jupiter consented, and immediately a numerous flight of birds issued from the burning pile on which the body was laid, and, after they had flown three times round the flames, they divided themselves into two separate bodies, and fought with such acrimony that above half of them fell down into the fire, as victims to appease the manes of Memnon. These birds were called Memnonides, and it has been observed by some of the ancients, that they never failed to return yearly to the tomb of Memnon, in Troas, and repeat the same bloody engagement, in honor of the hero, from whom they received their name. The Æthiopians or Egyptians, over whom Memnon reigned, erected a celebrated statue to the honor of their monarch. This statue had the wonderful property of uttering a melodious sound every day, at sun-rising, like that which is heard at the breaking of the string of a harp when it is wound up. This was effected by the rays of the sun when they fell upon it. At the setting of the sun, and in the night, the sound was lugubrious. This is supported by the testimony of the geographer Strabo, who confesses himself ignorant whether it proceeded from the basis of the statue, or the people that were then around it. This celebrated statue was dismantled by order of Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, and its ruins still astonish modern travellers by their grandeur and beauty. Memnon was the inventor of the alphabet, according to Anticlides, a writer mentioned by Pliny, 7, c. 56. Mosch. in Bion.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 578, &c.—Ælian. 5, c. 1.—Paus. 1, c. 42, l. 10, c. 31.—Strab. 13, &c.—Juv. 15, v. 5.—Philostr. in Apollod.—Plin. 36, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 9.—Quint. Calab.——A general of the Persian forces, when Alexander invaded Asia. He distinguished himself for his attachment to the interest of Darius, his valor in the field, the soundness of his counsels, and his great sagacity. He defended Miletus against Alexander, and died in the midst of his successful enterprises, B. C. 333. His wife Barsine was taken prisoner with the wife of Darius. Diod.

Diod. 16.——A governor of Cœlosyria.——A man appointed governor of Thrace by Alexander.——A man who wrote a history of Heraclea in Pontus, in the age of Augustus.

MEMPHIS, a celebrated town of Egypt, on the western banks of the Nile, above the Delta. It once contained many beautiful temples, particularly those of the god Apis, whose worship was observed with the greatest ceremonies. [Vid. Apis.] It was in the neighbourhood of Memphis that those famous pyramids were built, whose grandeur and beauty still astonish the modern traveller. These noble monuments of Egyptian vanity which pass for one of the wonders of the world, are about 20 in number, three of which by their superior size particularly claim attention. The largest of these is 481 feet in height measured perpendicularly, and the area of its basis is on 480, 249 square feet or something more than 11 English acres of ground. It has steps all round with massy and polished stones, so large that the breadth and depth of every step is one single stone. The smallest stone according to an antient historian is not less than 30 feet. The number of steps according to modern observation amounts to 208, a number which is not always adhered to by travellers. The place where Memphis formerly stood is not now known, the ruins of its fallen grandeur were conveyed to Alexandria to beautify its palaces, or to adorn the neighbouring cities. Strab. 17.—Mela. 1, c. 9.—Diod. 1.—Plut. in Isid.—Herodot. 2, c. 10, 99.—Joseph. ant. Jud. 8.——A nymph, daughter of the Nile, who married Ephesus, by whom she had Libya. She gave her name to the celebrated city of Memphis. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——The wife of Danaus Apollod. 2, c. 1.

MEMPHITIS, a son of Ptolemy Physcon king of Egypt. He was put to death by his father.

MENA or MENES, the first king of Egypt according to some accounts.

MENALCAS, a shepherd in Virgil's eclogues.

MENALCIDAS, an intriguing Lacedæmonian in the time of the famous Achæan league. He was accused before the Romans, and he killed himself.

MENALIPPE, a sister of Antiope, queen of the Amazons, taken by Hercules when that hero made war against this celebrated nation. She was ransomed, and Hercules received in exchange the arms and belt of the queen. Juv. 8, v. 229.——A daughter of the Centaur Chiron, beloved and ravished by Æolus, son of Hellen. She retired into the woods to hide her disgrace from the eyes of her father, and when she had brought forth she entreated the gods to remove her totally from the pursuits of Chiron. She was changed into a mare, and called Ocyroe. Some suppose that she assumed the name of Menalippe, and lost that of Ocyroe. She became a constellation after death, called the horse. Some authors call her Hippe or Evippe. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 18.—Paluæ 4.——Menalippe is a name common to other persons, but it is generally spelt Melanippe by the best authors. Vid. Melanippe.

MENALIPPUS. Vid. Melanippus.

MENANDER, a celebrated comic poet, of Athens, educated under Theophrastus. He was universally esteemed by the Greeks, and received the appellation of Prince of the New Comedy. He did not disgrace his compositions like Aristophanes, by mean and indecent reflections and illiberal satyr, but his writings were replete with elegance, refined wit, and judicious observations. Of 108 comedies which he wrote, nothing remains but a few fragments. It is said, that Terence translated all these, and indeed we have cause to lament the loss of such valuable writings when we are told by the antients that the elegant Terence, so much admired, was in the opinion of his countrymen reckoned inferior to Menander. It is said that Menander drowned himself in the 52d year of his age, B. C. 293, because the compositions of his rival Philemon obtained more applause than his own. Only eight of his numerous comedies were rewarded with a poetical prize. The name of his father was Diopythus, and that of his mother Hegistrata. His fragments with those of Philemon, were published by Clerica, 8vo. 1709. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.——A man who wrote an account of embassies, &c.—A king of Bactria, whose ashes were divided among his subjects, &c.—An historian of Ephesus.—Another of Pergamus.—An Athenian general defeated at Ægospotamos by Lysander.—An Athenian sent to Sicily with Nicias.—A man put to death by Alexander for deserting a fortress of which he had the command.—An officer under Mithridates, sent against Lucullus.

MENAS, a freedman of Pompey the Great who distinguished himself by the active and perfidious part he took in the civil wars which were kindled between the younger Pompey and Augustus. When Pompey invited Augustus to his galley, Menas advised his master to seize the person of his enemy enemy, and at the same time the Roman empire, by cutting the cables of his ship. No, replied Pompey, I would have approved of the measure if you had done it without consulting me; but I scorn to break my word. Suet. in Oct.—Horace ep. prod. 4 has ridiculed the pride of Menas, and recalled to his mind his former meanness and obscurity.

Menchères, the 12th king of Memphis.

Mendes, a city of Egypt, near Lycopolis, on one of the mouths of the Nile, called the Mendesian mouth. Pan under the form of a goat was worshipped there with the greatest solemnity. It was unlawful to kill one of these animals, with which the Egyptians were not ashamed to have public commerce to the disgrace of human nature, from the superstitious notion that such embraces had given birth to the greatest heroes of antiquity, as Alexander, Scipio, &c. Herodot. 2, c. 42 & 46.—Strab. 17.—Diod. 1.

Menecles, an orator of Alabanda in Caria, who settled at Rhodes.

Menecrates, a physician of Syracuse, famous for his vanity and arrogance. He was generally accompanied by some of his patients whose disorders he had cured. He disguised one in the habit of Apollo, and the other in that of Æsculapius, while he reserved for himself the title and name of Jupiter, whose power was extended over these inferior deities. He crowned himself like the master of the gods, and in a letter which he wrote to Philip king of Macedon, he stiled himself, in these words, Menecrates Jupiter to king Philip, greeting. The Macedonian monarch answered, Philip to Menecrates, greeting, and better sense. Philip also invited him to one of his feasts, but when the meats were served up, a table was put separate for the physician, on which he was served only with perfumes and frankincense, like the father of the gods. This entertainment displeased Menecrates; he remembered that he was a mortal, and hurried away from the company. He lived about 360 years before the Christian era. The book which he wrote on cures is lost. Ælian V. H. 10, c. 51.——One of the generals of Seleucus.—A physician under Tiberius.—A Greek historian of Nysa, disciple to Aristarchus, B. It is said that he died through melancholy when Antigonus, one of Alexander's generals had made himself master of his country. B. C. 300, in the 74th year of his age. Some attribute his death to a different cause, and say, that he was falsely accused of treason, for which he became so desperate that he died after he had passed seven days without taking any aliments. He was called the Eretrian Bull, on account of his gravity. Strab. 9.—Diog.——A Cynic philosopher of Lampsacus who said that he was come from hell to observe the sins and wickedness of mankind. His habit was that of the furies, and his behaviour was a proof of his insanity. He was disciple of Colotes of Lampsacus. Diog.——An officer of Lucullus.

Menelæa, a festival celebrated at Therapnæ in Laconia, in honor of Menelaus. He had there a temple, where he was worshipped with his wife Helen as one of the supreme gods.

Menelaus, a king of Sparta brother to Agamemnon. His father's name was Atreus, according to Homer, or according to the more probable opinion of Hesiod, Apollodorus, &c. he was the son of Plisthenes and Ærope. [Vid. Plisthenes.] He was educated with his brother Agamemnon in the house of Atreus, but soon after the death of this monarch, Thyestes his brother usurped the kingdom, and banished the two children of Plisthenes. Menelaus and Agamemnon came to the court of Œneus king of Calydonia who treated them with tenderness and paternal care. From Calydonia they went to Sparta, where like the rest of the Grecian princes they solicited the marriage of Helen the daughter of king Tyndarus. By the artifice and advice of Ulysses, Helen was permitted to choose a husband, and she fixed her eyes upon Menelaus and married him, after her numerous suitors had solemnly bound themselves by an oath to defend her, and protect her person against the violence or assault of every intruder. [Vid. Helena.] As soon as the nuptials were celebrated, Tyndarus resigned the crown to his son-in-law, and their happiness was complete. This was, however, of short duration; Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised Paris the son of Priam to reward him with such a beauty. [Vid. Paris.] The arrival of Paris in Sparta was the cause of great revolutions. The absence of Menelaus in Crete gave opportunities to the Trojan prince to corrupt the fidelity of Helen, and to carry away home what the goddess of beauty had promised to him as his due. This action was highly resented by Menelaus; he reminded the Greek princes of their oath and solemn engagements when they courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and immediately all Greece took up arms to defend his cause. The combined forces assembled at Aulis in Bœotia where they chose Agamemnon for their general, and Calchas for their high priest; and after their applications to the court of Priam for the recovery of Helen had proved fruitless, they marched to meet their enemies in the field. During the Trojan war Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage, and Paris must have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interposed and redeemed him from certain death. He also expressed his wish to engage Hector, but Agamemnon hindered him from fighting with so powerful an adversary. In the tenth year of the Trojan war, Helen, as it is reported, obtained the forgiveness and the good graces of Menelaus by introducing him with Ulysses the night that Troy was reduced to ashes, into the chamber of Deiphobus whom she had married after the death of Paris. This perfidious conduct totally reconciled her to her first husband, and she returned with him to Sparta, during a voyage of eight years. He died some time after his return. He had had a daughter called Hermione, and Nicostratus according to some by Helen, and a son called Megapenthes by a concubine. Some say that Menelaus went to Egypt on his return from the Trojan war to obtain Helen who had been detained there by the king of the country. [Vid. Helena.] The palace which Menelaus once inhabited was still entire in the days of Pausanias, as well as the temple which had been raised to his memory by the people of Sparta. Homer Od. 4, &c. Il. 1, &c.—Apollod 3, c. 10.—Paus. 3, c. 14 & 19.—*Dictys. Menestrei Portus, a town of Hispania Bætica.

Menestæus or Menestheus or Mnestheus, a son of Perœus who so insinuated himself into the favor of the people of Athens, that during the long absence of Theseus, he was elected king. The lawful monarch at his return home was expelled, and Mneſtheus established his usurpation by his popularity and great moderation. As he had been one of Helen's suitors, he went to the Trojan war at the head of the people of Athens, and died in his return in the island of Melos. He reigned 23 years, 1205, and was succeeded by Demophoon the son of Theseus. Plut. in Thes.——A son of Iphicrates who distinguished himself in the Athenian armies. C. Nep. in Tim.

Mera or Merra, one of the Atlantides who married Tegeates ſon of Lycaon. Pauſ. 8, c. 48.

Mercurius, a celebrated god of antiquity, called Hermes by the Greeks. There were no leſs than five of this name according to Cicero; a ſon of Cœlus and Lux; a ſon of Vulcan and Coronis, a ſon of the Nile; a ſon of Jupiter and Maia, and another called by the Egyptians Thaut. Some add a ſixth, a ſon of Bacchus and Proſerpine. To the ſon of Jupiter and Maia, the actions of all the others have been probably attributed, as he is the moſt famous, and the beſt known. Mercury was the meſſenger of the gods and of Jupiter in particular; he was the patron of travellers and of ſhepherds; he conducted the ſouls of the dead into the infernal regions, and not only preſided over orators, merchants, declaimers, but he was alſo the god of thieves, pickpockets, and all diſhoneſt perſons. His name is derived a mercibus, becauſe he was the god of merchandize among the Latins. He was born, according to the more received opinion in Arcadia, on mount Cyllene, and in his infancy he was entruſted to the care of the Seaſons. The day that he was born, or more probably the following day, he gave an early proof of his craftineſs and diſhoneſty, in ſtealing away the oxen of Admetus which Apollo tended. He gave another proof of his thieviſh propenſity, by taking alſo the quiver and arrows of the divine ſhepherd, and he encreaſed his fame by robbing Neptune of his trident, Venus of her girdle, Mars of his ſword, Jupiter of his ſceptre, and Vulcan of many of his mechanical inſtruments. Theſe ſpecimens of his art recommended him to the notice of the gods, and Jupiter took him as his meſſenger, interpreter, and cup-bearer in the aſſembly of the gods. This laſt office he diſcharged till the promotion of Ganymede. He was preſented by the king of heaven with a winged cap called petaſus, and with wings for his feet called talaria. He had alſo a ſhort ſword called harpe, which he lent to Perſeus. With theſe he was enabled to go into whatever part of the univerſe he pleaſed with the greateſt celerity, and beſides he was permitted to make himſelf inviſible, and to aſſume whatever ſhape he pleaſed. As meſſenger of Jupiter he was entruſted with all his ſecrets. He was the ambaſſador and plenipotentiary of the gods, and he was concerned in all alliances and treaties. He was the confident of Jupiter's amours, and he often was ſet to watch over the jealouſy and intrigues of Juno. The invention of the lyre and its ſeven ſtrings is aſcribed to him. This he gave to Apollo, and received in exchange the celebrated caduceus with which the god of poetry uſed to drive the flocks of king Admetus. [Vid. Caduceus.] In the wars of the giants againſt the gods, Mercury ſhowed himſelf brave, ſpirited and active. He delivered Mars from the long confinement which he ſuffered from the ſuperior power of the Aloides. He purified the Danaides of the murder of their huſbands, he tied Ixion to his wheel in the infernal regions, he deſtroyed the hundred-eyed Argus, he ſold Hercules to Omphale the queen of Lydia, he conducted Priam to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his ſon Heſtor, and he carried the infant Bacchus to the nymphs of Nyſa. Mercury had many ſirnames and epithets. He was called Cyllenius, Caduceator, Acacetos, from Acacus, an Arcadian; Acaceſius, Tricephalos, Triplex, Chthonius, Camillus, Agoueus, Delius, Arcas, &c. His children are alſo numerous as well as his amours. He was father of Autolycus, by Chione; Myrtillus, by Cleobula; Libys, by Libya; Echion and Eurytus, by Antianira; Cephalus, by Creuſa; Prylis, by Iſſa; and of Priapus, according to ſome. He was alſo father of Hermaphroditus, by Venus; of Eudorus, by Polimela; of Pan, by Dryope, or Penelope. His worſhip was well eſtabliſhed, particularly in Greece, Egypt and Italy. He was worſhipped at Tanagra in Bœotia, under the name of Criophorus, and repreſented as carrying a ram on his ſhoulders, becauſe he delivered the inhabitants from a peſtilence by telling them to carry a ram in that manner round the walls of their city. The Roman merchants yearly celebrated a feſtival on the 15th of May, in honor of Mercury in a temple near the Circus Maximus. A pregnant ſow was then ſacrificed and ſometimes a calf, and particularly the tongues of animals were offered. After the votaries had ſprinkled themſelves with water with laurel leaves, they offered prayers to the divinity, and intreated him to be favorable to them, and to forgive whatever artful meaſures, falſe oaths, or falſ-hoods they had uſed or uttered in the purſuit of gain. Sometimes Mercury appears on monuments with a large cloak round his arm or tied under his chin. The chief enſigns of his power and offices are his caduceus, his petaſus, and his talaria. Sometimes he is repreſented ſitting upon a cray fiſh, holding in one hand his caduceus, and in the other the claws of the fiſh. At other times he is like a young man without a beard, holding in one hand a purſe, as being the tutelary god of merchants, with a cock on his wriſts as an emblem of vigilance, and at his feet, a goat, a ſcorpion and a fly. Some of his ſtatues repreſented him as a youth faſcino erecto. Sometimes he reſts his foot upon a tortoiſe. In Egypt his ſtatues repreſented him with the head of a dog, whence he was often confounded with Anubis, and received the ſacrifice of a ſtork. Offerings of milk and honey were made becauſe he was the god of eloquence, whoſe powers were ſweet and perſuaſive. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of ſpeaking, of which the tongue is the organ. Sometimes his ſtatues repreſent him as without arms, becauſe, according to ſome, the power of ſpeech can prevail over every thing even without the aſſiſtance of arms. Homer Od. 1, &c. Il. 1, &c. Hymn in Merc.—*Lucian in Mort. She had married four huſbands before ſhe came to the imperial throne, and after the death of Nero ſhe retired to literary purſuits and peaceful occupatient. Otho courted her and would have married her had he not destroyed himself. In his moments he wrote her a very pathetic and consolatory letter, &c. Tacit. Ann.

Messalinus M. Valer, a Roman officer in the reign of Tiberius. He was appointed governor of Dalmatia, and rendered himself known by his opposition to Piso, and by his attempts to persuade the Romans, of the necessity of suffering women to accompany the camps on their different expeditions, Tacit. Ann. 3.——One of Domitian's informers.——A flatterer of the emperor Tiberius.

Messana, an antient and celebrated town of Sicily on the streights which separate Italy from Sicily. It was antiently called Zanole and was founded 1600 years before the Christian era. The inhabitants, being continually exposed to the depradations of the people of Cuma, implored the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and with them repelled the enemy. After this victorious campaign, the Messenians entered Zancle and lived in such intimacy with the inhabitants that they changed their name, and assumed that of the Messenians and called their city Messana. Another account says, that Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, made war against the Zancleans with the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and that after he had obtained a decisive victory, he called the conquered city Messana in compliment to his allies, about 494 years before the Christian era. After this revolution at Zancle, the Mamertini took possession of it and made it the capital of the neighbouring country. [Vid. Mamertini.] It afterwards fell into the hands of the Romans, and was for some time the chief of their possessions in Sicily. The inhabitants were called Messenii, Messanienses, and Mamertini. The streights of Messana have always been looked upon as very dangerous, especially by the antients, on account of the rapidity of the currents and the irregular and violent flowing and ebbing of the sea. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 4, c. 23.—Diod. 4.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot. 6, c. 23. l. 7. c. 28.

Messapia, a country of Italy, between Tarentum and Brundusium. It is the same as Calabria. It received its name from Messapus, the son of Neptune who left a part of Bœotia called Messapia, and came to Italy where he assisted the Rutulians against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 691.

Messapus, a town of Achaia. Paus. 7. c. 18.

Messe, a town in the island of Cythera. Stat. 1. Theb. 4, v. 226.

Messeis, a fountain of Thessaly. Strab 9.

Messene, a daughter of Triopas, king of Argos, who married Polycaon son of Lelex, king of Laconia. She encouraged her husband to levy troops, and to seize a part of Peloponnesus, which after it had been conquered, received her name. She received divine honors after death. Paus. 4, c. 1, &c.

Messene or Messena, a city in the Peloponnesus, the capital of the country called Messenia. The inhabitants have rendered themselves famous for the war, which they carried on against the Spartans, and which received the appellation of the Messenian war. The first Messenian war, arose from the following circumstances; The Messenians offered violence to some Spartan women who had assembled to offer sacrifices in a temple, which was common to both nations, and which stood on the borders of their respective territories, and besides they killed Teleclus, the Spartan king, who attempted to defend the innocence of the females. This account, according to the Spartan traditions is contradicted, by the Messenians, who observe that Teleclus with a chosen body of Spartans assembled at the temple, before mentioned, disguised in women's cloaths, and all secretly armed with daggers. This hostile preparation was to surprize some of the neighbouring inhabitants, and in a quarrel which soon after arose Teleclus and his associates were all killed. These quarrels were the cause of the first Messenian war, which began, B. C. 743 years. It was carried with vigor and spirit on both sides, and after many obstinate and bloody battles had been fought and continued for 19 years, it was at last finished by the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, a place which had stood a siege of ten years, and been defended with all the power of the Messenians. The insults to which the conquered Messenians were continually exposed, at last excited their resentment, and they resolved to shake off the yoke. They suddenly revolted and the second Messenian war was begun 685, B. C. and continued 14 years. The Messenians at first gained some advantages, but a fatal battle in the third year of the war so totally disheartened them that that fled to Ira, where they resolved to maintain an obstinate siege against their victorious pursuers. The Spartans were assisted by the Samians in besieging Ira and the Messenians were at last obliged to submit to the superior power of their adversaries. The taking of Ira, by the Lacedæmonians, after a siege of 11 years put an end to the second Messenian war. Peace was re-established for some time in Peloponnesus, but after the expiration of 200 years, the Messenians attempted a third time to free themselves from the power of Lacedæmon, B. C. 465. At that time the the Helots had revolted from the Spartans, and the Messenians by joining their forces to these wretched slaves looked upon their respective calamities as common, and thought themselves commonly interested in each other's welfare. The Lacedæmonians were assisted by the Athenians, but they soon grew jealous of one another's power, and their political connection ended in the most inveterate enmity and at last open war. Ithome was the place in which the Messenians had a second time gathered all their forces, and though ten years had already elapsed both parties seemed equally confident of victory. The Spartans were afraid of storming Ithome, as the oracle of Delphi had threatened them with the greatest calamities, if they offered any violence to a place which was dedicated to the service of Apollo. The Messenians, however, were soon obliged to submit to their victorious adversaries, B. C. 453, and they consented to leave their native country, and totally to depart from the Peloponnesus, solemnly promising that if they ever returned into Messenia, they would suffer themselves to be sold as slaves. The Messenians, upon this miserably exiled, applied to the Athenians for protection, and were permitted to inhabit Naupactus, whence some of them were afterwards removed to take possession of their antient territories in Messenia, during the Peloponnesian war. The third Messenian war was productive of great revolutions in Greece, and though almost a private quarrel, it soon engaged the attention of all the neighbouring states, and kindled the flames of dissension every where. Every state took up arms as if in its own defence, or to prevent additional power and dominion to be lodged in the hands of its rivals. The descendants of the Messenians at last returned to Peloponnesus, B. C. 370, after a long banishment of 300 years. *Paus. Messenia, a province of Peloponnesus, situate between Laconia, Elis, Arcadia, and the sea. Its chief city is Messena. Vid. Messene.

Mestor, a son of Perseus.——Of Perilaus.——Of Priam. Apollod.

Mesula, a town of Italy, in the country of the Sabines.

Metabus, a tyrant of the Privernates. He was father of Camilla, whom he consecrated to the service of Diana, when he had been banished from his kingdom by his subjects. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 540.

Metagitnia, a festival in honor of Apollo, celebrated by the inhabitants of Melite, who migrated to Attica. It received its name from its being observed in the month called Metagitnion.

Metanira, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis who first taught mankind agriculture. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Metapontus, a town of Lucania in Italy, founded about 1069 years, B. C. by Metabus, the father of Camilla or Opis, one of the companions of Hector. Pythagoras retired there for some time and perished in a sedition. Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Justin. 12, c. 2.

Metapontus, a son of Sisyphus, who married Theana. Vid. Theana. Hygin. fab. 186.

Metaurus, a town with a small river of the same name in the country of the Brutii. The river Metaurus falls into the Adriatic. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, v. 425.

Metella, the wife of Sylla.

Metelli, the surname of the family of the Cæcilii at Rome, the most known of whom were—A general, who defeated the Achæans, took Thebes, and invaded Macedonia, &c.——Q. Cæcilius, who rendered himself illustrious by his success against Jugurtha the Numidian king, from which he was surnamed Numidicus. He took in this expedition, the celebrated Marius as his lieutenant, and he had soon cause to repent of the confidence he had placed in him. Marius raised himself to power by defaming the character of his benefactor and Metellus was recalled to Rome and accused of extortion and ill management. Marius was appointed successor to finish the Numidian war, and Metellus was acquitted of the crimes laid to his charge before the tribunal of the Roman knights, who observed that the probity of his whole life, and the greatness of his exploits were greater proofs of his innocence, than the most powerful arguments.——Another who saved from the flames the Palladium, when Vesta's temple was on fire. He was then high priest. He lost his sight and one of his arms in doing it, and the senate to reward his zeal and piety permitted him always to be drawn to the senate house in a chariot, an honor which no one had ever before enjoyed. He also gained a great victory over the Carthaginians, &c.——Q. Cæcilius Celer, another who distinguished himself by his spirited exertions against Catiline. He married the sister of Clodius, who disgraced him by her incontinence and lasciviousness. He died 57 years before Christ. He was greatly lamented by Cicero, who shed tears at the loss of one of his most faithful and aluable friends.——L. Cæcilius, a tribune in the civil wars of J. Cæsar and Pompey. He favored the cause of Pompey, and opposed Cæsar when he entered near Rome with a victorious army. He refused to open the gates of Saturn's temple, in which were deposited great treasures, upon which they were broke open by Cæsar, and Metellus seized, when threatened with death.——Q. Cæcilius, a warlike general who conquered Crete and Macedonia, and was surnamed Macedonicus. He had four sons, of which three were consuls, and the other obtained a triumph, all during their father's life time.——A general of the Roman armies against the Sicilians and Carthaginians. Before he marched he offered sacrifices to all the gods, except Vesta, for which neglect the goddess was so incensed that she demanded the blood of his daughter Metella. When Metella was going to be immolated the goddess placed a heifer in her place and carried her to a temple at Lanuvium, of which she became the priestess.——Lucius Cæc. was surnamed Creticus from his conquest in Crete, B. C. 66.——Another surnamed Dalmaticus from his conquest over Dalmatia.——Cimber, one of the conspirators against J. Cæsar. It was he who gave the signal to attack and murder the dictator in the senate house.——Pius, a general in Spain, against Sertorius on whose head he set a price of 100 talents and 20,000 acres of land.——A consul who commanded in Africa, &c. Val. Max. Plin. Plut. Liv. Patere. 2.—Flor. 3, c. 8.—Paus. 7, c. 8 & 13.—Cic. in Tusc. &c.—Juv. 3, v. 138.—Appian Civ.—Cæsar bell. Civ.—Sallust. in Jug.

METHION, the father of Phorbas, &c. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

METHODIUS, a bishop of Tyre, who maintained a controversy against Porphyry. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1657.

METHONE, a town of Peloponnesus, where king Philip gained his first battle over the Athenians, B. C. 360.

METHYDRIUM, a town of Peloponnesus near Megalopolis.

METHYMNA, a town of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from a daughter of Macareus. It is the second city of the island in greatness, population and opulence, and its territory is fruitful, and the wines it produces, excellent. It was the native place of Arion. When the whole island of Lesbos revolted from the power of the Athenians, Methymna alone remained firm to its antient allies. Diod. 5, —Thucyd. 3.—Horat. 2. Sat. 8, v. 50.—Virg. G. 3, v. 90.

METIADUSA, a daughter of Eupalamus, who married Cecrops, by whom she had Pandion. Apollod. 3, c. 15.

METILIA, a Roman law, enacted A. U. C. 536, to settle the power of the dictator, and of his master of horse within certain bounds.

METILII, a Roman family brought from Alba to Rome, by Tullus Hostilius. Dionys. Halic.

METIUS, a man who accused Fabius Maximus, before the senate, &c.

METIOCHUS, a son of Miltiades, who was taken by the Phœnicians, and given to Darius king of Persia. He was tenderly treated by the monarch, though his father had conquered the Persian armies in the plains of Marathon. Plut. Herodot. 6, c. 41.—An Athenian entrusted with the care of the roads, &c.

METION, a son of Erechtheus, king of Athens and Praxithea. He married Alcippe, daughter of Mars and Agraulos. His sons drove Pandion from the throne of Athens, and were afterwards expelled by Pandion's children. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 2, c. 6.

METIS, one of the Oceanides. She was Jupiter's first wife, celebrated for her great prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods. Jupiter who was afraid lest she should bring forth into the world a child more cunning and greater than himself, devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Sometime after this adventure the god had his head opened, from which issued Minerva armed from head to foot. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 2. Metis gave a potion to Saturn and obliged him to throw up the children he had devoured. Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Hygin.

METISCUS, a charioteer to Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 469.

METIUS CURTIUS, one of the Sabines, who fought against the Romans on account of the stolen virgins.

METIUS SUFFETIUS, a dictator of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. He fought against the Romans and at last finally to settle their dispute, he proposed a single combat between the Horatii and Curatii. The Albans were conquered, and Metius promised to assist the Romans against their enemies. In a battle against the Veientes and Fidenates, Metius showed his infidelity by forsaking the Romans at the first onset, and retired to a neighbouring eminence, to wait for the event of the battle, and to fall upon whatever side proved victorious. The Romans obtained the victory and Tullus ordered Metius to be tied between two chariots, which were drawn by four horses two different ways, and his limbs were torn away from his body, about 669 years before the Christian era. Liv.

Lib. 1, c. 23, &c. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 642.——A critic. Vid. Turpa.——Carus, a celebrated informer under Domitian who enriched himself with the plunder of those who were sacrificed to the emperor's suspicion.

METŒCIA, festivals instituted by Theseus in commemoration of the people of Attica having removed to Athens.

METON, an astrologer and mathematician of Athens. His father's name was Pausanias. He refused to go to Sicily with his countrymen, and pretended to be insane, because he foresaw the calamities that attended that expedition. In a book called Enneadecaterides, or the cycle of 19 years, he endeavoured to adjust the course of the sun and of the moon, and supported that the solar and lunar years could regularly begin from the same point in the heavens. This is called by the moderns the golden numbers. He flourished, B. C. 432. Vitruv. 1.—Plut. in Nicia.——A native of Tarentum, who pretended to be intoxicated that he might draw the attention of his countrymen, when he wished to dissuade them from making an alliance with king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrr.

METOPE, the wife of the river Sangarius. She was mother of Hecuba.——The daughter of Ladon, who married the Asopus.——A river of Arcadia.

METRA, a daughter of Erechthon, a Thessalian prince, beloved by Neptune. When her father had spent all his fortune to gratify the canine hunger under which he labored, she prostituted herself to her neighbours, and received for reward oxen, goats, and sheep, which she presented to Erichthon. Some say that she had received from Neptune the power of changing herself into whatever animal she pleased, and that her father sold her continually to gratify his hunger, and that she instantly assumed a different shape and became again his property. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 21.

METRŌCLES, a pupil of Theophrastus, who had the care of the education of Cleombrotus and Cleomenes. He suffocated himself when old and infirm. Diog.

METRODŌRUS, a physician of Chios, B. C. 444. He was disciple of Democritus, and had Hippocrates among his pupils. His compositions on medicine, &c. are lost. He supported that the world was eternal and infinite, and denied the existence of motion. Diog.——A painter and philosopher of Stratonice, B. C. 171. He was sent to Paulus Æmylius, who, after the conquest of Perseus, demanded of the Athenians a philosopher and a painter, the former to instruct his children, and the latter to make a painting of his triumph. Metrodorus was sent, as in him alone were united the philosopher and the painter. Cic. de Finib. 1. de Orat. 3. Vid. Diog. in Epic.——A friend of Mithridates, sent as ambassador to Tigranes, king of Armenia. He was remarkable for his learning, moderation, humanity, and justice. He was put to death by his royal master for his infidelity B. C. 72. Strab.—Plut.

METROPHANES, an officer of Mithridates, who invaded Eubœa, &c.

METROPŌLIS, a town of Phrygia on the Mæander.—Another of Thessaly, near Pharsalia.

MEVANIA, a town of Umbria. Lucan. 1, v. 473.

MEVIUS, a wretched poet. Vid. Mævius.

MEZENTIUS, a king of the Tyrrhenians when Æneas came into Italy. He was remarkable for his cruelties, and put his subjects to death by slow tortures, or sometimes tied a man to a dead corpse face to face, and suffered him to die in that condition. He was expelled by his subjects and fled to Turnus, who employed him in his war against the Trojans. He was killed by Æneas. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 15.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—*Virg. MICCA, a virgin of Elis, murdered by a soldier, &c.

MICIPSA, a king of Numidia, son of Masinissa, who, at his death, B. C. 119, left his kingdom between his sons Adherbal and Hyempsal, and his nephew Jugurtha. Jugurtha abused his uncle's favors by murdering his two sons. Sallust. de Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Plut.

MICYTHUS, a youth through whom an attempt was made to bribe Epaminondas. Cor. Nep.

MIDAS, a king of Phrygia, son of Gordius or Gorgias. In the early part of his life, according to some traditions, he found a large treasure, to which he owed his greatness and opulence. The hospitality he shewed to Silenus, the preceptor of Bacchus, who had been brought to him by some peasants, was liberally rewarded, and Midas, when he conducted back the old man to the god, was permitted to chuse whatever recompence he pleased. He had the imprudence and the avarice to demand of the god that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted, but he was soon convinced of his injudicious choice, and when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away a present which must prove so fatal to the receiver. He

He was ordered to waſh himſelf in the river Pactolus, whoſe ſands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Some time after this adventure Midas had the imprudence to ſupport that Pan was ſuperior to Apollo in ſinging and playing upon the flute, for which raſh opinion the offended god changed his ears into thoſe of an aſs, to ſhew his ignorance and ſtupidity. This Midas attempted to conceal from the knowledge of his ſubjects, but one of his ſervants ſaw the length of his ears, and being unable to keep the ſecret, and afraid to reveal it, apprehenſive of the king's reſentment, he opened a hole in the earth, and after he had whiſpered there that Midas had the ears of an aſs, he covered the place as before, as if he had buried his words in the ground. On that place, as the poets mention, grew a number of reeds which when agitated by the wind uttered the ſame ſound that had been buried beneath, and publiſhed to the world that Midas had the ears of an aſs. Some explain the fable of the ears of Midas, by the ſuppoſition that he kept a number of informers and ſpies, who were continually employed in gathering every ſeditious word that might drop from the mouths of his ſubjects. Midas, according to Strabo, died of drinking bull's hot blood. This he did, as Plutarch mentions, to free himſelf from the numerous ill-dreams which continually tormented him. Midas, according to ſome, was ſon of Cybele. He built a town which he called Ancyræ. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 5.—Plut. de Superſt.—Strab. 1.—Hygin. fab. 191.—Max. Tyr. 30.—Pauſ. 1, c. 4.—*Val. MILESIUS, a ſirname of Apollo.——A native of Miletus.

MILETUM, a town of Calabria, built of the people of Miletus of Aſia.——A town of Crete.

MILETUS, a ſon of Apollo, who fled from Crete to avoid the wrath of Minos, whom he meditated to dethrone. He came to Caria, where he built a city which he called by his own name. Some ſuppoſe that he only conquered a city there, which aſſumed his name. They further ſay, that he put the inhabitants to the ſword, and divided the women among his ſoldiers. A woman called Cyanea fell to his ſhare. Strab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 446.—Pauſ. 7, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.——A celebrated town of Aſia Minor, the capital of all Ionia, ſituate about ten ſtadia ſouth of the mouth of the river Mæander near the ſea coaſt, on the confines of Ionia and Caria. It was founded by a Cretan colony under Miletus, or, according to others, by Neleus, the ſon of Codrus, or by Sarpedon, Jupiter's ſon. It has ſucceſſively been called Lelegeis, Pithyuſa, and Anactoria. The inhabitants, called Mileſii, were very powerful, and long maintained an obſtinate war againſt the kings of Lydia. They early applied themſelves to navigation, and planted no leſs than 80 colonies, or, according to Seneca, 380, in different parts of the world. Miletus gave birth to Thales, Anaximenes, Anaximander, Hecataeus, Timotheus the muſician, Pittacus one of the ſeven wiſe men, &c. Miletus was alſo famous for a temple and an oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and for its excellent wool. *Virg. MILINUS, a Cretan king, &c.

MILIONIA, a town of the Samnites taken by the Romans.

MILO, a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy. His father's name was Diotimus. He early accuſtomed himſelf to carry the greateſt burdens, and by degrees became a monſter in ſtrength. It is ſaid that he carried on his ſhoulders a young bullock 4 years old, for above 40 yards, and afterwards killed it with one blow of his fiſt, and eat it up in one day. He was ſeven times crowned at the Pythian games, and ſix at Olympia. He preſented himſelf a ſeventh time, but no one had the courage or boldneſs to enter the liſts againſt him. He was one of the diſciples of Pythagoras, and to his uncommon ſtrength the learned preceptor and his pupils owed their life. The pillar which ſupported the roof of the ſchool ſuddenly gave way, but Milo ſupported the whole weight of the building, and gave the philoſopher and his auditors time to eſcape. In his old age Milo attempted to pull up a tree by the roots and break it. He partly effected it, but his ſtrength being gradually exhauſted, the tree when half cleft reunited, and his hands remained pinched in the body of the tree. He was then alone, and being unable to diſentangle himſelf he was eaten up by the wild beaſts of the place, about 500 years before the Chriſtian era. Ovid. Met. 15.—Cic. de Senect.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Strab. 16.—Pauſ. 6, c. 11.——T. Annius, a native of Lanuvium, who attempted to obtain the conſulſhip at Rome by intrigue and ſeditious tumults. Clodius the tribune oppoſed his views, yet Milo would have ſucceeded, had not an unfortunate event totally fruſtrated his hopes. As he was going into the country, attended by his wife and a numerous retinue of gladiators and ſervants, he met on the Appian road his enemy Clodius, who was returning to Rome with three of his friends and ſome domeſtics completely armed. A quarrel aroſe between the ſervants. Milo ſupported his attendants, and the diſpute became general. Clodius received many ſevere wounds, and was obliged to retire to a neighbouring cottage. Milo purſued his enemy in his retreat, and ordered his ſervants to diſpatch him. Eleven of the ſervants of Clodius ſhared his fate, as alſo the owner of the houſe who had given them reception. The body of the murdered tribune was carried to Rome, and expoſed to public view. The enemies of Milo inveighed bitterly againſt the violence and barbarity with which the ſacred perſon of a tribune had been treated. Cicero undertook the defence of Milo, but the continual clamors of the friends of Clodius, and the ſight of an armed ſoldiery, which ſurrounded the ſeat of judgment, ſo terrified the orator, that he forgot the greateſt part of his arguments, and the defence he made was weak and injudicious. Milo was condemned, and baniſhed to Maſſilia. Cicero ſoon after ſent his exiled friend a copy of the oration which he had delivered in his defence, in the form in which we have it now, and Milo, after he had read it, exclaimed, O Cicero, hadſt thou ſpoken beſore my accuſers in theſe terms, Milo would not be now eating figs at Marſeilles. The friendſhip and cordiality of Cicero and Milo were the fruits of long intimacy and familiar intercourſe. It was by the ſucceſsful labors of Milo that the orator was recalled from baniſhment and reſtored to his friends. Cic. pro Milon.—Paterc. 2, c. 47 & 68.—Dio. 40.——A general of the forces of Pyrrhus. He was made governor of Tarentum, and that he might be reminded of his duty to his ſovereign, Pyrrhus ſent him as a preſent a chain, which was covered with the ſkin of Nicias the phyſician, who had perfidiouſly offered the Romans to poiſon his royal maſter for a ſum of money. Paſan. 8, &c.——A tyrant of Piſa in Elis, thrown into the river Alpheus by his ſubjects for his oppreſſion. Ovid. in Ib. v. 325.

Milonius, a drunken buffoon at Rome, accuſtomed to dance when intoxicated. Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 24.

Miltas, a ſoothſayer, who aſſiſted Dion in explaining prodigies, &c.

Miltiades, an Athenian, ſon of Cypſelus, who obtained a victory in a chariot race at the Olympic games, and led a colony of his countrymen to the Cherſoneſus. The cauſes of this appointment are ſtriking and ſingular. The Thracian Dolonci, haraſſed by a long war with the Abſynthians, were directed by the oracle of Delphi to take for their king the firſt man they met in their return home, who invited them to come under his roof and partake of his entertainments. This was Miltiades, whom the appearance of the Dolonci, their ſtrange arms and garments had ſtruck. He invited them to his houſe, and was made acquainted with the commands of the oracle. He obeyed, and when the oracle of Delphi had approved a ſecond time the choice of the Dolonci, he departed for the Cherſoneſus, and was inveſted by the inhabitants with ſovereign power. The firſt meaſure he took was to ſtop the further incurſions of the Abſynthians, by building a ſtrong wall acroſs the iſthmus. When he had eſtabliſhed himſelf at home, and fortified his dominions againſt foreign invaſion, he turned his arms againſt Lampſacus. His expedition was unſucceſsful; he was taken in an ambuſcade and made priſoner. His friend Crœſus, king of Lydia, was informed of his captivity, and he procured his releaſe by threatening the people of Lampſacus with his ſevereſt diſpleaſure. He lived a few years after he had recovered his liberty. As he had no iſſue, he left his kingdom and poſſeſſions to Steſagoras the ſon of Cimon, who was his brother by the ſame mother. The memory of Miltiades was greatly honored by the Dolonci, and they regularly celebrated feſtivals and exhibited ſhews in commemoration of a man to whom they owed their greatneſs and preſervation. Some time after Steſagoras died without iſſue, and Miltiades the ſon of Cimon, and the brother of the deceaſed, was ſent by the Athenians with one ſhip, to take poſſeſſion of the Cherſoneſus. At his arrival Miltiades appeared mournful, as if lamenting the recent death of his brother. The principal inhabitants of the country viſited the new governor to condole with him; but their confidence in his ſincerity proved fatal to them. Miltiades ſeized their perſons, and made himſelf abſolute in Cherſoneſus and to ſtrengthen himſelf he married Hegeſipyla, the daughter of Olorus, the king of the Thracians. His triumph was ſhort. In the third year of his government his dominions were threatened by an invaſion of the Scythian Nomades, whom Darius had ſome time before irritated by entering their country. He fled before them, but as their hoſtilities were of ſhort duration, he was ſoon reſtored to his kingdom. Three years after he left Cherſoneſus and ſet ſail for Athens, where he was received with great applauſe. He was preſent at the celebrated battle of Marathon, in which all the chief officers ceded their power to him, and left the event of the battle to depend upon his ſuperior abilities. He obtained an important victory [Vid. Marathon.] over the more numerous forces of his adverſaries; and when he had demanded of his fellow-citizens an olive crown as the reward of his valor in the field of battle, he was not only refuſed, but ſeverely reprimanded for preſumption. The only reward, therefore, that he received for a victory which proved ſo beneficial to the intereſts of univerſal Greece, was in itſelf ſimple and inconſiderable, though truly great in the opinion of that age. He was repreſented in the front of a picture, among the reſt of the commanders who fought at the battle of Marathon, and he ſeemed to exhort and animate his ſoldiers to fight with courage and intrepidity. Some time after Miltiades was entruſted with a fleet of 70 ſhips, and ordered to puniſh thoſe iſlands which had revolted to the Perſians. He was ſucceſsful at firſt, but a ſudden report that the Perſian fleet was coming to attack him, changed his operations as he was beſieging Paros. He raiſed the ſiege and returned to Athens, where he was accuſed of treaſon, and particularly of holding correſpondence with the enemy. The falſity of theſe accuſations might have appeared, if Miltiades had been able to come into the aſſembly. A wound which he had received before Paros detained him at home, and his enemies taking advantage of his abſence, became more eager in their accuſations and louder in their clamors. He was condemned to death, but the rigor of the ſentence was retracted on the recollection of his great ſervices to the Athenians, he he was put into priſon till he had paid a fine of 50 talents to the ſtate. His inability to diſcharge ſo great a ſum detained him in confinement, and ſoon after his wounds became incurable, and he died about 489 years before the Chriſtian era. His body was ranſomed by his ſon Cimon, who was obliged to borrow and pay the 50 talents, to give his father a decent burial. The crimes of Miltiades were probably aggravated in the eyes of his countrymen, when they remembered how he made himſelf abſolute in Cherſoneſus, and in condemning the barbarity of the Athenians towards a general, who was the ſource of their military proſperity, we muſt remember the jealouſy which ever reigns among a free and independent people, and how watchful they are in defence of the natural rights which they ſee wreſted from others by violence and oppreſſion. Cornelius Nepos has written the life of Miltiades the ſon of Cimon, but his hiſtory is incongruous and not authentic; and the author, by confounding the actions of the ſon of Cimon with thoſe of the ſon of Cypſelus, has made the whole dark and unintelligible. Greater reliance in reading the actions of both the Miltiades is to be placed on the narration of Herodotus, whoſe veracity is confirmed, and who was undiſputedly more informed and more capable of giving an account of the life and exploits of men who floriſhed in his age, and of which he could ſee the living monuments. Herodotus was born about ſix years after the famous battle of Marathon, and C. Nepos, as a writer of the Auguſtan age, floriſhed about 450 years after the age of the father of hiſtory. *C. Mimnermus, a Greek poet and muſician of Colophon in the age of Solon. He chiefly excelled in elegiac poetry, whence ſome have attributed the invention of it to him, and, and, indeed, he was the poet who made elegy an amorous poem, instead of a mournful and melancholy tale. In the expression of love, Propertius prefers him to Homer, as this verse shews:

Plus in amore valet Mimnermi versus Homero.

In his old age Mimnermus became enamoured of a young girl called Nanno. Some few fragments of his poetry remain, collected by Stobæus. Strab. 1 & 14.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—Diog. 1.

MINDARUS, a commander of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He was defeated by the Athenians, and died 410 B.C. Plut.

MINEIDES, the daughters of Minyas or Mineus, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia. They were three in number, Leuconoe, Leucippe, and Alcithoe. Ovid calls the two first Clymene and Iris. They derided the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god inspired them with an unconquerable desire of eating human flesh. They drew lots which of them should give up her son as food to the rest. The lot fell upon Leucippe, and she gave up her son Hippasus, who was instantly devoured by the three sisters. They were changed into bats. In commemoration of this bloody crime, it was usual among the Orchomenians for the high priest, as soon as the sacrifice was finished, to pursue, with a drawn sword, all the women who had entered the temple, and even to kill the first he came up to. Ovid. Met 4, fab. 12.—Plut. Quæst. Gr.

MINERVA, the goddess of wisdom, war, and all the liberal arts, was produced from Jupiter's brains without a mother. The god, as it is reported, married Metis, whose superior prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods made him apprehend that the children of such an union would be of a more exalted nature, and more intelligent than their father. To prevent this, Jupiter devoured Metis in her pregnancy, and, some time after, to relieve the pains which he suffered in his head, he ordered Vulcan to cleave it open. Minerva came all armed and grown up from her father's brain, and immediately was admitted into the assembly of the gods, and made one of the most faithful counsellors of her father. The power of Minerva was great in heaven; she could hurl the thunders of Jupiter, prolong the life of men, bestow the gift of prophecy, and, indeed, she was the only one of all the divinities whose authority and consequence were equal to those of Jupiter. The actions of Minerva are numerous, as well as the kindnesses by which she endeared herself to mankind. Her quarrel with Neptune concerning the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, deserves attention. The assembly of the gods settled the dispute by promising the preference to whosoever of the two gave the most useful and necessary present to the inhabitants of the earth. Neptune, upon this, struck the ground with his trident, and immediately a horse issued from the earth. Minerva produced the olive, and obtained the victory by the unanimous voice of the gods, who observed, that the olive, which is the emblem of peace, is far preferable to the horse, who is the symbol of war and bloodshed. The victorious deity called the capital Athenæ, and became the tutelar goddess of the place. Minerva was always very jealous of her power, and the manner in which she punished the presumption of Arachne is well known. [Vid. Arachne.] The attempts of Vulcan to offer her violence are strong marks of her virtue. Jupiter had sworn by the Styx to give to Vulcan, who made him a complete suit of armour, whatever he desired. Vulcan demanded Minerva, and the father of the gods who had permitted Minerva to live in perpetual celibacy, consented, but privately advised his daughter to make all the resistance she could to frustrate the attempts of her lover. The prayers and the force of Vulcan proved ineffectual, and her chastity was not violated, though the god left on her body the marks of his passion, and, from the impurity which proceeded from the scuffle, and which Minerva threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool, was born Erichthon, an uncommon monster. [Vid. Erichthonius.] Minerva was the first who built a ship, and it was her zeal for navigation and her care for the Argonauts, which placed the prophetic tree of Dodona behind the ship Argo, when going to Colchis. She was known among the ancients by many names. She was called Athena, Pallas, [Vid. Pallas.] Parthenos, from her remaining in perpetual celibacy; Tritonia, because worshipped near the lake Tritonis; Glaucopis, from the blueness of her eyes; Agorea, from her presiding over markets; Hippia, because she first taught mankind how to manage the horse; Stratea and Area, from her martial character; Coryphagenes, because born from Jupiter's brains; Sais, because worshipped at Sais, &c. Some attributed to her the invention of the flute, whence she was firnamed Aulon, Lusinia, Musica, Salpiga, &c. She, as it is reported, once amused herself in playing upon her favorite flute before Juno and Venus, but the goddesses ridiculed the distortion of her face in blowing the instrument. Minerva, convinced of the justness of their remarks by looking at herself in a fountain near mount Ida, threw away the musical instrument, and denounced denounced a melancholy death to him who found it. Marsyas was the miserable proof of the veracity of her expressions. The worship of Minerva was universally established; she had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. Sais, Rhodes, and Athens, particularly claimed her attention, and it is even said, that Jupiter rained a shower of gold upon the island of Rhodes, which had paid so much veneration and such an early reverence to the divinity of his daughter. The festivals celebrated in her honor were solemn and magnificent. [Vid. Panathenæa.] She was invoked by every artist, and particularly such as worked in wool, embroidery, painting, and sculpture. It was the duty of almost every member of society to implore the assistance and patronage of a deity who presided over sense, taste, and reason. Hence the poets have had occasion to say,

Tu nihil invitâ dices, faciesve Minervâ,

Qui bene placêrit Pallada, doctus erit.

Minerva was represented in different ways, according to the different characters in which she appeared. She generally appeared with a countenance full more of masculine firmness and composure, than of softness and grace. Most usually she was represented with a helmet on her head, with a large plume nodding in the air. In one hand she held a spear, and in the other a shield, with the dying head of Medusa upon it. Sometimes this Gorgon's head was on her breast-plate, with living serpents writhing round it, as well as her shield and helmet. In most of her statues she is represented as sitting, and sometimes she holds, in one hand, a distaff, instead of a spear. When she appeared as the goddess of the liberal arts, she was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplum. Sometimes Minerva's helmet was covered at the top with the figure of a cock, a bird who, on account of his great courage, is properly sacred to the goddess of war. Some of her statues represented her helmet with a sphinx in the middle, supported on either side by griffins. In some medals, a chariot drawn by four horses, or sometimes a dragon or a serpent, with winding spires, appear at the top of her helmet. She was partial to the olive-tree; the owl and the cock were her favorite birds, and the dragon among reptiles was sacred to her. The functions, offices, and actions, of Minerva, seem so numerous that they undoubtedly originate in more than one person. Cicero[1] takes of five persons of this name; a Minerva, mother of Apollo; a daughter of the Nile, who was worshipped at Sais, in Egypt; a third, born from Jupiter's brains; a fourth, daughter of Jupiter and Coryphe; and a fifth, daughter of Pallas, generally represented with winged shoes. This last put her father to death because he attempted her virtue. Paus. 1, 2, 3, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 16, l. 3, od. 4.—Virg. Æn. 2, &c.—Strab. 6, 9, & 13.—Philostr. Icon. 2.—*Ovid. MINERVA'LIA, festivals at Rome in honor of Minerva, celebrated in the months of March and June. During the solemnity scholars obtained some relaxation from their studious pursuits, and the present, which it was usual for them to offer to their masters, was called Minerval, in honor of the goddess Minerva, who patronized literature. *Varro de R. MINIO, a river of Etruria, falling into the Tyrrhene Sea. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 183. ——One of the favorites of Antiochus, king of Syria.

MINNÆI, a people of Arabia.

MINOA, a town of Sicily, built by Minos, when he was pursuing Dædalus.——A town of Peloponnesus.

MINOIS, belonging to Minos. Crete is called Minoia regna, as being the legislator's kingdom. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 14.——A patronymic of Ariadne. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 157.

MINOS, a king of Crete, son of Jupiter and Europa, who gave laws to his subjects, B.C. 1406, which still remained in full force in the age of the philosopher Plato. His justice and moderation procured him the appellation of the favorite of the gods, the confident of Jupiter, the wise legislator, in every city of Greece; and, according to the poets, he was rewarded for his equity, after death, with the office of supreme and absolute judge in the infernal regions. In this capacity he is represented sitting in the middle of the shades, and holding a sceptre in his hand. The dead plead their different causes before him, and the impartial judge shakes the fatal urn, which is filled with the destinies of mankind. He married Ithona, by whom he had Lycastes, who was the father of Minos 2d.—Homer. Od. 19.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 432.—Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 28.——The 2d, was a son of Lycastes, the son of Minos 1. and king of Crete. He married Pasiphae, the daughter of Sol and Perseis, and by her he had had many children. He increased his paternal dominions by the conquest of the neighbouring islands, but he showed himself cruel in the war which he carried on against the Athenians, who had put to death his son Androgeus. [Vid. Androgeus.] He took Megara by the treachery of Scylla [Vid. Scylla.] and not satisfied with a victory, he obliged the vanquished to bring him yearly to Crete seven chosen boys, and the same number of virgins, to be devoured by the minotaur. [Vid. Minotaurus.] This bloody tribute was at last abolished when Theseus had destroyed the monster. [Vid. Theseus.] When Dædalus, whose industry and invention had fabricated the labyrinth, and whose imprudence, in assisting Pasiphae in the gratification of her unnatural desires, had offended Minos, fled from the place of his confinement with wings, [Vid. Dædalus.] and arrived safe in Sicily. The incensed monarch pursued the offender, resolved to punish his infidelity. Cocalus, king of Sicily, who had hospitably received Dædalus, entertained his royal guest with dissembled friendship, and, that he might not deliver to him a man whose ingenuity and abilities he so well knew, he put Minos to death. Some say that it was the daughter of Cocalus who put the king of Crete to death, by detaining him long in a bath till he fainted, after which they suffocated him. Minos died about 35 years before the Trojan war. He was father of Androgeus, Glaucus, and Deucalion, and two daughters, Phædra and Ariadne. Many authors have confounded the two Minos's, the grandfather and the grandson, but Homer, Plutarch, and Diodorus, prove plainly that they were two different persons. Paus. in Ach. 4.—Plut. in Thes. Hygin. fab. 41.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 141.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 21.—Plut. in Min.—Athen.—Flacc. 14.

Minōtaurus, a celebrated monster, half a man and half a bull, according to this verse of Ovid, Semibovemque virum, semivirumque bovem.

It was the fruit of Pasiphae's amour with a bull. Minos refused to sacrifice a white bull to Neptune, an animal which he had received from the god for that purpose. This offended Neptune, and he made Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, enamoured of this fine bull, which had been refused to his altars. Dædalus prostituted his talents in being subservient to the queen's unnatural desires, and, by his means, Pasiphae's horrible passions were gratified, and the Minotaur came into the world. Minos confined in the labyrinth a monster which convinced the world of his wife's lasciviousness and indecency, and reflected disgrace upon his family. The Minotaur usually devoured the chosen young men and maidens, which the tyranny of Minos yearly exacted from the Athenians. Theseus delivered his country from this shameful tribute, when it had fallen to his lot to be sacrificed to the voracity of the Minotaur, and, by means of Ariadne, the king's daughter, he destroyed the monster, and made his escape from the windings of the labyrinth. The fabulous tradition of the Minotaur, and of the infamous commerce of Pasiphae with a favorite bull, has been often explained. Some suppose that Pasiphae was enamoured of one of her husband's courtiers, called Taurus, and that Dædalus favored the passions of the queen by suffering his house to become the retreat of the two lovers. Pasiphae, some time after, brought twins into the world, one of whom greatly resembled Minos, and the other Taurus. In the natural resemblance of their countenances with that of their supposed fathers originated their name, and consequently the fable of the Minotaur. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 2.—Hygin. fab. 40.—Plut. in Thes.—Palæphat.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 26.

Minthe, a daughter of Cocytus, loved by Pluto. Proserpine discovered his husband's amour, and changed his mistress into an herb, called by the same name, mint. Ovid. Met. 10. v. 729.

Minturnæ, a town of Campania, between Sinuessa and Formiæ. It was in the marshes in its neighbourhood that Marius concealed himself in the mud, to avoid the partizans of Sylla. The people condemned him to death, but, when his voice alone had terrified the executioner, they showed themselves compassionate, and favored his escape. Strab. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Liv. 8, &c.—Paterc. 2. c. 14.

Minūtia, a vestal virgin, accused of debauchery on account of the beauty and elegance of her dress. She was condemned to be buried alive because a female supported the false accusation, A. U. C. 418. Liv. 8, c. 15.

Minūtius, Augurinus, a Roman consul slain in a battle against the Samnites.—— Rufus, a master of horse to the dictator Fabius Maximus. His disobedience to the commands of the dictator was productive of an extention of his prerogative, and the master of the horse was declared equal in power to the dictator. Minutius, soon after this, fought with ill success against Annibal, and was saved by the interference of Fabius; which circumstance had such an effect upon him that he laid down his power at the feet of his deliverer, and swore that he would never act but by his directions. He was killed at the battle of Cannæ. C. Nep. in Ann. —— A Roman consul who defended Coriolanus from the insults of the people, &c. ——Another, defeated by the Æqui, and disgraced by the dictator Cincinnatus. ——A tribune who warmly opposed the views of C. Gracchus. ——A Roman chosen dictator, and obliged to lay down his office, because, during the time of his election, the sudden cry of a rat was heard. ——A Roman, one of the first who were chosen quæstors. —— Felix, an African lawyer, who flourished 207 A. D. He has written an elegant dialogue in defence of the Christian religion, called Octavius, from the principal speaker in it. This book was long attributed to Arnobius, and even printed as an 8th book [Octavius] till Balduinus discovered the imposition in his edition of Felix, 1560. The two last editions are that of Davies, 8vo. Cantab. 1712; and of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1709.

Minyæ, a name given to the inhabitants of Orchomenos, in Bœotia, from Minyas, king of the country. Orchomenos, the son of Minyas, gave his name to the capital of the country, and the inhabitants still retained their original appellation in contradistinction to the Orchomenians of Arcadia. A colony of Orchomenians passed into Thessaly and settled in Iolchos; from which circumstance the people of the place, and particularly the Argonauts, were called Minyæ. This name they received, according to the opinion of some, not because a number of Orchomenians had settled among them, but because the chief and noblest of them were descended from the daughters of Minyas. Part of the Orchomenians accompanied the sons of Codrus when they migrated to Ionia. The descendants of the Argonauts, as well as the Argonauts themselves, received the name of Minyæ. They first inhabited Lemnos, where they had been born from the Lemnian women who had murdered their husbands. They were driven from Lemnos by the Pelasgi about 1160 years before the Christian era, and came to settle in Laconia, from whence they passed into Calliste with a colony of Lacedæmonians. Hygin. fab. 14.—Paus. 9, c. 6.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Herodot. 4, c. 145.

Minyas, a king of Bœotia, son of Neptune and Tritogenia, the daughter of Æolus. Some make him the son of Neptune and Callirrhoe, or of Chryses, Neptune's son, and Chrysogenia, the daughter of Halmus. He married Clytodora, by whom he had Presbon, Periclymenus, and Etcoclymenus. He was father of Orchomenos, Diochithondes, and Athamas, by a second marriage with Phanasora, the daughter of Paon. According to Plutarch and Ovid, he had three daughters, called Leucònoe, Alcithoe, and Leucippe. They were changed into bats. [Vid. Mineides.] Paus. 9, c. 36.—Id. Quæst. Græc.—*Ovid. Minyus, a river of Thessaly, falling into the sea near Arene, called afterwards Orchomenus. Homer. Il. 11.—Strab. 8.

Minyia, a festival observed by Orchomenos in honor of Minyas, the king of the place. The Orchomenians were called Minyæ, and the river upon whose banks their town was built Myrsos.——A small island near Patmos.

Miraces, an eunuch of Parthia, &c. Flacc. 6, v. 690.

Misenum or Misenus. Vid. Misenus.

Misenus, a son of Æolus, who was piper to Hector. After Hector's death he followed Æneas to Italy, and was drowned on the coast of Campania, because he had challenged one of the Tritons. Æneas afterwards found his body on the sea shore, and buried it on a promontory which bears his name. There was also a town of the same name on the promontory, at the west of the bay of Naples, and it had also a capacious harbour, where Augustus and some of the Roman emperors kept one of their fleets. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 239, l. 6, v. 164 & 234.—Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Liv. 24, c. 13.

Misitheus, a Roman, celebrated for his virtues and his misfortunes. He was father-in-law to the emperor Gordian, whose counsels and actions he guided by his prudence and moderation. He was sacrificed to the ambition of Philip, a wicked senator, who succeeded him as prefect of the prætorian guards. He died A. D. 243, and left all his possessions to be appropriated for the good of the republic.

Mithras, a god of Persia, supposed to be the sun. His worship was introduced at Rome, and the Romans raised him altars, on which was this inscription, Deo Soli Mithræ, or Soli Deo invicto Mithræ. He is generally represented as a young man, whose head is covered with a turban, after the manner of the Persians. He supports his knee upon a bull that lies on the ground, and one of whose horns he holds in one hand, while, with the other, he plunges a dagger in his neck. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 720.

Mithracenses, a Persian who fled to Alexander after the murder of Darius by Bessus. Curt. 5.

Mithradates, a headsman of Astyages, ordered to put young Cyrus to death. He refused, and educated him at home as his own son, &c. Herodot.—Justin.

Mithrenes, a Persian who betrayed Sardes, &c.

Mithridates Ist, was the third king of Pontus. He was tributary to the crown of Persia, and his attempts to make himself independent independent proved fruitless. He was conquered in a battle, and obtained peace with difficulty. Xenophon calls him merely a governor of Cappadocia. He was succeeded by Ariobarzanes, B. C. 363. Diod.—Xenoph.——The second of that name, king of Pontus, was grandson to Mithridates I. He made himself master of Pontus, which had been conquered by Alexander, and had been ceded to Antigonus at the general division of the Macedonian empire among the conqueror's generals. He reigned about 26 years, and died at the advanced age of 84 years, B. C. 302. He was succeeded by his son Mithridates III. Some say that Antigonus put him to death, because he favored the cause of Cassander. Appian. Mith.—Diod.——The III. was son of the preceding monarch. He enlarged his paternal possessions by the conquest of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. He died after a reign of 36 years. Diod.——The IV. succeeded his father Ariobarzanes, who was the son of Mithridates III.——The V. succeeded his father Mithridates IV. and strengthened himself on his throne by an alliance with Antiochus the Great, whose daughter Laodice he married. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces.——

——The VI. succeeded his father Pharnaces. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made alliance with the Romans. He furnished them with a fleet in the third Punic war, and assisted them against Aristonicus, who had laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. This fidelity was rewarded; he was called Evergetes, and received from the Roman people the province of Phrygia Major, and was called the friend and ally of Rome. He was murdered, B. C. 123. Appian. Mithr.—Justin. 37, &c.——The VII. surnamed Eupator, and The Great, succeeded his father Mithridates VI. though only at the age of 11 years. The beginning of his reign was marked by ambition, cruelty, and artifice. He murdered his own mother, who had been left by his father coheiress of the kingdom, and he fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes against the poison with which his enemies at court attempted to destroy him. He early inured his body to hardship, and employed himself in many manly exercises, often remaining whole months in the country, and making the frozen snow and the earth the place of his repose. Naturally ambitious and cruel, he spared no pains to acquire himself power and dominion. He murdered the two sons whom his sister Laodice had had by Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and placed one of his own children, only eight years old, on the vacant throne. These violent proceedings alarmed Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who had married Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes. He suborned a youth to be king of Cappadocia, as the third son of Ariarathes, and Laodice was sent to Rome to impose upon the senate, and assure them that her third son was now alive, and that his pretensions to the kingdom of Cappadocia were just and well grounded. Mithridates used the same arms of dissimulation. He also sent to Rome Gordius, the governor of his son, who solemnly declared before the Roman people, that the youth who sat on the throne of Cappadocia was the third son and lawful heir of Ariarathes, and that he was supported as such by Mithridates. This intricate affair displeased the Roman senate, and, finally to settle the dispute between the two monarchs, the powerful arbiters took away the kingdom of Cappadocia from Mithridates, and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes. These two kingdoms being thus separated from their original possessors, were presented with their freedom and independence; but the Cappadocians refused it, and received Ariobarzanes for king. Such were the first seeds of enmity between Rome and the king of Pontus. [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Mithridates never lost an opportunity by which he might lessen the influence of his adversaries; and, the more effectually to destroy their power in Asia, he ordered all the Romans that were in his dominions to be massacred. This was done in one night, and no less than 150,000, according to Plutarch, or 80,000 Romans, as Appian mentions, were made, at one blow, the victims of his cruelty. This universal massacre called aloud for revenge. Aquilius, and soon after Sylla, marched against Mithridates with a large army. The former was made prisoner, but Sylla obtained a victory over the king's generals, and another decisive engagement rendered him master of all Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, and Asia Minor, which had submitted to the victorious arms of the monarch of Pontus. This ill fortune was aggravated by the loss of about 200,000 men, who were killed in the several engagements that had been fought; and Mithridates, weakened by repeated ill success by sea and land, sued for peace from the conqueror, which he obtained on condition of defraying the expences which the Romans had incurred by the war, and of remaining satisfied with the possessions which he had received from his ancestors. While these negociations of peace were carried on, Mithridates was not unmindful of his real interest. His poverty, and not his inclinations, obliged him to wish for peace. He immediately took the field with an army of 140,000 infantry, and 16,000 horse, which consisted of his own forces and those of his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. With such a numerous army, he soon made himself master of the Roman provinces in Asia; none dared to oppose his conquests, and the Romans, relying on his fidelity, had withdrawn the greatest part of their armies from the country.

The news of his warlike preparations was no ſooner heard, than Lucullus, the conſul, marched into Aſia, and, without delay, he blocked up the camp of Mithridates, who was then beſieging Cyzicus. The Aſiatic monarch eſcaped from him, and fled into the heart of his kingdom. Lucullus purſued him with the utmoſt celerity, and would have taken him priſoner after a battle, had not the avidity of his ſoldiers preferred the plundering of a mule loaded with gold, to the taking of a monarch who had exerciſed ſuch cruelties againſt their countrymen, and ſhown himſelf ſo faithleſs to the moſt ſolemn engagements. After this eſcape, Mithridates was more careful about the ſafety of his perſon, and he even ordered his wives and ſiſters to deſtroy themſelves, fearful of their falling into the enemy's hands. The appointment of Glabrio to the command of the Roman forces, inſtead of Lucullus, was favorable to Mithridates, and he recovered the greateſt part of his dominions. The ſudden arrival of Pompey, however, ſoon put an end to his victories. A battle, in the night, was fought near the Euphrates, in which the troops of Pontus labored under every diſadvantage. The engagement was by moon-light, and, as the moon then ſhone in the face of the enemy, the lengthened ſhadows of the arms of the Romans having induced Mithridates to believe that the two armies were cloſe together, the arrows of his ſoldiers were darted from a great diſtance, and their efforts rendered ineffectual. An univerſal overthrow enſued, and Mithridates, bold in his misfortunes, ruſhed through the thick ranks of the enemy, at the head of 800 horſemen, 500 of which periſhed in the attempt to follow him. He fled to Tigranes, but that monarch refuſed an aſylum to his father-in-law, whom he had before ſupported with all the collected forces of his kingdom. Mithridates found a ſafe retreat among the Scythians, and, though deſtitute of power, friends, and reſources, yet he meditated the deſtruction of the Roman empire, by penetrating into the heart of Italy by land. Theſe wild projects were rejected by his followers, and he ſued for peace. It was denied to his ambaſſadors, and the victorious Pompey declared, that, to obtain it, Mithridates muſt aſk it in perſon. He ſcorned to truſt himſelf into the hands of his enemy, and reſolved to conquer or to die. His ſubjects refuſed to follow him any longer, and they revolted from him, and made his ſon Pharnaces king. The ſon ſhowed himſelf ungrateful to his father, and even, according to ſome writers, he ordered him to be put to death. This unnatural treatment broke the heart of Mithridates; he obliged his wife to poiſon herſelf, and attempted to do the ſame himſelf. It was in vain; the frequent antidotes he had taken in the early part of his life, ſtrengthened his conſtitution againſt the poiſon, and, when this was unavailing, he attempted to ſtab himſelf. The blow was not mortal, and a Gaul, who was then preſent, at his own requeſt, gave him the fatal ſtroke, about 63 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 72d year of his age. Such were the misfortunes, abilities, and miſerable end of a man, who ſupported himſelf ſo long againſt the power of Rome, and who, according to the declaration of the Roman authors, proved a more powerful and indefatigable adverſary to the capital of Italy, than the great Annibal, and Pyrrhus, Perſeus, or Antiochus. Mithridates has been commended for his eminent virtues, and cenſured for his vices. As a commander he deſerves the moſt unbounded applauſe, and it may create admiration to ſee him waging war with ſuch ſucceſs during ſo many years, againſt the moſt powerful people on earth, led to the field by a Sylla, a Lucullus, and a Pompey. He was the greateſt monarch that ever ſat on a throne, according to the opinion of Cicero; and, indeed, no better proof of his military character can be brought, than the mention of the great rejoicings which happened in the Roman armies and in the capital at the news of his death. No leſs than twelve days were appointed for public thankſgivings to the immortal gods, and Pompey, who had ſent the firſt intelligence of his death to Rome, and who had partly haſtened his fall, was rewarded with the moſt uncommon honors. [Vid. Ampia lex.] It is ſaid, that Mithridates conquered 24 nations, whoſe different languages he knew, and ſpoke with the ſame eaſe and fluency as his own. As a man of letters he alſo deſerves attention. He was acquainted with the Greek language, and even wrote in that dialect a treatiſe on botany. His ſkill in phyſic is well known, and even now there is a celebrated antidote which bears his name, and is called Mithridate. Superſtition, as well as nature, had united to render him great, and, if we rely upon the authority of Juſtin, his birth was accompanied by the appearance of two large comets, which were ſeen for ſeventy days ſucceſſively, and whoſe ſplendor eclipſed the mid-day ſun, and covered the fourth part of the heavens. Juſtin. 37, c. 1, &c.—Strab.—Diod. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 5, &c.—*Plut. in Syll. MITHRIDATICUM BELLUM, begun 89 years B.C. was one of the longeſt and moſt celebrated wars ever carried on by the Romans againſt a foreign power. The ambition of Mithridates, from whom it receives its name, may be called the cauſe and origin of it. His views upon the kingdom of Cappadocia, of which he was ſtripped by the Romans, firſt engaged him to take up arms againſt the republic. Three Roman officers, L. Caſſius, the pro-conſul, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius, oppoſed Mithridates with the troops of Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallo-græcia. The army of theſe provinces, together with the Roman ſoldiers in Aſia, amounted to 70,000 men, and 6000 horſe. The forces of the king of Pontus were greatly ſuperior to theſe; he led 250,000 foot, 40,000 horſe, and 130 armed chariots, into the field of battle, under the command of Neoptolemus and Archelaus. His fleet conſiſted of 400 ſhips of war, well manned and proviſioned. In an engagement, the king of Pontus obtained the victory, and diſperſed the Roman forces in Aſia. He became maſter of the greateſt part of Aſia, and the Helleſpont ſubmitted to his power. Two of the Roman generals were taken, and M. Aquilius, who was the principal cauſe of the war, was carried about in Aſia, and expoſed to the ridicule and inſults of the populace, and at laſt put to death by Mithridates, who ordered melted gold to be poured down his throat, as a ſtur upon the avidity of the Romans. The conqueror took every poſſible advantage; he conquered all the iſlands of the Ægean Sea, and, though Rhodes refuſed to ſubmit to his power, yet all Greece was ſoon over-run by his general Archelaus, and made tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. Mean while the Romans, incenſed againſt Mithridates on account of his perfidy, and of his cruelty in maſſacreing 80,000 of their countrymen in one day all over Aſia, appointed Sylla to march into the eaſt. Sylla landed in Greece, where the inhabitants readily acknowledged his power; but Athens ſhut her gates againſt the Roman commander, and Archelaus, who defended it, defeated, with the greateſt courage, all the efforts and operations of the enemy. This ſpirited defence was of ſhort duration. Archelaus retreated into Bœotia, where Sylla ſoon followed him. The two hoſtile armies drew up in a line of battle near Chæronea, and the Romans obtained the victory, and, of the almoſt innumerable forces of the Aſiatics, no more than 10,000 eſcaped. Another battle in Theſſaly, near Orchomenos, proved equally fatal to the king of Pontus. Dorylaus, one of his generals, was defeated, and he ſoon after ſued for peace. Sylla liſtened to the terms of accommodation, as his preſence at Rome was now become neceſſary to quell the commotions and cabals which his enemies had raiſed againſt him. He pledged himſelf to the king of Pontus to confirm him in the poſſeſſion of his dominions, and to procure him the title of friend and ally of Rome; and Mithridates conſented to relinquiſh Aſia and Paphlagonia, to deliver Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and Bithynia to Nicomedes, and to pay to the Romans 2000 talents to defray the expences of the war, and to deliver into their hands 70 gallies with all their rigging. Though Mithridates ſeemed to have re-eſtabliſhed peace in his dominions, yet Fimbria, whoſe ſentiments were contrary to thoſe of Sylla, and who made himſelf maſter of an army by intrigue and oppreſſion, kept him under continual alarms, and rendered the exiſtence of his power precarious. Sylla, who had returned from Greece to ratify the treaty which had been made with Mithridates, rid the world of the tyrannical Fimbria, and the king of Pontus, awed by the reſolution and determined firmneſs of his adverſary, agreed to the conditions, though with reluctance. The hoſtile preparations of Mithridates, which continued in the time of peace, became ſuſpected by the Romans, and Muræna, who was left as governor of Aſia in Sylla's abſence, and who wiſhed to make himſelf known by ſome conſpicuous action, began hoſtilities by taking Comana and plundering the temple of Bellona. Mithridates did not oppoſe him, but he complained of the breach of peace before the Roman ſenate. Muræna was publicly reprimanded; but, as he did not ceaſe from hoſtilities, it was eaſily underſtood that he acted by the private directions of the Roman people. The king upon this marched againſt him, and a battle was fought, in which both the adverſaries claimed the victory. This was the laſt blow which the king of Pontus received in this war, which is called the ſecond Mithridatic war, and which continued for about three years. Sylla, at that time, was made perpetual dictator at Rome, and he commanded Muræna to retire from the kingdom of Mithridates. The death of Sylla changed the face of affairs; the treaty of peace between the king of Pontus and the Romans, which had never been committed to writing, demanded frequent explanations, and Mithridates at last threw off the mask of friendship, and declared war. Nicomedes, at his death, left his kingdom to the Romans, but Mithridates disputed their right to the possessions of the deceased monarch, and entered the field with 120,000 men, besides a fleet of 400 ships in his ports, 16,000 horsemen to follow him, and 100 chariots armed with scythes. Lucullus was appointed over Asia, and entrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war. His valor and prudence showed his merit, and Mithridates, in his vain attempts to take Cyzicum, lost no less than 300,000 men. Success continually attended the Roman arms. The king of Pontus was defeated in several bloody engagements, and with difficulty saved his life, and retired to his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus pursued him, and, when his applications for the person of the fugitive monarch had been despised by Tigranes, he marched to the capital of Armenia, and terrified, by his sudden approach, the numerous forces of the enemy. A battle ensued. The Romans obtained an easy victory, and no less than 100,000 foot of the Armenians perished, and only five men of the Romans were killed. Tigranocerta, the rich capital of the country, fell into the conqueror's hands. After such signal victories, Lucullus had the mortification to see his own troops mutiny, and to be dispossessed of the command by the arrival of Pompey. The new general showed himself worthy to succeed Lucullus. He defeated Mithridates, and rendered his affairs so desperate, that the monarch fled for safety into the country of the Scythians, where, for a while, he meditated the ruin of the Roman empire, and, with more wildness than prudence, secretly resolved to invade Italy by land, and march an army across the northern wilds of Asia and Europe to the Apennines. Not only the kingdom of Mithridates had fallen into the enemy's hands, but also all the neighbouring kings and princes were subdued, and Pompey saw prostrate at his feet Tigranes himself, that king of kings, who had lately treated the Romans with such contempt. Mean time, the wild projects of Mithridates terrified his subjects, and they, fearful to accompany him in a march of above 2000 miles across a barren and uncultivated country, revolted and made his son king. The monarch forsaken in his old age, even by his own children, put an end to his life, [Vid. Mithridates VII.] and gave the Romans cause to rejoice, as the third Mithridatic war was ended in his fall, B. C. 63. Such were the unsuccessful struggles of Mithridates against the power of Rome. He was always full of resources, and the Romans had never a greater or more dangerous war to sustain. The duration of the Mithridatic war is not precisely known. According to Justin, Orosius, Florus, and Eutropius, it lasted for forty years; but the opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapsed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates first entered the field against the Romans till the time of his death. Appian. in Mithrid.—Justin. 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Oresius.—Paterc.—Dion.

MĪTŸLĒNE & MĪTŸLĒNÆ, the capital city of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from Mitylene, the daughter of Macareus, a king of the country. It is greatly commended by the ancients for the stateliness of its buildings, and the fruitfulness of its soil, but more particularly for the great men it produced. Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophanes, Hellenicus, &c. were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a seat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honor of having educated many of the great men of Rome and Greece. In the Peleponnesian war, the Mityleneans suffered greatly for their revolt from the power of Athens, and, in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldness to resist the Romans, and disdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. Cic. de Leg. ag.—Strab. 13.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 3 & 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 7, &c.—Thucyd. 3, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. &c.

MOMUS, the god of pleaſantry among the ancients, ſon of Nox, according to Heſiod. He was continually employed in ſatirizing the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He blamed Vulcan, becauſe in the human form which he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in his breaſt, by which whatever was done or thought there might be eaſily brought to light. He cenſured the houſe which Minerva had made, becauſe the goddeſs had not made it moveable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. In the bull which Neptune had produced, he obſerved that his blows might have been ſurer if his eyes had been placed nearer the horns. Venus herſelf was expoſed to his ſatire, and when the ſneering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddeſs, he obſerved as ſhe retired, that the noiſe of her feet was too loud and greatly improper in the goddeſs of beauty. Theſe illiberal reflections upon the gods were the cauſe that Momus was driven from heaven. He is generally repreſented raiſing a maſk from his face, and holding a ſmall figure in his hand. Heſiod. in Theog.—Lucian. in Herm.

MOPHIS, an Indian prince conquered by Alexander.

MOPSIUM, a hill and town of Theſſaly, between Tempe and Lariſſa. Liv. 42.

MOPSOPIA, an antient name of Athens, from Mopſus one of its kings. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 10.

MOPSUS, a celebrated prophet, ſon of Manto and Apollo during the Trojan war. He was conſulted by Amphimachus, king of Colophon, who wiſhed to know what ſucceſs would attend his arms in a war which he was going to undertake. He predicted the greateſt calamities, but Calchas, who had been a ſoothſayer of the Greeks during the Trojan war, promiſed the greateſt ſucceſſes. Amphimachus followed the opinion of Calchas, but the prediction of Mopſus was fully verified. This had ſuch an effect upon Calchas that he died ſoon after. His death is attributed by ſome to another mortification of the ſame nature. The two ſoothſayers jealous of each other's fame, fame, came to a trial of their ſkill in divination. Calchas firſt aſked his antagoniſt how many figs a neighbouring tree bore, ten thouſand except one, replied Mopſus, and one ſingle veſſel can contain them all. The figs were gathered, and his conjectures were true. Mopſus, now to try his adverſary, aſked him how many young ones a certain pregnant ſow would bring forth. Calchas confeſſed his ignorance, and Mopſus immediately ſaid that the ſow would bring forth on the morrow ten young ones, of which only one ſhould be a male, all black, and that the females ſhould all be known by their white ſtreaks. The morrow proved the veracity of his prediction, and Calchas died by exceſs of the grief which his defeat produced. Mopſus after death was ranked among the gods, and had an oracle at Malia, celebrated for the true and deciſive anſwers which it gave. Strab. 9.—Paſ. 7, c. 3.—Ammian. 14, c. 8.—Plut. de orac. defect.——A ſon of Ampyx and Chloris, born at Titareſſa in Theſſaly. He was the prophet and ſoothſayer of the Argonauts, and died at his return from Colchis by the bite of a ſerpent in Libya. Jaſon erected him a monument on the ſea ſhore, where afterwards the Africans built him a temple where he gave oracles. He has often been confounded with the ſon of Manto, as their profeſſions and their names were alike. Hygin. fab. 14, 128, 173.—Strab. 9——A ſhepherd of that name in Virg. Ecl.

L. Mummius, a Roman conſul, ſent againſt the Achæans whom he conquered, B. C. 147. He deſtroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, by order of the ſenate, and obtained the ſirname of Achaicus from his victories. He did not enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of the enemy, but returned home without any encreaſe of fortune. He was ſo unacquainted with the value of the paintings and works of the moſt celebrated artiſts of Greece which were found in the plunder of Corinth, that he ſaid to thoſe who conveyed them to Rome, that if they loſt them or injured them, they ſhould make others in their ſtead. Paterc. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 8.—Plin. 34, c. 7, l. 37, c. 1.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Pauſ. 5, c. 24.——A lieutenant of Craſſus defeated, &c. Plut. in Craſſ.——A prætor.——An orator.

MUNATIUS, PLANCUS, a conſul ſent to the rebellious army of Germanicus. He was almoſt killed by the incenſed ſoldiery who ſuſpected that it was through him that they had not all been pardoned and indemnified by a decree of the ſenate.——A cenſor.——An orator and diſciple of Cicero. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather bore the ſame name. He was with Cæſar in Gaul, and was made conſul with Brutus. He promiſed to favor the republican cauſe for ſome time, but he deſerted again to Cæſar. He was long Antony's favorite, but he left him at the battle of Actium to conciliate the favors of Auguſtus. The conqueror made him cenſor. Suet. in Aug. 29.——A friend of Horace. 1, ep. 3, v. 31.

MUNDA, a ſmall town of Hiſpania Bætica, celebrated for a battle which was fought there on the 17th of March B. C. 45, between Cæſar and the republican forces of Rome under young Pompey. Cæſar obtained the victory after an obſtinate and bloody battle, and by this blow put an end to the Roman republic. Pompey loſt 30,000 men, and Cæſar only 1000, and 500 wounded. Hirt. bell. Hiſp. 27.

MUNITUS, a ſon of Laodice the daughter of Priam by Acamas. He was entruſted to the care of Æthra as ſoon as born. Parthen. 16.

MUNYCHIÆ, a port of Attica, between the Piræus and the promontory of Sunium called after king Munychus, who built there a temple to Diana, and in whoſe honor he inſtituted feſtivals called Munychia. The temple was held ſo ſacred that whatever criminals fled there for refuge were pardoned. During the feſtivals they offered ſmall cakes which they called amphiphontes, απο του αμφιφαειν, from ſhining all round, becauſe there were lighted torches hung round when they were carried to the temple, or becauſe they were offered at the full moon at which time the ſolemnity was obſerved. It was particularly in honor of Diana who is the ſame as the moon, becauſe it was full moon when Themiſtocles conquered the Perſian fleet at Salamis. Plut.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 709.—Strab. 9, Pauſ. 1, c. 1.

MURÆNA, a celebrated Roman left at the head of the armies of the republic in Aſia by Sylla. He invaded the dominions of Mithridates with ſucceſs, but ſoon after met with a defeat. He was honored with a triumph at his return to Rome. He commanded one of the wings of Sylla's army at the battle againſt Archelaus near Chæronea. He was ably defended in an oration by Cicero, when his character was attacked and cenſured. Cic. pro Mur.—Appian. de Mithrid.——A man put to death for conſpiring againſt Auguſtus, B. C. 22.

MURCUS, an enemy of the triumvirate of J. Cæſar.

MURGANTIA, a town of Samnium. Liv. 25, c. 27.

MUS, a Roman conſul. Vid. Decius.

MUSA ANTONIUS, a freedman and phyſician of Auguſtus. He cured his imperial maſter of a dangerous diſeaſe under which he labored, by recommending to him the uſe of the cold bath. He was greatly rewarded for this celebrated cure. He was honored with a brazen ſtatue by the Roman ſenate, which was placed near that of Æſculapius, and Auguſtus permitted him to wear a golden ring, and to be exempted from all taxes. He was not ſucceſsful in recommending the uſe of the cold bath to Marcellus, as he had been to Auguſtus, and his illuſtrious patient died under his care. The cold bath was for a long time diſcontinued, till Charmis of Marſeilles introduced it again, and convinced the world of its great benefits. Muſa was brother to Euphorbus the phyſician of king Juba. Two ſmall treatiſes, de herbâ Betonicâ, and de tuendâ Valetudine, are ſuppoſed to be the productions of his pen.——A daughter of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. She attempted to recover her father's kingdom from the Romans, but to no purpoſe, though Cæſar eſpouſed her cauſe. Paterc. 2.—Suet. in Cæſ.

MUSÆ, certain goddeſſes who preſided over poetry, muſic, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemoſyne, and were nine in number, Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpſichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Some ſuppoſe that there were only three muſes, Melete, Mneme, and Aœde; others four, Telxiope, Aœde, Arche, Melete. They were, according to others, daughters of Pierus and Antiope, from which circumſtance they are called Pierides. The name of Pierides might probably be derived from mount Pierus where they were born. They have been ſeverally called Caſtalides, Aganippides, Lebethrides, Aonides, Heliconiades, &c. from the places where they were worſhipped, or over which they preſided. Apollo, who was the patron and the conductor of the muſes has received the name of Muſagetes, or leader of the muſes. The ſame ſirname was alſo given to Hercules. The palm tree, the laurel, and all the fountains tains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnaſſus, &c. were ſacred to the muſes. They were generally repreſented as young, beautiful and modeſt virgins. They were fond of ſolitude, and commonly appeared in different attire according to the arts and ſciences over which they preſided. [Vid. Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, &c.] Sometimes they were repreſented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indiſſoluble connexion which exiſts between the liberal arts and ſciences. The muſes ſometimes appear with wings, becauſe by the aſſiſtance of wings they freed themſelves from the violence of Pyrenæus. Their conteſt with the daughters of Pierus is well known. [Vid. Pierides.] The worſhip of the muſes was univerſally eſtabliſhed, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece Theſſaly and Italy. No ſacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poets ever began a poem without a ſolemn invocation to the goddeſſes who preſided over verſe. There were feſtivals inſtituted in their honor in ſeveral parts of Greece, eſpecially among the Theſpians every fifth year. The Macedonians obſerved alſo a feſtival in honor of Jupiter and the muſes. It had been inſtituted by king Archelaus, and it was celebrated with ſtage plays, games and different exhibitions, which continued nine days according to the number of the muſes. *Plut. Erot. Musæus, an ancient Greek poet, ſuppoſed to have been ſon or diſciple of Linus or Orpheus, and to have lived about 1410 years before the Chriſtian era. Virgil has paid great honor to his memory by placing him in the Elyſian fields attended by a great multitude, and taller by the head than his followers. None of the poet's compoſitions are extant. The elegant poem of the loves of Leander and Hero was written by a Muſæus who floriſhed in the fourth century, according to the more received opinions. Among the good editions of Muſæus two may be ſelected as the beſt, that of Rover 8vo. L Bat. 1727; and that of Schroder. 8vo. Leovard. 1743. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 667.—Dig ——A Latin poet whoſe compoſitions were very obſcene. Martial. 12, ep. 96. ——A poet of Thebes who lived during the Trojan war.

Mutinus, Vid. Mutunus.

Mutius, the father-in-law of C. Marius. ——A Roman who ſaved the life of young Marius, by conveying him away from the purſuits of his enemies in a load of ſtraw.—A friend of Tiberius Gracchus by whoſe means he was raiſed to the office of a tribune. ——C. Scævola, ſirnamed Cordus became famous for his courage and intrepidity When Porſenna, king of Etruria, had beſieged Rome to reinſtate Tarquin in all his rights and privileges, Mutius determined to deliver his country from ſo dangerous an enemy. He diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a Tuſcan, and as he could fluently ſpeak the language, he gained an eaſy introduction into the camp, and ſoon into the royal tent. Porſenna ſat alone with his ſecretary, when Mutius entered. The Roman immediately ruſhed upon the ſecretary, and ſtabbed him to the heart, miſtaking him for his royal maſter. This occaſioned a noiſe; and Mutius, unable to eſcape, was ſeized and brought before the king. He gave no anſwer to the enquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman, and to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals and ſternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him, that 300 young Romans like himſelf had conſpired againſt his life, and entered his camp in diſguiſe, determined either to deſtroy him, or periſh in the attempt. This extraordinary confeſſion aſtoniſhed Porſenna, he made peace with the Romans and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the ſirname of Scævola, becauſe he had loſt the uſe of his right hand by by burning it in the preſence of the Etrurian king. Plut. in Par.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Liv. 2, c. 12.——Q. Scævola, a Roman conſul. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and ſignalized himſelf greatly in the Marſian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he inſtructed in the ſtudy of civil law. Cic.—Plut.——Another appointed proconſul of Aſia, which he governed with ſo much popularity, that he was generally propoſed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero ſpeaks of him as an eloquent, learned, and ingenious man. He was murdered in the temple of Veſta, during the civil was of Marius and Sylla, 82 years before Chriſt. Plut.—Cic.—Paterc. 2, c. 22.

MUTUNUS, or MUTINUS, a deity among the Romans, much the ſame as the Priapus of the Greeks. The Roman matrons, and particularly newly married women diſgraced themſelves by the obſcene ceremonies which cuſtom obliged them to obſerve before the ſtatue of this impure deity.

MYCALE, a city and mountain of Caria.——A celebrated magician, who boaſted that he could draw down the moon from her orb. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263.——A promontory of Aſia oppoſite Samos, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the Greeks and Perſians on the 22d of September 479 B. C. the ſame day that Mardonius was defeated at Platæa. The Perſians were about 100,000 men, that had juſt returned from the unſucceſsful expedition of Xerxes in Greece. They had drawn their ſhips to the ſhore and fortified themſelves, as if determined to ſupport a ſiege. They ſuffered the Greeks to diſembark from their fleet without the leaſt moleſtation, and were ſoon obliged to give way before the cool and reſolute intrepidity of an inferior number of men. The Greeks obtained a complete victory, ſlaughtered ſome thouſands of the enemy, burned their camp, and ſailed back to Samos with an immenſe booty, in which were ſeventy cheſts of money among other very valuable things. Herodot.—Died.——A woman's name. Juv. 4, v. 141.

MYCALESSUS, an inland town of Bœotia, where Ceres had a temple. Pauſ. 9, c. 19.

MYCENÆ, a town of Argolis, in Peloponneſus, built by Perſeus, ſon of Danae. It was ſituate on a ſmall river at the eaſt of the Inachus, about 50 ſtadia from Argos, and received its name from Mycene, a nymph of Laconia. It was once the capital of a kingdom, whoſe monarchs reigned in the following order. Acriſius 1344 B. C. Perſeus Electryon, Mæſtor, and Sthenelus; and Sthenelus alone for eight years; Atreus and Thyeſtes, Agamemnon, Ægyſthus, Oreſtes, Æpytus, who was diſpoſſeſſed 1104 B. C. on the return of the Heraclidæ. The town of Mycenæ was taken and laid in ruins by the Argives A. U. C. 185; and it was almoſt unknown where it ſtood in the age of the geographer Strabo. Pauſ. 2, c. 16.—Strab. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 839.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

MYCERINUS, a ſon of Cheops, king of Egypt. After the death of his father he reigned with great juſtice and moderation. Herodot. 2, c. 129.

MYCIBERNA, a town of the Helleſpont. Diod. 12.

MYCITHUS, a ſervant of Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium. He was entruſted with the care of the kingdom, and of the children of the diſeaſed prince, and he exerciſed his power with ſuch fidelity and moderation that he acquired the eſteem of all the citizens and at laſt reſtored the kingdom to his maſter's children when come to years of maturity, and retired to peace and ſolitude with a ſmall portion. He is called by ſome Micalus. Juſtin. 4, c. 2.

MYCON, a celebrated painter who with others aſſiſted in making and perfecting the Peecile of Athens. Plin. 33, & 35——A youth of Athens changed into a poppy by Ceres.

MYCONE, one of the Cyclades between Delos and Icaria which received its name from Myconus, an unknown perſon. It is about three miles at the eaſt of Delos, and is thirty-ſix miles in circumference. It remained long uninhabited on account of the frequent earthquakes to which it was ſubject. Some ſuppoſe that the giants whom Hercules killed were buried under that iſland, whence aroſe the proverb of every thing is under Mycone, applied to thoſe who treat of different ſubjects under one and the ſame title, as if none of the defeated giants had been buried under no other iſland or mountain about Mycone. Strabo obſerves, and his teſtimony is ſupported by that of modern travellers, that the inhabitants of Mycone became bald very early, even at the age of 20 or 25, from which circumſtance they were called by way of contempt, the bald heads of Mycone. Pliny ſays, that the children of the place were always born without hair. The iſland was poor, and the inhabitants very avaricious, whence Archilochus reproached a certain Pericles, that he came to a feaſt like a Myconian, that is, without previous invitation. Strab. 10.—Plin. 11, c. 37. l. 12, c. 7. l. 14, c. 1.—Athen. 1.—Thucyd.—3, c. 29.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—*Ovid. MYRTEA, a firname of Venus, becauſe ſhe preſided over the myrtle.

MYRTĪLUS, a ſon of Mercury and Phaetuſa or Cleobule, armbearer to Œnomaus, king of Piſa. He was ſo experienced in riding and in the management of horſes, that he rendered thoſe of Œnomaus the ſwifteſt in all Greece. His infidelity proved at laſt fatal to him. Œnomaus had been informed by an oracle that his daughter Hippodamia's huſband ſhould cauſe his death, and on that account he reſolved to marry her only to him who ſhould overcome him in a chariot race. This ſeemed totally impoſſible, and to render it more terrible, Œnomaus declared that death would be the conſequence of a defeat in the ſuitors. The charms of Hippodamia were ſo great that many ſacrificed their life in the fruitleſs endeavour to obtain her hand. Pelops, at laſt preſented himſelf undaunted at the fate of thoſe who had gone before him, but before he entered the courſe he bribed Myrtilus, and aſſured him that he ſhould ſhare Hippodamia's damia's favors if he returned victorious from the race. Myrtilus, who was enamoured of Hippodamia, gave an old chariot to Œnomaus, which broke in the course and caused his death. Pelops gained the victory, and married Hippodamia, and when Myrtilus had the audacity to claim the reward promised to his perfidy, Pelops threw him headlong into the sea, where he perished. The body of Myrtilus, according to some, was carried by the waves to the sea shore, where he received an honorable burial, and as he was the son of Mercury, he was made a constellation. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 84 & 224.—Paus. 8, c. 14.—Apollon. 1.

Myrtōum Mare, a part of the Ægean sea, which lies between Eubœa, Peloponnesus and Attica. It receives this name from Myrto a woman, or from Myrtos a small island in the neighbourhood, or from Myrtilus the son of Mercury who was drowned there, &c. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Hygin. fab. 84.

Mys (myos) an artist famous in working and polishing silver. Propert. 3, el. 9, v. 14.

Myscellus, or Miscellus, a native of Achaia, who founded Crotona in Italy, according to an oracle, which told him to build a city where he found rain with fine weather. The meaning of the oracle long perplexed him till he found a beautiful woman all in tears in Italy, which circumstance he interpreted in his favor. According to some Myscellus, who was the son of Hercules, went out of Argos, without the permission of the magistrates, for which he was condemned to death. The judges had put each a black ball as a sign of condemnation, but Hercules changed them all and made them white, and had his son acquitted, upon which Myscellus left Greece and came to Italy, where he built Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 19.—Strab 6 & 8.

Myrtis, a Greek woman who distinguished herself by her poetical talents. She florished about 500 years B. C. and instructed the celebrated Corinna in the several rules of versification. Pindar himself, as some report, was also one of her pupils.

Myrtale, a courtezan of Rome, mistress to the poet Horace. 1, od. 33.

Mytes, a son of the poet Valgius whose early death was so lamented by the father that Horace wrote an ode to allay the grief of his friend. Horat. 2, od. 9.

Mysia, a country of Asia minor, generally divided into major and minor. Mysia minor was bounded on the north and west by the Propontis and Bithynia, and Phrygia on the southern and eastern borders. Mysia major had Æolia on the south, the Ægean on the west, and Phrygia on the north and east. Its chief cities were Cyzicum, Lampsacus, &c. The inhabitants were once very warlike, but they greatly degenerated, and the words Mysorum ultimus were emphatically used to signify a person of merit. The antients generally hired them to attend their functions as mourners, because they were naturally melancholy and inclined to shed tears. They were once governed by monarchs. They are supposed to be descended from the Mysians of Europe, a nation which inhabited that part of Thrace which was situate between mount Hæmus and the Danube. Strab. Herodot. 1, &c.—Cic. in Verr.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Appian. in Mithrid.——A festival in honor of Ceres, firnamed Mysia from Mysias, an Argive who raised her a temple near Pallene in Achaia. Some derive the word απο του μυσιαν, to cloy or satisfy, because Ceres was the first who satisfied the wants of men by giving them corn. The festival continued during seven days, &c.

Myson, a native of Sparta, one of the seven wise men of Greece. When Anacharsis consulted the oracle of Apollo, to know which was the wisest man in Greece he received for answer, he who is now ploughing his fields. This was Myson. Diog. in vit.

Mythecus, a sophist of Syracuse. He studied cookery, and when he thought himself sufficiently skilled in dressing meat, he went to Sparta where he gained much practice, especially among the younger citizens. He was soon after expelled the city by the magistrates, who observed that the art of Mythecus was unnecessary, as hunger was the best seasoning.

Mytilene, Vid. Mitylene.

Myus, (Myuntis) a town of Ionia on the confines of Caria, founded by a Grecian colony. It is one of the 12 capital cities of Ionia, situate at the distance of about 30 stadia from the mouth of the Mæander. Artaxerxes, king of Persia, gave it to Themistocles to maintain him in meat. Magnesia was to support him in bread and Lampsacus in wine. C. Nep. in Themist.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 1 c. 142.

NABA-

NABAZANES, an officer of Darius 3d. at the battle of Iſſus. He conſpired with Beſſus to murder his royal maſter, either to obtain the favor of Alexander, or to ſeize the kingdom. Diod. 17.

NABATHÆA, a country of Arabia, of which the capital was called Petra. The word is often applied to any of the eaſtern countries of the world by the poets, and ſeems to be derived from Nabath the ſon of Iſmael. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 61, l. 5, v. 163.—Strab. 16.—Lucan. 4, v. 63.

NABIS, a celebrated tyrant of Lacedæmon, who in all acts of cruelty and oppreſſion ſurpaſſed a Phalaris or a Dionyſius. His houſe was filled with flatterers and with ſpies, who were continually employed in watching the words and the actions of his ſubjects. When he had exerciſed every art in plundering the citizens of Sparta, he made a ſtatue, which in reſemblance was like his wife, and was cloathed in the moſt magnificent apparel, and whenever any one refuſed to deliver up his riches, the tyrant led him to the ſtatue, which immediately, by means of ſecret ſprings, ſeized him in its arms, and tormented him in the moſt excruciating manner with bearded points and prickles, hid under the cloaths. To render his tyranny more popular, Nabis made an alliance with Flaminius, the Roman general, and purſued with the moſt inveterate enmity the war which he had undertaken againſt the Achæans. He beſieged Gythium, and defeated Philopœmen in a naval battle. His triumph was ſhort, the general of the Achæans ſoon repaired his loſſes, and Nabis was defeated in an engagement, and treacherouſly murdered as he attempted to ſave his life by flight, B. C. 192, after an uſurpation of 14 years. Polyb. 13.—Juſtin. 30 & 31.—Plut. in Phil.—Pauſ. 7, c. 8.—Flor. 2, c. 7.——A prieſt of Jupiter Ammon killed in the ſecond Punic war, as he fought againſt the Romans. Sil. 15, v. 672.

NACRI CAMPI, a place of Gallia Togata near Mutina. Liv. 41 c. 18.

NADAGARA. Vid. Nargara.

NÆNIA, the goddeſs of funerals at Rome, whoſe temple was without the gates of the city. The ſongs which were ſung at funerals were alſo called nænia. They were generally filled with the praiſes of the deceaſed, but ſometimes they were ſo unmeaning and improper, that the word became proverbial to ſignify nonſenſe. Varro. Plaut. Aſin. 41, c. 1, v. 63.

CN. NÆVIUS, a Latin poet in the firſt Punic war. He was originally in the Roman armies, but afterwards he applied himſelf to ſtudy, and wrote comedies, beſides a poetical account of the firſt Punic war in which he had ſerved. His ſatirical diſpoſition diſpleaſed the conſul Metellus, who drove him from Rome. He paſſed the reſt of his life in Utica, where he died, about 203 years before the Chriſtian era. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 1. de Senect.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, c. 53.——A tribune of the people at Rome, who accuſed Scipio Africanus of extortion.——An augur in the reign of Tarquin. To convince the king and the Romans of his power, as an augur, he cut a flint with a razor, and turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. Tarquin rewarded his merit by erecting him a ſtatue in the comitium which was ſtill in being in the age of Auguſtus. The razor and flint were buried near it under an altar, and it was uſual among the Romans to make witneſſes in civil cauſes ſwear near it. This miraculous event of cutting a flint with a razor, though believed by ſome writers, is treated as fabulous and improbable by Cicero, who, himſelf, had been an augur. Dionyſ. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 36.—Cic. de divin. 1.

NÆVOLUS, an infamous pimp in Domitian's reign. Juv. 9, v. 1.

NAHARVALI, a people of Germany. Tacit. Germ. 43.

NAIADES, certain inferior deities who preſided over rivers, ſprings, wells, and fountains. The Naiades generally inhabited the country and reſorted to the woods or meadow near the ſtream over which they preſided, whence the name (ναειν to flow.) They are repreſented as young and beautiful virgins often leaning upon an urn, from which flows a ſtream of water. Ægle was the faireſt of the Naiades, according to Virgil. They were held in great veneration among the ancients, and often ſacrifices of goats and lambs, were offered to them with libations of wine, honey, and oil. Sometimes they received only offerings of milk, fruit and flowers. Vid. Nymphæ. Virg. Ecl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 328.—Homer. Od. 13.

NAIS, one of the Oceanides, mother of Chiron or Glaucus by Magnes. Apollod. 1, c. 9.——A nymph, mother by Bucolion of Æneſus and Pedaſus. Homer. Il. 6.——A nymph in an iſland of the red ſea, who by her incantations turned to fiſhes all thoſe who approached her reſidence after ſhe had admitted them to her embraces. She was herſelf changed into a fiſh by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 49, &c.

NAPÆÆ, certain divinities among the ancients who preſided over the hills and woods of the country. Some ſuppoſe that they were titulary deities of the fountains and the Naiades of the ſea. Their name is derived from ναπη, a grove. Virg. G. 4, v. 535.

NAPHILUS, a river of Peloponneſus falling into the Alpheus. Pauſ. 8.

NARCÆUS, a son of Bacchus and Physcoa. Paus. 5, c. 15.

NARCISSUS, a beautiful youth, son of Cephisus and the nymph Liriope, born at Thespis in Bœotia. He saw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitless attempts to approach this beautiful object so provoked him that he grew desperate and killed himself. His blood was changed into a flower, which still bears his name. The nymphs raised a funeral pile to burn his body, according to Ovid, but they found nothing but a beautiful flower. Pausanias says that Narcissus had a sister as beautiful as himself, of whom he became deeply enamored. He often hunted in the woods in her company, but his pleasure was soon interrupted by her death, and still to keep afresh her memory, he frequently the groves, where he had often attended her, or reposed himself on the brim of a fountain, where the sight of his own reflected image still awakened tender sentiments. Paus. 9, c. 21.—Hygin. fab. 271.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 346, &c.—Philostrat. 1.——A freedman and secretary of Claudius, who abused his trust and the infirmities of his imperial master, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himself. Messalina the emperor's wife endeavored to remove him, but Narcissus sacrificed her to his avarice and resentment. Agrippina, who succeeded in the place of Messalina, was more successful. Narcissus was banished by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himself, A. D. 54. Nero greatly regretted his loss, as he had found him subservient to his most criminal and extravagant pleasures. Tacit.—Sueton.——A favorite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.——A wretch who strangled the emperor Commodus.

Naupactus or Naupactum, a city of Ætolia, at the mouth of the Evenus. The word is derived from ναυς & πηγνυμι, becauſe it was there that the Heraclidæ built the firſt ſhip, which carried them to Peloponneſus. It firſt belonged to the Locri Ozolæ, and afterwards fell into the hands of the Athenians, who gave it to the Meſſenians, who had been driven from Peloponneſus by the Lacedæmonians. It became the property of the Lacedæmonians, after the battle of Ægoſpotamos, and it was reſtored to the Locri. Philip of Macedonia afterwards took it and gave it to the Ætolians, from which circumſtance, it has generally been called one of the chief cities of their country. Strab. 4 —Pauſ. 4, c. 25. —Mela. 2, c. 3.

Nauplia, a maritime city of Peloponneſus, the naval ſtation of the Argives. The fountain Canathos was in its neighbourhood. Pauſ. 2, c. 38.—Strab. 8.

Nauplius, a ſon of Neptune and Amymone, king of Eubœa. He was father to the celebrated Palamedes, who was ſo unjuſtly ſacrificed to the artifice and reſentment of Ulyſſes by the Greeks during the Trojan war. The death of Palamedes highly irritated Nauplius, and to revenge the injuſtice of the Grecian princes, he attempted to debauch their wives and ruin their characters. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius ſaw them with pleaſure diſtreſſed in a ſtorm on the coaſts of Eubœa, and to make their diſaſter ſtill more univerſal, he lighted fires on ſuch places as were ſurrounded with the moſt dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be ſhipwrecked upon the coaſt. This ſucceeded, but Nauplius was ſo diſappointed when he ſaw Ulyſſes and Diomedes eſcape from the general calamity, that he threw himſelf into the ſea. According to ſome mythologiſts there were two perſons of this name, a native of Argos, who went to Colchis with Jaſon. He was ſon of Neptune and Amymone. The other was king of Eubœa, and lived during the Trojan war. He was, according to ſome, ſon of Clytonas, one of the deſcendants of Nauplius the Argonaut. The Argonaut was remarkable for his knowledge of ſea affairs, and of aſtronomy. He built the town of Nauplia and ſold Auge, daughter of Aleus, to king Teuthras to withdraw her from her father's reſentment. *Orph. NEMÆA, a town of Argolis between Cleonæ and Pilius with a wood, where Hercules

Hercules, in the 16th year of his age, killed the celebrated Nemæan lion. This animal was born of the hundred headed Typhon, and infeſted the neighbourhood of Nemæa, and kept the inhabitants under continual alarms. It was the firſt labor of Hercules to deſtroy it, and the hero, when he found that his arrows and his club were uſeleſs againſt an animal whoſe ſkin was hard and impenetrable, ſeized him in his arms and ſqueezed him to death. The conqueror cloathed himſelf in the ſkin, and games were inſtituted to commemorate ſo great an event. The Nemæan games were originally inſtituted by the Argives in honor of Archemorus, who died by the bite of a ſerpent, (Vid. Archemorus.) and Hercules ſometime after renewed them. They were one of the four great and ſolemn games, which were obſerved in Greece. The Argives, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonæ generally preſided by turns at the celebration, in which were exhibited foot and horſe races, chariot races, boxing, wreſtling and conteſts of every kind, both gymnical and equeſtrian. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of olive, afterwards of green parſley, in memory of the adventure of Archemorus, whom his nurſe laid down on a ſprig of that plant. They were celebrated every third, or according to others, evey fifth year or more properly on the 1ſt and 3d year of every Olympiad, on the 12th day of the Corinthian month Panemos, which correſponds to our Auguſt. They ſerved as an era to the Argives, and to the inhabitants of the neighbouring country. It was always uſual for an orator to pronounce a funeral oration in memory of the death of Archemorus, and thoſe who diſtributed the prizes were always dreſſed in mourning. *Pauſ. in Corinth.—Clem. Nemesiānus, a Latin poet, of no very brilliant talents, in the third century, whoſe poems on hunting and bird catching were publiſhed by Burman, inter ſcriptores rei venaticæ, 4to. L. Bat. 1728.

Nĕmĕsis, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddeſs of vengeance always prepared to puniſh impiety, and at the ſame time liberally to reward the good and virtuous. She is made one of the Parcæ by ſome mythologiſts, and is repreſented with a helm and a wheel. The people of Smyrna were the firſt who made her ſtatues with wings, to ſhow with what celerity ſhe is prepared to puniſh the crimes of the wicked both by ſea and land, as the helm and the wheel in her hands intimate. Her power did not only exiſt in this life, but ſhe was alſo employed after death to find out the moſt effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemeſis was particularly worſhipped at Rhamnus in Attica, where ſhe had a celebrated ſtatue 10 cubits long, made of Parian marble by Phidias, or according to others, by one of his pupils. The Romans were alſo particularly attentive to the adoration of a deity whom they ſolemnly invoked, and to whom they offered ſacrifices before they declared war againſt their enemies, to ſhow the world that their wars were undertaken upon the moſt juſt grounds. Her ſtatue at Rome was in the capitol. Some ſuppoſe that Nemeſis was the perſon whom Jupiter deceived in the form of a ſwan, and that Leda was entruſted with the care of the children which ſprang from the two eggs. Others obſerve that Leda obtained the name of Nemeſis after death. According to Pauſanias, there were more than one Nemeſis. The goddeſs Nemeſis was ſirnamed Rhamnuſia, becauſe worſhipped at Rhamnus, and Adraſtia from the temple which Adraſtus king of Argos erected to her when he went againſt Thebes to revenge the indignities which his ſon-in-law Polynices had ſuffered in being unjuſtly driven from his kingdom by Eteocles. The Greeks celebrated a feſtival called Nemeſia, in memory of deceaſed perſons, as the goddeſs Nemeſis was ſuppoſed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all inſult. *Hygin. P. afterwards called Tithorea. Plut. in Syll.—Pauſ. Phoc.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.——One of the commanders of the ten thouſand Greeks who aſſiſted Cyrus againſt Artaxerxes.

NEONTICHOS, a town of Æolia near the Hermus.

NEOPTOLEMUS, a king of Epirus, ſon of Achilles and Deidamia, called Pyrrhus, from the yellow color of his hair. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother, and gave early proofs of his valor. After the death of Achilles, Calchas declared in the aſſembly of the Greeks, that Troy could not be taken without the aſſiſtance of the ſon of the deceaſed hero. Immediately upon this Ulyſſes and Phœnix were commiſſioned to bring Pyrrhus to the war. He returned with them with pleaſure, and received the name of Neoptolemus, (new ſoldier,) becauſe he had come late to the field. On his arrival before Troy he paid a viſit to the tomb of his father, and wept over his aſhes. He afterwards, according to ſome authors, accompanied Ulyſſes to Lemnos, to engage Philoctetes to come to the Trojan war. He greatly ſignalized himſelf during the remaining time of the ſiege, and he was the firſt who entered the wooden horſe. He was inferior to none of the Grecian warriors in valor, and Ulyſſes and Neſtor alone could claim a ſuperiority over him in eloquence, wiſdom, and addreſs. His cruelty however was as great as that of his father. Not ſatisfied with breaking down the gates of Priam's palace, he exerciſed the greateſt barbarity upon the remains of his family, and without any regard to the ſanctity of the place where Priam had taken refuge, he ſlaughtered him without mercy; or, according to others, dragged him by the hair, to the tomb of his father, where he ſacrificed him, and where he cut off his head, and carried it in exultation through the ſtreets of Troy fixed on the point of a ſpear. He alſo ſacrificed Aſtyanax to his fury, and immolated Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles according to thoſe who deny that that ſacrifice was voluntary. When Troy was taken the captives were divided among the conquerors, and Pyrrhus had for his ſhare Andromache the widow of Hector, and Helenus the ſon of Priam. With theſe he departed for Greece, and he probably eſcaped from deſtruction by giving credit to the words of Helenus, who foretold him that if he ſailed with the reſt of the Greeks, his voyage would be attended with fatal conſequences, and perhaps with death. This obliged him to take a different courſe from the reſt of the Greeks, and he travelled over the greateſt part of Thrace, where he had a ſevere encounter with queen Harpalyce. [Vid. Harpalyce.] The place of his retirement after the Trojan war is not known. Some maintain that he went to Theſſaly, where his grandfather ſtill reigned; but this is confuted by others who obſerve, perhaps with more reaſon, that he went to Epirus, where he laid the foundations of a new kingdom, becauſe his grandfather Peleus had been deprived of his ſceptre by Acaſtus the ſon of Pelias. Neoptolemus lived with Andromache after his arrival in Greece, but it is unknown whether he treated her as a lawful wife, or a concubine. He had a ſon by this unfortunate princeſs called Moloſſus, and two others if we rely on the authority of Pauſanias. Beſides Andromache he married Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, as alſo Lanaſſa the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the deſcendants of Hercules. The cauſe of his death is variouſly related. Menelaus, before the Trojan war, had promiſed his daughter Hermione to Oreſtes, but the ſervices he experienced from the valor and the courage of Neoptolemus during the ſiege of Troy, induced him to reward his merit by making him his ſon-in-law. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but Hermione became jealous of Andromache, and becauſe ſhe had no children, ſhe reſolved to deſtroy her Trojan rival who ſeemed to ſteal away the affections of their common huſband. In the abſence of Neoptolemus at Delphi, Hermione attempted to murder Andromache, but ſhe was prevented by the interference of Peleus or according to others, of the populace. When ſhe ſaw her ſchemes defeated, ſhe determined to lay violent hands upon herſelf to avoid the reſentment of Neoptolemus. The ſudden arrival of Oreſtes changed her reſolutions, and ſhe conſented to elope with her lover to Sparta. Oreſtes at the ſame time to revenge and to puniſh his rival, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated in the temple of Delphi, and he was murdered at the foot of the altar by Machareus the prieſt, or by the hand of Oreſtes himſelf according to Virgil, Paterculus, and Hyginus. Some ſay that he was murdered by the Delphians, who had been bribed by the preſents of Oreſtes. It is unknown why Neoptolemus went to Delphi. Some ſupport that he wiſhed to conſult the oracle to know how he might have children by the barren Hermione; others ſay, that he went thither to offer the ſpoils which he had obtained during the Trojan war, to appeaſe the reſentment of Apollo whom he had provoked by calling him the cauſe of the death of Achilles. The plunder of the rich temple of Delphi, if we believe others, was the object of the journey of Neoptolemus, and it cannot but be obſerved, that he ſuffered the ſame death and the ſame barbarities which he had inflicted in the temple of Minerva upon the aged Priam and his wretched family. From this circumstance the ancients have made use of the proverb of Neoptolemic revenge when a person had suffered the same savage treatment which others had received from his hand. The Delphians celebrated a festival with great pomp and solemnity in memory of Neoptolemus, who had been slain in his attempt to plunder their temple, because, as they said, Apollo the patron of the place had been in some manner accessary to the death of Achilles. Patere. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. Nephele, the first wife of Athamas king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle. She was repudiated on pretence of being subject to fits of insanity, and Athamas married Ino the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had several children. Ino became jealous of Nephele, because her children would succeed to their father's throne before her's by right of seniority, and she resolved to destroy them. Nephele was apprized of her wicked intentions, and she removed her children from the reach of Ino, by giving them a celebrated ram sprung from the union of Neptune and Theophane, on whose back they escaped to Colchis. [Vid. Phryxus.] Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud, whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds. Some call her Nebula, which word is the latin translation of Nephele. The fleece of the ram, which saved the life of Nephele's children, is often called the Nephelian fleece. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. 2, &c.—*Ovid. Corn. Nepos, a celebrated historian in the reign of Augustus. He was born at Hostilia, and like the rest of his learned contemporaries, he shared the favors and enjoyed the patronage of the emperor. He was the intimate friend of Cicero and of Atticus, and recommended himself to the notice of the great and opulent by delicacy of sentiment and a lively disposition. According to some writers he composed three book of chronicles, as also a biographical account of all the most celebrated kings, general and authors of antiquity. Of all his valuable compositions, nothing remains but his lives of the illustrious Greek and Roman generals, which have often been attributed to Æmylius Probus, who published them in his own name in the age of Theodosus to conciliate the favors and the friendship of that emperor. The language of Cornelius has always been admired, and as a writer of the Augustan age, he is intitled to many commendations for the delicacy of his expressions, the elegance of his stile and the clearness and precision of his narrations. Some support that he translated Dares Phrygius from the Greek original, but the inelegance of the diction, and its many incorrect expressions plainly prove that it is the production, not of a writer of the Augustan age, but the spurious composition of a more modern pen. Cornelius speaks of his account of the Greek historians in Dion. c 3. Among the many good editions of Cornelius Nepos, two may be selected as the best, that of Verheyk, 8vo. L. Bat. 1773, and that of Glaſgow, 12mo. 1761.——Julius, an Emperor of the Weſt, &c.

Nepotianus Flavius Popilius, a ſon of Eutropia, the ſiſter of the emperor Conſtantine. He proclaimed himſelf emperor after the death of his couſin Conſtans, and rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty and oppreſſion. He was murdered after one month's reign, and his family were involved in his ruin.

Neptunius an epithet applied to Sext. Pompey, becauſe he believed himſelf to be god of the ſea, or deſcended from him, on account of his ſuperiority in ſhips, &c.

Neptunus, a god, ſon of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto and Juno. He was devoured by his father the day of his birth, and again reſtored to life by means of Metis, who gave Saturn a certain potion. Pauſanias ſays, that his mother concealed him in a ſheepfold in Arcadia, and that ſhe impoſed upon her huſband, telling him that ſhe had brought a colt into the world, which was inſtantly devoured by Saturn. Neptune ſhared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the ſea. This, however, did not ſeem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed, therefore he conſpired to dethrone him with the reſt of the gods. The conſpiracy was diſcovered and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. [Vid. Laomedon.] A reconciliation was ſoon after made, and Neptune was re-inſtituted to all his rights and privileges. Neptune diſputed with Minerva the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia, but he was defeated, and the olive which the goddeſs ſuddenly raiſed from the earth was deemed more ſerviceable for the good of mankind than the horſe which Neptune had produced by ſtriking the ground with his trident, as that animal is the emblem of war and ſlaughter. This deciſion did not pleaſe Neptune, he renewed the combat by diſputing for Trœzene, but Jupiter ſettled their diſputes by permitting them to be conjointly worſhipped there, and by giving the name of Polias or the protectreſs of the city to Minerva, and that of king of Trœzene to the god of the ſea. He alſo diſputed his right for the iſthmus of Corinth with Apollo, and Briareus, the Cyclops who was mutually choſen umpire gave the iſthmus to Neptune, and the promontory to Apollo. Neptune, as being god of the ſea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only the ocean, rivers and fountains were ſubjected to him, but he alſo could cauſe earthquakes at his pleaſure, and raiſe iſlands from the bottom of the ſea with a blow of his trident. The worſhip of Neptune was eſtabliſhed in almoſt every part of the earth, and the Libyans in particular venerated him above all other nations, and looked upon him as the firſt and greateſt of the gods. The Greeks and the Romans were alſo attached to his worſhip, and they celebrated their Iſthmian games and Conſualia with the greateſt ſolemnity. He was generally repreſented ſitting in a chariot made of a ſhell, and drawn by ſea horſes or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horſes, and holds his trident in his hand, and ſtands up as his chariot flies over the ſurface of the ſea. Homer repreſents him as iſſuing from the ſea, and in three ſteps croſſing the whole horizon. The mountains and the foreſts, ſays the poet, trembled as he walked; the whales, and all the fiſhes of the ſea appear round him, and even the ſea herſelf ſeems to feel the preſence of her god. The antients generally ſacrificed a bull and a horſe on his altars, and the Roman ſoothſayers always offered to him the gall of the victims, which in taſte reſembles the bitterneſs of the ſea water. The amours of Neptune are numerous. He obtained, by means of a dolphin, the favors of Amphitrite, who had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, and he placed among the conſtellations the fiſh which had perſuaded the goddeſs to become his wife. He alſo married Venilia and Salacia, which are only the names of Amphitrite, according to ſome authors, who obſerve that the former word is derived from venire, alluding to the continual motion of the ſea. Salacia is derived from ſalum, which ſignifies the ſea, and is applicable to Amphitrite. Neptune became a horſe to enjoy the company of Ceres. [Vid. Arion.] To deceive Theophane, he changed himſelf into a ram. [Vid. Theophane.] He aſſumed the form of the river Enipeus to gain the confidence of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, by whom he had Pelias and Neleus. He was alſo father of Phorcus and Polyphemus by Thooſſa; of Lycus, Nycteus and Euphemus by Celeno; of Chryſes by Chryſogenia; of Anæus by Aſtypalea; of Bœotus and Hellen by Antiope; of Leuconoe by Themiſto; of Agenor and Bellerophon by Eurynome the daughter of Nyſus; of Antas by Alcyone the daughter of Atlas; of Abas by by Arethuſa; of Actor and Dictys by Agemede the daughter of Augias; of Megareus by Œnope daughter of Epopeus; of Cycnus by Harpalyce; of Taras, Otus, Ephialtes, Dorus, Aleſus, &c. The word Neptunus is often uſed metaphorically by the poets, to ſignify ſea water. In the Conſualia of the Romans, horſes were led through the ſtreets finely equipped and crowned with garlands, as the god, in whoſe honor the feſtivals were inſtituted, had produced the horſe, an animal ſo beneficial for the uſe of mankind. Pauſ. 1, 2, &c.—*Homer. NĔRĔĪDES, nymphs of the ſea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were fifty, according to the greater number of the mythologiſts, whoſe names are as follows: Sao, Amphitrite, Proto, Galatæa, Thoe, Eucrate, Eudora, Galena, Glauce, Thetis, Spio, Cymothoe, Melita, Thalia, Agave, Eulimene, Erato, Paſithea, Doto, Eunice, Neſea, Dynamene, Pheruſa, Protomelia, Actea, Panope, Doris, Cymatolege, Hippothoe, Cymo, Eione, Hipponoe, Cymodoce, Neſo, Eupompe, Pronoe, Themiſto, Glauconome, Halimede, Pontoporia, Evagora, Liagora, Polynome, Laomadia, Lyſianaſſa, Autonoe, Menippe, Evarne, Pſamathe, Nemertes. In thoſe which Homer mentions, to the number of 30, we find the following names different from thoſe ſpoken of by Heſiod; Halia, Limmoria, Iera, Amphitroe, Dexamene, Amphinome, Callianira, Apſeudes, Callianaſſa, Clymene, Janira, Naſſa, Mera, Orithya, Amathea. Apollodorus, who mentions 45, mentions the following names different from the others: Glaucothoe, Protomeduſa, Pione, Pleſaura, Calypſo, Crantο, Neomeris, Dejanira, Polynoe, Melia, Dione, Iſea, Dero, Eumolpe, Ione, Ceto. Hyginus, and others differ from the preceding authors in the following names: Drymo, Xantho, Ligea, Phyllodoce, Cydippe, Lycorias, Cleio, Beroe, Ephira, Opis, Aſia, Deopea, Arethuſa, Crenis, Eurydice, and Leucothoe. The Nereides were implored as the reſt of the deities, they had altars chiefly on the coaſts of the ſea, where the piety of mankind made offerings of milk, oil, and honey, and often of the fleſh of goats. When they were on the ſea ſhore they generally reſided in grottos and caves, which were adorned with ſhells and ſhaded by the branches of vines. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the ſea, and to be ſubſervient to the will of Neptune. They were particularly fond of alcyons, and as they had the power of ruffling or calming the waters, they were always addreſſed by ſailors, who implored their protection, that they might grant them a favorable voyage and a proſperous return. They are repreſented as young and handſome virgins, ſitting on dolphins and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or ſometimes garlands of flowers, &c. Orpheus Hymn. 23.—*Catull. de Rapt. NĔRĔĬUS, a name given to Achilles, as ſon of Thetis, who was one of the Nereides. Horat. ep. 17, v. 8.

NĔRĔUS, a deity of the ſea, ſon of Oceanus and Terra. He married Doris by whom he had 50 daughters, called the Nereides. [Vid. Nereides.] Nereus was generally repreſented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and hair of an azure color. The chief place of his reſidence was in the Ægean ſea, where he was ſurrounded by his daughters, who often danced in choruſſes round him. He had the gift of prophecy, and informed thoſe that conſulted him with the different fates that attended them. He acquainted Paris with the conſequences of his elopement with Helen, and it was by his directions that Hercules obtained the golden apples of the Heſperides, but the ſea-god often evaded the importunities of inquirers by aſſuming different ſhapes, and totally eſcaping from their graſp. The word Nereus is often taken for the ſea itſelf. Nereus is ſometimes called the moſt antient of all the gods. Heſiod. Theog. Hygin.—Homer. Il. 18.—Apollod.—*Orpheus. NĔRĪPHUS, a deſart iſland near the Thracian Cherſoneſus.

NĔRĪTOS, a mountain in the iſland of Ithaca, as alſo a ſmall iſland in the Ionian ſea, according to Mela. The word Neritos is often applied to the whole iſland of Ithaca, and Ulyſſes, the king of it, is called Neritius dux, and his ſhip Neritia navis. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 271.—Plin. 4.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

NĔRĬUS, a ſilverſmith in the age of Horace, 2 Sat. 3, v. 69.——An uſurer in Nero's age, who was ſo eager to get money, that he married as often as he could, and as ſoon deſtroyed his wives by poiſon, to poſſeſs himſelf of their eſtates. Perſ. 2, v. 14.

NĔRO, Claudius Domitius Cæſar, a celebrated Roman emperor, ſon of Caius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 50, and four years after he ſucceeded to him on the throne.

The beginning of his reign was marked by acts of the greateſt kindneſs and condeſcenſion, by affability, complaiſance, and popularity. The object of his adminiſtration ſeemed to be the good of his people, and when he was deſired to ſign his name to a liſt of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, I wiſh to heaven I could not write. He was an enemy to flattery, and when the ſenate had liberally commended the wiſdom of his government, Nero deſired them to keep their praiſes till he deſerved them. Theſe promiſing virtues were ſoon diſcovered to be artificial, and Nero diſplayed the propenſities of his nature. He delivered himſelf from the ſway of his mother, and at laſt ordered her to be aſſaſſinated. This unnatural act of barbarity, might aſtoniſh ſome of the Romans, but Nero had his devoted adherents, and when he declared that he had taken away his mother's life to ſave himſelf from ruin, the ſenate applauded his meaſures, and the people ſignified their approbation. Many of his courtiers ſhared the unhappy fate of Agrippina, and Nero ſacrificed to his fury or caprice all ſuch as obſtructed his pleaſure, or diverted his inclination. In the night he generally ſallied out from his palace, to viſit the meaneſt taverns, and all the ſcenes of debauchery which Rome contained. In this nocturnal riot he was fond of inſulting the people in the ſtreets, and his attempts to offer violence to the wife of a Roman ſenator, nearly coſt him his life. He alſo turned actor, and publicly appeared on the Roman ſtage in the meaneſt characters. In his attempts to excel in muſic, and to conquer the diſadvantages of a hoarſe rough voice, he moderated his meals, and often paſſed the day without eating. The celebrity of the Olympian games attracted his notice. He paſſed into Greece, and preſented himſelf as a candidate for the public honor. He was defeated in wreſtling, but the flattery of the ſpectators adjudged him the victory, and Nero returned to Rome with all the pomp and ſplendor of an eaſtern conqueror drawn in the chariot of Auguſtus, and attended by a band of muſicians, actors, and ſtage dancers from every part of the empire. Theſe private and public amuſements of the emperor were indeed innocent, his character was injured and not the lives of the people. But his conduct ſoon became more abominable, he diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a woman, and was publicly married to one of his eunuchs. This violence to nature and decency was ſoon exchanged for another; Nero reſumed his ſex, and celebrated his nuptials with one of his meaneſt catamites, and it was on this occaſion that one of the Romans obſerved that the world would have been happy, if Nero's father had had ſuch a wife. But now his cruelty was diſplayed in a more ſuperlative degree, and he ſacrificed to his wantonneſs his wife Octavia Poppæa, and the celebrated writers, Seneca, Lucan, Petronius, &c. The Chriſtians alſo did not eſcape his barbarity. He had heard of the burning of Troy, and as he wiſhed to renew that diſmal ſcene, he cauſed Rome to be ſet on fire in different places. The conflagration became ſoon univerſal, and during nine ſucceſſive days the fire was unextinguiſhed. All was deſolation, nothing was heard but the lamentations of mothers whoſe children had periſhed in the flames, the groans of the dying, and the continual fall of palaces and buildings. Nero was the only one who enjoyed the general conſternation. He placed himſelf on the top of a high tower, and he ſang on his lyre the deſtruction of Troy, a dreadful ſcene which his barbarity had realized before his eyes. He attempted to avert the public odium from his head, by a feigned commiſeration of the miſeries of his ſubjects. He began to repair the ſtreets and the public buildings at his own expence. He built himſelf a celebrated palace, which he called his golden houſe. It was profuſely adorned with gold, with precious ſtones, and with whatever was rare and exquiſite. It contained ſpacious fields, artificial lakes, woods, gardens, orchards, and whatever could exhibit beauty and grandeur. The entrance of this edifice could admit a large coloſſus of the emperor 120 feet high, the galleries were each a mile long, and the whole was covered with gold. The roofs of the dining halls repreſented the firmament, in motion as well as in figure, and continually turned round night and day, ſhowering down all ſorts of perfumes and ſweet waters. When this grand edifice, which, according to Pliny, extended all round the city was finiſhed, Nero ſaid, that now he could lodge like a man. His profuſion was not leſs remarkable in all his other actions. When he went a fiſhing, his nets were made with gold and ſilk. He never appeared twice in the ſame garment, and when he undertook a voyage, there were thouſands of ſervants to take care of his wardrobe. This continuation of debauchery and extravagance, at laſt, rouſed the reſentment of the people. Many conſpiracies were formed againſt the emperor, but they were generally diſcovered, and ſuch as were acceſſary ſuffered the greateſt puniſhments. The moſt dangerous conſpiracy againſt Nero's life was that of Piſo, from which he was delivered by the confeſſion of a ſlave. The conſpiracy of Galba, proved more ſucceſsful, and the conſpirator, when he was informed that his plot was known to Nero, declared himſelf emperor. The unpopularity of Nero favored his cauſe, he was acknowledged knowledged by all the Roman empire, and the ſenate condemned the tyrant that ſat on the throne to be dragged naked through the ſtreets of Rome, and whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock like the meaneſt malefactor. This, however, was not done, and Nero by a voluntary death prevented the execution of the ſentence. He killed himſelf, A. D. 68, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 13 years and eight months. Rome was filled with acclamation at the intelligence, and the citizens more ſtrongly to indicate their joy, wore caps, ſuch as were generally uſed by ſlaves, who had received their freedom. Their vengeance was not only exerciſed againſt the ſtatues of the deceaſed tyrant, but his friends were the object of the public reſentment, and many were cruſhed to pieces in ſuch a violent manner, that one of the ſenators, amid the univerſal joy, ſaid that he was afraid they ſhould ſoon have cauſe to wiſh for Nero. The tyrant, as he expired, begged that his head might not be cut off from his body, and expoſed to the inſolence of an enraged populace, but that the whole might be burned on the funeral pile. His requeſt was granted by one of Galba's freedmen, and his obſequies were performed with the uſual ceremonies. Though his death ſeemed to be the ſource of univerſal gladneſs, yet many of his favorites lamented his fall, and were grieved to ſee that their pleaſures and amuſements were ſtopped by the death of the patron of debauchery and extravagance. Even the king of Parthia ſent ambaſſadors to Rome to condole with the Romans, and to beg that they would honor and revere the memory of Nero. His ſtatues were alſo crowned with garlands of flowers, and many believed that he was not dead, but that he would ſoon make his appearance, and take a due vengeance upon his enemies. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, in finiſhing the character of this tyrannical emperor, that the name of Nero is even now uſed emphatically to expreſs a barbarous and unfeeling oppreſſor. Pliny calls him the common enemy and the fury of mankind, and in this he has been followed by all writers who exhibit Nero as a pattern of the moſt execrable barbarity and unpardonable wantonneſs. Plut. in Galb.—Suet. in vitâ.—Plin. 7, c. 8, &c.—Dio. 64.—*Aurel. ——Claudius, a Roman general ſent in Spain to ſucceed the two Scipios. He ſuffered himſelf to be impoſed upon by Aſdrubal, and was ſoon after ſucceeded by young Scipio. He was afterwards made a conſul and intercepted Aſdrubal, who was paſſing from Spain into Italy with a large reinforcement for his brother Annibal. An engagement was fought near the river Metaurus, in which 56,000 of the Carthaginians were left in the field of battle, and great numbers taken priſoners, 207 B.C. Aſdrubal, the Carthaginian general, was alſo killed, and his head cut off and thrown into his brother's camp by the conquerors. Appian. in Han.—Oroſ. 4.—Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—*Val. He died in the place of his exile. His death was voluntary, according to ſome. Sueton. in Tiber.—— The Nero's were of the Claudian family, which, during the republican times of Rome, was honored with 28 conſulſhips, five dictatorſhips, ſix triumphs, ſeven cenſorſhips, and two ovations. They aſſumed the ſirname of Nero, which, in the language of the Sabines, ſignifies ſtrong and warlike.

NERŌNIA, a name given to Artaxata by Tiridates, who had been reſtored to his kingdom by Nero, whoſe favors he acknowledged by calling the capital of his dominions after the name of his benefactor.

NERONIĀNÆ THERMÆ, baths at Rome, made by the emperor Nero.

NERTOBRIGIA, a town of Spain.

NERVA COCCEIUS, a Roman emperor after the death of Domitian, A. D. 96. He rendered himſelf popular by his mildneſs, his generoſity, and the active part he took in the management of affairs. He ſuffered no ſtatues to be raiſed to his honor, and he applied to the uſe of the government all the gold and ſilver ſtatues which flattery and hatred had erected to his predeceſſor. In his civil character he was the patron of good manners, of ſobriety, and temperance. He forbad the mutilation of male children, and gave no countenance to the law which permitted the marriage of an uncle with his niece. He made a ſolemn declaration that no ſenator ſhould ſuffer death during his reign, and this he obſerved with ſuch ſanctity that, when two members of the ſenate had conſpired againſt his life, he was ſatisfied to tell them that he was informed of their wicked machinations. He alſo conducted them to the public ſpectacles, and ſat himſelf between them, and, when a ſword was offered to him, according to the uſual cuſtom, he dared the conſpirators to try it upon his body. Such goodneſs of heart, ſuch confidence in the ſelf-conviction of the human mind, and ſuch reliance upon the conſequence of his lenity and indulgence, conciliated the minds of all his ſubjects. Yet, as envy and danger are the conſtant companions of greatneſs, the Pretorian guards at laſt mutinied, and Nerva meanly yielded to their fury. He uncovered his aged neck in the preſence of the incenſed ſoldiery, and bade them wreak their vengeance upon him, provided they spared the life of those to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom his honor commanded him to defend. His seeming submission was unavailing, and he was at last obliged to surrender, to the fury of the soldiers, some of his friends and supporters. The infirmities of his age, and his natural timidity, at last obliged him to provide himself against any future mutiny or tumult, by chusing a worthy successor. He had many friends and relations, but he did not consider the aggrandizement of his family, and he chose, for his son and successor, Trajan, a man of whose virtues and greatness of mind he was fully convinced. This voluntary choice was approved by the acclamations of the people, and the wisdom and prudence which marked the reign of Trajan showed how discerning was the judgment, and how affectionate were the intentions, of Nerva, for the good of Rome. He died on the 27th of July, A. D. 98, in his 72d year, and his successor showed his respect for his merit and for his character by raising him altars and temples in Rome, and in the provinces, and by ranking him in the number of the gods. Nerva was the first Roman emperor who was of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. Plin. paneg.—Diod. 69.——M. Cocceius, a consul in the reign of Tiberius. He starved himself, because he would not be concerned in the extravagance of the emperor.——A celebrated lawyer, consul with the emperor Vespasian. He was father to the emperor of that name.

NESIS, an island on the coast of Campania, famous for asparagus. Plin. 19, c. 8.—Lucan 6, v. 90.

NESSUS, a celebrated centaur, son of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had entrusted to his care, with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. [Vid. Dejanira.] Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately he let fly one of his poisoned arrows, which struck the centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave the tunic he then wore to Dejanira, assuring her that, from the poisoned blood which had flowed from his wounds, it had received the power of calling a husband away from unlawful love. Dejanira received it with pleasure, and this mournful present caused the death of Hercules. [Vid. Hercules.] Apollod. 2, c. 7.—*Ovid. NESTOCLES, a famous statuary of Greece, rival to Phidias.

NESTOR, a son of Neleus and Chloris, nephew to Pelias, and grandson to Neptune. He had eleven brothers, who were all killed, with his father, by Hercules. His tender age detained him at home, and was the cause of his preservation. The conqueror spared his life, and placed him on the throne of Pylos. He married Eurydice, the daughter of Clymenes or, according to others, Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and was present at the nuptials of Pirithous, when a bloody battle was fought between the Lapithæ and Centaurs. As king of Pylos and Messenia he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself among the rest of the Grecian chiefs, by eloquence, address, wisdom, justice, and an uncommon prudence of mind. Homer displays his character as the most perfect of all his heroes, and Agamemnon exclaims, that, if he had ten generals like Nestor, he should soon see the walls of Troy reduced to ashes. After the Trojan war, Nestor retired to Greece, where he enjoyed, in the bosom of his family, the peace and tranquillity which were due to his wisdom and to his old age. The manner and the time of his death are unknown; the ancients are all agreed that he lived three generations of men, which length of time some suppose to be 300 years, though, more probably, only 90, allowing 30 years for each generation. From that circumstance, therefore, it was usual among the Greeks and the Latins, when they wished a long and happy life to their friends, to wish them to see the years of Nestor. He had two daughters, Pisidice and Polycaste; and seven sons, Perseus, Straticus, Aretus, Echephron, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Trasimedes. Nestor was one of the Argonauts, according to Valerius Flaccus 1, v. 380, &c.—Dictys Cret. 1, c. 13, &c.—*Homer. Niceratus, a poet, who wrote a poem in praise of Lysander.——The father of Nicias.

Nicetas, one of the Byzantine historians, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.

Niceteria, a festival at Athens, in memory of the victory which Minerva obtained over Neptune, in their dispute about giving a name to the capital of the country.

Nicia, a city. Vid. Nicæa.

Nicias, an Athenian general, celebrated for his valor and for his misfortunes. He early conciliated the good will of the people by his liberality, and he established his military character by taking the island of Cythera from the power of Lacedæmon. When Athens determined to make war against Sicily, Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reprobated as impolitic, and as the future cause of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmness, but he often blamed the quick and inconsiderate measures of his colleagues. The success of the Athenians remained long doubtful. Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuse was surrounded by a wall, and, though the operations were carried on slowly, yet the city would have surrendered, had not the sudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the besieged at the critical moment. Gylippus proposed terms of accommodation to the Athenians, which were refused; some battles were fought in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage, and Nicias at last, tired of his ill success, and grown desponding, demanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a successor. Demosthenes, upon this, was sent with a powerful fleet, but the advice of Nicias was despised, and the admiral, by his eagerness to come to a decisive engagement, ruined his fleet and the interest of Athens. The fear of his enemies at home prevented Nicias from leaving Sicily, and when, at last, a continued series of ill success obliged him to comply, he found himself surrounded on every side by the enemy, without hope of escaping. He gave himself up to the conquerors with all his army, but the assurances of safety which he had received soon proved vain and false, and he was no sooner in the hands of the enemy than he was shamefully put to death with Demosthenes. His troops were sent to quarries, where the plague and hard labor diminished diminished their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some suppose that the death of Nicias was not violent. He perished about 413 years before Christ, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant but unfortunate general. Plut. in vitâ.—C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 4, &c.—Diod. 15.——A grammarian of Rome, intimate with Cicero.——A man of Nicæa, who wrote an history of philosophers.——A physician of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who made an offer to the Romans of poisoning his master for a sum of money. NICIPPE, a daughter of Pelops, who married Sthenelus.—A daughter of Thespius. Apollod.

NICIPPUS, a tyrant of Cos, one of whose sheep brought forth a lion. Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 29.

NICO, one of the Tarentine chiefs who conspired against the life of Annibal. Liv. 30.——A celebrated architect and geometrician. He was father to the celebrated Galen, the prince of physicians.——One of the slaves of Craterus.——The name of an ass which Augustus met before the battle of Actium, a circumstance which he considered as a favorable omen.——The name of an elephant remarkable for his fidelity to king Pyrrhus.

NICOCHARES, a Greek comic poet in the age of Aristophanes.

NICOCLES, a familiar friend of Phocion, condemned to death. Plut.——A king of Salamis, celebrated for his contest with a king of Phœnicia to prove which of the two was most effeminate.——A king of Paphos, who reigned under the protection of Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He revolted from his friend to the king of Persia, upon which Ptolemy ordered one of his servants to put him to death, to strike terror into the other dependant princes. The servant, unwilling to murder the monarch, advised him to kill himself. Nicocles obeyed, and all his family followed his example, 310 years before the Christian era.——An ancient Greek poet, who called physicians a happy race of men, because light published their good deeds to the world, and the earth hid all their faults and imperfections.——A king of Cyprus, who succeeded Evagoras on the throne, 374 years before Christ. It was with him that the philosopher Isocrates corresponded.—A tyrant of Sicyon, deposed by means of Aratus, the Achæan.

NICOMACHUS, the father of the philosopher Aristotle.——One of Alexander's friends.——An excellent painter.——A Pythagorean philosopher.——A Lacedæmonian general, conquered by Timotheus.——A writer in the fifth century, &c.

NICOMEDES 1st. a king of Bithynia, about 278 years before the Christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia. Justin. Pausan. &c.——The 2d. was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B. C. 149. He reigned 59 years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.——The 3d. son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans re-established him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was, at last, expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia, who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab. Appian.——The 4th. of that name, was son and successor of Nicomedes 3d. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B. C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions, to the Roman people. Strab. 12.—Appian. Mithrid.—Justin. 38, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 5.——A celebrated geometrician in the age of the philosopher Eratosthenes. He made himself known by his his uſeful machines, &c.——An engineer in the army of Mithridates.——One of the preceptors of the emperor M. Antoninus.

NICOMĒDIA, a town of Bithynia, founded by Nicomedes 1ſt. It was the capital of the country, and it has been compared, for its beauty and greatneſs, to Rome, Antioch, or Alexandria. It became celebrated for being the reſidence of the emperor Conſtantine and moſt of his imperial ſucceſſors. Some ſuppoſe that it was originally called Aſtacus and Olbia, though it was generally believed that they were all different cities. Ammian. 17. Pauſ. Eliac.—Plin. 5, &c.—Strab. 12, &c.

NICON, a pirate of Phære, in Peloponneſus, &c.—Polyæn.——A native of Tarentum, Vid. Nico.

NICONIA, a town of Pontus.

NICŎPHRON, a comic poet of Athens ſome time after the age of Ariſtophanes.

NICOPŎLIS, a city of Lower Egypt.——A town of Armenia, built by Pompey the Great in memory of a victory which he had there obtained over the forces of Mithridates.——Another, in Thrace, built on the banks of the Neſtus by Trajan, in memory of a victory which he obtained there over the Barbarians.——A town of Epirus, built by Auguſtus after the battle of Actium.—Another, near Jeruſalem, founded by the emperor Veſpaſian.——Another, in Mœſia.——Another, in Dacia, built by Trajan to perpetuate the memory of a celebrated battle.——Another, near the bay of Iſſus, built by Alexander.

NICOSTRĂTUS, a man of Argos of great ſtrength. He was fond of imitating Hercules by cloathing himſelf in a lion's ſkin.——One of Alexander's ſoldiers. He conſpired againſt the king's life.——A dramatic actor of Ionia.——A comic poet of Argos.——An orator of Macedonia, in the reign of the emperor M. Antoninus.——A ſon of Menelaus and Helen.——A general of the Achæans, who defeated the Macedonians.

NICOTELES, a Corinthian drunkard. &c.

NIGER, a friend of M. Antony, ſent to him by Octavia.——A ſirname of Clitus, whom Alexander killed in a fit of drunkenneſs.——A river of Africa, falling into the Atlantic ocean.——C. Peſcennius Juſtus, a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valor in the Roman armies, while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax, he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated ſituation were ſupported by a ſound underſtanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue. He propoſed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M. Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondneſs of ancient diſcipline, and never ſuffered his ſoldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirſt with water and vinegar. He forbad the uſe of ſilver or gold utenſils in his camp, all the bakers and cooks were driven away, and the ſoldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biſcuits. In his puniſhments, Niger was inexorable; he condemned ten of his ſoldiers to be beheaded in the preſence of the army, becauſe they had ſtolen and eaten a fowl. The ſentence was heard with groans: the army interfered: and, when Niger conſented to diminiſh the puniſhment for fear of kindling rebellion, he yet ordered the criminals to make each a reſtoration of ten fowls to the perſon whoſe property they had ſtolen; they were, beſides, ordered not to light a fire the reſt of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments, and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general ſeemed to promiſe the reſtoration of ancient diſcipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger fruſtrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had alſo been inveſted with the imperial purple, marched againſt him; ſome battles were fought, and Niger was, at laſt, defeated, A. D. 194. His head was cut off, and fixed to a long ſpear, and carried in triumph through the ſtreets of Rome. He reigned about one year. Herodian.

P. NIGIDIUS FIGŬLUS, a celebrated philoſopher and aſtrologer at Rome, one of the moſt learned men of his age. He was intimate with Cicero, and gave him his moſt unbiaſſed opinions concerning the conſpirators who had leagued to deſtroy Rome with Catiline. He was made prætor, and honored with a ſeat in the ſenate. In the civil wars he followed the intereſt of Pompey, for which he was baniſhed by the conqueror. He died in the place of his baniſhment, 47 years before Chriſt. Cic. ad ſum. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 639.

NIGRITÆ, a people of Africa, who dwell on the banks of the Niger.

NILEUS, a ſon of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Aſia, where he built Epheſus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenæ, &c. Pauſ. 7, c. 2, &c.——A philoſopher who had in his poſſeſſion all the writings of Ariſtotle.

NILUS, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river which flows through the middle of Egypt and falls into the mediterranean ſea. The Nile anciently called Ægyptus is one of the moſt celebrated rivers in the world. Its ſources were unknown to the antients, and the moderns are equally ignorant of their ſituation, whence an impoſſibility is generally meant by the prove b of Nili caput quærere. It flows through the middle of Egypt in a northern direction, and when it comes to the town of Cercasorum, it then divides itself into several streams, and falls into the Mediterranean by seven mouths. The most eastern canal is called the Pelusian and the most western is called the Canopic mouth. The other canals are the Sebennytican, that of Sais, the Mendesian, Bolbitinic and Bucolic. They have all been formed by nature, except the two last, which have been dug by the labors of men. The island which the Nile forms by its division into several streams is called Delta, from its resemblance to the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. The Nile yearly overflows the country, and it is to those regular inundations that the Egyptians are indebted for the fertile produce of their lands. It begins to rise in the month of May for 100 successive days, and then decreases gradually the same number of days. If it rises no higher than 16 cubits a famine is generally expected, but if it exceeds this by many cubits it is of the most dangerous consequences; houses are overturned, the cattle are drowned, and a great number of insects are produced from the mud which destroy the fruits of the earth. The overflowings of the Nile which remained unknown to the ancients, though searched with the greatest application, are owing to the heavy rains which regularly fall in Æthiopia in the months of April and May, and which rush down like torrents upon the country and lay it all under water. These causes, as some people suppose, were well known to Homer, as he seems to show it by saying that the Nile flowed down from heaven. Strab 17.—Mela. 1, c. 9. l. 3. c. 9.—*Seneca. quæst. His works were edited at Rome, fol. 2 vols. 1668 & 1678.

NINNIUS, a tribune who opposed Clodius the enemy of Cicero.

NINIAS, Vid. Ninyas.

NINUS, a son of Belus who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Assyrian monarchy of which he was the first sovereign, B. C. 2059. He was very warlike, and extended his conquests from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her husband had destroyed himself through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned 52 year, and at his death, he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a son. The history of Ninus is very obscure and even fabulous according to the opinion of some. Ctesias is the principal historian from whom it is derived, but little reliance is to be placed upon him, when Aristotle deems him unworthy to be believed. Ninus, after death received divine honors, and became the Jupiter of the Assyrians and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Ctesias.—Diod. 2.—Justin. 1, c. 1.—Herodot. 2.——A celebrated city, the capital of Assyria built on the banks of the Tigris by Ninus and called Nineveh in Scripture. It was, according to the relation of Diodorus Siculus, fifteen miles long, nine broad, and forty-eight in circumference. It was surrounded by large walls 100 feet high, on the top of which three chariots could pass together a-breast and defended by 1500 towers each 200 feet high. Ninus was taken by the united armies of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar king of Babylon, B. C. 606. Strab. 1.—Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 185, &c.—Paus. 8, c. 33.—Lucian.

NINYAS, a son of Ninus and Semiramis king of Assyria, who succeeded his mother who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. Some suppose that Semiramis was put to death by her own son, because she had encouraged him to commit incest. The reign of Ninyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. The prince left the care of the government to his favorites and ministers, and gave himself up to pleasure, riot, and debauchery, and never appeared in public. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness, and therefore their name is little known till the age of Sardanapalus. Justin. 1. c. 2.—Diod. 1, &c.

NIOBE, a daughter of Tantalus king of Lydia by Euryanassa or Dione. She married Amphion the son of Jasus, by whom she had ten sons and ten daughters according to Hesiod, or two sons and three daughters according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius say, that she had six daughters and as many sons, and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c. according to the more received opinion, support that she had seven sons and seven daughters. The sons were Sipylus, Minyrus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damasichthon, and Ismenus; and those of the daughters Cleodoxa, Ethodæa or Thera, Astyoche, Phthia, Pelopia or Chloris, Astycratea, and Ogygia. The number of her children encreased her pride, and she had the imprudence not only to prefer herself to Latona who had only two children, but she even insulted her, and ridiculed the worship which was paid to her, observing that she had a better claim to altars and sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This insolence provoked Latona. She entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters ex-except Chloris were equally deſtroyed by Diana; and Niobe, ſtruck at the ſuddenneſs of her misfortunes, was changed into a ſtone. The carcaſes of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied in the plains for nine ſucceſſive days, becauſe Jupiter changed into ſtones all ſuch as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honored with a funeral by the gods. Homer. Il. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. fab. 5.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Horat. 4. od. 6.—Propert. 2, el. 6.——A daughter of Phoroneus, king of Peloponneſus, by Laodice. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Argus, who gave his name to Argia or Argolis, a country of Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 2, c. 22.—Apollod. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 8.

NIPHÆUS, a man killed by horſes, &c. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 570.

NIPHĀTES, a mountain of Aſia, which divides Armenia from Aſſyria. The ſources of the Tigris were in its neighbourhood. Virg. G. 3, v. 30.—Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 15.——A river of Armenia, falling into the Tigris. Horat. 2, od. 9.—Lucan. 3, v. 245.

NIPHE, one of Diana's companions. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 245.

NIREUS, a king of Naxos, ſon of Charops and Aglaia, celebrated for his beauty. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—Horat. 2, od. 20.

NISA, a town of Greece. Homer. Il. 2.——A country woman. Virg. Ecl. 8.——A place. Vid. Nyſa.——A celebrated plain of Media, near the Caſpian ſea, famous for its horſes.

NISÆA, a naval ſtation on the coaſts of Megaris. Strab. 9.

NISEIA, Vid. Niſus.

NISÆE, a ſea nymph. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 826.

NISIBIS, a town of Meſopotamia built by a colony of Macedonians on the Tigris, and celebrated as being a barrier between the provinces of Rome and the Perſian empire during the reign of the Roman emperors. It was ſometimes called Antiochia Mygdonica. Joſeph. 20, c. 2.—Strab. 11.—Amian. 25, &c.

NISUS, a ſon of Hyrtacus, born on mount Ida near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and ſignalized himſelf by his valor againſt the Rutulians. He was joined in the cloſeſt friendſhip with Euryalus, a young Trojan, and with him he entered in the dead of night the enemy's camp. As they were returning victorious, after much bloodſhed, they were perceived by the Rutulians; who attacked Euryalus. Niſus in endeavoring to reſcue his friend from the enemy's darts, periſhed himſelf with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a ſpear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans, and their great friendſhip, like that of a Pylades and an Oreſtes, or of a Theſeus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 176, &c.——A king of Dulichium, remarkable for his probity and virtue. Homer. Od. 18.——A king of Megara, ſon of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hoſtilities of Minos, who wiſhed to avenge the death of his ſon Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was beſieged, and Attica laid waſte. The fate of Niſus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued on his head, according to the words of an oracle, promiſed him life and ſucceſs to his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Niſcia Virgo.) ſaw from the walls of Megara the royal beſieger, and ſhe became deſperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her paſſion, ſhe ſtole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was aſleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos diſregarded the ſervices of Scylla, and ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Niſus aſſumed the nature of the hawk, at the very moment that he gave himſelf death not to fall into the enemy's hands. Theſe two birds have continually been at variance with each other, and Scylla, by her apprehenſions at the ſight of her father, ſeems to ſuffer the puniſhment which her perfidy deſerved. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 6, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 404, &c.

NISYROS, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, at the weſt of Rhodes with a town of the ſame name. It was originally joined to the iſland of Cos, according to Pliny, and it bore the name of Porphyris. Neptune, who was ſuppoſed to have ſeparated them with a blow of his trident, was worſhipped there, and called Niſyreus. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Strab. 10.

NITĒTIS, a daughter of Apries, king of Egypt, &c. Polyæn. 8.

NITOCRIS, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge acroſs the Euphrates, in the middle of that city, and dug a number of reſervoirs for the ſuperfluous waters of that river. She ordered herſelf to be buried over one of the gates of the city and placed an inſcription on her tomb, which ſignified that her ſucceſſors would find great treaſures within, if ever they were in need of money, but that their labors would be but ill repaid if ever they ventured to open it without neceſſity. Cyrus opened it through curioſity, and was ſtruck to find within theſe words, If thy avarice had not been inſatiable thou thou never wouldst have violated the monuments of the dead. Herodot. 1, c. 185.—A queen of Egypt who built a third pyramid.

NITRIA, a country of Egypt with two towns of the same name, above Memphis.

NOAS, a river of Thrace falling into the Ister. Herodot. 4, c. 49.

NOCMON, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

NOCTILUCA, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome, on mount Palatine. Varro de L. L. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 6.

NOLA, an antient town of Campania, which became a Roman colony before the first Punic war. It was founded by a Tuscan, or according to others by an Eubœan colony. It is said that Virgil had introduced the name of Nola in his Georgics, but that when he was refused a glass of water by the inhabitants as he passed through the city, he totally blotted it out of his poem, and substituted the word era, in the 225th line of the 2d book of his Georgics. Nola was besieged by Annibal, and bravely defended by Marcellus. Augustus died there on his return from Neapolis to Rome. Bells were first invented there in the beginning of the fifth century, from which reason they have been called Nolæ or Campanæ, in Latin. Patere. 2, c. 7.—Suet. in Aug.—Sil. 12. v. 161.—A. Gellius, 7, c. 20.

NOMENTĀNUS, an epithet applied to L. Cassius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as a mixture of luxury and dissipation. Horat. 1. Sat. 1, v. 102, & alibi.

NOMĀDES, a name given to all those uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their residence, to go in quest of fresh pasture, for the numerous cattle which they tended. There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. Those of Africa were afterwards called Numidians, by a small change of the letters which composed their name. Herodot. 1, c. 15. l. 4, c. 187.—Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 343.—Paus. 8. c. 43.

NOMÆ, a town of Sicily.

NOMENTUM, a town of the Sabines in Italy. The dictator Q. Servilius Priscus, gave the Veientes and Fidenates battle there A. U. C. 312, and totally defeated them. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 905.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.

NOMII, mountains of Arcadia.

NOMIUS, a surname given to Apollo, because he fed the flocks of king Admetus in Thessaly. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

NONĀCRIS, a town of Arcadia, which received its name from a wife of Lycaon. There was a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood. Evander is sometimes called Nonacrius heros, as being an Arcadian by birth, and Atalanta Nonacria, as being a native of the place. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 93. Met. 8, fab. 10.—Paus. 8, c. 17, &c.

NONIUS, a Roman soldier imprisoned for paying respect to Galba's statues, &c. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 36.

NONNIUS MARCELLUS, a grammarian whose treatise de varia significatione verborum was edited by Mercer. 8vo. Paris 1614.

NOPIA or CNOPIA, a town of Bœotia, where Amphiaraus had a temple.

NORA, a place of Asia, where Eumenes retired for some time, &c.

NORAX, a son of Mercury and Eurythea, who led a colony of Iberians into Sardinia. Paus. 10, c. 17.

NORBA, a town of the Volsci. Liv. 2, c. 34.

C. NORBĀNUS, a young and ambitious Roman who opposed Sylla, and joined his interest to that of young Marius. In his consulship he marched against Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.——A friend and general of Augustus employed in Macedonia against the republicans. He was defeated by Brutus, &c.

NORICUM, a country of ancient Illyricum which now forms a part of modern Bavaria and Austria. It extended between the Danube, and part of the Alps and Vindelicia. Its savage inhabitants who were once governed by kings made many incursions upon the Romans, and were at last conquered under Tiberius, and the country became a dependent province. In the reign of Diocletian Noricum was divided into two parts, Ripense and Mediterranean. The iron that was drawn for Noricum was esteemed excellent, and thence Noricus ensis to express the goodness of a sword. Dionys. Perieg.—Strab. 4.—Plin. 34, c. 14.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 16, v. 9.

NORTHIPPUS, a Greek tragic poet.

NORTIA, a name given to the goddess of Fortune among the Etrurians. Liv. 7, c. 3.

NOTHUS, a son of Deucalion.——A surname of Darius, king of Persia, from his illegitimacy.

NONUS, a Greek physician whose book de omnium morborum curationis was edited in 12mo. Argent, 1568.

NOTIUM, a town of Æolia near the Caystet. It was peopled by the inhabitants of Colophon, who left their antient habitations because Notium was more conveniently situated in being on the sea shore.

NOTUS, the south wind, called also Auster.

NOVĀTUS, a man who severely attacked the character of Augustus, under a fictitious name. The emperor discovered him and only fined him a small sum of money.

NOVIODŪNUM, a town of the Ædui in Gaul, taken by J. Cæsar. It is pleasantly situated on the Ligeris, and now called Noyon. Cæs. bell. G. 2, c. 12.

Novius Priscus, a man banished from Rome by Nero, on suspicion that he was accessary to Piso's conspiracy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 71.——A man who attempted to assassinate the emperor Claudius.——Two brothers obscurely born, distinguished in the age of Horace for their officiousness. Horat. 1, Sat. 6.

Nonnus, a Greek writer of the 5th century known by his Dionysiaca a wonderful collection of heathen mythology and erudition, edited 4to. Antwerp, 1569. His paraphrase on John was edited by Heinsius 8vo. L. Bat. 1627.

Nox, one of the most antient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus, she gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was also the mother of the Parcæ, Hesperides, Dreams, of Discord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by some of the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore she was worshipped with great solemnity by the antients. She had a famous statue in Diana's temple at Ephesus. It was usual to offer her a black sheep, as she was the mother of the furies. The cock was also offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day, during the darkness of the night. She is represented as mounted on a chariot and covered with a veil bespangled with stars. The constellations generally went before her as her constant messengers. Sometimes she is seen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, representing death or rather night, and the other white representing sleep, or day. Some of the moderns have described her as a woman veiled in mourning, and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 950.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 455.—Paus. 10, c. 38.—Hesiod. Theog.

Nuceria, a town of Campania taken by Annibal. It became a Roman colony under Augustus. Lucan. 2, v. 472.—Liv. 27, c. 3.——A town of Umbria.

Nuithones, a people of Germany.

Numa Marcius, a man made governor of Rome by Tullus Hostilius.

Numa Pompilius, a celebrated philosopher of Cures. He married Tatia the daughter of Tatius the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country to devote himself more freely to literary pursuits. At the death of Romulus, the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two senators were sent to acquaint him with the decisions of the senate and of the people. Numa refused their offers, and it was not but at the repeated solicitations and prayers of his friends, that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he dismissed the 300 body guards which his predecessor had kept around his person, observing that he did not distrust a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He was not, like Romulus, fond of war, and military expeditions, but he applied himself to tame the ferocity of his subjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the deity, and to quell their dissensions, by dividing all the citizens into different classes. He established different orders of priests, and taught the Romans not to worship the deity by images, and from his example no graven or painted statues appeared in the temples or sanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 160 years. He encouraged the report which was spread of his paying regular visits to the nymph Egeria, and made use of her name to give sanction to the laws and institutions which he had introduced. He established the college of the vestals and told the Romans that the safety of the empire depended upon the preservation of the sacred ancyle or shield which, as was generally believed, had dropped down from heaven. He dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign, remained shut as a mark of peace and tranquility at Rome. Numa died after a reign of 43 years, in which he had given every possible encouragement to the useful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B. C. 672. Not only the Romans, but also the neighbouring nations were eager to pay their last offices to a monarch whom they revered for his abilities, moderation, and humanity. He forbad his body to be burnt according to the custom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written. These books were accidentally found by one of the Romans about 400 years after his death, and as they contained nothing new or interesting, but merely the reasons why he had made innovations in the form of worship and in the religion of the Romans, they were burnt by order of the senate. He left behind one daughter called Pompilia, who married Numa Marcius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius the fourth king of Rome. Some say that he had also four sons, but this opinion is ill founded. Plut. in vitâ.—Varro.—Liv. 1.—Plin. 13 & 14. &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6 & 9.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 2, & 17.—Val. Max. 1, c. 2. Dionys. Hal. 2, c. 59.—Ovid. Fast. 3, &c.—One of the Rutulian chiefs killed in the night by Nisus and Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 454.

Numana, a town of Picenum in Italy. Mela. 2, c. 4.

Numantia, a town of Spain near the sources of the river Durius, celebrated for the long war which it maintained against the Romans. The inhabitants obtained some advantages over the Roman forces till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finish the war, and to see the destruction of Numantia. He began the siege with an army of 60,000 men, and was bravely oppoſed by the beſieged who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms. Both armies behaved with uncommon valor, and the courage of the Numantines was ſoon changed into deſpair and fury. Their proviſions began to fail, and they fed upon the fleſh of their horſes, and afterwards of that of their dead companions, and at laſt were neceſſitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy ſituation of their affairs obliged ſome to ſurrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themſelves up on the morrow; they refuſed, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and ſet fire to their houſes, and all deſtroyed themſelves, B. C. 133, ſo that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some hiſtorians however deny that, and ſupport that a number of Numantines delivered themſelves into Scipio's hands, and that 50 of them were drawn in triumph at Rome and the reſt ſold as ſlaves. The fall of Numantia was more glorious than that of Carthage or Corinth, though inferior to them. The conqueror obtained the ſirname of Numanticus. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Appian. Iber.—Paterc. 2, c. 3.—Cic. 1. off.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Plut.

NUMANTĪNA, a woman accuſed under Tiberius of making her huſband inſane by enchantments, &c. Tacit. 4, c. 22.

NUMĀNUS REMŬLUS, a Rutulian who accuſed the Trojans of effeminacy. He had married the younger ſiſter of Turnus and was killed by Aſcanius during the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 592, &c.

NUMĒNES, a follower of the doctrines of Plato and Pythagoras, born at Apamea in Syria. He flouriſhed in the reign of M. Antoninus.

NUMENIA, or NEOMENIA, a feſtival obſerved by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honor of all the gods, but eſpecially of Apollo, or the ſun, who is juſtly deemed the author of light, and of whatever diſtinction is made in the months, ſeaſons, days and nights. It was obſerved with games and public entertainments which were provided at the expence of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor. Solemn prayers were offered at Athens during the ſolemnity for the proſperity of the republic. The demigods as well as the heroes of the antients were honored and invoked in the feſtival.

NUMENIUS, a philoſopher who ſuppoſed that Chaos from which the world was created was animated by an evil and maleficent ſoul. He lived in the ſecond century.

NUMENTĀNA VIA, a road at Rome which led to mount Sacer through the gate Viminalis. Liv. 3, c. 52.

NUMERIĀNUS, M. Aurelius, a ſon of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father into the eaſt with the title of Cæſar, and at his death he ſucceeded him with his brother Carinus, B. C. 282. His reign was ſhort. Eight months after his father's death, he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law Arrius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. The murderer who hoped to aſcend the vacant throne, continued to follow the litter as if the emperor was alive, till he found a proper opportunity to declare his ſentiments. The ſtench of his body ſoon diſcovered his perfidy, and he was ſacrificed to the fury of the ſoldiers. Numerianus has been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally an eloquent ſpeaker, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.——A friend of the emperor Severus.

NUMERIUS, a man who favored the eſcape of Marius to Africa, &c.——A friend of Pompey taken by J. Cæſar's adherents, &c. Plin.

NUMICIA VIA, one of the great Roman roads which led from the capital to the town of Brundiſium.

NŪMICUS, a ſmall river of Latium near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found, and where Anna, Dido's ſiſter, drowned herſelf. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 150, &c. Sil. 1, v. 359.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 358, &c. Faſt. 3, v. 643.——A friend of Horace to whom he addreſſed 1 ep. 6.

NUMĪDA, a ſirname given by Horace 1 od. 36. to one of the generals of Auguſtus, from his conqueſts in Numidia. Some ſuppoſe that it is Pomponius, others, Plotius.

NŪMĪDIA, an inland country of Africa, which now forms the kingdom of Algiers and Biledulgerid. It was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean ſea, ſouth by Gætulia, weſt by Mauritania, and eaſt by a part of Libya, which was called Africa Propria. The inhabitants were called Nomades, and afterwards Numidæ. It was the kingdom of Maſiniſſa, who was the occaſion of the third Punic war, on account of the offence he had received from the Carthaginians. Jugurtha reigned there, as alſo Juba the father and ſon. It was conquered, and became a Roman province, of which Salluſt was the firſt governor. The Numidians were excellent warriors, and in their expeditions they always endeavoured to engage with the enemy in the night time. They rode without ſaddles or bridles, whence they have been called infreni. They had their wives in common as the reſt of the barbarian nations of antiquity. Salluſt. in Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Strab. 2 & 17.—Mela. 1, c. 4, &c.—Ovid Met. 15, v. 754.

NUMIDIUS, a governor of Syria under Claudius. Tacit. Ann. 12.

NŪMĪTOR, a ſon of Procas, king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, and began to reign conjointly with him. Amulius was too avaritious to bear a colleague on the throne: he expelled his brother, and that he might more safely secure himself, he put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated the daughter Ilia to the service of the goddess Vesta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. These great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant, and though the two children whom she brought forth were exposed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preserved, and Numitor was restored to his throne by his grandsons, and the tyrannical usurper was put to death. Dionys. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 3.—Plut. in Romul.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 55, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.——A son of Phorcus who fought with Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 342.—A rich and dissolute Roman in the age of Juvenal 7, v. 74.

NUMITORIUS, a Roman who defended Virginia, to whom Appius wished to offer violence. He was made military tribune.

NUMONIUS. Vid. Vala.

NUNCOREUS, a son of Sesostris king of Egypt, who made an obelisk, some ages after brought to Rome. Plin. 36, c. 11.——He is called Pheron by Herodotus.

NUNDINA, a goddess whom the Romans invoked when they named their children. This happened the ninth day of their birth, whence the name of the goddess, Nona dies.

NUNDINÆ, Vid. Feriæ.

NURSÆ, a town of Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 744.

NURSCIA, a goddess who patronized the Etrurians. Juv. 10, v. 74.

NURSIA, a town of Picenum whose inhabitants are called Nursini. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.—Martial. 13, ep. 20.

NUTRIA, a town of Illyricum. Polyb. 2.

NYCTEIS, a daughter of Nycteus, who was mother of Labdacus.—A patronymic of Antiope the daughter of Nycteus, mother of Amphion and Zethus by Jupiter, who had assumed the shape of a satyr to enjoy her company. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 110.

NYCTELIUS, a surname of Bacchus, Paus. 1, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

NYCTEUS, a son of Hyrieus and Clonia.——A son of Chthonius.——A son of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas, king of Lesbos, or of Thebes according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete called Polyxo or Amalthæa, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope. The first of these disgraced herself by her criminal amours, with her father, into whose bed she introduced herself by means of her nurse. When the father knew the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, who was immediately changed by Minerva into an owl. Nycteus made war against Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he intreated to continue the war, and punish Antiope for her immodest conduct. Vid. Antiope. Paus. 2, c. 6.—Hygin. fab. 157 & 204.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 590, &c. l. 6, v. 110, &c.

NYCTIMENE, a daughter of Nycteus. Vid. Nycteus.

NYCTIMUS, a son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia. He died without issue, and left his kingdom to his nephew Arcas, the son of Callisto. Paus. 8, c. 4.

NYMPHÆUM, a lake of Peloponnesus in Laconia. Id. 3, v. 23.

NYMPHÆ, certain female deities among the ancients. They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods and were called Dryades and Hamadryades, others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades, some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napææ, &c. Of the sea nymphs some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also rivers, fountains, streams and lakes. The nymphs fixed their residence not only in the sea, but also on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns, and their grottoes were beautified by evergreens and delightful and romantic scenes. The nymphs were immortal according to the opinion of some mythologists, others supposed that, like men, they were subject to mortality, tho' their life was of long duration. They lived for several thousand years according to Hesiod, or as Plutarch seems obscurely to intimate, they lived about 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known. There were above 3000, according to Hesiod, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were worshipped by the ancients, tho' not with so much solemnity as the superior deities. They had no temples raised to their honor, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and sometimes the sacrifice of a goat. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle and sometimes held a vase, from which they seemed to pour water. Sometimes they had grass, leaves, and shells instead of vases. It was deemed unfortunate to see them naked and such sight was generally attended by an immediate delirium, to which Propertius seems to allude in this verse, wherein he speaks of the innocence and simplicity of the primitive ages of the world, Nec fuerat nudas pœna videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally distinguished by an epithet which denoted the place of their residence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides; those of Corycus, Corycides, &c. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320. l. 5, v. 412. l. 9, 651, &c. Fast. 3, v. 769.—Paus. 10, c. 3.

—Plut. de Orac. def.—Orpheus Arg.—Hesiod. Theog.—Horace, 3, c. 12.—Homer. Od. 14.

NYMPHÆUM, a port of Macedonia. Cæs. bel. civ.——A promontory of Epirus on the Ionian sea.——A place near the walls of Apollonia, sacred to the nymphs, where Apollo had also an oracle. The place was also celebrated for the eruptions of fire which seemed to rise at a distance from the plains. It was there that a sleeping satyr was once caught and brought to Sylla as he returned from the Mithridatic war. This monster had the same features as the poets ascribe to the satyr. He was interrogated by Sylla, and by his interpreters, but his articulations were unintelligible, and the Roman spurned from him a creature which seemed to partake of the nature of a beast, more than that of a man. Plut. in Sylla—Dio. 41.—Plin. 5.—Strab. 7.——A city of Taurica Chersonesus.—The building at Rome where the nymphs were worshipped bore also this name, being adorned with the statues and with fountains and water falls which afforded an agreeable and refreshing coolness.

NYMPHÆUS, a man who went into Caria at the head of a colony, &c. Polyæn. 8.

NYMPHIDIUS, a favorite of Nero, who said that he was descended from Caligula. He was raised to the consular dignity, and soon after disputed the empire with Galba. He was slain by the soldiers, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15.

NYMPHIS, a native of Heraclea, who wrote an history of Alexander's life and actions, divided into 24 books. Ælian. 7, de Anim.

NYMPHODORUS, a writer of Amphipolis.—A Syracusan who wrote an history of Sicily.

NYMPHOLEPTES, or Nymphomanes, possessed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inspired by the nymphs Plut. in Arist.

NYMPHON, a native of Colophon, &c.

NYPSIUS, a general of Dionysius the tyrant who took Syracuse, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Diod. 16.

NYSA or NYSSA, a town of Æthiopia, at the south of Egypt, or according to others, of Arabia. This city, with another of the same name in India, was sacred to the god Bacchus, who was educated there by the nymphs of the place, and who received the name of Dionysius, which seems to be compounded of Διος & Νυσα, the name of his father, and that of the place of his education. The god made this place the seat of his empire and the capital of the conquered nations of the east. Diod. 3 & 4.—Mela. 3, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 13, &c.—Ital. 7, v. 198.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 805.—According to some geographers there were no less than ten places of the name of Nysa. One of these was on the coast of Eubœa, famous for its vines, which grew in such an uncommon manner that if a twig was planted in the ground in the morning, it immediately produced grapes, which were full ripe in the evening.—A city of Thrace.——Another seated on the top of mount Parnassus, and sacred to Bacchus. Juv. 7, v. 63.

NYSÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, because he was worshipped at Nysa.——A son of Dionysius of Syracuse. C. Nep. in Dion.

NYSAS, a river of Africa, rising in Æthiopia.

NYSIÆ PORTÆ, a small island of Africa.

NYSIÄDES, a name given to the nymphs of Nysa, to whose care Jupiter intrusted the education of his son Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 314, &c.

NYSIROS, an island. Vid. Nisyros.

NYSSA, a sister of Mithridates the Great. Plut.

OARUS, a river of Sarmatia, falling into the Palus Mœotis. Herodot. 4.

OARSES, the original name of Artaxerxes Memnon.

OASIS, a town about the middle of Libya, at the distance of seven days journey from Thebes in Egypt. There were two other cities of that name very little known. Herodot. 3, c. 26.

OAXES, a river of Crete which received its name from Oaxus the son of Apollo. Virg. Ecl. 1, v. 66.

OAXUS, a town of Crete, where Etearchus reigned, who founded Cyrene.——A son of Apollo and the nymph Anchiale.

OBULTRONIUS, a quæstor put to death by Galba's orders, &c. Tacit.

OCALEA or OCALIA, a town of Bœotia. Homer. Il. 2.——A daughter of Mantineus, who married Abas, son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, by whom she had Acrisius and Prœtus. Apollod. 2, c. 2.

O A

OCELIA, a woman who presided over the sacred rites of Vesta for 57 years with the greatest sanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius, and the daughter of Domitius succeeded her. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 86

OCEANIDES & OCEANITIDES, sea nymphs daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddess Tethys. They were 3000 according to Apollodorus, who mentions the names of seven of them; Asia, Styx, Electra, Doris, Eurynome, Amphitrite and Metis. Hesiod speaks of the eldest of them and reckons 41, Pitho, Admete, Prymno, Ianthe, Rhodia, Hippo, Callirhoe, Urania Clymene, Idyia, Pasithoe, Clythia, Zeuxo, Galuxaure, Plexaure, Perseis, Pluto, Thoe, Polydora, Melobosis, Dione, Cerceis, Xanthe, Acasta, Ianira, Telestho, Europa, Menestho, Petrea, Eudora, Calypso, Tyche, Ocyroe, Crisia, Amphiro, with those mentioned by Apollodorus, except Amphitrite. Hyginus places mentioned to whose names are almost all different from those of Apollodorus and Hesiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oceanides and the rest of the inferior deities were honored with libations and sacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were entreated to protect sailors from storms and dangerous tempests. The Argonauts before they proceeded to their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the sea shore, to all the deities of the sea, and sacrificed bulls to them, and entreated their protection. When the sacrifice was made on the sea shore the blood of the victim was received in a vessel; but when it was in open sea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the sea was calm the sailors generally offered a lamb or a young pig, but if it was agitated by the winds and rough, a black bull was deemed the most acceptable victim. Homer. Od. 3.—Horat.—Apollon. Arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 341.—Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1.

Oceanus, a powerful deity of the sea, son of Cœlus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the most principal rivers such as the Alpheus, Peneus, Strymon, &c. with a number of daughters who are called from him Oceanides. [Vid. Oceanides.] According to Homer, Oceanus was the father of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent visits from the rest of the deities. He is generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea. He often holds a pike in his hand, while ships under sail appear at a distance, or a sea monster stands near him. Oceanus presided over every part of the sea, and even the rivers were subjected to his power. The ancients were superstitious in their worship to Oceanus, and revered with great solemnity a deity to whose care they entrusted themselves when going on any voyage. Hesiod. Theog.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 81, &c.—Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.—Homer. Il.

Ocellus, an ancient philosopher of Lucania. Vid. Lucanus.

Oclum, a town of Gaul. Cæs. bell. G. 1, c. 10.

Ocha, a mountain of Eubœa, and the name of Eubœa itself.—A sister of Ochus buried alive by his orders.

Ochesius, a general of Ætolia.

Ochus, a surname given to Artaxerxes the 3d king of Persia. Vid. Artaxerxes.——A man of Cyzicus, who was killed by the Argonauts. Flacc. 3.——A prince of Persia, who refused to visit his native country for fear of giving all the women each a piece of gold. Plut.——A river of India, or of Bactriana.—Plin. 6 & 31.——A king of Persia He exchanged this name for that of Darius. Vid. Darius Nothus.

Ocnus, a son of the Tiber and of Manto, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. He built a town which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some suppose that he is the same as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 9.—Æn. 10, v. 198.——A man remarkable for his industry. He had a wife as remarkable for her profusion. She always consumed and squandered away whatever the labors of her husband had earned. He is represented as twisting a cord, which an ass standing by eats up as soon as he makes it, whence the proverb of the cord of Ocnus, often applied to labor which meets no return, and which is totally lost. Propert. 4, el. 3, v. 21.—Plin. 35, c. 11.—Pers. 10, c. 20.

Ocridion, a king of Rhodes who was reckoned in the number of the gods after death. Plut. in Græc. quæst.

Ocrisia, the wife of Corniculus, was one of the attendants of Tanaquil the wife of Tarquinius Priscus. As she was throwing into the flames, as offerings, some of the meats that were served on the table of Tarquin, she suddenly saw in the fire what Ovid calls obscæni formæ virilis. She informed the queen of it, and when by her orders she had approached near it, she conceived a son who was called Servius Tullius, and who being educated in the king's family, afterwards succeeded to the vacant throne. Some suppose that Vulcan had assumed that form which was presented to the eyes of Ocrisia, and that the god was the father of the sixth king of Rome. Plut. de fort. Rom.—Plin. 36, c. 27.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 627.

Octacilius, a slave who was manumitted, and who afterwards taught rhetoric at Rome. He had Pompey the Great in the number of his pupils. Sueton. in Rhet.—Martial. 10, ep. 79

Octavia, a Roman lady sister to the emperor Augustus and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political step to reconcile her brother and her husband. Antony proved for some time attentive to her, but he soon after despised her for Cleopatra, and when she attempted to withdraw him from this unlawful amour by going to meet him at Athens, she was secretly rebuked and totally banished from his presence. This affront was highly resented by Augustus, and though Octavia endeavoured to pacify him by palliating her husband's behaviour, he resolved to revenge her cause by arms. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries she had received, took into her house all the children of her husband and treated them with uncommon tenderness. Marcellus her son by her first husband was married to a niece of Augustus, and publicly intended as a successor to his uncle. His sudden death plunged all his family into the greateſt grief. Virgil, whom Auguſtus patroniſed, undertook upon himſelf to pay a melancholy tribute to the memory of a young man whom Rome regarded as her future father and patron. He was deſired to repeat his compoſition in the preſence of Auguſtus and of his ſiſter. Octavia burſt into tears as ſoon as the poet began, but when he mentioned Tu Marcellus eris, ſhe ſwooned away. This tender and pathetic encomium upon the merit and the virtues of young Marcellus was liberally rewarded by Octavia, and Virgil received 10,000 ſeſterces for every one of the verſes. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The elder married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom ſhe had Cn. Domitius the father of the emperor Nero by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. Antonia Minor, who was as virtuous and as beautiful as her mother, married Druſus the ſon of Tiberius, by whom ſhe had Germanicus, and Claudius who reigned before Nero. The death of Marcellus continually preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy about 10 years before the Chriſtian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory by pronouncing himſelf, her funeral oration. The Roman people alſo ſhowed their reſpect for her virtues by their wiſh to pay her divine honors. Sueton. in Aug.—Plut. in Anton. &c.——A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Meſſalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, ſhe was married to the emperor Nero in the 16th year of her age. She was ſoon after divorced on pretence of barrenneſs, and the emperor married Poppæa, who exerciſed her enmity upon Octavia by cauſing her to be baniſhed into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the inſtance of the people, and Poppæa, who was reſolved on her ruin, cauſed her again to be baniſhed to an iſland, where ſhe was ordered to kill herſelf by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa. Suet. in Claud. 27. in Ner. 7 & 35. Tacit. Ann. 12.

Octāviānus, or Octāvius Cæsar, the nephew of Cæſar the dictator. After the battle of Actium and the final deſtruction of the Roman republic the ſervile ſenate beſtowed upon him the title and ſirname of Auguſtus, as expreſſive of his greatneſs and dignity. Vid. Auguſtus.

Octāvius, a Roman officer who brought Perſeus, king of Macedonia, a priſoner to the conſul. He was ſent by his countrymen to be guardian to Ptolemy Eupator, the young king of Egypt, where he behaved with the greateſt arrogance. He was aſſaſſinated by Lyſias, who was before regent of Egypt. The murderer was ſent to Rome.——A man who oppoſed Metellus in the reduction of Crete, by means of Pompey. He was obliged to retire from the iſland.——A man who baniſhed Cinna from Rome and became remarkable for his probity and fondneſs of diſcipline. He was ſeized and put to death by order of his ſucceſsful rivals Marius and Cinna.——A Roman who boaſted of being in the number of Cæſar's murderers. His aſſertions were falſe, yet he was puniſhed as if he had been acceſſary to the conſpiracy.——A lieutenant of Craſſus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Craſſus.——A governor of Cilicia. He died in his province, and Lucullus made applications to ſucceed him, &c. ——A tribune of the people of Rome, whom Tib. Gracchus his colleague depoſed.——A commander of the forces of Antony againſt Auguſtus.——An officer who killed himſelf &c.——A tribune of the people, who debauched a woman of Pontus from her huſband. She proved unfaithful to him, upon which he murdered her. He was condemned under Nero. Tacit. Ann. & Hiſt.—Plut. in vitis.—Flor.—Liv. &c.——A poet in the Auguſtan age intimate with Horace. He alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an hiſtorian. Horat. 1. Sat. 10, v. 82.

Octolophum, a place of Greece. Liv. 31.

Ocȳălus, one of the Phæacians.

Ocȳpĕte, one of the Harpies, who infected whatever ſhe touched. The name ſignifies ſwift flying. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1. c. 9.——A daughter of Thaumas.——A daughter of Danaus.

Ocȳroe, a daughter of Chiron, who had the gift of prophecy. She was changed into a mare. Vid. Melanippe. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 638, &c ——A woman carried away by Apollo, as ſhe was going to a feſtival at Miletus.

Odenātus, a celebrated prince of Palmyra. He early inured himſelf to bear fatigues, and by hunting leopards and wild beaſts, he accuſtomed himſelf to the labors of a military life. He was faithful to the Romans, and when Aurelian had been taken priſoner by Sapor, king of Perſia, Odenatus warmly intereſted himſelf in his cauſe, and ſolicited his releaſe by writing a letter to the conqueror and ſending him preſents. The king of Perſia was offended at the liberty of Odenatus, he tore the letter, and ordered the preſents which were offered to be thrown into a river. To puniſh Odenatus, who had the impudence, as he obſerved, to pay homage to ſo great a monarch as himſelf, he ordered him to appear before him, on pain of being devoted to inſtant deſtruction with all his family, if he dared to refuſe. Odenatus diſdained the ſummons of Sapor, and oppoſed force to force. He obtained ſome advantages over the troops of the Perſian monarch, and took his wife priſoner with a great and rich rich booty. These services were seen with gratitude by the Romans, and Gallienus, the then reigning emperor named Odenatus as his colleague on the throne, and gave the title of Augustus to his children, and to his wife the celebrated Zenobia. Odenatus, invested with new power, resolved to signalize himself more conspicuously by conquering the northen barbarians, but his exultation was short, and he perished by the dagger of one of his relations, whom he had slightly offended in a domestic entertainment. He died at Emesse, about the 267th year of the Christian era. Zenobia succeeded to all his titles and honors.

Odessus, a river with a mountain of the same name, near the Euxine sea, in Asia minor. Ovid. 1. Trist. 9, v. 37.

Odinus, a celebrated hero of antiquity, who flourished about 70 years before the Christian æra in the northern parts of antient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a priest, a soldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He imposed upon the credulity of his superstitious countrymen and made them believe that he could raise the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and encreased his fame by conquest, and by persuasion, he resolved to die in a different manner from other men. He assembled his friends and with the sharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he should become one of the immortal gods. He further added, that he would prepare bliss and felicity for such of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. These injunctions had the desired effect, his countrymen superstitiously believed him, and always recommended themselves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the souls of such as had fallen in war.

Odites, a son of Ixion killed by Mopsus, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 457.——A prince killed at the nuptials of Andromache. Id. ib. 5, v. 97.

Odoacer, a king of the Heruli who destroyed the western empire of some, and called himself king of Italy. A. D. 476.

Odomanti, a people of Thrace. Liv. 45, c. 4.

Odones, a people of Thrace.

Odrysæ, an antient people of Thrace between Abdera and the river Ister. The epithet of Odrysius is often applied to a Thracian. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 554.

Odyssea, one of Homer's epic poems, in which he describes in 24 books the adventures of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than 55 days. It is not so esteemed as the Iliad of that poet. Vid. Homerus.

Œagrus & Œager, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, has received the appellation of Œagrius, tho' Servius, in his commentaries, disputes the explanation of Diodorus, by asserting that the Oeagrius is a river of Thrace whose waters supply the streams of the Hebrus. Ovid. in Ib. 484.—Apollon. 1, arg. Virg. G. 4, v. 524.—Ital. 5, v. 463.—Diod.

Œanthe, & Œanthia, a town of Achaia, where Venus had a temple. Paus. 10, c. 38.

Œax, a son of Nauplius and Clymene. He was brother to Palamedes. Higin. fab. 117.

Œbălia, the antient name of Laconia, which it received from king Œbalus. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.——A country of Italy, in whose territories Tarentum was built by a colony of Laconians. Virg. G. 4, v. 125.—Sil. 12, v. 451.

Œbălus, a son of Argalus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone the daughter of Perseus, by whom he had Hippocoon, Tyndarus, &c. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.——A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis, who reigned in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Œbăres, a satrap of Cyrus.—Polyæn. 7.——A groom of Darius son of Hystaspes. He was the cause that his master obtained the kingdom of Persia, by his artifice in making his horse neigh first. Vid. Darius 1st. Herodot. 3, c. 85.—Justin. 1, c. 10.

Œchălia, a country of Peloponnesus in Laconia, with a small town of the same name. This town was destroyed by Hercules, while Eurytus was king over it, from which circumstance it is often called Eurytopolis.——A small town of Eubœa. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 291. Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 9, v. 136.

Œclides, a patronymic of Amphiaraus son of Œcleus. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 7.

Œcleus, Vid. Oicleus.

Œcumenius, wrote in the middle of the 10th century a paraphrase of some of the books of the New Testament in Greek, edited in 2 vols. fol. Paris 1631.

Œdipŏdia, a fountain of Thebes in Bœotia.

Œdipus, a son of Laius, king of Thebes and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, Œdipus was born to be exposed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius the father of Œdipus was informed by the oracle, as soon as he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the calamity of the people, he resolved never to approach Jocasta, but his solemn resolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication. The queen became pregnant, and Laius, still intent to stop the evil, ordered his wife to destroy her child as soon as he came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet she gave the child as soon as born, to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him in the mountains. The servant was moved with pity, but to obey the command of Jocasta, he bored the feet of the child and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus, king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home, and Peribœa the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child, with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the swelling of his feet (οιδεω tumeo, πους pedes,) soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address, and one of them to mortify his rising ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts, he asked Peribœa, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill-founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth, where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey, met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his armbearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his armbearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality, and of the rank of the men, whom he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphynx. This terrible monster, whom Juno had sent to lay waste the country, (Vid. Sphynx,) resorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain without success the enigmas, which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the Sphynx, Creon, who, at the death of Laius, had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him, who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this; What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monster and said that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster was mortified at the true explanation, and dashed his head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismena and Antigone. Some years after, the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease, only when the murderer of king Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact enquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming, when Œdipus considered, that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonos, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus, king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this he walked, himself, without the assistance of a guide, to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had not children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus, in the age of Pausanias. Some of the antient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to some, the four children which he had were by Eurigania, the daughter of Periphas, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniss. &c.—*Sophocl. Œax, a daughter of Danaus.

Œnarètes, a favorite of young Proteus king of Egypt.

Œne, a small town of Argolis. The people are called Œneadæ.

Œnea, a river of Assyria. Ammian.

Œneus, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthaon or Porthaeus, and Eurytè. He married Althæa the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althæa's death, he married Peribœa the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general sacrifice, which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddess to revenge this unpardonable neglect incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and besides she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydonia. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chace, known by the name of the chace of the Calydonian boar. Sometime after, Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius. Diomedes, however, his grandson, soon restored him to his throne; but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed, rendered him melancholy. He exiled himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Œnea. It is reported that Œneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that he suffered the god to enjoy the favors of Althæa, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron, should be called among the Greeks by the name of Œneus (οἶνος) Hygin. fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—*Homer. Œnoe, a nymph who married Sicinus, the son of Thoas king of Lemnos. From her the island of Sicinus has been called Œnoe.——Two villages of Attica, were also called Œnoe.——A city of Argolis.——A town of Elis in the Peloponnesus. Strab. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 1. &c.

Œnomaus, a son of Mars by Sterope the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia by Evarete, daughter of Acrisius, or Eurythoa, the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law, therefore as he could skilfully drive a chariot, he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could out run him, on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their life if conquered. Many had already perished, when Pelops son of Tantalus, proposed himself. He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, by promising him the enjoyment of the favors of Hippodamia, if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian isthmus, and Œnomaus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, Œnomaus entrusted Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Those that had been defeated when Pelops entered the lists, were Marmax, Alcathous, Eurylus, Eurymachus, Capetus, Lasius, Acrias, Chalcodon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Aristomachus, Æolius, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 5, c. 17. l. 6, c. 21, &c.—*Apollon. Œnon, apart of Locris on the bay of Corinth.

Œnona, an antient name of the island Ægina. It is also called Œnopia.——Two villages of Attica, are also called Œnona, or rather Œnoe.

Œnone, a nymph of mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenus in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priam, that his voyage into Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled, and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Œnone, in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as he came into her presence, and Œnone was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that she bathed it with her tears, and stabbed herself to the heart. Dictys. Cret.—*Ovid. de Rem. Œnopia, one of the antient names of the island Ægina. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 473.

Œnopides, a mathematician of Chios.

Œnopion, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Œnopion received the island of Chios from Rhadamanthus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Ægean sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias.

Œnŏtræ, the inhabitants of Œnotria.

Œnŏtria, a part of Italy which was afterwards called Lucania. It received this name from Œnotrus the ſon of Lycaon, who ſettled there with a colony of Arcadians. The Œnotrians afterwards ſpread themſelves into Umbria and as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabines according to ſome writers. The name of Œnotria is ſometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where Œnotrus ſettled was before inhabited by the Auſones. Dionyſ. Hal. 1. c. 11.—Pauſ. 1. c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 536, l. 7, v. 85.—Ital. 8, v. 220.

Œnŏtrus, a ſon of Lycaon of Arcadia. He paſſed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of Œnotria to that part of the country where he ſettled. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 85.

Œnūsæ, ſmall iſlands near Chios.——Others on the coaſt of the Peloponneſus, near Meſſenia. Mela, 2, c. 17.

Œonus, a ſon of Licymnius, killed at Sparta where he accompanied Hercules.

Œroe, an iſland of Bœotia, formed by the Aſopus.

Œta, a celebrated mountain between Theſſaly and Macedonia, upon which Hercules burnt himſelf. Its height has given occaſion to the poets to feign that the ſun, moon, and ſtars roſe behind it. Mount Œta, properly ſpeaking, is a long chain of mountains which runs from the ſtreights of Thermopylæ and the gulf of Malia in a weſtern direction to mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. The ſtreights or paſſes of mount Œta, are called the ſtreights of Thermopylæ from the hot baths and mineral waters which are in the neighbourhood. Theſe paſſes are not more than 25 feet in breadth. Apollod. 2, c. 7. Pauſ. 10, c. 20, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 2, v. 216. l. 9, v. 204, &c.—*Virg. Œtylus or Œtylum, a town of Laconia, which received its name from Œtylus, one of the heroes of Argos. Serapis had a temple there. Pauſ. 3, c. 25.

Opellius, a man whom, though unpoliſhed, Horace repreſents as a character exemplary for wiſdom, œconomy, and moderation. Horat. 2, Sat. 2, v. 2.

Opi, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 28.

Ogdoliăpis, a navigable river flowing from the Alps.

Ogdōus, a king of Egypt.

Ogmius, a name of Hercules among the Gauls.

Ogoa, a deity of Caria, under whoſe temple, as was ſuppoſed, the ſea paſſed.

Ogulnia lex, by Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 453. It encreaſed the number of pontifices and auguis from four to nine. The addition was made to both orders from plebeian families.——A Roman lady as poor as ſhe was laſcivious. Juv. 6, v. 351.

Ogўges, a celebrated monarch, the moſt antient of thoſe that reigned in Greece. He was ſon of Terra, or, as ſome ſuppoſe, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Bœotia, which, from him, is ſometimes called Ogygia, and his power was alſo extended over Attica. It is ſuppoſed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are ſo obſcure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygian is often applied to every thing of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge, which ſo inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waſte for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is ſuppoſed to have happened about 1764 years before the chriſtian era, previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to ſome writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was alſo marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her color, diameter, figure, and her courſe. *Varro de R. Olympeum, a place in Delos.——Another in Syracuse.

Olympia (ōrum) celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius, to whom they were dedicated. They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B. C. 1453. Some attribute the institution to Pelops, after he had obtained a victory over Œnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the most received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honor of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augias, B. C. 1222. Strabo objects to this opinion, by observing, that if they had been established in the age of Homer, the poet would have undoubtedly spoken of them, as he is in every particular careful to mention the amusements and diversions of the antient Greeks. But they were neglected after their first institution by Hercules, and no notice was taken of them according to many writers, till Iphitus in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity. This re-institution, which happened B. C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiads. [Vid. Olympias.] They, however, were neglected for some time after the age of Iphitus, till Coræbus, who obtained a victory B. C. 776, re-instituted them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendance of the games were intrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans B. C. 361, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment; they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103d olympiad, the number was encreased to twelve, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following olympiad, they were reduced to eight, and afterwards encreased to ten, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. The presidents were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked, and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity, called αλυται, much the same as the Roman lictors; of whom the chief was called αλυταρχης. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to trespass this law, was immediately thrown down from a rock. This however was sometimes neglected, for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were were great. No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself ten months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. No unfair dealings were allowed, and whoever attempted to bribe his adversary, was subjected to a severe fine. No criminals, nor such as were connected with impious and guilty persons, were suffered to present themselves as combatants; and even the father and relations were obliged to swear that they would have recourse to no artifice which might decide the victory in favor of their friends. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. Some little balls superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver urn, and such as drew the same letter were obliged to contend one with the other. He who had an odd letter remained the last, and he often had the advantage, as he was to encounter the last who had obtained the superiority over his adversary. In these games were exhibited running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, which was called altogether πεντάθλον, or quinquertium. Besides these, there were horse and chariot races, and also contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained, was a crown of olive; which, as some suppose, was in memory of the labors of Hercules, which were accomplished for the universal good of mankind, and for which the hero claimed no other reward but the consciousness of having been the friend of humanity. So small and trifling a reward stimulated courage and virtue, and was more the source of great honors than the most unbounded treasures. The statues of the conquerors, called Olympionicæ, were erected at Olympia in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; they were drawn in a chariot by four horses, and every where received with the greatest acclamations. Their entrance into their native city was not through the gates, but to make it more grand and more solemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names; and indeed the victories severally obtained at Olympia are the subjects of the most beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a scarf was originally tied round their waist, but when it had entangled one of the adversaries, and been the cause that he lost the victory, it was laid aside, and no regard was paid to decency. The olympic games were observed every fifth year, or to speak with greater exactness, after a revolution of four years, and in the first month of the fifth year, and they continued for five successive days. As they were the most antient and the most solemn of all the festivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew so many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries. *Plut. Olympias, a certain space of time which elapsed between the celebration of the olympic games. The olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence some have said that they were observed every fifth year. This period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The custom of reckoning time by the celebration of the olympic games was not introduced at the first institution of these festivals, but to speak accurately, only the year in which Corœbus obtained the prize. This olympiad, which has always been reckoned the first, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of some of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the christian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon, next after the summer solstice; therefore the olympiads were of unequal length, because the time of the full moon differs 11 days every year, and for that reason they sometimes began the next day after the solstice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by olympiads ceased, as some suppose, after the 364th, in the year 440 of the Christian era. It was universally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though still the Pythian games served as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Bœotians, the Nemæan games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Isthmian to the Corinthians, and the inhabitants of the Peloponnesian isthmus. To the olympiads history is much indebted. They have served to fix the time of many momentous events, and indeed before this method of computing time was observed, every page of history is mostly fabulous, and filled with obscurity and contradiction, and no true chronological account can be properly established and maintained with certainty. The mode of computation, which was used after the suppression of the olympiads and of the consular fasti of Rome, was more useful as it was more universal; but while the era of the creation of the world prevailed in the east, the western nations in the 6th century began to adopt with more propriety the christian epoch, which was propagated in the 8th century, and at last, in the 10th, became legal and popular.——A celebrated woman who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip, king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness, and, more probably, her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra, the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was sensible of this injury, and Alexander showed his disapprobation of his father's measures by retiring from the court to his mother. The murder of Philip, which soon followed this disgrace, and which some have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greatest extravagancies. The queen paid the greatest honor to her husband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his ashes near those of Philip. The administration of Alexander, who had succeeded his father, was, in some instance, offensive to Olympias, but, when the ambition of her son was concerned, she did not scruple to declare publicly, that Alexander was not the son of Philip, but that he was the offspring of an enormous serpent who had supernaturally introduced himself into her bed. When Alexander was dead, Olympias seized the government of Macedonia, and, to establish her usurpation, she cruelly put to death Aridæus, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, with 100 leading men of Macedon, who were inimical to her interest. Such barbarities did not long remain unpunished; Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired with the remains of her family, and she was obliged to surrender after an obstinate siege. The conqueror ordered her to be accused and to be put to death. A body of 200 soldiers were ordered to put the bloody commands into execution, but the splendor and majesty of the queen disarmed their courage, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the Christian era. Justin. 7, c. 6, l. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Paus.——A fountain of Arcadia, which flowed for one year and the next was dry. Paus. 8, c. 29.

Olympiodorus, a musician, who taught Epaminondas music. *C. Omphale, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jardanus. She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wished to see so illustrious luſtrious a hero. Her wiſh was ſoon gratified. After the murder of Eurytus, Hercules fell ſick, and was ordered to be ſold as a ſlave, that he might recover his health and the right uſe of his ſenſes. Mercury was commiſſioned to ſell him, and Omphale bought him, and reſtored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his miſtreſs, and the queen favored his paſſion, and had a ſon by him, whom ſome call Agelaus, and others Lamon. From this ſon were deſcended Gyges and Crœſus; but this opinion is different from the account which makes theſe Lydian monarchs ſpring from Alcæus, a ſon of Hercules, by one of the female ſervants of Omphale. Hercules is repreſented by the poets as ſo deſperately enamoured of the queen that, to conciliate her eſteem, he ſpins by her ſide among her women, while ſhe covers herſelf with the lion's ſkin, and arms herſelf with the club of the hero, and often ſtrikes him with her ſandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the diſtaff, &c. Their fondneſs was mutual. As they once travelled together, they came to a grotto on mount Tmolus, where the queen dreſſed herſelf in the habit of her lover, and obliged him to appear in a female garment. After they had ſupped, they both retired to reſt in different rooms, as a ſacrifice on the morrow to Bacchus required. In the night, Faunus, or rather, Pan, who was enamoured of Omphale, introduced himſelf into the cave. He went to the bed of the queen, but the lion's ſkin perſuaded him that it was the dreſs of Hercules, and therefore he repaired to the bed of Hercules, in hopes to find there the object of his affections. The female dreſs of Hercules deceived him, and he laid himſelf down by his ſide. The hero was awaked, and kicked the intruder into the middle of the cave. The noiſe awoke Omphale, and Faunus was diſcovered lying on the ground, greatly diſappointed and aſhamed. *Ovid. Onesicritus, a cynic philoſopher of Ægina, who went with Alexander into Aſia, and was ſent to the Indian Gymnoſophiſts. He wrote an hiſtory of the king's life, which has been cenſured for the romantic, exaggerated, and improbable, narrative it gives. It is aſſerted, that Alexander, upon reading it, ſaid, that he ſhould be glad to come to life again for ſome time, to ſee what reception the hiſtorian's work met with. Plut. in Alex. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Onium, a place of Peloponneſus, near Corinth.

Onoba, a town near the columns of Hercules. Mela. 3, c. 1.

Onochonus, a river of Theſſaly, falling into the Peneus. It was dried up by the army of Xerxes. Herodot. 7, c. 196.

Onomacritus, a ſoothſayer of Athens. It is generally believed, that the Greek poem, on the Argonautic expedition, attributed to Orpheus, was written by Onomacritus. The elegant poems of Muſæus are alſo, by ſome, ſuppoſed to be the production of his pen. He floriſhed about 516 years before the Chriſtian era, and was expelled from Athens by Hipparchus, one of the ſons of Piſiſtratus. Herodot. 7, c. 6.——A Locrian, who wrote concerning laws, &c. Ariſtot. 2. Polit.

Onomarchus, a Phocian general, diſtinguiſhed during the ſacred war. He died 353 B. C.——A man to whoſe care Antigonus entruſted the keeping of Eumenes. C. Nep. in Eum.

Onomastorides, a Lacedæmonian ambaſſador ſent to Darius, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

Onomastus, a freedman of the emperor Otho. Pluth.

Onophas, one of the ſeven Perſians who conſpired againſt the uſurper Smerdis. Cteſias. An officer in the expedition of Xerxes againſt Greece.

Onosander, a Greek writer, whoſe book De Imperatoris Inſtitutione has been edited by Schwebel. with a French tranſlation, fol. Norimb. 1752.

Onythes, a friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 514.

Opalia, feſtivals celebrated by the Romans, in honor of Ops, on the 14th of the calends of January.

Ophelas, a general of Cyrene, defeated by Agathocles.

OPHELTES, a ſon of Lycurgus, king of Thrace. He is the ſame as Archemorus. Vid. Archemorus.——The father of Euryalus, whoſe friendſhip with Niſus is proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 201. One of the companions of Acœtes, changed into a dolphin by Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, fab. 8.

OPHENSIS, a town of Africa. Tacit. Hiſt. 4, c. 50.

OPHIA, a patronymic given to Combe, as daughter of Ophius, an unknown perſon.

OPHIONEUS was an ancient ſoothſayer in the age of Ariſtodemus. He was born blind.

OPHIUSA, the ancient name of Rhodes.——A ſmall iſland near Crete.——A town of Sarmatia.

OPICI, the ancient inhabitants of Campania. Juv. 3, v. 207.

OPIS, a nymph who was among Diana's attendants. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 532 & 867.——A town near the mouth of Tigris.——One of Cyrene's attendants. Virg. G. 4, v. 343.

OPILIUS, a grammarian, who floriſhed about 94 years before Chriſt. He wrote a book called Libri Muſarum.

OPITER, a Roman conſul, &c.

OPIMIUS, a Roman who made himſelf conſul in oppoſition to the intereſt and efforts of the Gracchi. He ſhewed himſelf a moſt inveterate enemy to C. Gracchus and his adherents, and behaved, during his conſulſhip, like a dictator. He was accuſed of bribery, and baniſhed. He died of want at Dyrrachium. Cic. pro Sext. Planc. & in Piſ.—Plut.——A Roman, who killed one of the Cimbri in ſingle combat.——A rich uſurer at Rome in the age of Horace, 2 Sat. 3, v. 142.

OPITERGINI, a people near Aquileia, on the Adriatic. Their chief city is called Opitergum. Lucan. 4, v. 416.

OPITES, a native of Argos, killed by Hector in the Trojan war. Homer. Il.

OPPIA, a veſtal virgin, buried alive for her incontinence.

OPPIA LEX, by C. Oppius, the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman ſhould wear above half an ounce of gold, have party-colored garments, or be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's diſtance, unleſs it was to celebrate ſome ſacred feſtivals or ſolemnities. This celebrated law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in diſtreſſed circumſtances, created diſcontent, and, 18 years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the aſſembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato oppoſed it ſtrongly, and made many ſatirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to ſolicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had preſented their petition to the aſſembly, anſwered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had ſuch an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was inſtantly abrogated with the unanimous conſent of all the comitia, Cato alone excepted. Liv. 33 & 34. Cic. de Orat. 3.

OPPIANUS, a Greek poet of Cilicia in the ſecond century. His father's name was Ageſilaus, and his mother's Zenodota. He wrote ſome poems, celebrated for their elegance and ſublimity. Two of his poems are now extant, five books on fiſhing, called alieuticon, and four on hunting, called cynegeticon. The emperor Caracalla was ſo pleaſed with his poetry that he gave him a piece of gold for every verſe of his cynegeticon; from which circumſtance the poem received the name of the golden verſes of Oppian. The poet died of the plague in the 30th year of his age. His countrymen engraved on his tomb, that the gods had haſtened to call back Oppian in the flower of youth, only becauſe he had already excelled all mankind. The beſt edition of his works is that of Schneider, 8vo. Argent. 1776.

OPPIDIUS, a rich old man introduced by Horace, 2 Sat. 3, v. 168, as wiſely dividing his poſſeſſions among his two ſons, and warning them againſt thoſe follies and that extravagance which he believed he ſaw riſing in them.

C. OPPIUS, a friend of Julius Cæſar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus and of Pompey the Great. In the latter, he paid not much regard to hiſtorical facts, and took every opportunity to defame Pompey, to extol the character of his patron Cæſar. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spaniſh wars, which ſome attribute to Cæſar, and others to A. Hirtius.——An officer ſent by the Romans againſt Mithridates. He met with ill ſucceſs, and was ſent in chains to the king, &c.——A Roman, who ſaved his aged father from the dagger of the triumvirate.

OPS, (opis) a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, the ſame as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Thya, Tellus, Proſerpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worſhip which was paid to theſe apparently ſeveral deities was offered merely to one and the ſame perſon, mother of the gods. The word Ops ſeems to be derived from Opus, becauſe the goddeſs, who is the ſame as the earth, gives nothing without labor. Tatius built her a temple at Rome. She was generally repreſented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering aſſiſtance to the helpleſs, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her feſtivals were called Opalia, &c. Varr. de L. L. 4. Dionyſ. Hal. 2. &c.—Tibull. el. 4, v. 68.

OPUS, (opuntis) a city of Locris, on the Aſopus, Aſopus, deſtroyed by an earthquake. Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

ORTATUS, one of the fathers, whoſe works were edited by Du Pin, fol. Paris, 1700.

ORTHUS Maximus, epithets given to Jupiter to denote his greatneſs and omnipotence.

ORA, a town of India, taken by Alexander.

——One of Jupiter's miſtreſſes.

ORACULUM, an anſwer of the gods to the queſtions of men, or the place where thoſe anſwers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were ſuppoſed to be the will of the gods themſelves, and they were conſulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. To make peace or war, to introduce a change of government, to plant a colony, to enact laws, to raiſe an edifice, to marry, were ſufficient reaſons to conſult the will of the gods. Mankind, in conſulting them, ſhewed that they wiſhed to pay implicit obedience to the command of the divinity, and, when they had been favored with an anſwer, they acted with more ſpirit and with more vigor, conſcious that the undertaking had met with the ſanction and approbation of heaven. In this, therefore, it will not appear wonderful, that ſo many places were ſacred to oracular purpoſes. The ſmall province of Bœotia could once boaſt of her 25 oracles, and Peloponneſus of the ſame number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in proceſs of time, heroes were admitted to enjoy the ſame privileges, and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antinous were ſoon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The moſt celebrated oracles of antiquity were thoſe of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon, &c. [Vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon.] The temple of Delphi ſeemed to claim a ſuperiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were ſo great, that not only private perſons, but even kings and numerous armies, made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. A prieſteſs at Delphi [Vid. Pythia] was permitted to pronounce the oracles of the god, and her delivery of the anſwers was always attended with acts of apparent madneſs and deſperate fury. Not only women, but even doves, were the miniſters of the temple of Dodona, and the ſuppliant votary was often ſtartled to hear his queſtions readily anſwered by the decayed trunk, or the ſpreading branches of a neighbouring oak. Ammon conveyed his anſwer in a plain and open manner, but Amphiaraus required many ablutions and preparatory ceremonies, and he generally communicated his oracles to his ſuppliants in dreams and viſions. Sometimes the firſt words that were heard, after iſſuing from the temple, were deemed the anſwers of the oracles, and ſometimes the nodding or ſhaking of the head of the ſtatue, the motions of fiſhes in a neighbouring lake, or their reluctance in accepting the food which was offered to them, were as ſtrong and valid as the moſt expreſs and the minuteſt explanations. The anſwers were alſo ſometimes given in verſe, or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obſcure, and often the cauſe of diſaſter to ſuch as conſulted them. Cræſus, when he conſulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that, if he croſſed the Halys, he muſt deſtroy a great empire: he ſuppoſed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Credo te, Æacida, Romanos vincere poſſe, which Pyrrhus received when he wiſhed to aſſiſt the Tarentines againſt the Romans, by a favorable interpretation for himſelf, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered, by the oracle of Delphi, to beware of 73 years, but the pleaſing idea that he ſhould live to that age rendered him careleſs, and he was ſoon convinced of his miſtake, when Galba, in his 73d year, had the preſumption to dethrone him. It is a queſtion among the learned, whether the oracles were given by the inſpiration of evil ſpirits, or whether they proceeded from the impoſture of the prieſts. Impoſture, however, and forgery, cannot long floriſh, and falſehood becomes its own deſtroyer; and, on the contrary, it is well known how much confidence an enlightened age, therefore much more the credulous and the ſuperſtitious, places upon dreams and romantic ſtories. Some have ſtrongly believed, that all the oracles of the earth ceaſed at the birth of Chriſt, but the ſuppoſition is falſe. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline, but they remained in repute, and were conſulted, though, perhaps, not ſo frequently, till the fourth century, when chriſtianity began to triumph over paganiſm. The oracles often ſuffered themſelves to be bribed. Alexander did it, but it is well known that Lyſander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who firſt mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt, has been ſeverely treated for his remarks by the hiſtorian Plutarch. Demoſthenes is alſo a witneſs of the corruption, and he obſerved, that the oracles of Greece were ſervilely ſubſervient to the will and pleaſure of Philip, king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expreſſes it by the word φιλιππίζειν. If ſome of the Greeks, and other European and Aſiatic countries, paid ſo much attention to oracles, and were ſo fully perſuaded of their veracity, and even divinity, many of their leading men and of their philoſophers were apprized of the deceit, and paid no regard to the command of prieſts whom money could corrupt, and interpoſition ſilence. The Egyptians ſhewed themſelves the moſt ſuperſtitious of of mankind, by their blind acquiescence to the imposition of their priests, who persuaded them that the safety and happiness of their life depended upon the mere motions of an ox, or the tameness of a crocodile. *Homer. ORÆA, a small country of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 30.——Certain solemn sacrifices of fruits offered in the four seasons of the year, to obtain mild and temperate weather. They were offered to the goddesses who presided over the seasons, who attended upon the sun, and who received divine worship at Athens.

ORASUS, a man who killed Ptolemy, the son of Pyrrhus.

ORBELUS, a mountain of Thrace or Macedonia.

ORBILIUS PUPILLUS, a grammarian of Beneventum, who was the first instructor of the poet Horace. He came to Rome in the consulship of Cicero, and there, as a public teacher, acquired more fame than money. He was naturally of a severe disposition, of which his pupils often felt the effects. He lived almost to his 100th year, and lost his memory some time before his death. Suet. de Illust. Gr. 9.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 71.

ORBONA, a mischievous goddess at Rome, who, as it was supposed, made children die. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 25.

ORCADES, islands on the northern coasts of Britain. They were unknown till Britain was discovered to be an island by Agricola, who presided there as governor. Tacit. in Agric.—Juv. 2, c. 161.

ORCHALUS, an eminence of Bœotia, near Haliartus, called also Alopecos. Plut. in Lys.

ORCHAMUS, a king of Assyria, father of Leucothoe, by Eurynome. He buried his daughter alive for her amours with Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 212.

ORCHIA LEX, by Orchius, the tribune, A. U. C. 566. It was enacted to limit the number of guests that were to be admitted at an entertainment; and it also enforced, that, during supper, which was the chief meal among the Romans, the doors of every house should be left open.

ORCHOMENUS or ORCHOMENUM, a town of Bœotia, at the west of the lake Copais. It was anciently called Minyeia, and, from that circumstance, the inhabitants were often called Minyans of Orchomenos. There was at Orchomenos a celebrated temple sacred to the Graces. The inhabitants founded Teos in conjunction with the Ionians, under the sons of Codrus. Plin. 4, c. 8.—Herodot. 1, c. 146.—Paus. 9, c. 37.—Strab. 9.——A town of Arcadia, at the north of Mantinea. Homer. Il. 2.——A town of Thessaly, with a river of the same name. Strab.——A son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, who gave his name to a city of Arcadia, &c. Paus. 8.——A son of Minyas, king of Bœotia, who gave the name of Orchomenians to his subjects. He died without issue, and the crown devolved to Clymenus, the son of Presbon, &c. Paus. 9, c. 36.

ORCUS, one of the names of the god of hell, the same as Pluto, though confounded by some with Charon. He had a temple at Rome. The word Orcus, is generally used to signify the infernal regions. Horat. 1, od. 28, &c. —Virg. Æn. 4, v. 502, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 116, &c.

ORCYNIA, a place of Cappadocia, where Eumenes was defeated by Antigonus.

ORDESSUS, a river of Scythia, which falls into the Ister.

ORESIADES, nymphs of the mountains, daughters of Phoroneus and Hecate. Some call them Oreatides, and give them Jupiter for father. They generally attended upon Diana, and accompanied her in hunting. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 504.—Homer. Il. 6.—Strab. 10. Ovid. Met. 8, v 787.

ORESAS, a son of Hercules and Chryseis.

ORESTÆ, a people of Epirus. They received their name from Orestes, who fled to Epirus when cured of his insanity. Lucan. 5, v. 249.

ORESTES, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, young Orestes was saved from his mother's dagger by means of his sister Electra, called Laodice by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, who was king of Phocis, and who had married a sister of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who carefully educated him with his son Pylades. The two young princes soon became acquainted, and, from their familiarity, arose the most inviolable attachment and friendship. When Orestes was arrived to years of manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra and her adulterer Ægisthus. The manner in which he committed this murder is variously reported. According to Æschylus, he was commissioned by Apollo to avenge his father, and, therefore, he introduced himself, with his friend Pylades, at the court of Mycenæ, pretending to bring the news of the death of Orestes from king Strophius. He was at first received with coldness, and, when he came into the presence of Ægisthus, who wished to inform himself of the particulars, he murdered him, and soon Clytemnestra shared the adulterer's fate. Euripides and Sophocles mention the same circumstances. Ægisthus was assassinated after Clytemnestra, according to Sophocles; and, in Euripides, Orestes is represented as murdering the adulterer, while he he offers a ſacrifice to the nymphs. This murder, as the poet mentions, irritates the guards, who were preſent, but Oreſtes appeaſes their fury by telling them who he is, and immediately he is acknowledged king of the country. Afterwards, he ſtabs his mother, at the inſtigation of his ſiſter Electra, after he has upbraided her for her infidelity and cruelty to her huſband. Such meditated murders receive the puniſhment which, among the ancients, was always ſuppoſed to attend parricide. Oreſtes is tormented by the Furies, and exiles himſelf to Argos, where he is ſtill purſued by the avengeful goddeſſes. Apollo, himſelf, purifies him, and he is acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites, whom Minerva, herſelf, inſtituted on this occaſion, according to the narration of the poet Æſchylus, who flatters the Athenians in his tragical ſtory, by repreſenting them as paſſing judgment, even upon the gods themſelves. According to Pauſanias, Oreſtes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Trœzene, where ſtill was ſeen a large ſtone at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was alſo, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Oreſtes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of inſanity. Theſe different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who ſays, that Oreſtes, after the murder of his mother, conſulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the perſecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece Diana's ſtatue, which was in the Taurica Cherſoneſus, and which, as it is reported by ſome, had fallen down from heaven. This was an arduous enterprize. The king of the Cherſoneſus always ſacrificed on the altars of the goddeſs all ſuch as entered the borders of his country. Oreſtes and his friend were both carried before Thoas, the king of the place, and they were doomed to be ſacrificed. Iphigenia was then prieſteſs of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate theſe ſtrangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn ſomething about a country which had given her birth. [Vid. Iphigenia.] She even intereſted herſelf in their misfortunes, and offered to ſpare the life of one of them, provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendſhip more truly diſplayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex Pont. 3, el. 2.

Ire jubet Pylades earum moriturus Oreſtem,
Hic negat; inque vicem pugnat uterque mori.

At laſt Pylades gave way to the preſſing entreaties of his friend, and conſented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. Theſe were addreſſed to Oreſtes himſelf, and, therefore, theſe circumſtances ſoon led to a total diſcovery of the connections of the prieſteſs with the man whom ſhe was going to immolate. Iphigenia was convinced that he was her brother Oreſtes, and, when the cauſes of their journey had been explained, ſhe reſolved, with the two friends, to fly from Cherſoneſus, and to carry away the ſtatue of Diana. Their flight was diſcovered, and Thoas prepared to purſue them, but Minerva interfered, and told him, that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. Some ſuppoſe, that Oreſtes came to Cappadocia from Cherſoneſus, and that there he left the ſtatue of Diana at Comana. Others contradict this tradition, and, according to Pauſanias, the ſtatue of Diana Orthia was the ſame as that which had been carried away from the Cherſoneſus. Some alſo ſuppoſe, that Oreſtes brought it to Aricia, in Italy, where Diana's worſhip was eſtabliſhed. After theſe celebrated adventures, Oreſtes aſcended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect ſecurity, and married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his ſiſter to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Oreſtes with Hermione is a matter of diſpute among the ancients. All are agreed that ſhe had been promiſed to the ſon of Agamemnon, but Menelaus had married her to Neoptolemus, the ſon of Achilles, who had ſhown himſelf ſo truly intereſted in his cauſe during the Trojan war. The marriage of Hermione with Neoptolemus diſpleaſed Oreſtes; he remembered that ſhe had been early promiſed to him, and therefore he reſolved to recover her by force or artifice. This he effected by cauſing Neoptolemus to be aſſaſſinated, or aſſaſſinating him himſelf. According to Ovid's epiſtle of Hermione to Oreſtes, Hermione had always been faithful to her firſt lover, and even it was by her perſuaſions that Oreſtes removed her from the houſe of Neoptolemus. Hermione was diſſatisfied with the partiality of Neoptolemus for Andromache, and her attachment for Oreſtes was encreaſed. Euripides, however, and others, ſpeak differently of Hermione's attachment to Neoptolemus: ſhe loved him ſo tenderly that ſhe reſolved to murder Andromache, who ſeemed to ſhare, in a ſmall degree, the affections of her huſband. She was ready to perpetrate the horrid deed when Oreſtes came into Epirus, and ſhe was eaſily perſuaded by the foreign prince to withdraw herſelf, in her huſband's abſence, from a country which ſeemed to contribute ſo much to her ſorrows. Oreſtes, the better to ſecure the affections of Hermione, aſſaſſinated Neoptolemus, [Vid. Neoptolemus,] and retired to his kingdom of Argos. His old age was crowned with peace and ſecurity, and he died in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne leone to his ſon Tiſamenes, by Hermione. Three years after, the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponneſus, and baniſhed the deſcendants of Menelaus from the throne of Argos. Oreſtes died in Arcadia, as ſome ſuppoſe, by the bite of a ſerpent; and the Lacedæmonians, who had become his ſubjects at the death of Menelaus, were directed by an oracle to bring his bones to Sparta. They were, ſome time after, diſcovered at Tegea, and his ſtature appeared to be ſeven cubits, according to the traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others. The friendſhip of Oreſtes and of Pylades became proverbial, and the two friends received divine honors among the Scythians, and were worſhipped in temples. Pauſ. 1, 2, 4, &c.—Patere. 1, c. 1 & 3.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Strab. 9 & 13.—*Ovid. He was highly honored at the Roman court, and his ſon Auguſtulus was the laſt emperor of the weſtern empire.——A governor of Egypt under the Roman emperors.

Oreſtēum, a town of Arcadia, about 18 miles from Sparta. It was founded by Oreſtheus, a ſon of Lycaon, and originally called Oreſthaſium, and afterwards Oreſteum, from Oreſtes, the ſon of Agamemnon, who came there. Pauſ. 8, c. 8.——Euripid.

Oreſtĭdæ, the deſcendants or ſubjects of Oreſtes, the ſon of Agamemnon. They were driven from the Peloponneſus by the Heraclidæ, and came to ſettle in a country which, from them, was called Oreſtida, at the ſouth weſt of Macedonia. Some ſuppoſe that that part of Greece originally received its name from Oreſtes, who fled and built there a city, which gave its founder's name to the whole province. Thucyd. 2.—Liv. 31.

Oretæ, a people of Aſiatic Sarmatia, on the Euxine Sea.

Oretāni, a people of Spain.

Oretilia, a woman who married Caligula, by whom ſhe was ſoon after baniſhed.

Orĕum, one of the principal towns of Eubœa.

Orga or Orgas, a river of Phrygia, falling into the Mæander.

Orgessum, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 27.

Orgetorix, one of the chief men of the Helvetii, while Cæſar was in Gaul.

Orgia, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus. They are the ſame as the Bacchanalia, Dionyſia, &c. which were celebrated by the ancients to commemorate the triumph of Bacchus in India. Vid. Dionyſia.

Oribăsus, a celebrated phyſician, greatly eſteemed by the emperor Julian, in whoſe reign he floriſhed. He abridged the works of Galenus, and of all the moſt reſpectable writers on phyſic, at the requeſt of the emperor. He accompanied Julian into the eaſt, but his ſkill proved ineffectual in attempting to cure the fatal wound, which his benefactor had received. After Julian's death, he fell into the hands of the Barbarians. The beſt edition of his works is that of Dundas, 4to. L. Bat. 1745.

Oricum or Oricus, a maritime town of Macedonia, founded by a colony from Colchis, according to Pliny. It had a celebrated harbour, and was greatly eſteemed by the Romans on account of its ſituation, but it was not well defended. The tree which produces the turpentine grew there in abundance. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 136. Liv. 24, c. 40.—Plin. 2, c. 89.—Cæſ. bell. Civ. 3, c. 1, &c.

Oriens, in ancient geography, is taken for all the moſt eaſtern parts of the world, ſuch as Parthia, India, Aſſyria, &c.

Origen, a Greek writer, as much celebrated for the eaſineſs of his manner, his humility, and modeſty, as for his learning and the ſublimity of his genius. He was ſirnamed Adamantus, from his aſſiduity, and became ſo rigid a Chriſtian that he made himſelf an eunuch, by following the literal ſenſe of a paſſage in the Greek teſtament, which ſpeaks of the voluntary eunuchs of Chriſt. He ſuffered martyrdom in his 69th year, A. C. 254. His works were excellent and numerous, and contained a number of homilies, commentaries on the holy ſcriptures, and different treatiſes, beſides the Hexapla, ſo called from its being divided into ſix columns, the firſt of which contained the Hebrew text, the ſecond the ſame text in Greek characters, the third the Greek verſion of the Septuagint, the fourth that of Aquila, the fifth that of Symmachus, and the ſixth Theodotion's Greek verſion. This famous work firſt gave the hint for the compilation of our Polyglot Bibles. The works of Origen have been learnedly edited by the Benedictine monks, though the whole is not yet completed, in four vols. fol. Paris, 1733, 1740, and 1759. The Hexapla was publiſhed in 8vo. at Lipſ. 1769, by Car. Frid. Bahrdt.

Orĭgo, a courtezan in the age of Horace. Horat. 1, Sat. 2, v. 55.

Orinus, a river of Sicily.

Oriobătes, a general of Darius at the battle of Arbela, &c. Curt. 4.

Orion, a celebrated giant, ſprung from the urine of Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury. Theſe three gods, as they travelled over Bœotia, met with great hoſpitality from Hyrieus, a peaſant of the country, who was ignorant of their dignity and character. They were entertained with whatever the cottage afforded, and, when Hyrieus had diſcovered that they were gods, becauſe Neptune told him to fill up Jupiter's cup with wine, after he had ſerved it before the reſt, the old man welcomed them by the voluntary ſacrifice of an ox. Pleaſed with his piety, the gods promiſed to grant him whatever he required, and the old man, who had lately loſt his wife, to whom he had promiſed never to marry again, deſired them that, as he was childleſs, they would give him a ſon without another marriage. The gods conſented, and they ordered him to bury in the ground the ſkin of the victim, into which they had all three made water. Hyrieus did as they commanded, and, when nine months after, he dug for the ſkin, he found in it a beautiful child, whom he called Urion, ab urinâ. The name was changed into Orion by the corruption of one letter, as Ovid ſays, Perdidit antiquum littera prima ſonum. Orion ſoon rendered himſelf celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants, and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic ſtature, however, diſpleaſed Œnopion, king of Chios, whoſe daughter Hero or Merope he demanded in marriage. The king, not to deny him openly, promiſed to make him his ſon-in-law as ſoon as he delivered his iſland from wild beaſts. This taſk, which Œnopion deemed impracticable, was ſoon performed by Orion, who eagerly demanded his reward. Œnopion, on pretence of complying, intoxicated his illuſtrious gueſt, and put out his eyes on the ſea ſhore, where he had laid himſelf down to ſleep. Orion, finding himſelf blind when he awoke, was conducted by the ſound to a neighbouring forge, where he placed one of the workmen on his back, and, by his directions, went to a place where the riſing ſun was ſeen with the greateſt advantage. Here he turned his face towards the luminary, and, as it is reported, he immediately recovered his eye-ſight, and haſtened to puniſh the perfidious cruelty of Œnopion. It is ſaid, that Orion was an excellent workman in iron, and that he fabricated a ſubterraneous palace for Vulcan. Aurora, whom Venus had inſpired with love, carried him away into the iſland of Delos, to enjoy his company with greater ſecurity; but Diana, who was jealous of this, deſtroyed Orion with her arrows. Some ſay, that Orion had provoked Diana's reſentment by offering violence to Opis, one of her female attendants, or, according to others, becauſe he had attempted the virtue of the goddeſs herſelf. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a ſcorpion, which the earth produced, to puniſh his vanity in boaſting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. Some ſay that Orion was ſon of Neptune and Euryale, and that he had received from his father the privilege and power of walking over the ſea without wetting his feet. Others make him ſon of Terra, like the reſt of the giants. He had married a nymph called Sida before his connection with the family of Œnopion; but Sida was the cauſe of her own death, by boaſting herſelf fairer than Juno. According to Diodorus, Orion was a celebrated hunter, ſuperior to the reſt of mankind by his ſtrength and uncommon ſtature. He built the port of Zancle, and fortified the coaſt of Sicily againſt the frequent inundations of the ſea, by heaping a mound of earth, called Peloron, on which he built a temple to the gods of the ſea. After death, Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the conſtellations ſtill bears his name. The conſtellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the bull, was compoſed of 17 ſtars in the form of a man holding a ſword, which has given occaſion to the poets often to ſpeak of Orion's ſword. As the conſtellation of Orion, which riſes about the 9th day of March, and ſets about the 21ſt of June, is generally ſuppoſed to be accompanied, at its riſing, with great rains and ſtorms, it has acquired the epithet of aqueſus given it by Virgil. Orion was buried in the iſland of Delos, and the monument which the people of Tanagra, in Bœotia, ſhowed, as containing the remains of this celebrated hero, was nothing but a cenotaph. The daughters of Orion diſtinguiſhed themſelves as much as their father, and, when the oracle had declared that Bœotia ſhould not be delivered from a dreadful peſtilence before two of Jupiter's children were immolated on the altars, they joyfully accepted the offer, and voluntarily ſacrificed themſelves for the good of their country. Their names were Menippe and Metioche. They had been carefully educated by Diana, and Venus and Minerva had made them very rich and valuable preſents. The deities of hell were ſtruck at the patriotiſm of the two females, and immediately two ſtars were ſeen to ariſe from the earth, which ſtill ſmoaked with the blood, and they were placed in the heavens in the form of a crown. According to Ovid, their bodies were burned by the Thebans, and, from their aſhes, aroſe two perſons, whom the gods ſoon after changed into conſtellations. Diod. 4.—Homer. Od. 5, &c.—*Virg. ORNITUS, a friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla in the Rutulian wars. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 677.

ORNOSPĂDES, a Parthian, driven from his country by Artabanus. He assisted Tiberius, and was made governor of Macedonia, &c. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 37.

ORNYTION, a son of Sysiphus, king of Corinth. Paus. 9, c. 17.

OROBIA, a town of Eubœa.

ORŌDES, a prince of Parthia, who murdered his brother Mithridates, and ascended his throne. He defeated Crassus, the Roman triumvir, and poured melted gold down the throat of his fallen enemy, to reproach him of his avarice and ambition. He followed the interest of Cassius and Brutus at Philippi. It is said, that, when Orodes became old and infirm, his 30 children applied to him, and disputed, in his presence, their right to the succession. Phraates, the eldest of them, obtained the crown from his father, and, to hasten him out of the world, he attempted to poison him. The poison had no effect, and Phraates, still determined on his father's death, strangled him with his own hands, about 37 years before the Christian era. Orodes had then reigned about 50 years. Justin. 42, c. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.——Another king of Parthia, murdered for his cruelty. Josephus 18. Jud.——A son of Artabanus, king of Armenia. *Tacit. OROETES, a Persian governor of Sardis, famous for his cruel murder of Polycrates. He died B. C. 521.

OROMEDON, a lofty mountain in the island of Cos.

ORONTAS, a relation of Artaxerxes, sent to Cyprus, where he made peace with Evagoras, &c. Polyæn. 7.

ORONTES, a satrap of Mysia, B. C. 385, who rebelled from Artaxerxes, &c. Id.—A governor of Armenia. Id.—A king of the Lycians during the Trojan war, who followed Æneas, and perished in a shipwreck. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 117. l. 6, v. 34.——A river of Syria, rising in Cœlosyria, and falling, after a rapid and troubled course, into the Mediterranean, below Antioch. According to Strabo, who mentions some fabulous accounts concerning it, the Orontes disappeared under ground for the space of five miles. Dionys. Perieg.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 248. Strab. 16.—Paus. 8, c. 20.

OROPHERNES, a man who seized the kingdom of Cappadocia. He died B. C. 154.

ORŌPUS, a town of Bœotia on the borders of Attica, near the Euripus, which received its name from Oropus, a son of Macedon. It was the frequent cause of quarrels between the Bœotians and the Athenians, whence some have called it one of the cities of Attica, and was at last confirmed in the possession of the Athenians by Philip, king of Macedon. Amphiaraus had a temple there. Paus. 1, c. 34.—Strab. 9.——A small town of Eubœa.——Another in Macedonia.

OROSIUS, a writer, A. D. 416, who published an universal history in seven books, from the creation to his own times, in which, tho' learned, diligent, and pious, he betrayed a great ignorance of the knowledge of historical facts, and of chronology. The best edition is that of Havercamp, 4to. L. Bat. 1767.

ORPHEUS, a son of Œager by the muse Calliope. Some suppose him to be son of Apollo, to render his birth more illustrious. He received a lyre from Apollo, or, according to some, from Mercury, upon which he played with such a masterly hand that even the most rapid rivers ceased to flow, the savage beasts of the forest forgot their mildness, and the mountains came to listen to his song. All nature seemed charmed and animated, and the nymphs were his constant companions. Eurydice was the only one who made a deep impression on the melodious musician, and their nuptials were celebrated. Their happiness however, was short, Aristæus became enamoured of Eurydice, and, as she fled from her pursuer, a serpent, that was lurking in the grass, bit her foot and she died of the poisoned wound. Her loss was severely felt by Orpheus, and he resolved to recover her or perish in the attempt. With his lyre in his hand, he entered the infernal regions, and gained an easy admission to the palace of Pluto. The king of hell was charmed with the melody of his strains, and according to the beautiful expressions of the poets, the wheel of Ixion stopped, the stone of Sisyphus stood still, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirst, and even the furies relented. Pluto and Proserpine were moved with his sorrow, and consented to restore him Eurydice, provided he forbore looking behind till he had come to the extremest borders of hell. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions of the air when he forgot his promises, and turned back to look at his long lost Eurydice. He saw her but she instantly vanished from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refused admission, and the only comfort he could had was to sooth his grief at the sound of his muſical inſtrument in grottoes or on the mountains. He totally ſeparated himſelf from the ſociety of mankind, and the Thracian women whom he had offended by his coldneſs to their amorous paſſion, or according to others, by his unnatural gratifications, and impure indulgencies, attacked him while they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus, and after they had torn his body to pieces they threw his head into the Hebrus, which ſtill articulated the words Eurydice! Eurydice! as it was carried down the ſtream into the Ægean ſea. Orpheus was one of the Argonauts, of which celebrated expedition, he wrote a poetical account ſtill extant. This is doubted by Ariſtotle, who ſays according to Cicero, that there never exiſted an Orpheus, but that the poems which paſs under his name, are the compoſitions of a Pythagorean philoſopher named Cercops. According to ſome of the moderns the Argonautica, and the other poems attributed to Orpheus, are the production of the pen of Onomacritus, a poet who lived in the age of Piſiſtratus tyrant of Athens. Pauſanias, however, and Diodorus Siculus ſpeak of Orpheus as a great poet and muſician, who rendered himſelf equally celebrated by his knowledge of the art of war, by the extent of his underſtanding, and by the laws which he enacted. Some maintain that he was killed by a thunderbolt. He was buried at Pieria in Macedonia, according to Apollodorus. The inhabitants of Dion boaſted that his tomb was in their city, and the people of mount Libethrus in Thrace, claimed the ſame honor, and farther obſerved that the nightingales which built their neſts near his tomb, ſang with greater melody than all other birds. Orpheus, as ſome report, after death received divine honors, the muſes gave an honorable burial to his remains, and his lyre became one of the conſtellations in the heavens. ORUS, or Horus, one of the gods of the Egyptians, ſon of Oſiris and of Iſis. He aſſiſted his mother in avenging his father, who had been murdered by Typhon. Orus was ſkilled in medicine, he was acquainted with futurity, and he made the good and the happineſs of his ſubjects the ſole object of his government. He was the emblem of the ſun among the Egyptians, and he was generally repreſented as an infant, ſwathed in variegated cloaths. In one hand he holds a ſtaff, which terminates in the head of a hawk, in the other a whip with two thongs. Herodot. 2.—Plut. de Iſid. & Oſ.—Diod. 1.—The firſt king of Trœzene.—Pauſ. 2, c. 30.

OSCHOPHORIA, a feſtival obſerved by the Athenians. It receives its name απο του Φερειν τας οσχας from carrying boughs hung up with grapes called οσχαι. Its original inſtitution is thus mentioned by Plut. in Theſ. Theſeus at his return from Crete, forgot to hang out the white ſail, by which his father was to be apprized of his ſucceſs. This neglect was fatal to Ægeus, who threw himſelf into the ſea and periſhed. Theſeus no ſooner reached the land, than he ſent a herald to inform his father of his ſafe return, and in the the mean time he began to make the ſacrifices which he vowed when he firſt ſet ſail from Crete. The herald, on his entrance into the city, found the people in great agitation. Some lamented the king's death while others elated at the ſudden news of the victory of Theſeus, crowned the herald with garlands in demonſtration of their joy. The herald carried back the garlands on his ſtaff to the ſea ſhore, and after he had waited till Theſeus had finiſhed his ſacrifice, he related the melancholy ſtory of the king's death. Upon this, the people ran in crouds to the city, ſhowing their grief by cries and lamentations. From that circumſtance therefore, at the feaſt of Oſchophoria, not the herald but his ſtaff is crowned with garlands, and all the people that are preſent always exclaim ιλλυ, ιε, ιε, the firſt of which expreſſes haſte and the others a conſternation or depreſſion of ſpirits. The hiſtorian further mentions, that Theſeus, when he went to Crete did not take with him the uſual number of virgins, but that inſtead of two of them, he filled up the number with two youths of his acquaintance, whom he made paſs for women, by diſguiſing their dreſs, and by uſing them to the ointments and perfumes of women, as well as by a long and ſucceſsful imitation of their voice. The impoſition ſucceeded, their ſex was not diſcovered in Crete, and when Theſeus had triumphed over the Minotaur, he, with theſe two youths, led a proceſſion with branches in their hands, in the ſame habit which is ſtill uſed at the celebration of the Oſchophoria. The branches which were carried, were in honor of Bacchus or Ariadne, or becauſe they returned in autumn, when the grapes were ripe. Beſides this proceſſion, there was alſo a race exhibited, in which only young men, whoſe parents were both alive, were permitted to engage. It was uſual for them to run from the temple of Bacchus, to that of Minerva, which was on the ſea ſhore. The place where they ſtopped was called οσχοφοριον becauſe the boughs which they carried in their hands were depoſited there. The rewards of the conqueror was a cup called περιλα πλοα five-fold, becauſe it contained a mixture of five different things, wine, honey, cheeſe, meal, and oil.

Osci, a people between Campania and the country of the Volſci, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. Some ſuppoſe that they are the ſame as the Opici, the word Oſci being a diminutive or abreviation of the other. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 730.

Oscius, a mountain with a river of the ſame name in Thrace.

Oscus, a general of the fleet of the emperor Otho.

Osinius a king of Cluſium who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 655.

Osiris, a great deity of the Egyptians, ſon of Jupiter and Niobe. All the antients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god, but they all agree that as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civiliſe his ſubjects, to poliſh their morals, to give them good and ſalutary laws, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accompliſhed a reform at home, Oſiris reſolved to go and ſpread civilization in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Iſis and of her faithful miniſter Hermes or Mercury. The command of his troops at home was left to the truſt of Hercules, a warlike officer. In his expedition Oſiris was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis, Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Æthiopia, where his army was encreaſed by the addition of the Satyrs, a hairy race of monſters who made dancing and playing on muſical inſtruments their chief ſtudy. He afterwards paſſed through Arabia and viſited the greateſt part of the kingdoms of Aſia and of Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worſhip of the gods, and a reverence for the wiſdom of a ſupreme being. At his return home Oſiris found the minds of his ſubjects rouſed and agitated. His brother Typhon had raiſed ſeditions, and endeavoured to make himſelf popular. Oſiris, whoſe ſentiments were always of the moſt pacific nature, endeavoured to convince his brother of his ill conduct, but he fell a ſacrifice to the attempt. Typhon murdered him in a ſecret apartment, and cut his body to pieces which were divided among the aſſociates of his guilt. Typhon, according to Plutarch, ſhut up his brother in a coffer and threw him into the Nile. The enquiries of Iſis diſcovered the body of her huſband on the coaſts of Phœnicia, where it had been conveyed by the waves, but Typhon ſtole it as it was carrying to Memphis and he divided it among his companions as was before obſerved. This cruelty incenſed Iſis; ſhe revenged her huſband's death and with her ſon Orus, ſhe defeated Typhon and the partizans of his conſpiracy. She recovered the mangled pieces of her huſband's body, the genitals excepted, which the murderer had thrown into the ſea, and to render him all the honor which his humanity deſerved, ſhe made as many ſtatues of wax as there were mangled pieces of his body. Each ſtatue contained a piece of the fleſh of the dead monarch, and Iſis, after ſhe had ſummoned in her preſence one by one, the prieſts of all the different deities in her dominions, gave them each a ſtatue, intimating that in doing that ſhe had preferred them to all the other communities of Egypt, and ſhe bound them by a ſolemn oath that they would keep ſecret that mark of her favor, and endeavour to ſhew their ſenſe of it by eſtabliſhing a form of worſhip, and paying divine honors to the remains of their prince. They were further directed to chuſe whatever animals they pleaſed to repreſent the perſon and the divinity of Oſiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greateſt revevence to that repreſentative of divinity, and to bury it when dead with the greateſt ſolemnity. To render their eſtabliſhment more popular, each sacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to them to maintain them and to defray the expences which necessarily attended the sacrifices and ceremonial rites. That part of the body of Osiris which had not been recovered was treated with more particular attention by Isis, and she ordered that it should receive honors more solemn and at the same time more mysterious than the other members [Vid. Phallica.] As Osiris had particularly instructed his subjects in cultivating the ground, the priest chose the ox to represent him, and paid the most superstitious veneration to that animal. [Vid. Apis.] Osiris, according to the opinion of some mythologists, is the same as the sun, and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionysius, a Jupiter, a Pan, &c. is the same as that which Osiris received in the Egyptian temples. Isis also after death received divine honors as well as her husband, and as the ox was the symbol of the sun, or Osiris, so the cow was the emblem of the moon or of Isis. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the power and greatness of Osiris than this inscription which has been found on some antient monuments: Saturn the youngest of all the gods was my father, I am Osiris who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deserts of India, and travelled over the greatest part of the world, and visited the streams of the Ister and the remote shores of the ocean, diffusing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth. Osiris was generally represented with a cap on his head like a mitre with two horns; he held a stick in his left hand, and in his right a whip with three thongs. Sometimes he appears with the head of a hawk, as that bird, by its quick and piercing eyes, is a proper emblem of the sun. Plut. in Isid. & Os.—Herodot. 2, c. 144.—Diod. 1.—*Homer. Ossa, a lofty mountain of Thessaly, once the residence of the Centaurs. It was formerly joined to mount Olympus, but Hercules, as some report, separated them, and made between them the celebrated valley of Tempe. This separation of the two mountains was more probably effected by an earthquake which happened as fabulous accounts represent about 1885 years before the christian era. Ossa was one of those mountains which the giants, in their wars against the gods, heaped up one on the other to scale the heavens with more facility. Mela. 2, c. 3.—*Ovid. Ostia, a town built at the mouth of the river Tiber by Ancus Martius, king of Rome, about 16 miles distant from Rome. It had a celebrated harbour, and was so pleasantly situated that the Romans generally spent a part of the year there as in a country seat. There was a small tower in the port like the Pharos of Alexandria built upon the wreck of a large ship which had been sunk there, and which contained the obelisks of Egypt with which the Roman emperors intended to adorn the capital of Italy. In the age of Strabo the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber had choked the harbour, and added much to the size of the holy islands which sheltered the ships at the entrance of the river. Ostia and her harbour called Portus became gradually separated, and are now at a considerable distance from the sea. Flor. 1, c. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 33.—Mela 2, c. 4.—Sueton.—Plin.

Otho, M. Salvius, a Roman emperor descended from the antient kings of Etruria. He was one of Nero's favorites, and as such he was raised to the highest offices of the state, and made governor of Pannonia by the interest of Seneca who wished to remove him from Rome, lest Nero's love for Poppæa should prove his ruin. After Nero's death Otho conciliated the favor of Galba to the new emperor; but when he did not gain his point and when Galba had refused to adopt him as his successor, he resolved to make himself absolute without any regard to the age or dignity of his friend. The great debts which he had contracted encouraged his avarice, and he caused Galba to be assassinated, and he made himself emperor. He was acknowledged by the senate and the Roman people, but the sudden revolt of Vitellius in Germany rendered his situation precarious and it was mutually resolved that their respective right to the empire should be decided by arms. Otho obtained three victories over his enemies, but in a general engagement near Brixellum, his forces were defeated and he stabbed himself when all hopes of success were vanished after a reign of about three months on the 20th of April A. D. 69. It has been justly observed that the last moments of Otho's life were those of a philosoper. He comforted his soldiers who lamented his fortune, and he expressed his concern for their safety when they earnestly solicited to pay him the last friendly offices before he stabbed himself, and he observed that it was better that one man should die, than that all should be involved ed in ruin for his obſtinacy. His nephew was pale and diſtreſſed, fearing the anger and haughtineſs of the conqueror, but Otho comforted him, and obſerved, that Vitellius would be kind and affectionate to the friends and relations of Otho, ſince Otho was not aſhamed to ſay, that in the time of their greateſt enmity, the mother of Vitellius had received every friendly treatment from his hands. He alſo burnt the letters which by falling into the hands of Vitellius might provoke his reſentment againſt thoſe who had favored the cauſe of an unfortunate general. Theſe noble and humane ſentiments in a man who was the aſſociate of Nero's ſhameful pleaſures and who ſtained his hand in the blood of his maſter, have appeared to ſome wonderful, and paſſed for the features of policy and not of a naturally virtuous and benevolent heart. Plut. in vitâ.—Suet.—Tacit. 2, Hiſt. c. 50, &c.—Juv. 2, v. 90.——Roſcius a tribune of the people, who, in Cicero's conſulſhip, made a regulation to permit the Roman knights at public ſpectacles to have the 14 firſt rows after the ſeats of the ſenators. Otys, a prince of Paphlagonia, who revolted from the Perſians to Ageſilaus.

P. Ovidius Naso, a celebrated Roman poet born at Sulmo. As he was intended for the bar, his father ſent him early to Rome, and removed him to Athens in the ſixteenth year of his age. The progreſs of Ovid in the ſtudy of eloquence was great, but the father's expectations were fruſtrated; his ſon was born a poet, and nothing could deter him from purſuing his natural inclination, though he was often reminded that Homer lived and died in the greateſt poverty. Every thing he wrote was expreſſed in poetical numbers, as he himſelf ſays, et quod tentabam ſcribere verſus erat. A lively genius and a fertile imagination ſoon gained him admirers; the learned became his friends; Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace honored him with their correſpondence, and Auguſtus patronized him with the moſt unbounded liberality. Theſe favors, however, were but momentary, and the poet was ſoon after baniſhed to Tomos on the Euxine ſea, by the emperor. The true cauſe of this ſudden exile is unknown. Some attribute it to a ſhameful amour with Livia the wife of Auguſtus, while others ſupport that it aroſe from the knowledge which Ovid had of the unpardonable inceſt of the emperor with his daughter Julia. Theſe reaſons are indeed merely conjectural, the cauſe was of a very private and very ſecret nature, of which Ovid himſelf is afraid to ſpeak. It was, however, ſomething improper in the family and court of Auguſtus, as theſe lines ſeem to indicate:

Cur aliquid vidi? Cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi eſt?
Inſcius Actæon vidit ſine veſte Dianam,
Præda fuit canibus non minus ille ſuis.

Again,

Inſcia quod crimen viderunt lumina plector,
Peccatumque oculos eſt habuiſſe meum.

And in another place,

Perdiderunt cum me duo crimina, carmen et error,
Alterius facti culpa ſilenda mihi eſt.

In his baniſhment, Ovid betrayed his puſillanimity, and however afflicted and diſtreſſed his ſituation was, yet the flattery and impatience which he ſhowed in his writings are a diſgrace to his pen, and expoſe him more to ridicule than pity. Though he proſtituted his pen and his time to adulation, yet the emperor proved deaf to all entreaties, and refuſed to liſten to his moſt ardent friends at Rome, who wiſhed for the return of the poet. Ovid, who undoubtedly wiſhed for a Brutus to deliver Rome of her tyrannical Auguſtus, continued his flattery even to meanneſs; and when the emperor died, he was ſo mercenary as to conſecrate a ſmall temple to the departed tyrant, on the ſhore of the Euxine, where he regularly offered frankincenſe every morning. Tiberius proved as regardleſs as his predeceſſor, to the entreaties which were made for Ovid, and the poet died in the 7th or 8th year of his baniſhment, in the 59th year of his age, A. D. 17, and was buried at Tomos. In the year 1508 of the Chriſtian era, the following epitaph was found at Stain, in the modern kingdom of Auſtria,

Hic ſitus eſt vates quem Divi Cæſaris ira Auguſti patriâ cedere juſſit humo.
Sæpe miſer voluit patriis occumbere terris,
Sed fruſtra! Hunc illi fata dedêre locum.

This

This, however, is an impoſition to render celebrated an obſcure corner of the world, which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greateſt part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoſes in 15 books are extremely curious, on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate, but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In compoſing this, the poet was more indebted to the then exiſting traditions, and to the theogony of the antients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Faſti were divided into 12 books, the ſame number as the conſtellations in the zodiac; but of theſe ſix have periſhed, and the learned world have reaſon to lament the loſs of a poem, which muſt have thrown ſo much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, feſtivals and ſacrifices of the antient Romans, as we may judge from the ſix that have ſurvived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Triſtia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and ſoftneſs of expreſſion, as alſo his Elegies on different ſubjects. The Heroides are nervous, ſpirited, and diffuſe, the poetry is excellent, the language varied, but the expreſſions are often too wanton and indelicate, a fault which is common in his compoſitions. His three books of Amorum, and the ſame number de Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery deſcriptions; but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and they are to be read with caution, as they ſeem to be calculated to corrúpt the heart, and ſap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus of the ſame name, is a ſatyrical performance. Beſides theſe, there are extant ſome fragments of other poems, and among theſe ſome of a tragedy called Medea. The talents of Ovid as a dramatic writer have been diſputed, and ſome have obſerved, that he who is ſo often void of ſentiment, was not born to ſhine as a tragedian. Ovid has attempted perhaps too many ſorts of poetry at once. On whatever he has written, he has totally exhauſted the ſubject and left nothing unſaid. He every where paints nature with a maſterly hand, and gives ſtrength to the moſt vulgar expreſſions. It has been judiciouſly obſerved, that his poetry after his baniſhment from Rome, was deſtitute of that ſpirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compoſitions. His Faſti, are perhaps the beſt written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love verſes, his Heroides, and after all his Metamorphoſes, which were not totally finiſhed when Auguſtus ſent him into baniſhment. His Epiſtles from Pontus are the language of an abject and puſillanimous flatterer. However critics may cenſure the indelicacy and the inaccuracies of Ovid, it is to be acknowledged that his poetry contains great ſweetneſs and elegance, and, like that of Tibullus, charms the ear and captivates the mind. The beſt editions of Ovid's works, are thoſe of Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1727; of L. Bat. 1670, in 8vo. and of Utrecht, in 12mo. 4 vols. 1713. *Ovid. Oxionæ, a nation of Germans, whom ſuperſtitious traditions repreſented as having the countenance human, and the reſt of the body like that of beaſts. Tacit. de Germ. 46.

Oxus, a large river of Bactriana.——Another in Scythia.

Oxyartes, a king of Bactriana, who ſurrendered to Alexander.

Oxycānus, an Indian prince in the age of Alexander, &c.

Oxydrăcæ, a nation of India. Curt. 9, c. 4.

Oxȳlus, a leader of the Heraclidæ, when they recovered the Peloponneſus. He was rewarded with the kingdom of Elis. Pauſ. 5, c. 4.

Oxynthes, a king of Athens, B. C. 1149. He reigned 12 years.

Oxypŏrus, a ſon of Cinyras and Metharme.

Oxyrynchus, a town of Egypt on the Nile.

Ozines, a Perſian impriſoned by Craterus, becauſe he attempted to revolt from Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Ozŏlæ or Ozŏli, a people who inhabited the eaſtern parts of Ætolia, which were called Ozolea. This tract of territory lay at the north of the bay of Corinth, and extended about 12 miles northward. They received their name from the bad ſtench (ὀζη) of their bodies and of their cloathing, which was the raw hides of wild beaſts. Some derive it with more propriety from the ſtench of the ſtagnated water in the neighbouring lakes and marſhes. According to a fabulous tradition, they received their name from a very different circumſtance: During the reign of a ſon of Deucalion, a bitch brought into the world a ſtick inſtead of whelps. The ſtick was planted in the ground by the king, and it grew up to a large vine and produced grapes, from which the inhabitants of the country were called Ozolæ, not from ὀζειν, to ſmell bad, but from ὀζος, a branch or ſprout. The name of Ozolæ, on account of its indelicate ſignification, highly diſpleaſed the inhabitants, and they exchanged it ſoon for that of Ætolians. Pauſ. 10, c. 38.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.

PACATIANUS, Titus Julius, a general of the Roman armies, who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, about the latter part of Philip's reign. He was soon after defeated, A. D. 249, and put to death, &c.

PACCIUS, an insignificant poet in the age of Domitian, Juv. 7, v. 12.

PACHES, an Athenian, who took Mitylene, &c.

PĂCHINUS, or Păchynus, a promontory of Sicily, projecting about 2 miles into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, at the south-east corner of the island, with a small harbour of the same name. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 699.—Paus. 5, c. 25.

M. PACONIUS, a Roman put to death by Tiberius, &c. Suet. in Tib. 61.—A Stoic philosopher, son of the preceding.—He was banished from Italy by Nero, and he retired from Rome with the greatest composure and indifference.

PACŌRUS, the eldest of the 30 sons of Orodes, king of Parthia, sent against Crassus, whose army he defeated, and whom he took prisoner. He took Syria from the Romans, and supported the republican party of Pompey, and of the murderers of Julius Cæsar. He was killed in a battle by Ventidius Bassus, B. C. 39, on the same day (9th of June) that Crassus had been defeated. Flor. 4, c. 9.—Horat. 3, od. 6, v. 9.—A king of Parthia, who made a treaty of alliance with the Romans, &c.—Another intimate with king Decebalus.

PACTŌLUS, a celebrated river of Lydia, rising in mount Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus after it has watered the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas washed himself when he turned into gold whatever he touched; and from that circumstance it ever after rolled golden sand, and received the name of Chrysorrhoas. It is called Tmolus by Pliny. Strabo observes, that it had no golden sands in his age. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 142.—Strab. 18. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 86.—Herodot. 5, c. 110.—Plin. 33, c. 8.

PACTYAS, a Lydian entrusted with the care of the treasures of Crœsus at Sardes. The immense riches which he could command, corrupted him, and to make himself independent, he gathered a large army. He laid siege to the citadel of Sardes, but the arrival of one of the Persian generals soon put him to flight. He retired to Cumæ and afterwards to Lesbos, where he was delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 154, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 35.

PACTYES, a mountain of Ionia, near Ephesus.

PACUVIUS, M. a native of Brundusium, son of the sister of the poet Ennius, who distinguished himself by his skill in painting, and by his poetical talents. He wrote satires and tragedies which were represented at Rome, the best of which was Oresles. His style was rough and without purity or elegance. Some few fragments remain of his compositions. He retired to Tarentum, where he died in the 90th year of his age, about 131 years before Christ. Cic. de orat. 2.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

PADÆI, an Indian nation, who devour their sick before they die. Herodot. 3, c. 99.

PĂDUA, a town called also Patavium, in the country of the Venetians, founded by Antenor immediately after the Trojan war. It was the native place of the historian Livy. The inhabitants were once so powerful that they could levy an army of 20,000 men. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 251.

PADUS, (now called the Po) a river in Italy, known also by the name of Eridanus, which forms the northern boundary of the territories of Italy. It rises in mount Vesulus, one of the highest mountains of the Alps, and discharges itself in an eastern direction into the Adriatic sea by seven mouths, after it has collected in its course the waters of above 30 rivers. It was formerly said that it rolled gold dust in its sands, which was carefully searched by the inhabitants. The consuls C. Flaminius Nepos, and P. Furius Philus, were the first Roman generals who crossed it. The Po is famous for the death of Phaeton, who, as the poets mention, was thrown there by the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 37, c. 2.

PADUSA, the same as the Po. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 457.

PÆAN, a surname of Apollo, derived from the word pæan, an hymn which was sung in his honor, because he had killed the serpent Python, which had given cause to the people to exclaim Io Pæan! The exclamation of Io Pæan! was made use of in speaking to the other gods, as it often was a demonstration of joy. Juv. 6, v. 171.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 538, l. 14, v. 720.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Strab. 18.

PÆMĀNI, a people of Belgic Gaul.

PÆON, a Greek historian. Plut. in Thes.—A celebrated physician who cured the wounds which the gods received during the Trojan war. From him physicians are sometimes called Pæonii, and herbs serviceable in medicinal processes Pæoniæ herbæ. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 769.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 535.

PÆŏNES, a people of Macedonia, who inhabited a ſmall part of the country called Pæonia. Some believe that they were deſcended from a Trojan colony. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.—Herodot. 5, c. 13, &c.

PÆŏNIA, a country of Macedonia, on the borders of the Strymon. It received its name from Pæon, a ſon of Endymion, who ſettled there.——A ſmall town of Attica.

PÆŏNIDES, a name given to the daughters of Pierus, who were defeated by the Muſes, becauſe their mother was a native of Pæonia. Ovid. Met. 5, ult. fab.

PÆOS, a ſmall town of Arcadia.

PÆSOS, a town of the Helleſpont called alſo Apæſos. It is ſituated at the north of Lampſacus. When it was deſtroyed the inhabitants migrated to Lampſacus, where they ſettled. They were of a Mileſian origin. Strab. 13. Homer. Il. 2.

PÆSTUM, a town of Lucania, called alſo Neptunia, where the ſoil produced roſes which bloſſomed twice a year. Virg. G. 4, v. 119. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708.

PÆTOVIUM, a town of Pannonia.

CÆCINNA PÆTUS, the huſband of Arria. (Vid. Arria.)——A governor of Armenia, under Nero.——A Roman who conſpired with Catiline againſt his country.——A man drowned as he was going to Egypt to collect money. Propert. 3, el. 7. v. 5.

PĂGĂSÆ or PĂGĂSA, a town of Magneſia, in Macedonia, with an harbour and a promontory of the ſame name. The ſhip Argo was built there, as ſome ſuppoſe, and according to Propertius, the Argonauts ſet ſail from that harbour. From that circumſtance not only the ſhip Argo but alſo the Argonauts themſelves were ever after diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of Pagaſæus. Pliny confounds Pagaſæ with Demetrias, but they are different, and the latter was peopled by the inhabitants of the former, who preferred the ſituation of Demetrias for its conveniences. (vid. Met. 7, v. 1. l. 8, v. 349.—Lucan. 2, v. 715, l. 6, v. 400,—Mela. 2, c. 3 & 7.—Strab. 9.—Propert. 1. el. 20, v. 17.—Plin. 4, c. 8.—Apollon. Rhod. 1, v. 238, &c.

PĂGĂSUS, a Trojan killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 670.

PAGUS, a mountain of Æolia. Pauſ. 7, c. 5.

PALĂCIUM or PALĂTIUM, a town of the Thracian Cherſoneſus.——A ſmall village on the Palatine hill, where Rome was afterwards built.

PALÆA, a town of Cyprus.——Of Cephallenia.

PALÆAPŎLIS, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Spain.

PALÆMON or PALLEMON, a ſea deity, ſon of Athamas and Ino. His original name was Melicerta, and he aſſumed that of Palæmon, after he had been changed into a ſea deity by Neptune. [Vid. Melicerta.]——A noted grammarian at Rome in the age of Tiberius, who made himſelf ridiculous by his arrogance and luxury Juv. 6, v. 451.—Martial. 2, ep. 86.——A ſon of Neptune, who was among the Argonauts. Apollod.

PALÆPĂPHOS, a town of Cyprus.

PALÆPHĂTUS, an antient Greek philoſopher, whoſe age is unknown though it can be aſcertained that he floriſhed between the times of Ariſtotle and Auguſtus. He wrote 5 books de incredibilibus, of which only the firſt remains, and in it he endeavours to explain fabulous and mythological traditions by hiſtorical facts. The beſt edition of Palæphatus, is that of J. Frid. Fiſcher in 8vo. Lipſ. 1773.——An heroic poet of Athens, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world.——A diſciple of Ariſtotle, born at Abydos.——An hiſtorian of Egypt.

PALÆPŎLIS, a town built in Italy by a Greek colony.

PALÆSTE, a village of Epirus. Lucan. 5, v. 460.

PALÆSTĪNA, a province of Syria, &c. Herodot. 1, c. 105.

PALÆSTĪNUS, an antient name of the river Strymon.

PĂLĂMĒDES, a Grecian chief, ſon of Nauplius, king of Eubœa by Clymene. He was ſent by the Greek princes who were going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulyſſes to the camp, who to withdraw himſelf from the expedition, pretended inſanity, and the better to impoſe upon his friends, uſed to harneſs different animals to a plough, and ſow ſalt inſtead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was ſoon perceived by Palamedes, he knew that the regret to part from his wife Penelope, whom he had lately married, was the only reaſon of the pretended inſanity of Ulyſſes, and to demonſtrate this, Palamedes took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulyſſes ſhowed that he was not inſane, by turning the plough a different way not to hurt his child. This having been diſcovered, Ulyſſes was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war, but an immortal enmity aroſe between Ulyſſes and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca reſolved to take every opportunity to diſtreſs him, and when all his expectations were fruſtrated, he had the meanneſs to bribe one of his ſervants, and to make him dig a hole in his maſter's tent, and there conceal a large ſum ſum of money. After this Ulyſſes forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was ſuppoſed to have ſent to Palamedes. In the letter the Trojan king ſeemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previouſly agreed upon, when he received the money. This forged letter was carried by means of Ulyſſes before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was ſummoned, and he made the moſt ſolemn proteſtations of innocence, but all was in vain, the money that was diſcovered in his tent ſerved only to coroborate the accuſation. He was found guilty by all the army and ſtoned to death. Homer is ſilent about the miſerable fate of Palamedes, and Pauſanias mentions that it had been reported by ſome that Ulyſſes and Diomedes had drowned him in the ſea as he was fiſhing on the coaſt. Philoſtratus, who mentions the tragical ſtory above related, adds that Achilles and Ajax buried his body with great pomp on the ſea ſhore, and that they raiſed upon it a ſmall chapel, where ſacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a ſoldier, and according to ſome he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters θ, ξ, χ, φ, during the Trojan war. To him alſo is attributed the invention of dice and backgammon; and it is ſaid that he was the firſt who regularly ranged an army in a line of battle, and who placed ſentinels round the camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watch word. Hygin. fab. 95, 105, &c.—Apollod. 2, &c.——*Dictys. PALANTIA, a town of Spain. Mela. 2, c. 6.

PALATINUS MONS, a celebrated hill, the largeſt of the ſeven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the firſt foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there alſo he kept his court, as well as Tullus Hoſtilius, and Auguſtus, and all the ſucceeding emperors, from which circumſtance the word Palatium has ever ſince been applied to the reſidence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddeſs Pales, or from the Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the bleatings of ſheep which were frequent there, or perhaps from the word palantes, wandering, becauſe Evander when he came to ſettle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one ſociety. Dio. Caſſ. 53.—Ital. 12, v. 709.——Juv. 9, v. 23.—Martial. 1, ep. 71.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 3.——Cic. in Catil. 1.—Apollo, who was worſhipped on the Palatine hill, was alſo called Palatinus. His temple there had been built by Auguſtus, who had enriched it with a library, valuable for the various collections of Greek and Latin manuſcripts which it contained. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 17.

PALANTIUM, a town of Arcadia.

PALEIS, or PALÆ, a town in the iſland of Cephallenia. Pauſ. 6, c. 15.

PALES, the goddeſs of ſheepfolds and of paſtures among the Romans. She was worſhipped with great ſolemnity at Rome, and her feſtivals called Palilia, were celebrated the very day that Romulus began to lay the foundation of the city of Rome.——Virg. G. 3, v. 1, & 294.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 722, &c.——Pater. 1. c. 8.

PALFURIUS SURA, a writer removed from the ſenate by Domitian, who ſuſpected him of attachment to Vitellius, &c.——Juv. 4, v. 53.

PALICI or PALISCI, two deities, ſons of Jupiter by Thalia, whom Æchylus calls Ætna, in a tragedy which is now loſt, according to the words of Macrobius. The nymph Ætna when pregnant, entreated her lover to remove her from the purſuits of Juno. The god concealed her in the bowels of the earth, and when the time of her delivery was come, the earth opened and brought into the world two children, who received the name of Palici, ἀπὸ τοῦ πάλιν ἰέναι becauſe they came again into the world from the bowels of the earth. Theſe deities were worſhipped with great ceremonies by the Sicilians, and near their temple were two ſmall lakes, which were ſuppoſed to have ſprung out of the earth, at the ſame time that they were born. Near theſe pools it was uſual to take the moſt ſolemn oaths, by thoſe who wiſhed to decide controverſies and quarrels. If any of the perſons who took the oaths perjured themſelves, they were immediately puniſhed in a ſupernatural manner, and thoſe whoſe oath, by the deities of the place, was ſincere, departed unhurt. The Palici had alſo an oracle which was conſulted upon great emergencies, and which rendered the trueſt and moſt unequivocal anſwers. In a ſuperſtitious age, the altars of the Palici were ſtained with the blood of human ſacrifices, but this barbarous cuſtom was ſoon aboliſhed, and the deities were ſatisfied with their uſual offerings. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 585.——Ovid. Met. 5, v. 506.——Diod. 2.——Macrob. Saturn. 5, c. 10.——Ital. &c.

PALILIA, a feſtival celebrated by th Romans, in honor of the goddeſs Pales

The ceremony consisted in burning heaps of straw, and in leaping over them. No sacrifices were offered but the purifications were made with the smoke of horses' blood, and with the ashes of a calf that had been taken from the belly of his mother, after it had been sacrificed, and with the ashes of beans. The purification of the flocks was also made with the smoke of sulphur, of the olive, the pine, the laurel and the rosemary. Offerings of mild cheese, boiled wine, and cakes of millet were afterwards made to the goddess. This festival was observed on the 21st of April, and it was during the celebration that Romulus first began to build his city. Some call this festival Parilia quasi a pariendo, because the sacrifices were offered to the divinity for the fecundity of the flocks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 774. Fast. 4, v. 721, &c. l. 6. v. 257.

PALINURUS, a skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and agitation of the sea, and at last came safe to the sea shore, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him to obtain his cloaths. His body was left unburied on the sea shore, and as, according to the religion of the antient Romans, no person was suffered to cross the Stygian lake before 100 years were elapsed, if his remains had not been decently buried, we find Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, speaking to Palinurus, and assuring him, that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed, should soon be adorned with a monument, and bear his name, and accordingly a promontory was called Palinurus, Virg. Æn. 3, v. 513, l. 5, v. 840, &c. l. 6, v. 341. —— Ovid. de Rem. 577. —— Mela. 2, c. 4. —— Strab.

PALISCŌRUM, or PALICŌRUM STAGNUM, a sulphureous pool in Sicily. Vid. Palici.

PALLADES, certain virgins who were consecrated to Jupiter by the Thebans of Egypt. Strab. 17.

PALLADIUM, a celebrated statue of Pallas. It was about three cubits high, and represented the goddess as sitting and holding a pike in her right hand, and in her left a distaff and a spindle. It fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilus, as that prince was building the citadel of Ilium. Some nevertheless suppose that it fell at Pessinus in Phrygia, or according to others, Dardanus received it as a present from his mother Electra. There are some authors who maintain that the Palladium was made with the bones of Pelops by Aberis, but Apollodorus seems to say, that it was no more than a piece of clock work which moved of itself. However discordant the opinions of antient authors be about this famous statue, it is universally agreed, that on its preservation depended the safety of Troy. This fatality was well known to the Greeks during the Trojan war, and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes were commissioned to steal it away. They effected their purpose, and if we rely upon the authority of some authors, they were directed how to carry it away by Helenus the son of Priam, who proved, in this, unfaithful to his country, because his brother Deiphobus, at the death of Paris, had married Helen, of whom he was enamoured. Minerva was displeased with the violence which was offered to her statue, and according to Virgil the Palladium itself appeared to have received life and motion, and by the flashes which started from its eyes, and its sudden springs from the earth, it seemed to shew the resentment of the goddess. The true Palladium, as some authors observe, was not carried away from Troy by the Greeks, but only one of the statues of similar size and shape, which were placed near it, to deceive whatever sacrilegious persons attempted to steal it. The Palladium, therefore, as they say, was conveyed safe from Troy to Italy by Æneas, and it was afterwards preserved by the Romans with the greatest secrecy and veneration, in the temple of Vesta, a circumstance which none but the vestal virgins knew. Herodian 1, c. 14, &c. —— *Ovid. PALLADIUS, a Greek physician whose treatise on fevers, was edited 8vo. L. Bat. 1745.

PALLANTEUM, a town of Italy. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 54.

PALLANTIAS, a patronymic of Aurora, as being related to the giant Pallas. —— Ovid. Met. 9. fab. 12.

PALLANTIDES, the 50 sons of Pallas, the son of Pandion, and the brother of Ægeus. They were all killed by Theseus, the son of Ægeus, whom they opposed when he came to take possession of his father's kingdom. This opposition they shewed in hopes of succeeding to the throne, as Ægeus left no children, except Theseus, whose legitimacy was even disputed, as he was born Trœzene. —— Plut. in Thes. —— Paus. 1.

PALLAS, a freed man of Claudius, famous for the power and the riches he obtained. He advised the emperor, his master, to marry Agrippina, and to adopt her her ſon Nero for his ſucceſſor. It was by his means, and thoſe of Agrippina, that the death of Claudius was haſtened, and that Nero was raiſed to the throne. Nero forgot to whom he was indebted for the crown. He diſcarded Pallas, and ſome time after cauſed him to be put to death, that he might make himſelf maſter of his great riches, A. D. 61. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 53.

PALLAS, (ădis) a daughter of Jupiter, the ſame as Minerva. The goddeſs received this name either becauſe ſhe killed the giant Pallas, or perhaps from the ſpear which ſhe ſeems to brandiſh in her hands, (πάλλειν,) For the functions, power, and character of the goddeſs, Vid. Minerva.

PALLAS, (antis) a ſon of king Evander, ſent with ſome troops to aſſiſt Æneas. He was killed by Turnus, the king of the Rutuli, after he had made a great ſlaughter of the enemy. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 104, &c.——One of the giants, ſon of Tartarus and Terra. He was killed by Minerva, who covered herſelf with his ſkin, whence, as ſome ſuppoſe, ſhe is called Pallas. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A ſon of Crius and Eurybia, who married the nymph Styx, by whom he had Victory, Valor, &c. *Heſiod. PALMA, a governor of Syria.

PALMȳRA, the capital of Palmyrene, a country on the eaſtern boundaries of Syria, now called Theudemor, or Tadmor. It is famous for being the ſeat of the celebrated Zenobia and of Odenatus, in the reign of the emperor Aurelian. It is now in ruins, and the ſplendor and magnificence of its porticos, temples, and palaces, are nowdaily examined by the curious and the learned.

PALPHURIUS, one of the flatterers of Domitian. Juv. 4, v. 53.

PAMMON, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba. Apollod.

PAMPA, a village near Tentyra in Thrace. Juv. 15, v. 76.

PAMPHĪLUS, a celebrated painter of Macedonia, in the age of Philip. He was founder of the ſchool for painting at Sicyon, and he made a law which was obſerved not only in Sicyon, but all over Greece, that none but the children of noble and dignified perſons ſhould be permitted to learn painting. Apelles was one of his pupils. Diog.

PAMPHOS, a Greek poet, ſuppoſed to have lived before Heſiod's age.

PAMPHȳLA, a Greek woman, who wrote a general hiſtory in 33 books, in Nero's reign. This hiſtory, ſo much commended by the antients, is loſt.

PAMPHȳLIA, a province of Aſia Minor, antiently called Mopſopia, and bounded on the ſouth by a part of the Mediterranean, called the Pamphylian ſea, weſt by Lycia, north by Piſidia, and eaſt by Cilicia. It abounded with paſtures, vines and olives. It was peopled by a Grecian colony. Strab. 14.—Mela. 1.—Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Plin. 5, c. 26.

PAN was the god of ſhepherds, of huntſmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the ſon of Mercury, by Dryope, according to Homer. Some give him Jupiter and Calliſto for parents, others Jupiter and Ybis or Oneis. Lucian, Hyginus, &c. ſupport that he was the ſon of Mercury and Penelope, the daughter of Icarius, and that the god gained the affections of the princeſs under the form of a goat, as ſhe tended her father's flocks on mount Taygetus, before her marriage with the king of Ithaca. Some authors maintain that Penelope became mother of Pan, during the abſence of Ulyſſes in the Trojan war, and that he was the offſpring of all the ſuitors which frequented the palace of Penelope, whence he received the name of Pan, which ſignifies all or every thing. Pan was a monſter in appearance, he had two ſmall horns on his head, his complexion was ruddy, his noſe flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were thoſe of a goat. The education of Pan was entruſted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinoe, but the nurſe, according to Homer, terrified at the ſight of ſuch a monſter, fled away and left him. He was wrapped up in the ſkin of beaſts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themſelves with the oddity of his appearance. Bacchus was greatly pleaſed with him, and gave him the name of Pan. The god of ſhepherds chiefly reſided in Arcadia, where the woods and the moſt rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with ſeven reeds, which he called Syrinx, in honor of a beautiful nymph of the ſame name, to whom he attempted to offer violence, and who was changed into a reed. He was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and often with ſucceſs. Though deformed in his ſhape and features, yet he had the good fortune to captivate Diana, and of gaining her favor, by transforming himſelf into a beautiful white goat. He was alſo enamoured of a nymph of the mountains called Echo, by whom he had a ſon called Lynx. He alſo paid his addreſſes to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and it is well known in what manner he was received. [Vid. Omphale.] The worſhip of Pan was well eſtabliſhed particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on mount Lycæus. His feſtivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. [Vid. Lupercalia.] The worſhip, and the different functions of Pan, are derived from the mythology of the antient Egyptians. This god was one of the eight great gods of the Egyptians, who ranked before the other 12 gods, whom the Romans called Conſentes. He was worſhipped with the greateſt ſolemnity all over Egypt. His ſtatues repreſented him as a goat, not becauſe he was really ſuch, but this was done for myſterious reaſons. He was the emblem of fecundity, and they looked upon him as the principle of all things. His horns, as ſome obſerve, repreſented the rays of the ſun, and the brightneſs of the heavens was expreſſed by the vivacity and the ruddineſs of his complexion. The ſtar which he wore on his breaſt, was the ſymbol of the firmament, and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, ſuch as the woods and plants. Some ſuppoſe that he appeared as a goat becauſe when the gods fled into Egypt, in their war againſt the giants, Pan tranſformed himſelf into a goat, an example which was immediately followed by all the deities. Pan, according to ſome, is the ſame as Faunus, and he is the chief of all the Satyrs. Plutarch mentions, that in the reign of Tiberius, an extraordinary voice was heard near the Echinades in the Ionian ſea, which exclaimed, that the great Pan was dead. This was readily believed by the emperor, and the aſtrologers were conſulted, but they were unable to explain the meaning of ſo ſupernatural a voice, which probably proceeded from the impoſition of one of the courtiers who attempted to terrify Tiberius. In Egypt, in the town of Mendes, which word alſo ſignifies a goat, there was a ſacred goat kept, with the moſt ceremonious ſanctity. The death of this animal was always attended with the greateſt ſolemnities, and like that of another Apis, became the cauſe of an univerſal mourning. As Pan uſually terrified the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, that kind of fear which often ſeizes men, and which is only ideal and imaginary, has received from him the name of panic fear. This kind of terror has been exemplified not only in individuals, but in numerous armies, ſuch as that of Brennus, which was thrown into the greateſt conſternation at Rome, without any cauſe or plauſible reaſon. *Ovid. PANACEA, a goddeſs, daughter of Æſculapius, who preſided over health. Lucan. 9, v. 918.

PANÆTIUS, a ſtoic philoſopher of Rhodes, 138 B. C. He ſtudied at Athens for ſome time, of which he refuſed to become a citizen, obſerving that a good and modeſt man ought to be ſatisfied with one country. He came to Rome, where he reckoned among his pupils Lælius and Scipio the ſecond Africanus. To the latter he was attached by the cloſeſt ties of friendſhip and familiarity, he attended him in his expeditions, and partook of all his pleaſures and amuſements. To the intereſt of their countrymen at Rome the Rhodians were greatly indebted for their proſperity and the immunities, which they for ſome time enjoined. Panætius wrote a treatiſe on the duties of man, whoſe merit can be aſcertained from the encomiums, which Cicero beſtows upon it. Cic. de offic. &c.—A tyrant of Leontini in Sicily. B. C. 613.

PANARES, a general of Crete, defeated by Metellus, &c.

PANARISTE, one of the waiting women of Berenice the wife of king Antiochus.

PANATHENÆA, feſtivals in honor of Minerva the patroneſs of Athens. They were firſt inſtituted by Erichtheus or Orpheus, and called Athenæa, but Theſeus afterwards renewed them and cauſed them to be celebrated and obſerved by all the tribes of Athens, which he had united into one, and from which reaſon the feſtivals received their name. Some ſuppoſe that they are the ſame as the Roman Quinquatria, as they are often called by that name among the Latins. In the firſt years of the inſtitution, they were obſerved only during one day, but afterwards the time was prolonged, and the celebration was attended with greater pomp and ſolemnity. The feſtivals were two; the great Panathenæa μεγαλα, which were obſerved every 5th year beginning on the 22d of the month called Hecatombæon or 7th of July, and the leſſer Panathenæa, μικρα, which were kept every 3d year, or rather annually, beginning on the 21ſt or 20th of the month called Thargelion, correſponding to the 5th or 6th day of the preſent month of May. In the leſſer feſtivals there were three games conducted by ten preſidents choſen from the ten tribes of Athens, who continued four years in office. On the evening of the firſt day there was a race with torches, in which men on foot, and afterwards on horſeback, contended. The ſame was alſo exhibited in the greater feſtivals. The ſecond combat was gymnical, and exhibited a trial of ſtrength and bodily dexterity. The laſt was a muſical contention, firſt inſtituted by Pericles. In the ſongs they celebrated the generous undertaking of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, who oppoſed the Piſiſtratidæ, and of Thraſybulus, who delivered Athens from its thirty tyrants. Phrynis of Mitylene was the firſt who obtained the victory by playing upon the harp. There were beſides other muſical inſtruments, on which they played in concert, ſuch as flutes, &c. The poets contended in four plays, called from their number τετραλογια. The laſt of theſe was a ſatire. There was alſo at Sunium an imitation of a naval fight. Whoever obtained the victory in any of theſe games was rewarded with a veſſel of oil, which he was permitted to diſpoſe of in whatever manner he pleaſed, and it was unlawful for any other perſon to tranſport that commodity. The conqueror alſo received a crown of the olives which grew in the groves of Academus, and were ſacred to Minerva, and called μορσιαι, from μορος, death, in remembrance of the tragical end of Hallirhotius the ſon of Neptune, who cut his own legs when he attempted to cut down the olive which had given the victory to Minerva in preference to his father, when theſe two deities contended about giving a name to Athens. Some ſuppoſe that the word is derived from μερος, a part, becauſe theſe olives were given by contribution by all ſuch as attended at the feſtivals. There was alſo a dance called Pyrrhichia, performed by young boys in armour, in imitation of Minerva, who thus expreſſed her triumph over the vanquiſhed Titans. Gladiators were alſo introduced when Athens became tributary to the Romans. During the celebration no perſon was permitted to appear in dyed garments, and if any one tranſgreſſed he was puniſhed according to the diſcretion of the preſident of the games. After theſe things, a ſumptuous ſacrifice was offered, in which every one of the Athenian boroughs contributed an ox, and the whole was concluded by an entertainment for all the company with the fleſh that remained from the ſacrifice. In the greater feſtivals the ſame rites and ceremonies were uſually obſerved, but with more ſolemnity and magnificence. Others were alſo added, particularly the proceſſion, in which Minerva's ſacred πεπλος, or garment, was carried. This garment was woven by a ſelect number of virgins, called ἐργαζιναι, from ἐργον, work. They were ſuperintended by two of the ἀρρηφοροι, or young virgins, not under ſeventeen years of age nor above eleven, whoſe garments were white and ſet off with ornaments of gold. Minerva's peplus was of a white color, without ſleeves and embroidered with gold. Upon it were deſcribed the atchievements of the goddeſs, particularly her victories over the giants. The exploits of Jupiter and the other gods were alſo repreſented there, and from that circumſtance men of courage and bravery are ſaid to be ἀξιοι πεπλου, worthy to be pourtrayed in Minerva's ſacred garment. In the proceſſion of the peplus, the following ceremonies were obſerved. In the ceramicus, without the city, there was an engine built in the form of a ſhip, upon which Minerva's garment was hung as a ſail, and the whole was conducted, not by beaſts, as ſome have ſuppoſed, but by ſubterraneous machines, to the temple of Ceres Eleuſinia, and from thence to the citadel, where the peplus was placed upon Minerva's ſtatue, which was laid upon a bed woven or ſtrewed with flowers, which was called πλακις. Perſons of all ages, of every ſex and quality, attended the proceſſion, which was led by old men and women, carrying olive branches in their hands, from which reaſon they were called θαλλοφοροι, bearers of green boughs. Next followed men of full age with ſhields and ſpears. They were attended by the μετοικοι, or foreigners, who carried ſmall boats as a token of their foreign origin, and from that account they were called σκαφηφοροι boat bearers. After them came the women attended by the wives of the foreigners called ὑδριαφοροι, becauſe they carried water-pots. Next to theſe came young men crowned with millet and ſinging hymns to the godddeſs, and after them followed ſelect virgins of the nobleſt families, called κανηφοροι, baſket bearers, becauſe they carried baſkets, in which were certain things neceſſary for the celebration with whatever utenſils were alſo requiſite. Theſe ſeveral neceſſaries were generally in the poſſeſſion of the chief manager of the feſtival called ἀρχιθεωρος, who diſtributed them when occaſion offered. The virgins were attended by the daughters of the foreigners, who carried umbrellas and little ſeats, from which they were named διφρηφοροι, ſeat carriers. The boys, called παιδαγωγοι, as it may be ſuppoſed, led the reſt cloathed in coats generally worn at proceſſions. The neceſſaries for this and every other feſtival were prepared in a public hall erected for that purpoſe, between the Piræan gate and the temple of Ceres. The management and the care of the whole was entruſted to the νομοφυλακες, or people employed in ſeeing the rites and ceremonies properly obſerved. It was alſo uſual to ſet all priſoners at liberty, and to preſent golden crowns to ſuch as had deſerved well of their country. Some perſons were alſo choſen to ſing ſome of Homer's poems, a cuſtom which was firſt introduced by Hipparchus the ſon of Piſiſtratus. It was alſo cuſtomary in this feſtival and every other quinquennial feſtival, to pray for the proſperity of the Plataeans, whoſe ſervices had been ſo conſpicuous at the battle of Marathon.

PANCHÆA, PANCHÆA or PANCHAIA, an iſland of Arabia Felix, where Jupiter had a magnificent temple.——A part of Arabia Felix, celebrated for the myrrh, frankincenſe, and perfumes which it produced. Virg. G. 2, v. 139. l. 4, v. 379.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 309, &c.—Diod. 5.

PANDA, two deities at Rome, who preſided one over the openings of roads; and the other over the openings of towns. Varro de P. R. 1.

PANDAMA, a girl of India favored by Hercules, &c. Polyæn 1.

PANDĂRIA, a ſmall iſland of the Tyrrhene ſea.

PANDĂRUS, a ſon of Lycaon, who aſſiſted the Trojans in their war againſt the Greeks. He went to the war without a chariot and therefore he generally fought on foot. He broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans, and wounded Menelaus and Diomedes, and ſhewed himſelf brave and uncommonly courageous. He was at laſt killed by Diomedes; and Æneas, who then carried him in his chariot, by attempting to revenge his death nearly periſhed by the hand of the furious enemy. Dictys, Cret. 2, c. 35.—Homer. Il. 2 & 5.—Hygin. fab. 112.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 495.—Strab. 14.——A ſon of Alcanor killed with his brother Bitias by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 735.—A native of Crete puniſhed with death for being acceſſary to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, ſuppoſe that Tantalus ſtole the ambroſia and the nectar from the tables of the gods to which he had been admitted, or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crime Pandarus was concerned, and for which he ſuffered. Pandarus had two daughters Camiro and Clytia, who were alſo deprived of their mother by a ſudden death, and left without friends or protectors. Venus had compaſſion upon them and ſhe fed them with milk, honey and wine. The Goddeſſes were all equally intereſted in their welfare. Juno gave them wiſdom and beauty, Diana a handſome figure and regular features, and Minerva inſtructed them in whatever domeſtic accompliſhments can recommend a wife. Venus wiſhed ſtill to make their happineſs more complete, and when they were come to nubile years the goddeſs prayed Jupiter to grant them kind and tender huſbands. But in her abſence the Harpyies carried away the virgins and delivered them to the Eumenides to ſhare the puniſhment which their father ſuffered. Pauſ. 10, c. 30.—Pindar.

PANDĂRUS or PANDAREUS, a man who had a daughter called Philomela. She was changed into a nightingale, after ſhe had killed, by miſtake, her ſon Itylus, whoſe death ſhe mourned in the greateſt melancholy. Some ſuppoſe him to be the ſame as Pandion, king of Athens.

PANDATES, a friend of Datames at the court of Artaxerxes. C. Nep. in Dat.

PANDĒMUS, one of the ſirnames of the god of love, among the Egyptians and the Greeks, who diſtinguiſhed two Cupids, one of whom was the vulgar called Pandemus, and another of a purer and more celeſtial origin. Plut. in erot.

PANDIA, a feſtival at Athens eſtabliſhed by Pandion, from whom it received its name, or becauſe it was obſerved in honor of Jupiter, who can τα παντα διγειν, move and turn all things as he pleaſes. Some ſuppoſe that it concerned the moon, becauſe it does παντοτε ιεναι, move inceſſantly by ſhewing itſelf day and night, rather than the ſun which never appears but in the day time. It was celebrated after the Dionyſia, becauſe Bacchus is ſometimes taken for the ſun or Apollo, and therefore the brother, or, as ſome will have it, the ſon of the moon.

PANDĬON, a king of Athens, ſon of Erichthon and Paſithea, who ſucceeded his father, B. C. 1437. He became father of Procne and Philomela, Erechtheus and Butes. During his reign there was ſuch an abundance of corn, wine and oil, that it was publicly reported that Bacchus and Minerva had perſonally viſited Attica. He waged a ſucceſsful war againſt Labdacus king of Bœotia, and gave his daughter Procne in marriage to Tereus, king of Thrace, who had aſſiſted him. The treatment which Philomela received from her brother-in-law, Tereus, (Vid. Philomela) was the ſource of infinite grief to Pandion, and he died thro' exceſs of ſorrow, after a reign of 40 years. There was alſo another Pandion, ſon of Cecrops 2d. by Metiaduca, who ſucceeded to his father, B. C. 130. He was driven from his paternal dominions and fled to Pylas, king of Megara, who gave him his daughter Pelia in marriage and reſigned his crown to him. Pandion became father of four children, Ægeus, Pallas, Niſus and Lycus. The eldeſt of theſe children recovered his father's kingdom. Some authors have confounded the two Pandions together in ſuch an indiſcriminative manner, that they ſeem to have been only one and the ſame perſon. Many believe that Philomela and Procne were the daughters, not of Pandion the 1ſt. but of Pandion the 2d. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 676.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 48.——A ſon of Phineus and Cleopatra.——A ſon of Ægyptus.——A king of the Indies in the age of Auguſtus.

PANDŌRA, a celebrated woman, the firſt mortal female that ever lived, according to the opinion of the poet Heſiod. She was made with clay by Vulcan, at the requeſt of Jupiter who wiſhed to puniſh the impiety and artifice of Prometheus by giving him a wife. When this woman of clay had been made by the artiſt and received life, all the gods vied in making her preſents. Venus gave her beauty and the art of pleaſing; the Graces gave her the power of captivating, Apollo taught her how to ſing. Mercury inſtructed her in eloquence, and Minerva gave her the moſt rich and ſplendid ornaments. From all theſe valuable preſents, which ſhe had received from the gods, the woman was called Pandora, which intimates that ſhe had received every neceſſary gift, παν δωρον. Jupiter after this gave her a beautiful box, which ſhe was ordered to preſent to the man who married her, and by the commiſſion of the god, Mercury conducted her to Prometheus. The artful mortal was ſenſible of the deceit, and as he had always diſtruſted Jupiter, as well as the reſt of the gods, ſince he had ſtolen fire away from the ſun to animate his man of clay, he ſent away Pandora without ſuffering himſelf to be captivated by her charms. His brother Epimetheus was not poſſeſſed of the ſame prudence and ſagacity. He married Pandora, and when he opened the box which ſhe preſented to him, there iſſued from it a multitude of evils and diſtempers, which diſperſed themſelves all over the world, and which from that fatal moment have never ceaſed to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one who remained at the bottom of the box, and it is ſhe alone who has the wonderful power of eaſing the labors of man, and of rendering his troubles and his ſorrows leſs painful in life. Heſiod. Theog. & Dieſ.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Pauſ. 1, c. 24.—Hygin. 14.——A daughter of Erechtheus king of Athens. She was ſiſter to Protogenia, who ſacrificed herſelf for her country at the begining of the Bœotian war.

PANDOSIA, a town in the country of the Brutii, ſituate on a mountain. Alexander king of the Moloſſi died there. Strab. 6.——A town of Epirus.

PANDRŌSOS, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, ſiſter to Aglauros and Herſe. She was the only one of the ſiſters, who had not the fatal curioſity to open a baſket which Minerva had entruſted to their care, [Vid. Erichthonius,] for which ſincerity a temple was raiſed to her, near that of Minerva, and a feſtival inſtituted in her honor, called Pandroſia. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 738.—Apollod. 3.—Pauſ. 1, &c.

PANENUS or PANÆUS, a celebrated painter who was for ſometime engaged in painting the battle of Marathon. Plin. 35.

PANGÆUS, a mountain of Thrace, antiently called Mons Caraminus, and joined to Mount Rhodope near the ſources of the river Neſtus. It was inhabited by four different nations. It was on this mountain that Lycurgus the Thracian king was torn to pieces, and that Orpheus called the attention of the wild beaſts, and of the mountains and woods to liſten to his ſong. It abounded in gold and ſilver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 16, &c. l. 7, c. 113—Virg. G. 4, v. 462.—Ovid. Faſt. 3.—Thucyd. 2.

PANIASIS, a man who wrote a poem upon Hercules, &c. Vid. Panyaſis.

PANIONIUM, a place at the foot of mount Mycale, near the town of Epheſus in Aſia Minor, ſacred to Neptune of Helice. It was in this place that all the ſtates of Ionia aſſembled, either to conſult for their own ſafety and proſperity, or to celebrate feſtivals, or to offer a ſacrifice for the good of all the nation, whence the name, πανιωνιον, all Ionia. The deputies of the twelve Ionian cities which aſſembled there were thoſe of Miletus, Myus, Priene, Epheſus, Lebedos, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Phocæa, Teos, Chios, Samos and Erythræ. If the bull offered in ſacrifice bellowed it was accounted an omen of the higheſt favor, as the ſound was particularly acceptable to the god of the ſea, as in ſome manner it reſembled the roaring of the waves of the ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 148, &c.—Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 17.

PANIUS, a place of Cœlo-Syria where Antiochus defeated Scopas. B. C. 198.

PANNŌNIA, a large country of Europe, bounded on the eaſt by Upper Mœſia, ſouth by Dalmatia, weſt by Noricum, and north by by the Danube. It was divided by the antients into Lower and Upper Pannonia. The inhabitants were of Celtic origin, and were firſt invaded by J. Cæſar, and conquered in the reign of Tiberius. Philip and his ſon Alexander ſome ages before had ſucceſſively conquered it. Sirmium was the antient capital of all Pannonia, which contains the modern provinces of Croatia, Carniola, Sclavonia, Boſnia, Windiſch, March, with part of Servia, and of the kingdoms of Hungary and Auſtria. Plin. 3.—Dion. Caſſ. 49.—Strab. 4 & 7.—Jornand.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.

Panomphæus, a ſirname of Jupiter, either becauſe he was worſhiped by every nation on earth, or becauſe he heard the prayers and the ſupplications which were addreſſed to him, or becauſe the reſt of the gods derived from him their knowledge of futurity (πας, omnis, ομφη, vox.) Ovid. Met. 11, v. 198.—Homer. Il. 8.

Panope or Panopea, one of the Nereides, whom ſailors generally invoked in ſtorms. Her name ſignifies, giving every aſſiſtance, or ſeeing every thing. Heſiod. Theog. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825—— One of the daughters of Theſpius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—A town of Phocis. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 19.

Panopes, a famous huntſman among the attendants of Aceſtes, king of Sicily, who was one of thoſe that engaged in the games exhibited by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, c. 300.

Panopeus, a ſon of Phocus and Aſterodia, who accompanied Amphitryon when he made war againſt the Teleboans. He was father to Epeus, who made the celebrated wooden horſe at the ſiege of Troy. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 2, v. 4.—— A town of Phocis, between Orchomenos and the Cephiſus. Pauſ. 10, c. 4.—Strab. 9.

Panopion, a Roman ſaved from death by the uncommon fidelity of his ſervant. When the aſſaſſins came to murder him as being proſcribed, the ſervant exchanged cloaths with his maſter, and let him eſcape by a back-door. He afterwards went into his maſter's bed, and ſuffered himſelf to be killed as if Panopion himſelf. Val. Max.

Panopolis, the city of Pan, a town of Egypt, called alſo Chemmis. Pan had there a temple, where he was worſhipped with great ſolemnity, and repreſented in a ſtatue faſcino longiſſimo & erecto. Diod. 5.—Strab. 17.

Panormus, a town of Sicily, built by the Phœnicians, on the north weſt part of the iſland, with a good and capacious harbour. It was the ſtrongeſt hold of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and it was at laſt taken with difficulty by the Romans. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ital. 14, v. 262.—— A town of the Thracian Cherſoneſus.—— A town of Ionia, near Epheſus—— another in Crete ——in Macedonia,—— Achaia,——Samos, —a Meſſenian who inſulted the religion of the Lacedæmonians. Vid. Gonippus.

Pansa C. Vibius, a Roman conſul who with A. Hirtius purſued the murderers of J. Cæſar, and was killed in a battle near Mutina. On his death-bed he adviſed young Octavius to unite his intereſt with that of Antony, if he wiſhed to revenge the death of Julius Cæſar, and from his friendly advice ſoon after roſe the celebrated ſecond triumvirate. Some ſuppoſe that Panſa was put to death by Octavius himſelf, or through him, by the phyſician Glicon, who poured poiſon into the wounds of his patient. Panſa and Hirtius were the two laſt conſuls who enjoyed the dignity of chief magiſtrates of Rome, with full power. The authority of the conſuls afterwards dwindled into a ſhadow. Paterc. 2, c. 6.—Dio. 46.—Ovid. Triſt. 3, e. l. 5.—Plut. & Appian.

Pantagnostus, a brother of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. Polyæn. 1.

PAPIRIUS, a centurion engaged to murder Piſo, the pro-conſul of Africa. Tacit. Hiſt. 4, c. 49.—A patrician, choſen rex ſacrorum, after the expulſion of the Tarquins from Rome.—A Roman who wiſhed to gratify his unnatural deſires upon the body of one of his ſlaves called Publilius. The ſlave refuſed, and was inhumanly treated. This called for the interference of juſtice, and a decree was made, which forbad any perſon to be detained in fetters, but only for a crime that deſerved ſuch a treatment, and only till the criminal had ſuffered the puniſhment which the laws directed. Creditors alſo had a right to arreſt the goods, and not the perſon of their debtors. Liv. 8, c. 28.—Carbo, a Roman conſul who undertook the defence of Opimius, who was accuſed of condemning and putting to death a number of citizens on mount Aventinus without the formalities of a trial. His client was acquitted.—Curſor, a man who firſt erected a ſun-dial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome, B. C. 293; from which time the days began to be divided into hours.—A dictator who ordered his maſter of horſe to be put to death, becauſe he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic without his conſent. The people interfered, and the dictator pardoned him.

him. Curſor madewar againſt the Sabines and conquered them, and alſo triumphed over the Samnites. His great ſeverity diſpleaſed the people. He floriſhed about 320 years before the chriſtian era. Liv. 9, c. 14.——One of his family ſirnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilſt he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father of the ſame name, carried him to the ſenate-houſe, where affairs of the greateſt importance were then in debate before the ſenators. The mother of young Papirius wiſhed to know what had paſſed in the ſenate, but Papirius unwilling to betray the ſecrets of that auguſt aſſembly, amuſed his mother by telling her, that it had been conſidered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one huſband, than two huſbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and ſhe communicated the ſecret to the other Roman matrons, and on the morrow they aſſembled in the ſenate, petitioning that one woman might have two huſbands, rather than one huſband two wives. The ſenators were aſtoniſhed at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole myſtery, and from that time it was made a law among the ſenators, that no young man ſhould for the future be introduced into the ſenate-houſe, except Papirius. This law was carefully obſerved till the age of Auguſtus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the ſenators.——Carbo, a friend of Cinna and Marius. At his return to Rome, he was refuſed a triumph, upon which he introduced a triumphal proceſſion, and walked with his victorious army to the capitol, wearing a crown of myrtle on his head. His example was afterwards followed by ſuch generals as were refuſed a triumph by the Roman ſenate. Val. Max. 3, c. 6.

Papiria lex, by Papirius Carbo, A. U. C. 621. It required that in paſſing or rejecting laws in the comitia, the votes ſhould be given on tablets.——Another by the tribune Papirius, which enacted that no perſon ſhould conſecrate any edifice, place, or thing, without the conſent and permiſſion of the people.——Another A. U. C. 563, to diminiſh the weight, and increaſe the value of the Roman as.——Another A. U. C. 421, to give the freedom of the city to the citizens of Acerræ.——Another A. U. C. 623. It was propoſed, but not paſſed. It recommended the right of chuſing a man tribune of the people as often as he wiſhed.

Pappia lex was enacted to ſettle the rights of huſbands and wives if they had no children.——Another by which a perſon leſs than 50 years old, could not marry another of 60.

Parasia, a country at the eaſt of Media.

Parasius a ſon of Philonomia by a ſhepherd. He was expoſed on Erymanthus by his mother, with his twin brother Lycaſtus. Their lives were preſerved.

Parcæ, powerful goddeſſes who preſided over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number, Clotho, Lacheſis and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Heſiod, or of Jupiter and Themis, according to the ſame poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the ſea. Clotho, the youngeſt of the ſiſters, preſided over the moment in which we are born, and held a diſtaff in her hand. Lacheſis ſpun out all the events and actions of our life, and Atropos, the eldeſt of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of ſciſſars. Their different functions are well expreſſed in this antient verſe:

Clotho colum retinet, Lacheſis net, & Atropos occat.

The name of the Parcæ according to Varro, is derived a partu or parturiendo, becauſe they preſided over the birth of men, and by corrup-obſcruption the word parca is formed from parta or partus. The power of the Parcæ was great and extenſive. Some ſuppoſe that they were ſubjected to none of the gods but Jupiter, whilſt others ſupport that even Jupiter himſelf was obedient to their commands, and indeed we ſee the father of the gods in Homer's Iliad unwilling to ſee Patroclus periſh, yet obliged by the ſuperior power of the Fates to abandon him to his deſtiny. According to the more received opinions, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befals us in the world, immediately proceeds from the Fates or Parcæ. Some make them miniſters of the king of hell, and repreſent them as ſitting at the foot of his throne, others repreſent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidſt the celeſtial ſpheres, cloathed in robes ſpangled with ſtars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pauſanias, the names of the Parcæ were different from thoſe already mentioned. The moſt ancient of all, as the geographer obſerves, was Venus Urania who preſided over the birth of men, the ſecond was Fortune, Ilithyia was the third. To theſe ſome add a fourth, Proſerpina, who often diſputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worſhip of the Parcæ was well eſtabliſhed in ſome cities of Greece and though mankind were well convinced that they were inexorable, and that it was impoſſible to mitigate them, yet they were eager to ſhew a proper reſpect to their divinity, by raiſing them temples and ſtatues. They received the ſame worſhip as the Furies, and their votaries yearly ſacrificed to them black ſheep, during which ſolemnity the prieſts were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Parcæ were generally repreſented as three old women with chaplets made with wool, and interwoven with the flowers of the Narciſſus. They were covered with a white robe, and fillet of the ſame color, bound with chaplets. One of them held a diſtaff, another the ſpindle, and the third was armed with ſciſſars, with which ſhe cut the thread which her ſiſters had ſpun. Their dreſs is differently repreſented by ſome authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of ſeven ſtars. She holds a diſtaff in her hand reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lacheſis wore, was variegated with a great number of ſtars, and near her were placed a variety of ſpindles. Atropos was cloathed in black ſhe held ſciſſars in her hand, with clues of thread of different ſize, according to the length and ſhortneſs of the lives, whoſe deſtinies they ſeemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the invention of theſe Greek letters α, β, η, τ, υ, and others call them the ſecretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Parcæ by the different names of μοιρα, αισα, κηρ, ειμαρμενη, which are expreſſive of their power and of their inexorable decrees. *Heſiod, Theog. & ſcut. PARIS, the ſon of Priam king of Troy, by Hecuba, alſo called Alexander. He was deſtined, even before his birth to become the ruin of his country, and when his mother in the firſt months of her pregnancy had dreamed that ſhe ſhould bring forth a torch which would ſet fire to her palace, the ſoothſayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future ſon, and which would end in the deſtruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent ſo great and ſo alarming an evil, ordered his ſlave Archelaus to deſtroy the child as ſoon as born. The ſlave, either touched with humanity or influenced by Hecuba, did not deſtroy him, but was ſatisfied to expoſe him on mount Ida, where the ſhepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own ſon. Some attribute the preſervation of his life before he was found by the ſhepherds, to the motherly tenderneſs of a ſhe bear who ſuckled him. Young Paris, though educated among ſhepherds and peaſants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity, and from his care in protecting the flocks of mount Ida againſt the rapacity of the wild beaſts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). He gained the eſteem of all the ſhepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favor of Œnone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married, and with whom he lived with the moſt perfect tenderneſs. Their conjugal peace was ſoon diſturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddeſs of diſcord, who had not been invited to partake of the entertainment, ſhewed her diſpleaſure, by throwing into the aſſembly of the gods who were at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple, on which were written the words Detur pulchreori. All the goddeſſes claimed it as their own, the contention at firſt became general, but at laſt only three, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, wiſhed to diſpute their reſpective right to beauty. The gods, unwilling to become arbiters in an affair of ſo tender and ſo delicate a nature, appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty to the faireſt of the goddeſſes, and indeed the ſhepherd ſeemed properly qualified to decide ſo great a conteſt, as his wiſdom was ſo well eſtabliſhed, and his prudence and ſagacity ſo well known. The goddeſſes appeared before their judge without any covering or ornament, and each tried by promiſes and entreaties to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promiſed him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the faireſt woman in the world for his wife, as Ovid expreſſes it, Heroid. 17, v. 118.

Unaque cum regnum; belli daret altera laudem;
Tyndaridis conjux, Tertia dixit, eris.

After he had heard their ſeveral claims and promiſes, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus, and gave her the golden apple, to which, perhaps, ſhe ſeemed entitled, as the goddeſs of beauty. This deciſion of Paris in favor of Venus, drew upon the judge and his family the reſentment of the two other goddeſſes. Soon after Priam propoſed a conteſt among his ſons and other princes, and promiſed to reward the conqueror with one of the fineſt bulls of mount Ida. His emiſſaries were ſent to procure the animal, and it was found in the poſſeſſion of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The ſhepherd was deſirous of obtaining again this favorite animal, and he went to Troy and entered the liſts of the combatants. He was received with the greateſt applauſe, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Neſtor, the ſon of Neleus; Cycnus, ſon of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Deiphobus, ſons of Priam. He alſo obtained a ſuperiority over Hector himſelf, and the prince enraged to ſee himſelf conquered by an unknown ſtranger, purſued him cloſely, and Paris muſt have fallen a victim to his brother's reſentment, had he not fled to the altar of Jupiter. This ſacred retreat preſerved his life, and Caſſandra the daughter of Priam ſtruck with the ſimilarity of the features of Paris with thoſe of her brothers, enquired his birth and his age. From theſe circumſtances ſhe ſoon diſcovered that he was her brother, and as ſuch ſhe introduced him to her father and to her brothers. Priam acknowledged Paris as his ſon, forgetful of the alarming dreams which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealouſy ceaſed among the brothers. Paris did not long ſuffer himſelf to remain inactive, he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Heſione his father's ſiſter whom Hercules had carried away and oblig'd to marry Telamon the ſon of Æacus. This was the pretended motive of his voyage, but the cauſes were far different. Paris recollected that he was to be the huſband of the faireſt of women, and if he had been led to form thoſe expectations while he was an obſcure ſhepherd of Ida, he had now every plauſible reaſon to ſee them realized ſince he was acknowledged ſon of the king of Troy. Helen was the faireſt woman of the age, and Venus had promiſed her to him. On theſe grounds, therefore, he viſited Sparta, the reſidence of Helen who had married Menelaus. He was received with every mark of reſpect, but he abuſed the hoſpitality of Menelaus, and while the huſband was abſent in Crete, Paris perſuaded Helen to elope with him, and to fly to Aſia. Helen conſented, and Priam received her into his palace without difficulty, as his ſiſter was then detained in a foreign country, and as he wiſhed to ſhow himſelf as hoſtile as poſſible to the Greeks. This affair was ſoon productive of ſerious conſequences. When Menelaus had married Helen, all her ſuitors had bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath to protect her perſon, and to defend her from every violence, [Vid. Helena] and therefore the injured huſband reminded them of their engagements, and called upon them to recover Helen. Upon this all Greece took up arms in the cauſe of Menelaus, Agamemnon was choſen general of all the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. [Vid. Troja.] Paris, mean while, who had refuſed Helen to the petitions and embaſſies of the Greeks, armed himſelf with his brothers and ſubjects to oppoſe the enemy; but the ſucceſs of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and at the very ſight of Menelaus whom he had ſo recently injured all his reſolution vaniſhed, and he retired from the front of the army where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus, which he undertook by means of his brother Hector, Paris muſt have periſhed had not Venus interfered and ſtolen him from the reſentment of his adverſary. He nevertheleſs wounded in another battle Machaon, Euryphilus and Diomedes, and according to ſome opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. [Vid. Achilles.] The death of Paris is differently related, ſome ſuppoſe that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the poſſeſſion of Hercules, and that when he found himſelf languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himſelf to be carried to the feet of Œnone whom he

he had baſely abandoned, and who in the years of his obſcurity had foretold him that he would ſolicit her aſſiſtance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the preſence of Œnone, and the nymph ſtill mindful of their former loves threw herſelf upon his body and ſtabbed herſelf to the heart after ſhe had plentifully bathed it with her tears. According to ſome authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponneſus, but he was driven on the coaſts of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta he kept Helen at his court and permitted Paris to retire. Parmenides, a Greek philoſopher of Elis, who floriſhed about 505 years before Chriſt. He was the pupil of Xenophanes, or Anaximander according to ſome. He maintained, that there were only two elements, fire and the earth; and he taught that the firſt generation of men was produced from the ſun. He firſt diſcovered that the earth was round, and that it was placed in the centre of the univerſe. There were, as he ſuppoſed, only two ſorts of philoſophy——one founded on reaſon, and the other on opinion. He digeſted this unpopular ſyſtem in verſes, of which a few fragments remain. Diog.

Parmenio, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his perſon as a man than as a monarch. When Darius king of Perſia, offered Alexander all the country which lies at the weſt of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occaſion to obſerve, that he would without heſitation accept of theſe conditions if he were Alexander, ſo would I, were I Parmenio, replied Alexander. This friendſhip ſo true and inviolable, was ſacrificed to a moment of reſentment and ſuſpicion, and Alexander who had too eagerly liſtened to a light and perhaps a falſe accuſation, ordered Parmenio and his ſon to be put to death, as if guilty of treaſon againſt his perſon. Parmenio was in the 70th year of his age, B. C. 330. He died in the greateſt popularity, and it has been judiciouſly obſerved, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt. 7, &c.—— Plut. in Alex.

Parnassus, a mountain of Phocis, antiently called Larnaſſos, from the boat of Deucalion λαρναξ, which was carried there in the univerſal deluge. It received the name of Parnaſſus from Parnaſſus the ſon of Neptune, by Cleobula, and was ſacred to the Muſes, and to Apollo and Bacchus. The ſoil was barren, but the vallies and the green woods that covered its ſides, rendered it agreeable and fit for ſolitude and meditation. Parnaſſus is one of the higheſt mountains of Europe, and it is eaſily ſeen from the citadel of Corinth, though at the diſtance of about 80 miles. According to the computation of the antients, it is one day's journey round. At the north of Parnaſſus, there is a large plain about eight miles in circumference. The mountain, according to the poets, had only two tops called Hyampea and Tithorea, on one of which the city of Delphi is ſituated. Strab. 8, 9.——Mela. 2, c. 3.——*Ovid. Paros, a celebrated iſland among the Cyclades, about 7 miles ½ diſtant from Naxos, and 28 from Delos. According to Pliny, it is half as large as Naxos, that is, about 36 or 37 miles in circumference, a meaſure which ſome of the moderns have extended extended to 50 and even 80 miles. It has borne the different names of Pactia, Minoa, Hiria, Demetrias, Zacynthus, Cabarnis, and Hyleussa. It received the name of Paros, which it still bears, from Paros, a son of Jason, or as some maintain of Parrhasius. The island of Paros was rich and powerful, and well known for its famous marble, which was always used by the best statuaries. The best quarries were those of Marpesus, a mountain where still caverns of the most extraordinary depth, are seen by modern travellers, and admired as the sources from whence the labyrinth of Egypt, and the porticoes of Greece received their splendor. According to Pliny, the quarries were so uncommonly deep, that in the clearest weather the workmen were obliged to use lamps, from which circumstance the Greeks have called the marble Lychnites, worked by the light of lamps. Paros is also famous for the fine cattle which it produces, and for its partridges, and wild pidgeons. The capital city was called Paros. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians, and afterwards a colony of Cretans settled in it. The Athenians made war against it, because it had assisted the Persians in the invasion of Greece, and took it, and it became a Roman province in the age of Pompey. Archilochus was born there. The Parian marbles, perhaps better known by the appellation of Arundelian, were engraved in this island in capital letters, B. C. 264, and as a valuable chronicle preserved the most celebrated epochas of Greece from the year 1582, B. C. These valuable pieces of antiquity were procured originally by M. de Peirisc, a Frenchman, and afterwards purchased by the earl of Arundel, by whom they were given to the university of Oxford, where they are still to be seen. Prideaux published an account of all the inscriptions in 1676. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—C. Nep. in Milt. & Alc.—Virg. Æn. 105, v. 7. 3, v. 125.—*Ovid. Parrhasia, a town of Arcadia, founded by Parrhasius, the son of Jupiter. The Arcadians are sometimes called Parrhasians, and Arcas Parrhasis. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 334.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 315.—Paus. 8, c. 27.

Parrhasius, a famous painter of Ephesus in the age of Zeuxis, about 415 years before Christ. He was a great master of his profession, and particularly excelled in strongly expressing the violent passions. He was blessed with a great genius, and much invention, and he was peculiarly happy in his designs. He acquired himself great reputation by his pieces, but by none more than that in which he allegorically represented the people of Athens, with all the injustice, the clemency, the fickleness, timidity, the arrogance and inconsistency which so eminently characterized that celebrated nation. He once entered the lists against Zeuxis, and when they had produced their respective pieces, the birds came to pick with the greatest avidity the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Immediately Parrhasius exhibited his piece, and Zeuxis said, remove your curtain that we may see the painting. The curtain was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himself conquered by exclaiming, Zeuxis has deceived birds, but Parrhasius has deceived Zeuxis himself. Parrhasius grew so vain of his art, that he cloathed himself in purple, and wore a crown of gold, calling himself the king of painters. He was lavish in his own praises, and by his vanity too often exposed himself to the ridicule of his enemies. Phot. in Thes. de Poet. aud.—Paus. 1, c. 28.—Plin. 35, v. 10.—Horat. 4, od. 8.——A son of Jupiter, or according to some, of Mars, by a nymph called Philonomia.

Parthaon, a son of Agenor and Epicaste, who married Euryte, daughter of Hippodamus, by whom he had many children, among whom were Œneus and Sterope. Parthaon was brother to Demonice, the mother of Evenus by Mars, and also to Molus, Pylus, and Thestius. He is called Portheus by Homer. Il. 14.——Apollod. 1, c. 7.——Hygin, fab. 129 & 239.——A son of Peripetus and father of Arista. Paus. 8.

Partheniæ & Parthenii, a certain number of desperate citizens of Sparta. During the Messenian war the Spartans were absent from their city, for the space of ten years, and it was unlawful for them to return, as they had bound themselves by a solemn oath not to revisit Sparta before they had totally subdued Messenia. This long absence alarmed the Lacedæmonian women, as well as the magistrates. The Spartans were reminded by their wives that if they continued in their resolution the state must at last decay for want of citizens, and when they had duly considered this embassy, they empowered all the young men in the army who had come to the war while yet under age, and who therefore were not bound by the oath, to return to Sparta, and by a familiar and promiscuous intercourse with all the unmarried women of the state, to raise a future generation. It was carried into execution and the children that sprang from this union were called Partheniæ, sons of virgins, (παρθένοι.) The war with Messenia was some time after ended, and the the Spartans returned victorious; but the cold indifference with which they looked upon the Partheniæ was attended with ſerious conſequences. The Partheniæ knew they had no legitimate fathers, and no inheritance, and that therefore their life depended upon their own exertions. This drove them almoſt to deſpair. They joined with the Helots, whoſe maintenance was as precarious as their own, and it was mutually agreed to murder all the citizens of Sparta, and to ſeize their poſſeſſions. This maſſacre was to be done at a general aſſembly, and the ſignal was the throwing of a cap in the air. The whole, however, was diſcovered thro' the diffidence and apprehenſions of the Helots, and when the people had aſſembled, the Partheniæ diſcovered that all was known, by the voice of a crier, who proclaimed that no man ſhould throw up his cap. The Partheniæ, tho' apprehenſive of puniſhment, were not viſibly treated with greater ſeverity; their calamitous condition was attentively examined, and the Spartans, afraid of another conſpiracy and awed by their numbers, permitted them to ſail for Italy with Phalantus their ring-leader at their head. They ſettled in Magna Græcia, and built Tarentum, about 707 years before Chriſt. Juſtin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6. Paſ. in Lacon, &c.—Plut. in Apoph.

PARTHENON, a temple of Athens, ſacred to Minerva. It was deſtroyed by the Perſians, and afterwards rebuilt by Pericles, in a more magnificent manner. All the circumſtances which related to the birth of Minerva were beautifully and minutely repreſented in baſs-relief, on the front of the entrance. The ſtatue of the goddeſs was 26 cubits high, and made of gold and ivory. It paſſed for one of the maſter pieces of Phidias. Plin. 34.

PARTHIA, a celebrated country of Aſia, bounded on the weſt by Media, ſouth by Carmania, north by Hyrcania, and eaſt by Aria, &c. containing according to Ptolemy, 25 large cities, the moſt capital of which was called Hecatompylos, from its hundred gates. Some ſuppoſe that the preſent capital of the country is built on the ruins of Hecatompylos. According to ſome authors the Parthians were Scythians by origin, who made an invaſion on the more ſouthern provinces of Aſia, and at laſt fixed their reſidence near Hyrcania. They long remained unknown and unnoticed, and became ſucceſſively tributary to the empire of the Aſſyrians, Medes, and Perſians. When Alexander invaded Aſia, the Parthians ſubmitted, like the other dependent provinces of Perſia, and they were for ſome time under the power of Eumenes, Antigonus, Seleucus Nicanor, and Antiochus, till the rapacity and oppreſſion of Agathocles, a lieutenant of the latter rouſed their ſpirit, and fomented rebellion. Arſaces, a man of obſcure origin, but bleſſed with great military powers, placed himſelf at the head of his countrymen, and laid the foundation of the Parthian empire, about 250 years before the Chriſtian era. The Macedonians attempted in vain to recover it, a race of active and vigilant princes, who aſſumed the ſirnames of Arſacides from the founder of their kingdom, encreaſed its power, and rendered it ſo formidable, that it even diſputed the empire of the world with the Romans, and could never be ſubdued by that nation, which had ſeen no people on earth unconquered by their arms. It remained a kingdom till the reign of Artabanus, who was killed about the year 229, of the Chriſtian era, and from that time it became a province of the newly re-eſtabliſhed kingdom of Perſia, under Artaxerxes. The Parthians were naturally ſtrong and warlike, and were eſteemed the moſt expert horſemen and archers in the world. The peculiar cuſtom of diſcharging their arrows while they were retiring full ſpeed has been greatly celebrated by the antients, particularly by the poets, who all obſerve that their flight was more formidable than their attacks. This manner of fighting, and the wonderful addreſs, and dexterity with which it was performed, gained them many victories. They were addicted much to drinking, and to every manner of lewdneſs, and their laws permitted them to raiſe children even by their mothers and ſiſters Strab. 2, 6, &c.—Lucan. 3, 7, 8, &c.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—*Virg. PARYSĂTIS, a Perſian princeſs, wife of Darius Ochus, by whom ſhe had Artaxerxes Memnon, and Cyrus the younger. She was ſo extremely partial to her younger ſon, that ſhe committed the greateſt cruelties to encourage his ambition, and ſhe ſupported him with all her intereſt in his rebellion againſt his brother Memnon. The death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa, was revenged with the greateſt barbarity, and Paryſatis ſacrificed to her reſentment all ſuch as ſhe found concerned in his fall. She alſo poiſoned Statira the wife of her ſon Artaxerxes, and ordered one of the eunuchs of the court to be flead alive, and his ſkin to be ſtretched on two poles before her eyes, becauſe he had by order of the king, cut off the hand and the head of Cyrus. Theſe cruelties offended Artaxerxes, and he ordered his mother to be confined in Babylon, but they were ſoon after reconciled, and Paryſatis regained all her power and influence till the time of her death. Plut. in Art.—Cteſ.

PASIPHAE, a daughter of the Sun, and of Perſeis, who married Minos king of Crete. She diſgraced herſelf by her unnatural paſſion for a bull, which according to ſome authors, ſhe was enabled to gratify by means of the artiſt Dædalus. This celebrated bull had been given to Minos by Neptune, to be offered on his altars. But as the monarch refuſed to ſacrifice the animal on account of his beauty, the god revenged his diſobedience by inſpiring Paſiphae with an unnatural love for it. This fabulous tradition, which is univerſally believed by the poets, who obſerve that the minotaur was the fruit of this infamous commerce, is refuted by ſome writers, who ſuppoſe that the infidelity of Paſiphae to her huſband was betrayed in her affection for an officer called Taurus, and that Dædalus by permitting his houſe to be the aſylum of the two lovers, was looked upon as acceſſary to the gratification of Paſiphae's luſt. From this amour with Taurus, as it is farther remarked the queen became mother of twins, and the name of Minotaurus ariſes from the reſemblance of the children to the huſband and the lover of Paſiphae. Minos had four ſons, by Paſiphae, Caſtreus, Deucalion, Glaucus and Androgeus, and three daughters, Hecate, Ariadne, and Phædra. Patrŏclēs, a man who wrote an hiſtory of the world. Strab.

Patrŏclus, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, ſon of Menœtius, by Sthenele, whom ſome call Philomela, or Polymela. The accidental murder of Clyſonymus, the ſon of Amphidamas, in the time of his youth, obliged him to fly from Opus, where his father reigned. He retired to the court of Peleus king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the moſt intimate friendſhip with Achilles the monarch's ſon. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war Patroclus alſo accompanied them at the expreſs command of his father, who had viſited the court of Peleus, and he embarked with 10 ſhips from Phthia. He was the conſtant companion of Achilles, he lodged in the ſame tent, and when his friend refuſed to appear in the field of battle, becauſe he had been offended by Agamemnon, Patroclus imitated his example, and by his abſence was the cauſe of the overthrow of many Greeks. But at laſt Neſtor prevailed upon him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. The valor of Patroclus, together with the terror which the ſight of the arms of Achilles inſpired, ſoon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for ſafety. He would have broken down the walls of the city, but Apollo, who intereſted himſelf for the Trojans, placed himſelf to oppoſe him, and Hector, at the inſtigation of the god, diſmounted from his chariot to attack him, as he attempted to ſtrip one of the Trojans whom he had ſlain. The engagement was obſtinate, but at laſt Patroclus was overpowered by the valor of Hector, and the interpoſition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, and Hector would have ſevered his head from his body had not Ajax and Menelaus intervened. His body was at laſt recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the greateſt lamentations. His funeral was obſerved with the greateſt ſolemnity. Achilles ſacrificed near the burning pile twelve young Trojans, beſides four of his horſes and two of his dogs, and the whole was concluded by the exhibition of funeral games, in which the conquerors were liberally rewarded by Achilles. The death of Patroclus, as it is deſcribed by Homer, gave riſe to new events, Achilles forgot his reſentment againſt Agamemnon, and entered the field to avenge the fall of his friend, and his anger was gratified only by the ſlaughter of Hector, who had more powerfully kindled his wrath by appearing at the head of the Trojan armies in the armour which had been taken from the body of Patroclus. The patronymic of Actorides is often applied to Patroclus, becauſe Actor was father to Menœtius—Dictys, Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 9, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Hygin. fab. 97 & 275.—*Ovid. Patulcius, a ſirname of Janus, which he received a pateo, becauſe the doors of his temple were always open in the time of war. Some ſuppoſe that he received it becauſe he preſided over gates, or becauſe the year began by the celebration of his feſtivals. Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 129.

Paula, the firſt wife of the emperor Heliogabalus. She was daughter of the prefect of the pretorian guards. The emperor divorced her, and Paula retired to ſolitude and obſcurity with compoſure.

Paulina, a Roman lady who married Saturninus, a governor of Syria, in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius. Her conjugal peace was diſturbed, and violence was offered to her virtue by a young man called Mundus, who was enamoured of her and who had cauſed her to come to the temple of Iſis by means of the prieſts of the goddeſs, who declared that Anubis wiſhed to communicate to her ſomething of moment.

Saturninus complained to the emperor of the violence which had been offered to his wife, and the temple of Isis was overturned and Mundus banished, &c.——The wife of the philosopher Seneca, who attempted to kill herself, when Nero had ordered her husband to die. The emperor however prevented her, and she lived some few years after in the greatest melancholy. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 63, &c.——A sister of the emperor Adrian.——The wife of the emperor Maximinus.

Paulinus Pompeius, an officer in Nero's reign. Suetonius.——A Roman general, the first who crossed mount Atlas with an army. He wrote an history of this expedition in Africa which is lost. Paulinus also distinguished himself in Britain, &c. He followed the arms of Otho against Vitellius. Plin 5, c. 1.——Valerius, a friend of Vespasian.

Paulus Æmilius, a Roman celebrated for his victories, and surnamed Macedonicus from his conquest of Macedonia. In the early part of life he distinguished himself by his uncommon application, and by his fondness for military discipline. His first appearance in the field was attended with great success, and the barbarians that had revolted in Spain were reduced with the greatest facility under the power of the Romans. In his first consulship his arms were directed against the Ligurians whom he totally subjected. His applications for a second consulship proved abortive, but when Perseus the king of Macedonia had declared war against Rome, the abilities of Paulus were remembered and he was honored with the consulship about the 60th year of his age. After this appointment he behaved with uncommon vigor, and soon a general engagement was fought near Pydna. The Romans obtained the victory, and Perseus saw himself deserted by all his subjects. In two days the conqueror made himself master of all Macedonia, and soon after the fugitive monarch was brought into his presence. Paulus did not exult over his fallen enemy, but when he had gently rebuked him for his temerity in attacking the Romans, he addressed himself in a pathetic speech to the officers of his army who surrounded him, and feelingly enlarged on the instability of fortune, and the vicissitude of all human affairs. When he had finally settled the government of Macedonia with ten commissioners from Rome, and after he had sacked 70 cities of Epirus, and divided the booty amongst his soldiers Paulus returned to Italy. He was received with the usual acclamations, and though some of the seditious soldiers attempted to prevent his triumphal entry into the capitol, yet three days were appointed to exhibit the fruits of his victories. Perseus with his wretched family adorned the triumph of the conqueror, and as they were dragged through the streets before the chariot of Paulus, they drew tears of compassion from the people. The riches which the Romans derived from this conquest were immense, and the people were freed from all taxes till the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa; but while every one of the citizens received some benefit from the victories of Paulus, the conqeror himself was poor, and appropriated for his own use nothing of the Macedonian treasures except the library of Perseus. In the office of censor, to which he was afterwards elected, Paulus behaved with the greatest moderation, and at his death, which happened about 168 years before the Christian era, not only the Romans, but their very enemies confessed, by their lamentations, the loss which they had sustained. He had married Papiria, by whom he had two sons, one of which was adopted by the family of Maximus, and the other in that of Scipio Africanus. He had also two daughters, one of whom married a son of Cato, and the other Ælius Tubero. He afterwards divorced Papiria, and when his friends wished to reprobate his conduct in doing so, by observing that she was young and handsome, and that she had made him father of a fine family, Paulus replied that the shoe which he then wore was new and well made, but that he was obliged to leave it off, though no one but himself, as he said, knew where it pinched him. He married a second wife by whom he had two sons, whose sudden death exhibited to the Romans in the most engaging view, their father's philosophy and stoicism. The elder of these sons died five days before Paulus triumphed over Perseus, and the other three days after the public procession. This domestic calamity did not shake the firmness of the conqueror, yet before he retired to a private station, he harangued the people, and in mentioning the severity of fortune upon his family, he expressed his wish that every evil might be averted from the republic by the sacrifice of the domestic prosperity of an individual. Plut. in vitâ.—Liv. 43, 44, &c.—Justin 33, c. 1, &c.——Samosatemus, an author in the reign of Gallienus.——Maximus *Vid. Pavor, an emotion of the mind, which received divine honors among the Romans. Tullus Hoſtilius the third king of Rome, was the firſt who built her temples, and raiſed altars to her honor, as alſo to Pallor, the goddeſs of Paleneſs. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.

Pausanias, a Spartan general, who greatly ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Platæa, againſt the Perſians. The Greeks were very ſenſible of his ſervices, and they rewarded his merit with a tenth of the ſpoils taken from the Perſians. He was afterwards ſet at the head of the Spartan armies, and extended his conqueſts in Aſia, but the haughtineſs of his behaviour created him many enemies, and the Athenians ſoon obtained a ſuperiority in the affairs of Greece. Pauſanias was diſſatisfied with his countrymen, and he offered to betray Greece to the Perſians, if he received in marriage as the reward of his perfidy, the daughter of their monarch. His intrigues were diſcovered by means of a youth, who was intruſted with his letters to Perſia, and who refuſed to go, on the recollection that ſuch as had been employed in that office before had never returned. The letters were given to the Ephori of Sparta, and the perfidy of Pauſanias laid open. He fled for ſafety to a temple of Minerva, and as the ſanctity of the place ſcreened him from the violence of his purſuers, the ſacred building was ſurrounded with heaps of ſtones, the firſt of which was carried there by the indignant mother of the unhappy man. He was ſtarved to death in the temple, and died about 471 years before the Chriſtian era. There was a feſtival and ſolemn games inſtituted in his honor, in which only free born Spartans contended. There was alſo an oration ſpoken in his praiſe, in which his actions were celebrated, particularly the battle of Platæa, and the defeat of Mardonius. *C. This incenſed Pauſanias, he reſolved to revenge himſelf and when he had heard from his maſter Hermocrates the ſophiſt, that the moſt effectual way to render himſelf illuſtrious, was to murder a perſon who had ſignalized himſelf by uncommon actions; he ſtabbed Philip as he entered a public theatre. After this bloody action he attempted to make his eſcape to his chariot, which waited for him at the door of the city, but he was ſtopped accidentally by the twig of a vine and fell down. PAX, an allegorical divinity among the antients. The Athenians raised her a statue, which represented her as holding Plutus the god of wealth in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to prosperity and to opulence, and they were the first who erected an altar to her honor after the victories obtained by Timotheus over the Lacedæmonian power, tho' Plutarch asserts it had been done after the conquests of Cimon over the Persians. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian, built her a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire in the reign of Commodus. It was customary for men of learning to assemble in that temple, and even to deposit their writings there, as in a place of the greatest security. Therefore when it was burnt, not only books, but also many valuable things, jewels, and immense treasures were lost in the general conflagration. C. Nep. in Timoth. 2. Plut. in Cim.

PEGĂSIS, a nymph.

PEGĂSIUM STAGNUM, a lake near Ephesus, which arose from the earth, when Pegasus struck it with his foot.

PEGĂSUS, a winged horse sprung from the blood of Medusa, when Perseus had cut off her head. He received his name from his being born, according to Hesiod, near the sources (πηγαι) of the ocean. As soon as born he left the earth, and flew up into heaven, or rather, according to Ovid, he fixed his residence on mount Helicon, where by striking the earth with his foot, he instantly raised a fountain, which has been called Hippocrene. He became the favorite of the Muses, and being afterwards tamed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon to conquer the Chimæra. No sooner was this fiery monster destroyed, than Pegasus threw down his rider, because he was a mortal, or rather according to the more received opinion, because he attempted to fly to heaven. This act of temerity in Bellerophon, was punished by Jupiter, who sent an insect to torment Pegasus, which occasioned the melancholy fall of his rider. Pegasus continued his flight up to heaven, and was placed among the constellations by Jupiter. Perseus, according to Ovid, was mounted on the horse Pegasus, when he destroyed the sea monster, which was going to devour Andromache. Hesiod. Theog.—Horat. 4, od. 11,—*Homer. PELASGI, a people of Greece, supposed to be one of the most antient in the world. They first inhabited Argolis in Peloponnesus, which from them received the name of Pelasgia, and about 1883 years before the Christian æra, they passed into Ætolia, Æmonia, and were afterwards diſperſed in ſeveral parts of Greece. Some of them fixed their habitations in Epirus, others in Crete, others in Italy, and others in Leſbos. From theſe different changes of ſituation in the Pelaſgians, all the Greeks are indiſcriminately called Pelaſgians, and their country Pelaſgia, though more properly ſpeaking, it ſhould be confined to Theſſaly, Epirus, and Peloponneſus in Greece. Some of the Pelaſgians that had been driven from Attica, ſettled in Lemnos, where ſome time after they carried ſome Athenian women, whom they had ſeized in an expedition, on the coaſt of Attica. They raiſed ſome children by theſe captive females, but they afterwards deſtroyed them with their mothers, through jealouſy, becauſe they differed in manners, as well as language from them. This horrid murder was attended by a dreadful peſtilence, and they were ordered, to expiate their crime, to do whatever the Athenians commanded them. This was to deliver their poſſeſſions into their hands. The Pelaſgians ſeem to have received their name from Pelaſgus the firſt king, and founder of their nation. Pauſ. 8, c. 1.—Strab. 5.—Herodot. 1.—Plut. in Rom.—Virg. Æn. 1.—*Ovid. PELASGIA, or PELASGIOTIS, a country of Greece, whoſe inhabitants are called Pelaſgi, or Pelaſgiotæ. Every country of Greece, and all Greece in general is indiſcriminately called Pelaſgia, though the name ſhould be more particularly confined to a part of Theſſaly, ſituate between the Peneus, the Aliacmon and the Sperchius. The maritime borders of this part of Theſſaly, were afterwards called Magneſia, though the ſea or its ſhore ſtill retained the name of Pelaſgicus Sinus. Pelaſgia is alſo one of the antient names of Epirus, as alſo of Peloponneſus. Vid. Pelaſgi.

PELETHRONII, an epithet given to the Lapithæ, becauſe they inhabited the town of Pelethronium, at the foot of mount Pelion in Theſſaly; or becauſe one of their number bore the name of Pelethronius. It is to them that mankind are indebted for the invention of the bit with which they tamed their horſes with ſo much dexterity. Virg. G. 3, v. 115.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 452.—Lucan. 6, v. 387.

PELEUS, a king of Theſſaly, ſon of Æacus and Endeis, the daughter of Chiron. He married Thetis, one of the Nereids, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. He was acceſſary to the death of his brother Phocus, and on that account he was obliged to leave his father's dominions. He retired to the court of Eurytus, the ſon of Actor, who reigned at Phthia, or according to the leſs received opinion of Ovid, he fled to Ceyx, king of Trachinia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, with the uſual ceremonies, and the monarch gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Some time after this, Peleus and Eurytus went to the chaſe of the Calydonian boar, where the father-in-law was accidentally killed by an arrow which his ſon-in-law had aimed at the beaſt. This unfortunate event obliged him to baniſh himſelf from the court of Phthia, and he retired to Iolchos, where he was purified of the murder of Eurytus, by Acaſtus the king of the country. His reſidence at Iolchos, was ſhort, Aſtydamia, the wife of Acaſtus became enamoured of him and when ſhe found him inſenſible to her paſſionate declarations, ſhe accuſed him of attempts upon her virtue. The monarch partially believed the accuſations of his wife, but not to violate the laws of hoſpitality, by putting him inſtantly to death, he ordered his officers to conduct him to mount Pelion, on pretence of hunting, and there to tie him to a tree, that he might become the prey of the wild beaſts of the place. The orders of Acaſtus were faithfully obeyed, but Jupiter, who knew the innocence of his grandſon Peleus, ordered Vulcan to ſet him at liberty. As ſoon as he had been delivered from danger, Peleus aſſembled his friends to puniſh the ill-treatment which he had received from Acaſtus. He forcibly took Iolchos, drove the king from his poſſeſſions, and put to death the wicked Aſtydamia. After the death of Antigone, Peleus courted Thetis, of whoſe ſuperior charms, Jupiter himſelf had been enamoured. His pretenſions, however, were rejected, and as he was a mortal, the goddeſs fled from him with the greateſt abhorrence, and the more effectually to evade his enquiries, ſhe generally aſſumed the ſhape of a bird, or a tree, or of a tygreſs. Peleus became more animated from her refuſal, he offered a ſacrifice to the gods, and Proteus informed him that to obtain Thetis he muſt ſurprize her while ſhe was aſleep in her grotto, near the ſhores of Theſſaly. This advice was immediately followed, and Thetis unable to eſcape from the graſp of Peleus, at laſt conſented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity, and all the gods attended, and made them each the moſt valuable preſents. The goddeſs of diſcord was the only one of the deities who was not present, and she punished this seeming neglect by throwing an apple into the midst of the assembly of the gods, with the inscription of detur pulchriori [Vid. Discordia.] From the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was born Achilles, whose education was early entrusted to the Centaur Chiron, and afterwards to Phœnix, the son of Amyntor. Achilles went to the Trojan war, at the head of his father's troops, and Peleus gloried in having a son who was superior to all the Greeks in valor, and intrepidity. The death of Achilles was the source of grief to Peleus, and Thetis to comfort her husband, promised him immortality, and ordered him to retire into the grottos of the island of Leuce, where he would see and converse with the manes of his son. Peleus had a daughter called Polydora, by Antigone. *Homer. Il.—Eurip. in Androm.—Catull. de Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—Ovid. Heroid. 5. Fast. 2. PELIADES, the daughters of Pelias. Vid. Pelias.

PELIAS, the twin brother of Neleus, was son of Neptune by Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. His birth was concealed from the world by his mother, who wished her father to be ignorant of her incontinence. He was exposed in the woods, but his life was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Pelias, from a spot of the color of lead in his face. Sometime after this adventure, Tyro married Cretheus, son of Æolus, king of Iolchos, and became mother of three children, of whom Æson was the eldest. Meantime Pelias visited his mother, and was received in her family, and after the death of Cretheus, he unjustly seized the kingdom, which belonged to the children of Tyro, by the deceased monarch. To strengthen himself in his usurpation, Pelias consulted the oracle, and when he was told to beware of one of the descendants of Æolus, who should come to his court with one foot shod, and the other bare, he privately removed the son of Æson, after he had publicly declared that he was dead. These precautions proved abortive. Jason the son of Æson, who had been educated by Chiron, returned to Iolchos, when arrived to years of maturity, and as he had lost one of his shoes in crossing the river Anaurus or the Evenus, Pelias immediately perceived that this was the person whom he was advised so much to dread. His unpopularity prevented him from acting with violence against a stranger, whose uncommon dress, and commanding aspect, had raised admiration in his subjects. But his amusement was excited, when he saw Jason arrive at his palace, with his friends and his relations, and boldly demand the kingdom which he usurped. Pelias was conscious that his complaints were well founded, and therefore to divert his attention, he told him that he would voluntarily resign the crown to him, if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus, the son of Athamas, whom Æetes had cruelly murdered. He further observed, that the expedition would be attended with the greatest glory, and that nothing but the infirmities of old age had prevented him himself from vindicating the honor of his country, and the injuries of his family, by punishing the assassin. This so warmly recommended, was as warmly accepted by the young hero, and his intended expedition was made known all over Greece. [Vid. Jason.] During the absence of Jason, in the Argonautic expedition, Pelias murdered Æson and all his family, but according to the more received opinion of Ovid, Æson was still living when the Argonauts returned, and he was restored to the vigor of youth by the magic of Medea. This sudden change in the vigor and the constitution of Æson, astonished all the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias who had received the patronymic of Peliades, expressed their desire to see their father's infirmities vanish, by the same powerful arts. Medea, who wished to avenge the injuries which her husband Jason had received from Pelias, raised the desires of the Peliades, by cutting an old ram to pieces, and boiling the flesh in a cauldron, and afterwards turning it into a fine young lamb. After they had seen this successful experiment, the Peliades cut their father's body to pieces, after they had drawn all the blood from his veins, on the assurance that Medea would replenish them by her incantations. The limbs were immediately put into a cauldron of boiling water, but Medea suffered the flesh to be totally consumed, and refused to give the Peliades the promised assistance, and the bones of Pelias did not even receive a burial. The Peliades were four in number, Alceste, Pisidice, Pelopea, and Hippothoe, to whom Hyginus adds Medusa. Their mother's name was Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias, or Philomache, the daughter of Amphion. After this parricide, the Peliades fled to the court of Admetus, where Acastus, the son-in-law of Pelias pursued them, and took their protector prisoner. The Peliades died, and were buried in Arcadia. Hygin. fab. 12, 13, & 14.—Ovid. Met. 7. fab. 3, & 4.—Pauf. 8, c. 11.—Apollod.

PĔLŎPEA or PĔLŏPIA, a daughter of Thyestes the brother of Atreus. She had a son by her father who had offered her violence in a wood without knowing that she was his own daughter. Some support that Thyestes purposely committed this incest, as the oracle had informed him that his wrongs should be avenged, and his brother destroyed by a son who should be born from him and his daughter. This proved too true. Pelopea afterwards married her uncle Atreus, who kindly received in his house his wife's illegitimate child, called Ægysthus, because preserved by goats, (αἶγες) when exposed in the mountains. Ægysthus became his uncle's murderer. [Vid. Ægysthus] Hygin. fab. 87, &c.—Ælian V. H. 12.—Ovid. in ib. v. 389.—Seneca in Agam.

PELŏPEIA, a festival observed by the people of Elis in honor of Pelops. It was kept in imitation of Hercules who sacrificed to Pelops in a trench, as it was usual, when the manes and the infernal gods were the objects of worship.

PELŏPIA, a daughter of Niobe.—A daughter of Pelias.—The mother of Cycnus.

PELOPĬDAS, a celebrated general of Thebes son of Hippoclus. He was descended of an illustrious family, and was remarkable for his immense possessions which he bestowed with great liberality to the poor and necessitous. Many were the objects of his generosity, but when Epaminondas had refused to accept his presents, Pelopidas disregarded all his wealth and preferred before it the enjoyment of his friend's conversation and of his poverty. From their friendship and intercourse the Thebans derived the most considerable advantages. No sooner had the interest of Sparta prevailed at Thebes, and the friends of liberty and national independence been banished from the city, than Pelopidas, who was in the number of the exiles, resolved to free his country from foreign slavery. His plan was bold and animated, and his deliberations were slow. Mean while Epaminondas, who had been left by the tyrants at Thebes, as being in appearance a worthless and insignificant philosopher, animated the youths of the city, and at last Pelopidas, with eleven of his associates entered Thebes, and easily massacred the friends of the tyranny, and freed their country from foreign masters. After this successful enterprize, Pelopidas was unanimously placed at the head of the government, and so confident were the Thebans, of his abilities as a general and a magistrate, that they successively re-elected him 13 times to fill the honorable office of governor of Bœotia. Epaminondas shared with him the sovereign power, and it was to their valor and prudence that the Thebans were indebted for a celebrated victory at the battle of Leuctra. In a war which Thebes carried on against Alexander tyrant of Phera, Pelopidas was appointed commander, but his imprudence in trusting himself unarmed into the enemy's camp nearly proved fatal to him.

him. He was taken priſoner, but Epaminondas reſtored him to liberty. The perfidy of Alexander irritated him, and he was killed bravely fighting in a celebrated battle in which his troops obtained the victory, B. C. 564 years. He received an honorable burial, the Thebans ſhewed their ſenſe for his merit by their lamentations, they ſent a powerful army to revenge his death by the deſtruction of the tyrant of Phera and his relations, and his children were preſented with immenſe donations by the cities of Theſſaly. Pelopidas is admired for his valor, as he never engaged an enemy without obtaining the advantage. The impoveriſhed ſtate of Thebes before his birth, and after his fall, plainly demonſtrates the ſuperiority of his genius and of his abilities, and it has been juſtly obſerved that with Pelopidas and Epaminondas the glory and the independence of the Thebans roſe and ſet. *Plut. & C. PELOPONNESIACUM BELLUM, a celebrated war which continued for 27 years between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Peloponneſus with their reſpective allies. It is the moſt famous and the moſt intereſting of all the wars which have happened between the inhabitants of Greece, and for the minute and circumſtantial deſcription which we have of the events and revolutions which mutual animoſity produced, we are indebted more particularly to the correct and authentic writings of Thucydides, and of Xenophon. The circumſtances which gave birth to this memorable war are theſe; the power of Athens under the prudent and vigorous adminiſtration of Pericles, was already extended over Greece, and it had procured itſelf many admirers and more enemies, when the Corcyreans, who had been planted by a Corinthian colony, refuſed to pay to their founders thoſe marks of reſpect and reverence which among the Greeks every colony was obliged to pay to its mother country. The Corinthians wiſhed to puniſh that infidelity, and when the people of Epidamnus, a conſiderable town on the Adriatic, had been invaded by ſome of the barbarians of Illyricum, the people of Corinth gladly granted to the Epidamnians that aſſiſtance which had in vain been ſolicited from the Corcyreans their founders and their patrons. The Corcyreans were offended at the interference of Corinth in the affairs of their colony; they manned a fleet and obtained a victory over the Corinthian veſſels which had aſſiſted the Epidamnians. The ſubſequent conduct of the Corcyreans, and their inſolence to ſome of the Athians who had furniſhed a few ſhips to the Corinthians, provoked the Peloponneſians, and the diſcontent became general. Ambaſſadors were ſent by both parties to Athens to claim its protection and to juſtify their violent proceedings. The greateſt part of the Athenians heard their various reaſons with moderation and with compaſſion, but the enterprizing ambition of Pericles prevailed, and when the Corcyreans had reminded the people of Athens, that in all the eſtates of Peloponneſus they had to dread the moſt malevolent enemies, and the moſt inſidious of rivals, they were liſtened to with attention and were promiſed ſupport. This ſtep was no ſooner taken than the Corinthians appealed to the other Grecian ſtates, and particularly to the Lacedæmonians. Their complaints were accompanied by thoſe of the people of Megara and of Ægina, who bitterly inveighed againſt the cruelty, injuſtice and inſolence of the Athenians. This had due weight with the Lacedæmonians, who had long beheld with concern and with jealouſy the ambitious power of the Athenians, and they determined to ſupport the cauſe of the Corinthians. However, before they proceeded to hoſtilities, an embaſſy was ſent to Athens to repreſent the danger of entering into a war with the moſt powerful and floriſhing of all the Grecian ſtates. This alarmed the Athenians, but when Pericles had eloquently ſpoken of the reſources and the actual ſtrength of the republic and of the weakneſs of the allies, the clamors of his enemies were ſilenced, and the anſwer which was returned to the Spartans was taken as a declaration of war. The Spartans were ſupported by all the republics of the Peloponneſus except Argos and part of Achaia, beſides the people of Megara, Bœotia, Phocis, Locris, Leucas, Ambracia, and Anactorium. The Platæans, the Leſbians, Carians, Chians, Meſſenians, Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Corcyreans, Dorians, and Thracians were the friends of the Athenians, with all the Cyclades except Eubœa, Samos, Melos and Thera. The firſt blow had already been ſtruck, May 7, B. C. 431, by an attempt of the Bœotians to ſurprize Platæa, and therefore Archidamus king of Sparta, who had in vain recommended moderation to the allies, entered Attica at the head of an army of 60,000 men and laid waſte the country by fire and ſword. Pericles, who was at the head of the government, did not attempt to oppoſe them in the field, but a fleet of 150 ſhips ſet ſail without delay to ravage the coaſts of the Peloponneſus. Megara was alſo depopulated by an army of 20,000 men, and the campaign of the firſt year of the war was concluded in celebrating with the moſt ſolemn pomp the funerals of ſuch as had nobly fallen in battle.

The

The following year was remarkable for a peſtilence which raged in Athens, and which deſtroyed the greateſt part of the inhabitants. The public calamity was ſtill heightened by the approach of the Peloponneſian army on the borders of Attica, and by the unſucceſsful expedition of the Athenians againſt Epidaurus and in Thrace. The peſtilence which had carried away ſo many of the Athenians proved alſo fatal to Pericles, and he died about two years and ſix months after the commencement of the Peloponneſian war. The following years did not give riſe to new events, but the revolt of Leſbos from the alliance of the Athenians was productive of new troubles. Mitylene, the capital of the iſland, was recovered, and the inhabitants treated with the greateſt cruelty. The iſland of Corcyra became alſo the ſeat of new ſeditions, and thoſe citizens who had been carried away priſoners by the Corinthians, and for political reaſons treated with lenity, and taught to deſpiſe the alliance of Athens, were no ſooner returned home than they raiſed commotions, and endeavoured to perſuade their countrymen to join the Peloponneſian confederates. This was ſtrongly oppoſed, but both parties obtained by turns the ſuperiority, and maſſacred with the greateſt barbarity, all thoſe who obſtructed their views. Some time after Demoſthenes the Athenian general invaded Ætolia where his arms were attended with the greateſt ſucceſs. He alſo fortified Pylos in the Peloponneſus, and gained ſo many advantages over the confederates that they ſued for peace which the inſolence of Athens refuſed. The fortune of the war ſoon after changed, and the Lacedæmonians under the prudent conduct or Braſidas, made themſelves maſters of many valuable places in Thrace. But this victorious progreſs was ſoon ſtopped by the death of their general, and that of Cleon the Athenian commander, and the pacific diſpoſition of Nicias, who was now at the head of Athens, made overtures of peace and univerſal tranquillity. Pliſtoanax, the king of the Spartans, wiſhed them to be accepted, but the intrigues of the Corinthians prevented the diſcontinuation of the war, and therefore hoſtilities began a-new. But while war was carried on with various ſucceſs in different parts of Greece, the Athenians engaged in a new expedition, they yielded to the perſuaſive eloquence of Gorgias of Leontium, and the ambitious views of Alcibiades, and ſent a fleet of 20 ſhips to aſſiſt the Sicilian ſtates againſt the tyrannical power of Syracuſe, B. C. 416. This was warmly oppoſed by Nicias, but the eloquence of Alcibiades prevailed, and a powerful fleet was ſent againſt the capital of Sicily. Theſe vigorous, though impolitic meaſures of the Athenians, were not viewed with indifference by the confederates. Syracuſe, in her diſtreſs, implored the aſſiſtance of Corinth, and Gylippus was ſent to direct her operations, and to defend her againſt the power of her enemies. The events of battles were dubious, and though the Athenian army was animated, by the prudence and intrepidity of Nicias, and the more haſty courage of Demoſthenes, yet the good fortune of Syracuſe prevailed, and after a campaign of 2 years of bloodſhed, the fleets of Athens were totally ruined, and the few ſoldiers that ſurvived the deſtructive ſiege made priſoners of war. So fatal a blow threw the people of Attica into conſternation and deſpair, and while they ſought for reſources at home, they ſeverely felt themſelves deprived of ſupport abroad, their allies were alienated by the intrigues of the enemy, and rebellion was fomented in their dependent ſtates and colonies on the Aſiatic coaſt. The threatened ruin however was timely averted, and Alcibiades, who had been treated with cruelty by his countrymen, and who had for ſome time reſided in Sparta, and directed her military operations, now exerted himſelf to defeat the deſigns of the confederates, by inducing the Perſians to eſpouſe the cauſe of his country. But a ſhort time after the internal tranquillity of Athens was diſturbed, and Alcibiades, by wiſhing to aboliſh the democracy, called away the attention of his fellow citizens from the proſecution of a war which had already coſt them ſo much blood. This, however, was but momentary, the Athenians ſoon after obtained a naval victory, and the Peloponneſian fleet was defeated by Alcibiades. The Athenians beheld with rapture the ſucceſs of their arms, but when their fleet, in the abſence of Alcibiades, had been defeated and deſtroyed near Andros, by Lyſander, the Lacedæmonian admiral, they ſhewed their diſcontent and mortification by eagerly liſtening to the accuſations which were brought againſt their naval leader, to whom they gratefully had acknowledged themſelves indebted for their former victories. Alcibiades was diſgraced in the public aſſembly, and ten commanders were appointed to ſucceed him in the management of the republic. This change of admirals, and the appointment of Callicratidas to ſucceed Lyſander, whoſe office had expired with the revolving year, produced new operations. The Athenians fitted out a fleet, and the two nations decided their ſuperiority near Argiuſæ, in a naval battle. Callicratidas was killed, and the Lacedæmonians conquered, but the rejoicings which the intelligence of this victory occaſioned, were ſoon ſtopped, when

when it was known that the wrecks of ſome of the diſabled ſhips of the Athenians, and the bodies of the ſlain had not been ſaved from the ſea. The admirals were accuſed in the tumultuous aſſembly, and immediately condemned. Their ſucceſſors in office were not ſo prudent, but they were more unfortunate in their operations. Lyſander was again placed at the head of the Peloponneſian forces, inſtead of Eteonicus, who had ſucceeded to the command at the death of Callicratidas. The age and the experience of this general ſeemed to promiſe ſomething deciſive, and indeed an opportunity was not long wanting for the diſplay of his military character. The ſuperiority of the Athenians, over that of the Peloponneſians, rendered the former inſolent, proud, and negligent, and when they had imprudently forſaken their ſhips to indulge their indolence, or purſue their amuſements on the ſea ſhore at Ægoſpotamos, Lyſander attacked their fleet, and his victory was complete. Of one hundred and eighty ſail, only nine eſcaped, eight of which fled under the command of Conon, to the iſland of Cyprus, and the other carried to Athens, the melancholy news of the defeat. The Athenian priſoners were all maſſacred, and when the Peloponneſian conquerors had extended their dominion over the ſtates and communities of Europe and Aſia, which formerly acknowledged the power of Athens, they returned home to finiſh the war by the reduction of the capital of Attica. The ſiege was carried on with vigor, and ſupported with firmneſs, and the firſt Athenian who mentioned capitulation to his countrymen, was inſtantly ſacrificed to the fury and the indignation of the populace, and all the citizens unanimouſly declared, that the ſame moment would terminate their independence and their lives. This animated language, however, was not long continued, the ſpirit of faction was not yet extinguiſhed at Athens, and it proved perhaps more deſtructive to the public liberty than the operations and aſſaults of the Peloponneſian beſiegers. During four months, negociations were carried on with the Spartans, by the ariſtocratical part of the Athenians, and at laſt it was agreed, that to eſtabliſh the peace, the fortifications of the Athenian harbours muſt be demoliſhed, together with the long walls which joined them to the city; all their ſhips, except 12 were to be ſurrendered to the enemy; they were to reſign every pretenſion to their ancient dominions abroad; to recall from baniſhment all the members of the late ariſtocracy; to follow the Spartans in war, and in the time of peace, to frame their conſtitution according to the will and the preſcriptions of their Peloponneſian conquerors. The terms were accepted, and the enemy entered the harbour, and took poſſeſſion of the city, that very day on which the Athenians had been accuſtomed to celebrate the anniverſary of the immortal victory, which their anceſtors had obtained over the Perſians about 76 years before, near the iſland of Salamis. The walls and fortifications were inſtantly levelled with the ground, and the conquerors obſerved, that in the demolition of Athens, ſucceeding ages would fix the era of Grecian freedom. The day was concluded with a feſtival, and the recitation of one of the tragedies of Euripides in which the misfortunes of the daughter of Agamemnon, who was reduced to miſery, and baniſhed from her father's kingdom, excited a kindred ſympathy in the boſom of the audience, who melted into tears at the recollection that one moment had likewiſe reduced to miſery and ſervitude, the capital of Attica, which was once called the common patroneſs of Greece, and the ſcourge of Perſia. This memorable event happened about 404 years before the Chriſtian era, and 30 tyrants were appointed by Lyſander over the government of the city. *Xen. Græc. Hiſt.—Plut. in Lyſ. Per. Alcib. PELOPONNESUS, a celebrated peninſula, which comprehends the moſt ſouthern parts of Greece. It received this name from Pelops, who ſettled there, as the name indicates (πηλοπος νησος, the iſland of Pelops.) It had been called before Argia, Pelaſgia, and Argolis. Its preſent name is Morea, which ſeems to be derived either from the Greek word μορεα, or the Latin morus, which ſignifies a mulberry tree, which is found there in great abundance. The antient Peloponneſus was divided into ſix different provinces, Meſſenia, Laconia, Elia, Arcadia, Achaia propria, and Argolis, to which ſome add Sicyon. Theſe provinces all bordered on the ſea ſhore, except Arcadia. The Peloponneſus was conquered ſome time after the Trojan war, by the Heraclidæ or deſcendants of Hercules, who had been forcibly expelled from it. The inhabitants of this peninſula rendered themſelves illuſtrious like the reſt of the Greeks by their genius, their fondneſs for the fine arts, the cultivation of learning, and the profeſſion of arms, but in nothing more than by a celebrated war which they carried on againſt Athens and her allies for 27 years, and which from them received the name of the Peloponneſian war. [Vid. Peloponneſiacum bellum.] The Peloponneſus ſcarce extended 200 miles in length, and 140 in breadth. It was separated from Greece by the narrow isthmus of Corinth, which the emperor Nero attempted in vain to cut, to make a communication between the bay of Corinth, and the Saronicus sinus. Strab. 8.—Thucyd. Diod. 12, &c.—Paus. 3, c. 21, l. 8 c. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 4.—Herodot.

PELOPS, a celebrated prince, son of Tantalus king of Phrygia. His mother's name was Euryanassa, or according to others Euprytone, or Eurystemista, or Dione. He was murdered by his father, who wished to try the divinity of the gods who had visited Phrygia, by placing on their table the limbs of his son. The gods perceived his perfidious cruelty, and they refused to touch the meat, except Ceres, whom the recent loss of her daughter had rendered melancholy and inattentive. She eat one of the shoulders of Pelops, and therefore when Jupiter had had compassion on his fate, and restored him to life, he placed a shoulder of ivory instead of that which Ceres had devoured. This shoulder had an uncommon power, and it could heal by its very touch, every complaint, and remove every disorder. Some time after, the kingdom of Tantalus was invaded by Tros, king of Troy, on pretence that he had carried away his son Ganymedes. This rape had been committed by Jupiter himself, the war nevertheless, was carried on, and Tantalus, defeated and ruined, was obliged to fly with his son Pelops, and to seek a shelter in Greece. This tradition is confuted by some who support, that Tantalus did not fly into Greece, as he had been sometime before confined by Jupiter in the infernal regions for his impiety, and therefore Pelops was the only one whom the enmity of Tros persecuted. Pelops came to Pisa, where he became one of the suitors of Hippodamia, the daughter of king Œnomaus, and he entered the lists against the father, who promised his daughter only to him, who could out-run him in a chariot race. Pelops was not terrified at the fate of the 13 who before him had entered the course against Œnomaus, and had according to the conditions proposed, been put to death when conquered. He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and therefore he easily obtained the victory. [Vid. Oenomaus.] He married Hippodamia, and threw headlong into the sea Myrtilus, when he claimed the reward of his perfidy. According to some authors, Pelops had received some winged horses from Neptune, with which he was enabled to out-run Œnomaus. When he had established himself on the throne of Pisa, Hippodamia's possession, he extended his conquests over the neighbouring countries, and from him the peninsula, of which he was one of the monarchs, received the name of Peloponnesus. Pelops, after death, received divine honors, and he was as much revered above all the other heroes of Greece, as Jupiter was above the rest of the gods. He had a temple at Olympia, near that of Jupiter, where Hercules consecrated to him a small portion of land, and offered to him a sacrifice. The place where this sacrifice had been offered was religiously observed, and the magistrates of the country yearly, on coming upon office, made there an offering of a black ram. During the sacrifice, the soothsayer was not allowed, as at other times, to have a share of the victim, but he alone who furnished the wood, was permitted to take the neck. The wood for sacrifices as may be observed, was always furnished by some of the priests, to all such as offered victims, and they received a price equivalent to what they gave. The white poplar was generally used in the sacrifices made to Jupiter and to Pelops. The children of Pelops by Hippodamia were Pitheus, Trœzen, Atreus, Thyestes, &c. besides some by concubines. The time of his death is unknown, though it is universally agreed, that he survived for some time Hippodamia. Some suppose that the Palladium of the Trojans was made with the bones of Pelops. His descendants were called Pelopidæ. Pindar, who in his first Olympic speaks of Pelops, confutes the traditions of his ivory shoulder, and says, that Neptune took him up to heaven to become there cup-bearer to the gods, from which he was expelled, when the impiety of Tantalus wished to make mankind partake of the nectar and the entertainments of the gods. Some suppose that Pelops first instituted the Olympic games in honor of Jupiter, and to commemorate the victory which he had obtained over Œnomaus. Paus. 5, c. 1, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Diod. 3.—Strab. 8, Mela. 1, c. 18.—*Pindar. PELORIA, a festival observed by the Thessalians, in commemoration of the news which they received by one Pelorius, that the mountains of Tempe had been separated by an earthquake, and that the waters of the lake which lay there stagnated, had found a passage into the Alpheus, and left behind a vast, pleasant, and most delightful plain, &c. Athen. 3.

PELORUM, or PELORUS, one of the three great promontories of Sicily. It lies near the coast of Italy, and received its name from from Pelorus, the pilot of the ſhip which carried Annibal away from Italy. This celebrated general, as it is reported, was carried by the tides into the ſtreights of Charybdis, and as he was ignorant of the coaſt, he aſked the pilot of his ſhip the name of the promontory, which appeared at a diſtance. The pilot told him, it was one of the capes of Sicily, but Annibal gave no credit to his information, and murdered him on the ſpot on the apprehenſion that he would betray him into the hands of the Romans. He was, however, ſoon convinced of his error, and found that the pilot had ſpoken with great fidelity, and therefore to pay honor to his memory, and to atone for his cruelty, he gave him a magnificent funeral, and ordered that the promontory ſhould bear his name, and from that time, it was called Pelorum. Some ſuppoſe that this account is falſe, and they obſerve, that it bore that name before the age of Annibal. Val. Max. 9, 9, c. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—*Virg. PELUSIUM, a town of Egypt, ſituate at the entrance of one of the mouths of the Nile, called from it Peluſian. It its about 20 ſtadia from the ſea, and it has received the name of Peluſium from the lakes and marſhes, (πηλος) which are in its neighbourhood. It was the key of Egypt on the ſide of Phœnicia, as it was impoſſible to enter the Egyptian territories without paſſing by Peluſium, and therefore on that account it was always well fortified and garriſoned, as it was of ſuch importance for the ſecurity of the country. It is now in ruins. Mela. 2, c. 9.—Strab. 17.—Virg. G. 1. v. 228.

PENATES, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who preſided over houſes and the domeſtic affairs of families. They were called Penates, becauſe they were generally placed in the innermoſt, and moſt ſecret parts of the houſe, in penitiſſimâ ædium parte, quod, as Cicero ſays, penitus inſident. The place where they ſtood was afterwards called penetralia, and they themſelves received the name of Penetrales. It was in the option of every maſter of a family to chuſe his Penates, and therefore Jupiter, and ſome of the ſuperior gods are often invoked as patrons of domeſtic affairs. According to ſome, the gods Penates were divided into four claſſes; the firſt comprehended all the celeſtial, the ſecond the ſea, gods, the third the gods of hell, and the laſt all ſuch heroes as had received divine honors after death. The Penates were originally the manes of the dead, but when ſuperſtition had taught mankind to pay uncommon reverence to the ſtatues and images of their deceaſed friends, their attention was ſoon exchanged for regular worſhip, and they were admitted by their votaries, to ſhare immortality and power over the world, with a Jupiter or a Minerva. The ſtatues of the Penates were generally made with wax, ivory, ſilver, or earth, according to the affluence of the worſhipper, and the only offerings they received were wine, incenſe, fruits, and ſometimes the ſacrifice of lambs, ſheep, goats, &c. In the early ages of Rome, human ſacrifices were offered to them, but Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins, aboliſhed this unnatural cuſtom. When offerings were made to them, their ſtatues were crowned with garlands, poppies, or garlick, and beſides the monthly day that was ſet apart for their worſhip, their feſtivals were celebrated during the Saturnalia. Some have confounded the Lares and the Penates, but they were different. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27. Ver. 2.—Dionyſ. 1.

PENELEUS, one of the Greeks killed in the Trojan war.

PENELOPE, a celebrated princeſs of Greece, daughter of Icarius, and wife of Ulyſſes, king of Ithaca. Her marriage with Ulyſſes was celebrated about the ſame time that Menelaus married Helen, and ſhe retired with her huſband to Ithaca, againſt the inclination of her father, who wiſhed to detain her at Sparta, her native country. She ſoon after became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part with great reluctance from her huſband, whom the Greeks obliged to go to the Trojan war. [Vid. Palamedes.] The continuation of the war for ten years, made her ſad and melancholy, but when Ulyſſes did not return like the other princes of Greece at the concluſion of the war, her fears and her anxieties were increaſed. As ſhe received no intelligence of his ſituation, ſhe was ſoon beſet by a number of importuning ſuitors, who wiſhed her to believe that her huſband was ſhipwrecked, and that therefore ſhe ought not longer to expect his return, but forget his loſs, in giving herſelf to one of her numerous admirers. She received their addreſſes with coldneſs and diſdain, but as ſhe was deſtitute of power, and a priſoner as it were in their hands, ſhe yet flattered them with hopes and promiſes, and declared that ſhe would make choice of one of them, as ſoon as ſhe had finiſhed a piece of tapeſtry, on which ſhe was employed. The work was done in a dilatory manner, and ſhe baffled their eager expectations, by undoing in the night, what ſhe had done in the day-time. This artifice of Penelope has given riſe to the proverb of Penelope's web, which which is applied to whatever labor can never be ended. The return of Ulyſſes after an abſence of twenty years, however, delivered her from fears, and from her dangerous ſuitors. Penelope is deſcribed by Homer as a model of female virtue and chaſtity, but ſome more modern writers diſpute her claims to modeſty, and continence, and they repreſent her as the moſt debauched and voluptuous of her ſex. According to their opinions therefore, ſhe liberally gratified the deſires of her ſuitors, in the abſence of her huſband, and had a ſon whom ſhe called Pan, as if to ſhew that he was the offſpring of all her admirers. Some however, ſuppoſe, that Pan was ſon of Penelope by Mercury, and that he was born before his mother's marriage with Ulyſſes. The god, as it is ſaid, deceived Penelope, under the form of a beautiful goat, as ſhe was tending her father's flocks on one of the mountains of Arcadia. After the return of Ulyſſes, Penelope had a daughter, who was called Ptoliporthe, but if we believe the traditions that were long preſerved at Mantinea, Ulyſſes repudiated his wife for her incontinence during his abſence, and Penelope fled to Sparta, and afterwards to Mantinea, where ſhe died and was buried. After the death of Ulyſſes, according to Hyginus, ſhe married Telegonus, her huſband's ſon by Circe, by order of the goddeſs Minerva. Some ſay that her original name was Arnea, or Amirace, and that ſhe was called Penelope when ſome river birds called Penelopes, had ſaved her from the waves of the ſea, when her father had expoſed her. Icarius had attempted to deſtroy her, becauſe the oracles had told him that his daughter by Peribœa, would be the moſt diſſolute of her ſex, and a diſgrace to his family, Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Pauſ. 3, c. 12.—*Homer. Peneus, a river of Theſſaly, riſing on mount Pindus and falling into the Thermean gulf, after a wandering courſe between mount Oſſa and Olympus, through the plains of Tempe. It received its name from Peneus, a ſon of Oceanus, and Tethys. The Peneus antiently inundated the plains of Theſſaly, till an earthquake ſeparated the mountains Oſſa and Olympus, and formed the beautiful vale of Tempe, where the waters formerly ſtagnated. From this circumſtance, therefore, it obtained the name of Araxes ab aparow ſcindo. Daphne, the daughter of the Peneus, according to the fables of the mythologiſts, was changed into a laurel on the banks of this river. This tradition ariſes from the quantity of laurels which ſpring near the Peneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Strab. 9.—Melu. 2, c. 3.—*Virg. Penthesĭlea, a queen of the Amazons, daughter of Mars. She came to aſſiſt Priam in the laſt years of the Trojan war, and fought againſt Achilles, by whom ſhe was ſlain. The hero was ſo ſtruck with the beauty of Penthesilea when he ſtripped her of her arms, that he even ſhed tears for having too violently ſacrificed her to his fury. Therſites laughed at the partiality of the hero, for which ridicule he was inſtantly killed. Lycophron ſays, that Achilles ſlew Therſites becauſe he had put out the eyes of Penthesilea when ſhe was yet alive. The ſcholiaſt of Lycophron differs from that opinion, and declares, that it was commonly believed, that Achilles offered violence to the body of Penthesilea when ſhe was dead, and that Therſites was killed becauſe he had reproached the hero of this infamous action, in the preſence of all the Greeks. The death of Therſites ſo offended Diomedes that he dragged the body of Penthesilea out of the camp, and threw it into the Scamander. It is generally ſuppoſed, that Achilles was enamoured of the Amazon before he fought with her, and that ſhe had by him a ſon called Cayſter. Dictys. Cret. 3, & 4.—Pauſ. 10, c. 31.—*Q. Pentheus, ſon of Echion and Agave, was king of Thebes in Bœotia. His refuſal to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus was attended with the moſt ſerious conſequences. He forbad his ſubjects to pay adoration to this new god, and when the Theban women had gone out of the city to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, Pentheus, apprized of the debauchery which attended the ſolemnity, ordered the god himſelf, who conducted the religious multitude to be ſeized. His orders were obeyed with reluctance, but when the doors of the priſon in which Bacchus had been confined, opened of their own accord, Pentheus became more irritated, and commanded his ſoldiers to deſtroy the whole band of the bacchanals. This, however, was not executed, for Bacchus inſpired the monarch with the ardent deſire of ſeeing the celebration of the orgies. Accordingly he hid himſelf in a wood on mount Cithæron, from whence he could ſee all the ceremonies unperceived. But here his curioſity ſoon proved fatal, he was deſcried by the bacchanals, and they all ruſhed upon him. His mother was the firſt who attacked him, and her example was inſtantly followed by her two ſiſters, Ino and Autonoe, and his body was torn to pieces. Euripides introduces Bacchus among his prieſteſſes, when Pentheus was put to death, but Ovid, who relates the whole in the ſame manner, differs from the Greek poet only in ſaying that not Bacchus himſelf, but one of his prieſts were preſent. The tree on which the Bacchanals found Pentheus, was cut down by the Corinthians, by order of the oracle, and with it two ſtatues of the god of wine were made, and placed in the forum. Hygin. fab. 184.—Theocrit. 26.—*Ovid. PERCŌTE, a city which aſſiſted Priam during the Trojan war. Vid. Percote.

PERCOSIUS, a man acquainted with futurity. He attempted in vain to diſſuade his two ſons to go to the Trojan war, by telling them that they ſhould periſh there.

PERCŌTE, a town on the Helleſpont between Abydos and Lampſacus, near the ſea ſhore. Artaxerxes gave it to Themiſtocles, to maintain his warbrobe. It is ſometimes called Percope. Herodot. 1, c. 117.—Hom.

PERDICCAS, the fourth king of Macedonia, B. C. 729, was deſcended from Temenus. He encreaſed his dominions by conqueſt, and in the latter part of his life, he ſhewed his ſon Argeus where he wiſhed to be buried, and told him that as long as the bones of his deſcendants and ſucceſſors on the throne of Macedonia, were laid in the ſame grave ſo long would the crown remain in their family. Theſe injunctions were obſerved till the time of Alexander, who was buried out of Macedonia Herodot. 7, & 8.—Juſtin. 7, c. 2.——Another king of Macedonia, ſon of Alexander. He reigned during the Peloponneſian war, and aſſiſted the Lacedæmonians againſt Athens. He behaved with great courage on the throne, and died B. C. 413, after a long reign of glory and independence, during which he had ſubdued ſome of his barbarian neighbours.——Another king of Macedonia who was ſupported on his throne by Iphicrates the Athenian, againſt the intruſions of Pauſanias. He was killed in a war againſt the Illyrians, B. C. 360. Juſtin. 7, &c.——One of the friends and favorites of Alexander the Great. At the king's death he wiſhed to make himſelf abſolute, and the ring which he had received from the hand of the dying Alexander, ſeemed in ſome meaſure to favor his pretenſions. The better to ſupport his claims to the throne, he married Cleopatra, the ſiſter of Alexander, and ſtrengthened himſelf by maki g a league with Eumenes. His ambitious views were eaſily diſcovered by Antigonus, and the reſt of the generals of Alexander, who all wiſhed like Perdiccas to ſucceed to the kingdom and honors of the deceaſed monarch. Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, leagued with Antigonus againſt him, and after much bloodſhed on both ſides, Perdiccas was totally ruined, and at laſt aſſaſſinated in his tent in Egypt by his own officers, about 321 years before the Chriſtian era. Perdiccas had not the prudence and the addreſs which were neceſſary to conciliate the eſteem and gain the attachment of his fellow ſoldiers, and this impropriety of his conduct alienated the heart of his friends, and at laſt proved his deſtruction. Plut. in Alex.—Diod. 17, & 18.—Curt. 10.—C. Nep. Eum.—Ælian. V. H. 12.

PERDIX, a young Athenian, ſon of the ſiſter of Dædalus. He invented the ſaw, and ſeemed to promiſe to become as great an artiſt as ever lived. His uncle was jealous of his riſing fame, and he threw him down down from the top of a tower, and put him to death. Perdix was changed into a bird which bears his name. Hygin. fab. 39, & 274.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Ovid Met. 8, v. 220, &c.

PERENNA. Vid. Anna.

PERENNIS, a favorite of the emperor Commodus. He is described by some as a virtuous and impartial magistrate, while others paint him as a cruel, violent, and oppressive tyrant, who committed the greatest barbarities to enrich himself. He was put to death for aspiring to the empire. Herodian.

PEREUS, a son of Elatus and Laodice, grandson of Arcas. Paus. 8, c. 4.

PERGA, a town of Syria.

PERGĂMUS, Pergama, (plur.) the citadel of the city of Troy. The word is often used for Troy. It was situated in the most elevated part of the town, on the shores of the river Scamander. Xerxes mounted to the top of this citadel when he reviewed his troops as he marched to invade Greece. Herodot. 7, c. 43.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 466, &c.

PERGĂMUS, a town of Mysia, on the banks of the Caycus. It was the capital of a celebrated empire called the kingdom of Pergamus, which was founded by Philæterus, an eunuch, whom Lysimachus after the battle of Ipsus, had entrusted with the treasures which he had obtained in the war. Philæterus made himself master of the treasures and of Pergamus, in which they were deposited, B. C. 283, and laid the foundations of an empire, over which he himself presided for 20 years. His successors began to reign in the following order: His nephew Eumenes ascended the throne 263 B. C; Attalus, 241; Eumenes the second, 197; Attalus Philadelphus, 159; Attalus Philomator, 138, who, B. C. 133, left the Roman people heirs to his kingdom, as he had no children. The right of the Romans, however, was disputed by an usurper who claimed the empire as his own, and Aquilius the Roman general was obliged to conquer the different cities one by one, and to gain their submission by poisoning the waters which were conveyed to their houses, till the whole was reduced into the form of a dependent province. The capital of the kingdom of Pergamus was famous for a library of 200,000 volumes, which had been collected by the different monarchs who had reigned there. This noble collection was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, with the permission of Antony, and it adorned and enriched the Alexandrian library, till it was most fatally destroyed by the Saracens, A. D. 642. Parchment was first invented and made use of, at Pergamus to transcribe books, as Ptolemy king of Egypt had forbidden the exportation of papyrus from his kingdom, in order to prevent Eumenes, from making a library as valuable and as choice as that of Alexandria. From this circumstance parchment has been called charta pergamena. Galenus the physician, and Apollodorus the mythologist were born there. Æsculapius was the chief deity of the country. Plin. 5, & 15.—Ibid. 6, c. 11.—Strab. 13.——A son of Neoptolemus and Andromache, who, as some suppose, founded Pergamus in Asia. Paus. 1, c. 11.

PERGE, a town of Pamphylia. Strab. 14.

PERGUS, a lake of Sicily near Enna, where Proserpine was carried away by Pluto. Ovid. Met. 5. fab. 11.

PERIANDER, a tyrant of Corinth, son of Cypselus. The first years of his government were mild and popular, but he soon learnt to become oppressive, when he had consulted the tyrant of Sicily about the surest way of reigning. He received no other answer but whatever explanation he wished to place on the Sicilian tyrant's having, in the presence of his messenger, plucked in a field, all the ears of corn which seemed to tower above the rest. Periander understood the meaning of this answer. He immediately surrounded himself with a numerous guard, and put to death the richest and most powerful citizens of Corinth. He was not only cruel to his subjects, but also his family were objects of his vengeance. He committed incest with his mother, and put to death his wife Melissa, upon false accusation. He also banished his son Lycophron, to the island of Corcyra, because the youth pitied the miserable end of his mother, and detested the barbarities of his father. Periander died about 585 years before the Christian era, and by the meanness of his flatterers, he was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. Though he was tyrannical, yet he patronized the fine arts; he was fond of peace, and he shewed himself the friend and the protector of genius and learning. He used to say, that a man ought solemnly to keep his word, but not to hesitate to break it if ever it clashed with his interest. He said also, that not only crime ought to be punished, but also every wicked and corrupted thought. Diog. in vita.—Arist. 5, Polit.—Paus. 2.——A tyrant of Ambracia.

PERIARCHUS, a naval commander of Sparta conquered by Conon. Diod.

PERIBŒA, the second wife of Œneus, king of Calydon, was daughter of Hipponous. She became mother of Tydeus. ſome ſuppoſe that Œneus debauched her, and afterwards married her. Hygin. fab. 69. ——A daughter of Alcathous, ſold by her father on ſuſpicion that ſhe was courted by Telamon, ſon of Æacus, king of Ægina. She was carried to Cyprus, where Telamon the founder of Salamis married her. She became mother of Ajax. She alſo married Theſeus, according to ſome. Pauſ. 1, c. 17, & 42.—Hygin. 97.——The wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who educated Œdipus as her own child.—— A daughter of Eurymedon, who became mother of Nauſithous by Neptune. ——The mother of Penelope, according to ſome authors.

PERIBOMIUS, a noted debauchee, &c. Jup. 2, v. 16.

PERICLES, an Athenian of a noble family, ſon of Xanthippus and Agariſte. He was naturally endowed with great powers, which he improved by attending the lectures of Damon, of Zeno, and of Anaxagoras. Under theſe celebrated maſters he became a commander, a ſtateſman, and an orator, and gained the affections of the people by his uncommon addreſs and well directed liberality. When he took a ſhare in the adminiſtration of public affairs, he rendered himſelf popular by oppoſing Cimon, who was the favorite of the nobility, and to remove every obſtacle which ſtood in the way of his ambition, he leſſened the dignity and the power of the court of the Areopagus, whom the people had been taught for ages to reſpect and to venerate. He alſo attacked Cimon, and cauſed him to be baniſhed by the oſtraciſm. Thucydides alſo, who had ſucceeded Cimon on his baniſhment, ſhared the ſame fate, and Pericles remained for 15 years the ſole miniſter, and as it may be ſaid the abſolute ſovereign of a republic which always ſhowed itſelf ſo jealous of its liberties, and which diſtruſted ſo much the honeſty of her magiſtrates. In his miniſterial capacity Pericles did not enrich himſelf, but the proſperity of Athens was the object of his adminiſtration. He made war againſt the Lacedæmonians, and reſtored the temple of Delphi to the care of the Phocians, who had been illegally deprived of that honorable truſt. He obtained a victory over the Sicyonians near Nemæa, and waged a ſucceſsful war againſt the inhabitants of Samos at the requeſt of his favorite miſtreſs Aſpaſia. The Peloponneſian war was fomented by his ambitious views [Vid. Peloponneſiacum bellum], and when he had warmly repreſented the floriſhing ſtate, the opulence, and actual power of his country, the Athenians did not heſitate a moment to undertake a war againſt the moſt powerful republics of Greece, a war which continued for 27 years, and which was concluded by the deſtruction of their empire, and the demolition of their walls. The arms of the Athenians were for ſome time crowned with ſucceſs, but an unfortunate expedition raiſed clamors againſt Pericles, and the enraged populace attributed all their loſſes to him, and to make atonement for their ill ſucceſs, they condemned him to pay 50 talents. This loſs of popular favor by republican caprice, did not ſo much affect Pericles as the recent death of all his children, and when the tide of unpopularity was paſſed by, he condeſcended to come into the public aſſembly, and to view with ſecret pride the contrition of his fellow citizens, who univerſally begged his forgiveneſs for the violence which they had offered to his miniſterial character. He was again reſtored to all his honors, and if poſſible inveſted with more power and more authority than before, but the dreadful peſtilence which had diminiſhed the number of his family, proved fatal to him, and about 429 years before Chriſt, in his 70th year, he fell a ſacrifice to that terrible malady, which robbed Athens of ſo many of her citizens. Pericles was for 40 years at the head of the adminiſtration, 25 years with others and 15 alone, and the floriſhing ſtate of the empire during his government, gave occaſion to the Athenians publicly to lament his loſs, and venerate his memory. As he was expiring, and ſeemingly ſenſeleſs, his friends that ſtood around his bed expatiated with warmth on the moſt glorious actions of his life, and the victories which he had won, when he ſuddenly interrupted their tears and converſation, by ſaying that in mentioning the exploits that he had atchieved, and which were common to him with all generals, they had forgot to mention a circumſtance which reflected far greater glory upon him as a miniſter, a general, and above all as a man. It is, ſays he, that not a citizen in Athens has been obliged to put on mourning on my account. The Athenians were ſo pleaſed with his eloquence that they compared it to thunder and lightning, and as to another father of the gods, they gave him the ſirname of Olympian. The poets, his flatterers, ſaid that the goddeſs of perſuaſion, with all her charms and her attraction, dwelt upon his tongue. When he marched at the head of the Athenian armies, Pericles obſerved that he had the command of a free nation that were Greeks, and citizens of Athens. He alſo declared that not only the hand of a magiſtrate, but alſo his eyes and his tongue ſhould be pure and undefiled. Yet great and venerable as this character may may appear, we must not forget the follies of Pericles. His vicious partiality for the celebrated courtezan Aspasia, subjected him to the ridicule and the censure of his fellow citizens; but if he triumphed over satire and malevolent remarks, the Athenians had occasion to execrate the memory of a man who by his example corrupted the purity and innocence of their morals, and who made licentiousness respectable, and the indulgence of every impure desire the qualification of the soldier as well as of the senator. Pericles lost all his legitimate children by the pestilence, and to call a natural son by his own name he was obliged to repeal a law which he had made against spurious children, and which he had enforced with great severity. This son, called Pericles, became one of the ten generals who succeeded Alcibiades in the administration of affairs, and like his colleagues he was condemned to death by the Athenians, after the unfortunate battle of Arginusæ. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Plut in vitâ.—Quintil. 12, c. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—*Ælian V. Peripatetici, a sect of philosophers at Athens, disciples to Aristotle. They received this name from the place where they were taught, called Peripaton in the Lyceum, or because they received the philosopher's lectures as they walked (περιπατουντες). The Peripatetics acknowledged the dignity of human nature, and placed their summum bonum not in the pleasures of passive sensation, but in the due exercise of the moral and intellectual faculties. The habit of this exercise when guided by reason, constituted the highest excellence of man. The philosopher contended that our own happiness chiefly depends upon ourselves, and tho' he did not require in his followers that self-command to which others pretended, yet he allowed a moderate degree of perturbation, as becoming human nature, and he considered a certain sensibility of passion totally necessary, as by resentment we are enabled to repel injuries, and the smart which past calamities have inflicted, renders us careful to avoid the repetition. Cic. Acad. 2, &c.

PERSEPHONE, a daughter of Jupiter and Ceres, called alſo Proſerpine. [Vid. Proſerpina.]——The mother of Amphion by Jaſus.

PERSEPOLIS, a celebrated city, the capital of the Perſian empire. It was laid in ruins by Alexander after the conqueſt of Darius. The reaſon of this is unknown. Diodorus ſays that the ſight of about 800 Greeks, whom the Perſians had ſhamefully mutilated, ſo irritated Alexander that he reſolved to puniſh the barbarity of the inhabitants of Perſepolis, and of the neighbouring country, by permitting his ſoldiers to plunder their capital. Others ſuppoſe that Alexander ſet it on fire at the inſtigation of Thais, one of his courtezans, when he had paſſed the day in drinking and in riot and debauchery. The ruins of Perſepolis ſtill aſtoniſh the modern traveller by their grandeur and magnificence. Curt. 5, c. 7.—Diod. 17, &c.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin. 11, c. 14.

PERSES, a ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda. From him the Perſians, who were originally called Cephenes, received their name. Herodot. 7, c. 61.—— A king of Macedonia. Vid. Perſeus.

PERSEUS, a ſon of Jupiter and Danae, the daughter of Acriſius. As Acriſius had confined his daughter in a brazen tower to prevent her becoming a mother, becauſe he was to periſh, according to the words of an oracle, by the hands of his daughter's ſon, Perſeus was no ſooner born (Vid. Danae) than he was thrown into the ſea with his mother Danae. The hopes of Acriſius were fruſtrated, the ſlender boat which carried Danae and her ſon was driven by the winds upon the coaſts of the iſland of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fiſherman called Dictys, and carried to Polydectes the king of the place. They were treated with great humanity, and Perſeus was entruſted to the care of the prieſts of Minerva's temple. His riſing genius and manly courage, however, ſoon diſpleaſed Polydectes, and the monarch, who wiſhed to offer violence to Danae, feared the reſentment of her ſon. Yet Polydectes reſolved to remove every obſtacle. He invited all his friends to a ſumptuous entertainment, and it was requiſite that all ſuch as came, ſhould preſent the monarch with a beautiful horſe. Perſeus was in the number of the invited, and the more particularly ſo, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the preſent which he expected from all the reſt. Nevertheleſs Perſeus, who wiſhed not to appear inferior to the others in magnificence, told the king that as he could not give him a horſe, he would bring him the head of Meduſa, the only one of the Gorgons who was ſubject to mortality. The offer was doubly agreeable to Polydectes, as it would remove Perſeus from Seriphos, and on account of its ſeeming impoſſibility, the attempt might might perhaps end in his ruin. But the innocence of Perſeus was patronized by the gods. Pluto lent him his helmet, which had the wonderful power of making its bearer inviſible. Minerva gave him her buckler, which was as reſplendent as glaſs, and he received from Mercury wings and the talaria, with a ſhort dagger made of diamonds, and called herpe. According to ſome it was from Vulcan, and not from Mercury that he received the herpe, which was in form like a ſcythe. With theſe arms Perſeus began his expedition, and traverſed the air, conducted by the goddeſs Minerva. He went to the Graiæ, the ſiſters of the Gorgons, who according to the poets had wings like the Gorgons, but only one eye and one tooth between them all, of which they made uſe of, each in her turn. They were three in number, according to Æſchylus and Apollodorus; or only two, according to Ovid and Heſiod. With Pluto's helmet, which rendered him inviſible, Perſeus was enabled to ſteal their eye and their tooth while they were aſleep, and he returned them only when they had informed him where their ſiſters the Gorgons reſided. When he had received every neceſſary information, Perſeus flew to the habitation of the Gorgons, which was ſituate beyond the weſtern ocean, according to Heſiod and Apollodorus; or in Libya according to Ovid and Lucan; or in the deſarts of Aſiatic Scythia, according to Æſchylus, he found theſe monſters aſleep, and as he knew that if he fixed his eyes upon them, he ſhould be inſtantly changed into a ſtone, he continually looked on his ſhield, which reflected all the objects as clearly as the beſt of glaſſes. He approached them, and with a courage which the goddeſs Minerva ſupported, he cut off Meduſa's head with one blow. The noiſe awoke the two immortal ſiſters, but Pluto's helmet rendered Perſeus inviſible, and the attempts of the Gorgons to revenge Meduſa's death proved fruitleſs, the conqueror made his way thro' the air, and from the blood which dropped from Meduſa's head ſprang all thoſe innumerable ſerpents which have ever ſince infeſted the ſandy deſerts of Libya. Chryſaor alſo with his golden ſword, ſprung from theſe drops of blood, as well as the horſe Pegaſus, which immediately flew thro' the air, and ſtopped on mount Helicon, where he became the favorite of the Muſes. Mean time Perſeus had continued his journey acroſs the deſerts of Libya, but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas, king of Mauritania. He went to the monarch's palace, where he hoped to find a kind reception by announcing himſelf as the ſon of Jupiter, but in this he was diſappointed. Atlas recollected that according to an antient oracle, his gardens were to be robbed of their fruit by one of the ſons of Jupiter, and therefore he not only refuſed Perſeus the hoſpitality he demanded, but he even offered violence to his perſon. Perſeus finding himſelf inferior to his powerful enemy, ſhowed him Meduſa's head, and inſtantly Atlas was changed into a large mountain which bore the ſame name in the deſarts of Africa. On the morrow Perſeus continued his flight, and as he paſſed acroſs the territories of Libya, he diſcovered on the coaſts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda, expoſed to a ſea monſter. He was ſtruck at the ſight, and offered her father Cepheus to deliver her from inſtant death if he obtained her in marriage as a reward of his labors. Cepheus conſented and immediately Perſeus raiſing himſelf in the air, flew towards the monſter, which was advancing to devour Andromeda, and he plunged his dagger in his right ſhoulder, and deſtroyed it. This happy event was attended with the greateſt rejoicings. Perſeus raiſed three altars to Mercury, Jupiter, and Pallas, and after he had offered the ſacrifice of a calf, a bullock, and a heifer, the nuptials were celebrated with the greateſt feſtivity. The univerſal joy, however, was ſoon diſturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, entered the palace with a number of armed men, and attempted to carry away the bride, whom he had courted and admired long before the arrival of Perſeus. The father and mother of Andromeda interfered, but in vain; a bloody battle enſued, and Perſeus muſt have fallen a victim to the rage of Phineus, had not he defended himſelf at laſt with the ſame arms which proved fatal to Atlas. He ſhewed the Gorgons head to his adverſaries, and they were inſtantly turned to ſtone, each in the poſture and attitude in which he then ſtood. The friends of Cepheus, and ſuch as ſupported Perſeus ſhared not the fate of Phineus, as the hero had previouſly warned them of the power of Meduſa's head, and of the ſervices which he received from it. Soon after this memorable adventure Perſeus retired to Seriphos, at the very moment that his mother, Danae, fled to the altar of Minerva to avoid the purſuit of Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Dictys, who had ſaved her from the ſea, and who as ſome ſay was the brother of Polydectes, defended her againſt the attempts of her enemies, and therefore Perſeus, ſenſible of his merit and of his humanity, placed him on the throne of Seriphos, after he had with Meduſa's head turned into ſtones the wicked Polydectes, deſtes, and the officers who were the aſſociates of his guilt. He afterwards reſtored to Mercury his talaria and his wings, to Pluto his helmet, to Vulcan his ſword, and to Minerva her ſhield; but as he was more particularly indebted to the goddeſs of wiſdom for her aſſiſtance and protection, he placed the Gorgon's head on her ſhield, or rather, according to the more received opinion, on her ægis. After he had finiſhed theſe celebrated exploits, Perſeus expreſſed a wiſh to return to his native country, and accordingly he embarked for the Peloponneſus with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the Peloponneſian coaſts he was informed that Teutamias, king of Lariſſa, was then celebrating funeral games in honor of his father. This intelligence drew him to Lariſſa to ſignalize himſelf in throwing the quoit, of which, according to ſome, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill a man with a quoit which he had thrown in the air. This was no other than his grandfather Acriſius, who on the firſt intelligence that his grandſon had reached the Peloponneſus, fled from his kingdom of Argos to the court of his friend and ally Teutamias to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle which had obliged him to treat his daughter with ſo much barbarity. Some ſuppoſe with Pauſanias, that Acriſius had gone to Lariſſa to be reconciled to his grandſon whoſe fame had been ſpread in every city of Greece; and Ovid maintains that the grandfather was under the ſtrongeſt obligations to his ſon-in-law, as thro' him he had received his kingdom, from which he had been forcibly driven by the ſons of his brother Prœtus. This unfortunate murder greatly depreſſed the ſpirits of Perſeus; by the death of Acriſius he was entitled to the throne of Argos, but he refuſed to reign there, and to remove himſelf from a place which reminded him of the parricide he had unfortunately committed, he exchanged his kingdom for that of Tirynthus, and the maritime coaſt of Argolis, where Megapenthes the ſon of Prœtus then reigned. When he had finally ſettled in this part of the Peloponneſus, he determined to lay the foundations of a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Mycenæ, becauſe the pommel of his ſword, called by the Greeks myces, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown, yet it is univerſally agreed that he received divine honors like the reſt of the antient heroes. He had ſtatues at Mycenæ, and in the iſland of Seriphos, and the Athenians raiſed him a temple, in which they conſecrated an altar in honor of Dictys, who had treated Danae and her infant ſon with ſo much paternal tenderneſs. The Egyptians alſo paid particular honor to his memory, and aſſerted that he often appeared among them wearing ſhoes two cubits long, which was always interpreted as a ſign of fertility. Perſeus had by Andromeda, Alceus, Sthenelus, Neſtor, Electryon, and Gorgophone, and after death, according to ſome mythologiſts, he became a conſtellation in the heavens. Herodot. 2, c. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4. &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 16 & 18 l. 3, c. 17, &c.—*Apollon. PERSEUS or PERSES, a ſon of Philip king of Macedonia. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf like his father, by his enmity to the Romans, and when he had made ſufficient preparations, he declared war againſt them. His operations, however, were ſlow and injudicious, he wanted courage and reſolution, and though he at firſt obtained ſome advantages over the Roman armies, yet his avarice and his timidity proved deſtructive to his cauſe. When Paulus was appointed to the command of the Roman armies in Macedonia, Perſeus ſhewed his inferiority by his imprudent incampments, and when he had at laſt yielded to the advice of his officers, who recommended a general engagement, and drawn up his forces near the walls of Pydna, B. C. 168, he was the firſt who ruined his own cauſe, and by flying as ſoon as the battle was begun, he left the enemy maſters of the field. From Pydna, Perſeus fled to Samothrace, but he was ſoon diſcovered in his obſcure retreat, and brought into the preſence of the Roman conqueror, where the meanneſs of his behaviour expoſed him to ridicule, and not to mercy. He was carried to Rome, and dragged along the ſtreets of the city to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. His family were alſo expoſed to the ſight of the Roman populace, who ſhed tears on viewing in their ſtreets, dragged like a ſlave, a monarch who had once defeated their armies, and ſpread alarm all over Italy, by the greatneſs of his military preparations, and by his bold undertakings. Perſeus died in priſon, or according to ſome he was put to a ſhameful death the firſt year of his captivity. He had two ſons, Philip and Alexander, and one daughter whoſe name is not known. Alexander the younger of theſe was hired to a Roman carpenter, and led the the greateſt part of his life in obſcurity, till his ingenuity raiſed him to notice. He was afterwards made ſecretary to the ſenate. Liv. 40, &c.—Juſtin 33, c. 1. &c.—Plut. in Paulo.—Flor. 2, c. 12.—Propert. 4 el. 12, v. 39.

PERSIA, a celebrated kingdom of Aſia, which in its antient ſtate extended from the Helleſpont to the Indus, above 2800 miles, and from Pontus to the ſhores of Arabia above 2000 miles. As a province, Perſia was but ſmall, and according to the deſcription of Ptolemy, it was bounded on the north by Media, weſt by Suſiana, ſouth by the Perſian gulf, and eaſt by Carmania. The empire of Perſia, or the Perſian monarchy, was firſt founded by Cyrus the Great, about 559 years before the Chriſtian era, and under the ſucceeding monarchs it became one of the moſt conſiderable and powerful kingdoms of the earth. The kings of Perſia began to reign in the following order: Cyrus, B. C. 559: Cambyſes 529; and after the uſurpation of Smerdis for 7 months, Darius 521: Xerxes the Great 485: Artabanus 7 months, and Artaxerxes Longimanus 464: Xerxes II. 425: Sogdianus 7 months, 424: Darius II. or Nothus 423: Artaxerxes II. or Memnon 404: Artaxerxes III. or Ochus, 358: Arſes or Arogus 337, and Darius III. or Codomanus, 335, who was conquered by Alexander the Great 331. The deſtruction of the Perſian monarchy by the Macedonians was eaſily effected, and from that time Perſia became tributary to the Greeks. After the death of Alexander, when the Macedonian empire was divided among the officers of the deceaſed conqueror, Seleucus Nicanor made himſelf maſter of the Perſian provinces, till the revolt of the Parthians introduced new revolutions in the eaſt. Perſia was partly reconquered from the Greeks, and remained tributary to the Parthians for near 500 years. After this the ſovereignty was again placed into the hands of the Perſians, by the revolt of Artaxerxes, a common ſoldier, A. D. 229, who became the founder of the ſecond Perſian monarchy, which proved ſo inimical to the power of the Roman emperors. In their national character, the Perſians were warlike, they were early taught to ride, and to handle the bow, and by the manly exerciſes of hunting, they were inured to bear the toils and fatigues of a military life. Their national valor, however, ſoon degenerated, and their want of employment at home ſoon rendered them unfit for war. In the reign of Xerxes, when the empire of Perſia was in its moſt floriſhing ſtate, a ſmall number of Greeks were enabled repeatedly to repel for three ſucceſſive days, an almoſt innumerable army. This celebrated action which happened at Thermopylæ, ſhews in a ſtrong light the ſuperiority of the Grecian ſoldiers over the Perſians, and the battles that before, and a ſhort time after, were fought between the two nations at Marathon, Salamis, Platæa and Mycale, are again an inconteſtible proof that theſe Aſiatics had more reliance upon their numbers and upon the ſplendor and richneſs of their arms, than upon the valor and the diſcipline of their troops. Their cuſtom, too prevalent among eaſtern nations, of introducing luxury in the camp, proved alſo in ſome meaſure deſtructive to their military reputation, and the view which the antients give us of the army of Xerxes, of his cooks, ſtage-dancers, concubines, muſicians and perfumers, is no very favorable ſign of the ſagacity of a monarch who in a moment could call millions of men to ſtock to his ſtandard. In their religion the Perſians were very ſuperſtitious, they paid the greateſt veneration to the ſun, the moon, and the ſtars, and they offered ſacrifices to fire, but the ſupreme deity was never repreſented by ſtatues among them. They permitted polygamy, and it was no inceſt among them to marry a ſiſter, or a mother. In their puniſhments they were extremely ſevere, even to barbarity. The monarch always appeared with the greateſt pomp and dignity; his perſon was attended by a guard of 15,000 men, and he had beſides, a body of 10,000 choſen horſemen, called immortal. He ſtiled himſelf like the reſt of the eaſtern monarchs, the King of kings, as expreſſive of his greatneſs and his power. The Perſians were antiently called Cephenes, Achæmenians, and Artæi. They received the name of Perſians from Perſes the ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda, who is ſuppoſed to have ſettled among them. Perſepolis was the capital of the country. Curt. 4, &c.—*Plut. in Artax. PERSICUM MARE, or Perſicus Sinus, a part of the Indian ocean on the coaſt of Perſia and Arabia, now called the Gulf of Balgora.

PERSIS, a province of Perſia bounded by Media, Carmania, Suſiana and the Perſian gulf. It is often taken for Perſia itſelf.

AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS, a Latin poet of Volaterræ. He was of an equeſtrian family, and he made himſelf known by his intimacy with the moſt illuſtrious Romans of the age. The early part of his life was ſpent in his native town, and at the age of ſixteen he was removed to Rome, where he ſtudied philoſophy under Cornutus the celebrated Stoic. He alſo received the inſtructions of Palemon the grammarian, and Virginius the rhetorician. Naturally of a mild diſpoſition, his character was unimpeached, his modeſty remarkable, and his benevolence univerſally admired. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſatyrical humor, and made the faults of the orators and poets of his age the ſubject of his poems. He did not even ſpare Nero, and the more effectually to expoſe the emperor to ridicule, he introduced into his ſatires ſome of his verſes. The torva mimalloneis implerunt cornua bombis, with the three following verſes are Nero's according to ſome. But though he was ſo ſevere upon the vicious and ignorant, he did not forget his friendſhip for Cornutus, and he ſhowed his regard for his character and abilities by making mention of his name with great propriety in his ſatires. It was by the advice of his learned preceptor that he corrected one of his poems in which he had compared Nero to Midas, and at his repreſentation he altered the words Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet, into Auriculas aſini quis non habet? Perſius died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 62, and left all his books, which conſiſted of ſeven hundred volumes, and a large ſum of money, to his preceptor, but Cornutus only accepted the books, and returned the money to the ſiſters and friends of the deceaſed. The ſatires of Perſius are ſix in number, blamed by ſome for obſcurity of ſtyle and of language. But tho' they may appear almoſt unintelligible to ſome, it ought to be remembered that they were read with pleaſure and with avidity by his contemporaries, and that the only difficulties which now appear to the moderns, ariſe from their not knowing the various characters which they deſcribed, the vices which they laſhed, and the errors which they cenſured. The ſatires of Perſius are generally printed with thoſe of Juvenal, the beſt editions of which will be found to be Hennin. 4to L. Bat. 1695, and Hawkey, 12mo. Dublin 1746. The beſt edition of Perſius, ſeparate is that of Meric Caſaubon, 12mo. Lond. 1647.—A man whoſe quarrel with Rupilius, is mentioned in a ridiculous manner by Horat. Sat. 7. He is called Hybrida, as being ſon of a Greek by a Roman woman.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor after the death of Commodus. He was deſcended of an obſcure family, and like his father, who was either a ſlave or the ſon of a manumitted ſlave, he for ſome time followed the mean employment of drying wood and making charcoal. His indigence, however, did not prevent him from receiving a liberal education, and indeed he was for ſome time employed in teaching a number of pupils the Greek and the Roman languages in Etruria. He left this laborious profeſſion for a military life, and by his valor and intrepidity he gradually roſe to offices of the higheſt truſt in the army, and was made conſul by M. Aurelius for his eminent ſervices. He was afterwards entruſted with the government of Mœſia, and at laſt he preſided over the city of Rome as governor. When Commodus was murdered, Pertinax was univerſally ſelected to ſucceed to the imperial throne, and his refuſal, and the plea of old age and encreaſing infirmities did not prevent his being ſaluted emperor and Auguſtus. He acquieſced with reluctance, but his mildneſs, his economy, and the popularity of his adminiſtration convinced the ſenate and the people of the prudence and the juſtice of their choice. He forbad his name to be inſcribed on ſuch places or eſtates as were part of the imperial domain, and exclaimed that they belonged not to him but to the public. He melted all the ſilver ſtatues which had been raiſed to his vicious predeceſſor, and he expoſed to public ſale, all his concubines, his horſes, his arms, and all the inſtruments of his pleaſure and extravagance. With the money raiſed from theſe ſeveral goods he enriched the empire, and was enabled to aboliſh all the taxes which Commodus had laid on the rivers, ports and highways through the empire. This patriotic adminiſtration gained him the affection of the worthieſt and moſt diſcerning of his ſubjects, but the extravagant aud luxurious raiſed their clamors againſt him, and when Pertinax attempted to introduce among the pretorian guards that diſcipline which was ſo neceſſary to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of Rome, the flames of rebellion were kindled, and the minds of the ſoldiers totally alienated. Pertinax was apprized of this mutiny, but he refuſed to fly at the hour of danger. He ſcorned the advice of his friends who wiſhed him to withdraw from the impending ſtorm, and he unexpectedly appeared before the ſeditious pretorians, and without fear or concern, boldly aſked them whether they who were bound to defend the perſon of their prince and emperor, were come to betray him and to ſhed his blood. His undaunted aſſurance and his intrepidity would have had the deſired effect, and the ſoldiers had already begun to retire when one of the moſt ſeditious advanced and darted his javelin at the emperor's breaſt, exclaiming, the ſoldiers ſend you this. The reſt immediately followed the example, and Pertinax muffling up his head, and calling upon Jupiter to avenge his death, remained unmoved and was inſtantly diſpatched. His head was cut off and carried upon the point point of a ſpear as in triumph to the camp. This happened on the 28th of March, A. D. 193. Pertinax reigned only 87 days, and his death was the more univerſally lamented as it proceeded from a ſeditious tumult and robbed the Roman empire of a wiſe, virtuous, and benevolent emperor. Dio.—Herodian.—Capital.

PETRŌNIUS a governor of Egypt appointed to ſucceed Gallus. He behaved with great humanity to the Jews, and made war againſt Candace queen of Æthiopia. Strab. 17.—A favorite of Nero, put to death by Galba.—A govenor of Britain.—A tribune killed in Parthia with Craſſus.—A man baniſhed by Nero to the Cyclades, when Piſo's conſpiracy was diſcovered. Tacit. An. 15.—A governor of Britain in Nero's reign. He was put to death by Galba's orders.—Maximus, a Roman emperor. Vid. Maximus.—Arbiter, a favorite of the emperor Nero, and one of the miniſters and aſſociates of all his pleaſures and his debauchery. He was naturally fond of pleaſure and effeminate, and he paſſed his whole nights in revels and the days in ſleep. He indulged himſelf in all the delights and gaieties of life, but though he was the moſt voluptuous of the age, yet he moderated his pleaſures, and wiſhed to appear curious and refined in luxury and extravagance. Whatever he did ſeemed to be performed with an air of unconcern and negligence, he was affable in his behaviour, and his witticiſms and ſatirical remarks appeared artleſs and natural. He was appointed proconſul of Bithynia, and afterwards he was honored with the conſulſhip, in both of which honorable employments he behaved with all the dignity which became one of the ſucceſſors ceſſors of a Brutus or a Scipio. With his office he laid down his artificial gravity, and gave himſelf up to the purſuit of pleaſure, the emperor became more attached to him, and ſeemed fonder of his company, but he did not long enjoy the imperial favors. Tigellinus, likewiſe one of Nero's favorites, jealous of his fame, accuſed him of conſpiring againſt the emperor's life. The accuſation was credited and Petronius immediately reſolved to withdraw himſelf from Nero's puniſhments by a voluntary death. This was performed in a manner altogether unprecedented, A. D. 66. Petronius ordered his veins to be opened, but without the eagerneſs to terminate his agonies he had them cloſed at intervals. Some time after they were opened, and as if he wiſhed to die in the ſame careleſs and unconcerned manner as he had lived, he paſſed his time in diſcourſing with his friends upon triſles, and liſtened with the greateſt avidity to love verſes, amuſing ſtories, or laughable epigrams. Sometimes he manumitted his ſlaves or puniſhed them with ſtripes. In this ludicrous manner did he ſpend his laſt moments till nature was exhauſted, and before he expired he wrote an epiſtle to the emperor, in which he had deſcribed with a maſterly hand his nocturnal extravagances, and the daily impurities of his actions. This letter was careſully ſealed, and after he had conveyed it privately to the emperor, Petronius broke his ſignet that it might not after his death become a ſnare to the innocent. Petronius diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings as well as by his luxury and voluptuouſneſs. He is the author of many elegant but obſcene compoſitions ſtill extant, among which is a poem on the civil wars of Pompey and Cæſar, ſuperior in ſome reſpects to the Pharſalia of Lucan. There is alſo the feaſt of Trimalcion, in which he paints with too much licentiouſneſs, the pleaſures and the debaucheries of a corrupted court and of an extravagant monarch—reflections on the inſtability of human life—— a poem on the vanity of dreams---another on the education of the Roman youth---two treatiſes, &c. The beſt editions of Petronius are thoſe of Burman, 4to. Utr. 1709, and Reineſius, 8vo. 1731.

Pexodorus, a governor of Caria who offered to give his daughter in marriage to Aridæus the illegitimate ſon of Philip. Plut.

Phæa, a celebrated ſow which infeſted the neighbourhood of Cromyon. It was deſtroyed by Theſeus as he was travelling from Trœzene to Athens to make himſelf known to his father. Some ſuppoſed that the boar of Calydon ſprang from this ſow, Phæa, according to ſome authors, was no other than a woman who proſtituted herſelf to ſtrangers, whom ſhe murdered, and afterwards plundered. Plut. in Theſ.—Strab. 8.

Phæācia, an iſland of the Ionian ſea, near the coaſt of Epirus, antiently called Scheria, and afterward Corcyra. The inhabitants, called Phæaces, were a luxurious and diſſolute people, from which reaſon a glutton was generally ſtigmatized by the epithet of Phæax. When Ulyſſes was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Phæacia, Alcinous was then king of the iſland, whoſe gardens have been greatly celebrated. Horat. 1, ep. 15, v. 24.—Ovid, Met. 13, v. 719.—Strab. 6 & 7.

Phæax, an inhabitant of the iſland of Phæacia. Vid Phæacia.—— A man who ſailed with Theſeus to Crete.—— An Athenian who oppoſed Alcibiades in his adminiſtration.

Phædĭmus, one of Niobe's children. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—— A Macedonian general who betrayed Eumenes to Antigonus.—— A celebrated courier of Greece.

Phædon, an Athenian put to death by the 30 tyrants.—— A diſciple of Socrates. He had been ſeized by pirates in his younger days, and the philoſopher who ſeemed to diſcover ſomething uncommon, and promiſing in his countenance, bought his liberty for a ſum of money, and ever after eſteemed him. Phædon after the death of Socrates, returned to Elis his native country, where he founded a ſect of philoſophers called Elean. The name of Phædon is affixed to one of the dialogues of Plato. Diog.—— An archon at Athens, when the Athenians Athenians were directed by the oracle to remove the bones of Theſeus to Attica Plut. in Theſ.

PHÆDRA, a daughter of Minos and Paſiphae, who married Theſeus, by whom ſhe became mother of Acamas and Demophoon. They had already lived for ſome time in conjugal felicity, when Venus, who hated all the deſcendants of Apollo, becauſe that god had diſcovered her amours with Mars, inſpired Phædra with an unconquerable paſſion for Hippolytus the ſon of Theſeus, by the amazon Hippolyte. This ſhameful paſſion Phædra long attempted to ſtifle, but in vain, and therefore, in the abſence of Theſeus, ſhe addreſſed Hippolytus with all the impatience of a deſponding lover. Hippolytus rejected her with horror and diſdain; but Phædra, incenſed on account of the reception ſhe had met, reſolved to puniſh his coldneſs and refuſal. At the return of Theſeus ſhe accuſed Hippolytus of attempts upon her virtue. The credulous father liſtened to the accuſation, and without hearing the defence of Hippolytus, he baniſhed him from his kingdom, and implored Neptune who had promiſed to grant three of his requeſts, to puniſh him in ſome exemplary manner. As Hippolytus fled from Athens, his horſes were ſuddenly terrified by a huge ſea monſter, which Neptune had ſent on the ſhore. He was dragged through precipices and over rocks, and he was trampled under the feet of his horſes, and cruſhed under the wheels of his chariot. When the tragical end of Hippolytus was known at Athens, Phædra confeſſed her crime, and hung herſelf in deſpair, unable to ſurvive one whoſe death her wickedneſs and guilt had occaſioned. The death of Hippolytus, and the infamous paſſion of Phædra, is the ſubject of one of the tragedies of Euripides and of Seneca. Phædra was buried at Trœzene, where her tomb was ſtill ſeen in the age of the geographer Pauſanias, near the temple of Venus, which ſhe had built to render the goddeſs favorable to her inceſtuous paſſion. There was near her tomb a myrtle, whoſe leaves were all full of ſmall holes, and it was reported, that Phædra had done this with a hair pin, when the vehemence of her paſſion had rendered her melancholy and almoſt deſperate. She was repreſented in a painting in Apollo's temple at Delphi, as ſuſpended in the air, while her ſiſter Ariadne ſtood near to her, and fixed her eyes upon her. Plut. in Theſ.—Pauſ. 1, c. 22, l. 2, c. 32.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 47, & 243.—*Eurip. & Senec. in Hippol. PHÆDRUS, one of the diſciples of Socrates. Cic. de Nat. D. 1.—An Epicurean philoſopher.—A Thracian, who became one of the freed men of the emperor Auguſtus. He tranſlated into iambic verſes, the fables of Æſop, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. They are divided into five books, valuable for their preciſion, purity, elegance, and ſimplicity. They remained long buried in oblivion, till they were diſcovered in the library of St. Remi, at Rheims, and publiſhed by Peter Pithou, a Frenchman, at the end of the 16th century. Phædrus was for ſome time perſecuted by Sejanus becauſe this corrupt miniſter believed that he was ſatiriſed and abuſed in the encomiums which the poet every where pays to virtue. The beſt editions of Phædrus, are thoſe of Burman, 4to. Leyd. 1727. Hoogſtraten, 4to. Amſt. 1701, and Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754.

PHÆDYMA, a daughter of Otanes, who firſt diſcovered that Smerdis, who had aſcended the throne of Perſia at the death of Cambyſes, was an impoſtor. Herodot. 3, c. 69.

PHÆMONŌE, a prieſteſs of Apollo.

PHÆNARĒTE, the mother of the philoſopher Socrates. She was a midwife by profeſſion.

PHÆNIAS, a peripatetic philoſopher, diſciple of Ariſtotle. He wrote an hiſtory of tyrants.

PHÆNNIS, a famous propheteſs in the age of Antiochus. Pauſ. 10, c. 15.

PHÆSANA, a town of Arcadia.

PHÆSTUM, a town of Crete.—Another of Macedonia.

PHAĔTON, a ſon of the Sun, or Phœbus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was ſon of Cephalus and Aurora, according to Heſiod and Pauſanias, or of Tithonus and Aurora, according to Apollodorus. He is, however, more generally acknowledged to be the ſon of Phœbus and Clymene. Phaeton was naturally of a lively diſpoſition, and a handſome figure. Venus became enamoured of him, and entruſted him with the care of one of her temples. This diſtinguiſhing favor of the goddeſs, rendered him vain and aſpiring, and when Epaphus, the ſon of Io, had told him, to check his pride, that he was not the ſon of Phœbus, Phaeton reſolved to know his true origin, and at the inſtigation of his mother he viſited the palace of the ſun. He begged Phœbus, that if he really were his father, he would give him inconteſtible proofs of his paternal tenderneſs, and convince the world of his legitimacy. Phœbus ſwore by by the Styx, that he would grant him whatever he required, and no ſooner was the oath uttered, than Phaeton demanded him to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus repreſented the impropriety of ſuch a requeſt, and the dangers to which it would expoſe him; but in vain, and as the oath was inviolable, and Phaeton unmoved, the father inſtructed his ſon how he was to proceed in his way through the regions of the air. His explicit directions were forgotten, or little attended to, and no ſooner had Phaeton received the reins from his father, than he betrayed his ignorance and incapacity of guiding the chariot. The flying horſes became ſenſible of the confuſion of their driver, and immediately departed from the uſual track. Phaeton repented too late of his raſhneſs, and already heaven and earth were theatened with an univerſal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the diſorder of the horſes of the ſun, ſtruck the rider with one of his thunder bolts, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body conſumed with the fire, was found by the nymphs of the place, and honored with a decent burial. His ſiſters mourned his unhappy end, and were changed into poplars by Jupiter. [Vid. Phaetontiades.] According to the poets, while Phaeton was unſkilfully driving the chariot of his father, the blood of the Æthiopians was dried up and their ſkin became black, a color which is ſtill preſerved among the greateſt part of the inhabitants of the torrid zone. The territories of Libya were alſo parched up, according to the ſame tradition, on account of their too great vicinity to the ſun, and ever ſince Africa, unable to recover her original verdure and fruitfulneſs, has exhibited a ſandy country, and uncultivated waſte. According to thoſe who explain this poetical fable, Phaeton was a Ligurian prince, who ſtudied aſtronomy, and in whoſe age the neighbourhood of the Po was viſited with uncommon heats. The horſes of the Sun are called Phaetontis equi, either becauſe they were guided by Phaeton, or from the Greek word (φαεθων) which expreſſes the ſplendor and luſtre of that luminary. *Virg. PHALÆSIA, a town of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 35.

PHALANTHUS, a Lacedæmonian, who founded Tarentum in Italy, at the head of the Partheniæ. His father's name was Aracus. As he went to Italy he was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt, and carried to ſhore by a dolphin, and from that reaſon, there was a dolphin placed near his ſtatue in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. [Vid. Parthenia.] He received divine honors after death. Juſtin. 3, c. 4.—Pauſ. 10. c. 10.—Horat. 2, od. 6.——A town and mountain of the ſame name in Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 35.

PHĂLĂRIS, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who made uſe of the moſt excrutiating torments to puniſh his ſubjects on the ſmalleſt ſuſpicion. Perillus made him a brazen bull, and when he had preſented it to Phalaris, the tyrant ordered the inventor to be ſeized, and the firſt experiment to be made on his body. Theſe cruelties did not long remain unrevenged, the people of Agrigentum revolted in the tenth year of his reign, and put him to death in the ſame manner as he had tortured Perillus, and many of his ſubjects, after him, B. C. 552. The brazen bull of Phalaris was found at Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and it was delivered again to the inhabitants of Agrigentum by the Romans. There are now ſome letters extant written by a certain Abaris to Phalaris with their reſpective anſwers, but they are ſuppoſed by ſome to be ſpurious. The beſt edition is that of the learned Boyle, Oxon. 1718. Cic. in Verr. 4. ad Attic. 7, ep. 12, de offic. 2.---Ovid. de art. am. 1, v. 663---Juv. 8, v. 81. Plin. 34, c. 8. ---Diod.---A Trojan killed by Turnus *Virg. PHALĔRON, or PHALĔRUM, an antient harbour harbour of Athens, about 25 ſtadia from the city, which for its ſituation was not very fit for the reception of many ſhips. —— A place of Theſſaly.

PHALIAS, a ſon of Hercules and Heliconis.

PHALLĬCA, feſtivals obſerved by the Egyptians in honor of Oſiris. They receive their name from φαλλος ſimulachrum ligneum membri virilis. The inſtitution originated in this: after the murder of Oſiris, Iſis was unable to recover among the other limbs the privities of her huſband, and therefore, as ſhe paid particular honor to every part of his body, ſhe diſtinguiſhed that which was loſt with more honor, and paid it more attention. Its repreſentation called phallus was made with wood, and carried during the ſacred feſtivals which were inſtituted in honor of Oſiris. The people held it in the greateſt veneration, it was looked upon as the emblem of fecundity, and the mention of it among the antients, never conveyed any impure thought or laſcivious reflection. The feſtivals of the phallus were imitated by the Greeks, and introduced in Europe by the Athenians, who made the proceſſion of the phallus part of the celebration of the Dionyſia of the god of wine. Thoſe that carried the phallus at the end of a long pole, were called phallaphori. They generally appeared among the Greeks, beſmeared with the dregs of wine, covered with ſkins of lambs, and wearing on their heads a crown of ivy. Lucian. de Deâ. Syr.—Plut. de Iſid. & Oſir.

PHANŎCLES, an elegiac poet of Greece, who wrote a poem upon that unnatural ſin, of which Socrates is accuſed by ſome. He ſupported that Orpheus had been the firſt who diſgraced himſelf by that filthy indulgence. Some of his fragments are remaining.

PHANODĒMUS, an hiſtorian who wrote on the antiquities of Attica.

PHANTASIA, a daughter of Nicarchus of Memphis in Egypt. Some have ſuppoſed that ſhe wrote a poem on the Trojan war, and another on the return of Ulyſſes to Ithaca, from which compoſitions Homer copied the greateſt part of his Iliad and Odyſſey, when he viſited Memphis, where they were depoſited.

PHANUS, a ſon of Bacchus, who was among the Argonauts.

PHAON, a boatman of Mitylene in Leſbos. He received a ſmall box of ointment from Venus, who had preſented herſelf to him in the form of an old woman, to be carried over into Aſia, and as ſoon as he had rubbed himſelf with what the box contained, he became one of the moſt beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with the charms of Phaon, and among others, Sappho, the celebrated poeteſs. Phaon gave himſelf up to the pleaſures of Sappho's company, but however, he ſoon conceived a diſdain for her, and Sappho mortified at his coldneſs, threw herſelf into the ſea. Some ſay that Phaon was beloved by the goddeſs of beauty, who concealed him for ſome time among lettuces. Ælian ſays, that Phaon was killed by a man whoſe bed he was defiling. Ælian V. H. 12. Ovid. Heroid. 21.—Palæphat de in. c. 49.—Athen. 1.—Lucian in Sim. & Poliſtr.

PHARMECŪSA, an iſland of the Ægean ſea, where Julius Cæſar was ſeized by ſome pirates.

PHARNABĀZUS, a ſatrap of Perſia, ſon of a perſon of the ſame name. B. C. 409. He aſſiſted the Lacedæmonians againſt the Athenians, and gained their eſteem by his friendly behaviour and ſupport. His behaviour, however, to Alcibiades was of the moſt perfidious nature, and he did not ſcruple to betray to his mortal enemies the man man he had long honored with his friendſhip. C. Nep. in Alc.—Plut.—An officer under Eumenes.—A king of Iberia.

PHARNĂCES, a ſon of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who favored the Romans againſt his father. He revolted againſt Mithridates, and even cauſed him to be put to death, according to ſome accounts. In the civil wars of Julius Cæſar and Pompey, he intereſted himſelf for neither of the contending parties, upon which Cæſar turned his arms againſt him, and conquered him. It was to expreſs the celerity of his operations in conquering Pharnaces, that the conqueror made uſe of theſe words, Veni, vidi, vici. Flor. 3.—Suet. in Cæſ. 37.—Paterc. 2, c. 55.—A king of Pontus, who made war with Eumenes, B. C. 181.—A king of Cappadocia.—A librarian of Atticus. Cic. ad Att.

PHARNUS, a king of Media, conquered by Ninus king of Aſſyria.

PHAROS, a ſmall iſland in the bay of Alexandria, about ſeven furlongs diſtant from the continent. It was joined to the Egyptian ſhore, with a cauſeway by Dexiphanes, B. C. 284, and upon it was built a celebrated tower, in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, and Philadelphus, by Soſtratus, the ſon of Dexiphanes. This tower which was called the tower of Pharos, and which paſſed for one of the ſeven wonders of the world, was built with white marble. On the top, fires were conſtantly kept to direct ſailors in the bay, which was dangerous and difficult of acceſs. The building of this tower coſt the Egyptian monarch 800 talents, which are equivalent to above 165,000l. Engliſh, if Attic, or if Alexandrian, double that ſum. There was this inſcription upon it, King Ptolemy to the gods the ſaviors, for the benefit of ſailors; but Soſtratus the architect, wiſhing to claim all the glory, engraved his own name upon the ſtones, and afterwards filled the hollow with mortar, and wrote the above mentioned inſcription. When the mortar had decayed by time, Ptolemy's name diſappeared, and the following inſcription then became viſible: *Soſtratus the Cnidian, ſon of Dexiphanes, to the gods the ſaviors, for the benefit of ſailors. PHERĔCRĂTES, a comic poet of Athens, in the age of Plato and Ariſtophanes. He is ſuppoſed to have written 21 comedies, of which only few verſes remain. He introduced living characters on the ſtage, but never abuſed the liberty which he had taken either by ſatire or defamation. He invented a ſort of verſe, which from him has been called Pherecratian. It conſiſted of the three laſt feet of an hexameter verſe, of which the firſt was always a ſpondee. as for inſtance, the third verſe of Horace's 1, od. 5. Grato Pyrrha ſub antro.——Another deſcended from Deucalion. Cic. Tuſ.

PHERECŸDES, a philoſopher of Syros, diſciple to Pittacus, one of the firſt who delivered his thoughts in proſe. He was acquainted with the periods of the moon and foretold eclipſes with the greateſt accuracy. The doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, was firſt ſupported by him, as alſo that of the metempſychoſis. Pythagoras was one of his diſciples, remarkable for his eſteem and his attachment to his learned maſter. When Pherecydes lay dangerouſly ill in the iſland of Delos, Pythagoras haſtened to give him every aſſiſtance in his power, and when all his efforts had proved ineffectual, he buried him, and after he had paid him the laſt offices, he retired to Italy. Some, however, ſuppoſe, that Pherecydes threw himſelf down from a precipice as he was going to Delphi, or according to others, he fell a ſacrifice to the louſy diſeaſe, B. C. 515, in the 85th year of his age. Diog.—Lactant.——An hiſtorian of Leros ſirnamed the Athenian. He wrote an hiſtory of Attica, now loſt, in the age of Darius Hyſtaſpes.——A tragic poet.

PHICORES, a people near the Palus Mæotis. Mela. 1, c. 19.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated ſtatuary of Athens, who died B.C. 432. He made a ſtatue of Minerva at the requeſt of Pericles, which was placed in the Pantheon. It was made with ivory and gold, and meaſured 39 feet in height. His preſumption raiſed him many enemies, and he was accuſed of having carved his own image, and that of Pericles on the ſhield of the ſtatue of the goddeſs, for which he was baniſhed from Athens by the clamorous populace. He retired to Elis, where he determined to revenge the ill-treatment he had received from his countrymen, by making a ſtatue which ſhould eclipſe the fame of that of Minerva. He was ſucceſsful in the attempt, and the ſtatue he made of Jupiter Olympius was always reckoned the beſt of all his pieces, and has paſſed for one of the wonders of the world. The people of Elis were ſo ſenſible of his merit, and of the honor he had done to their city, that they appointed his deſcendants to the honorable office of keeping clean that magnificent ſtatue, and of preſerving it from every injury. Pauſ. 9, c. 4.—Cic. de Orat. Strab. 8.—Quintil. 12.—Plut. in Per.

PHILÆNI, two brothers of Carthage. When a conteſt aroſe between the Cyreneans and Carthaginians, about the extent of their territories, it was mutually agreed, that at a ſtated hour, two men ſhould depart from each city, and that whenever they met, there they ſhould fix the boundaries of their country. The Philæni accordingly departed from Carthage, and met the Cyreneans, when they had advanced far into their territories. This produced a quarrel, and the Cyreneans ſupported, that the Philæni had left Carthage before the appointment, and that therefore they muſt retire, or be buried in the ſand. The Philæni refuſed, upon which they were overpowered by the Cyreneans, and accordingly buried in the ſand. The Carthaginians, to commemorate the patriotic deeds of the Philæni, who had ſacrificed their lives, that the extent of their country might not be diminiſhed, raiſed two altars on the place where their bodies had been buried, which they called Philænorum aræ. Theſe altars were the boundaries of the Carthaginian dominions, which on the other ſide extended as far as the columns of Hercules, which is about 2000 miles, or according to the accurate obſervations of the moderns, only 1420 geographical miles. Salluſt. de bell. Jug.

PHI-

PHILÆUS, a ſon of Ajax by Lyſide the daughter of Coronus, one of the Lapithæ. Miltiades, as ſome ſuppoſe, was deſcended from him.——A ſon of Augeas, who upbraided his father for not granting what Hercules juſtly claimed for cleaning his ſtables. [Vid. Augeas.] He was placed upon his father's throne by Hercules. Apollod. 2.

PHILLIPPIDES, a comic poet in Alexander's age.—A courier called alſo Phidippides.

PHILIPPŌLIS, a town of Thrace, near the Hebrus, built by Philip the father of Alexander.

PHILIPPUS 1ſt, ſon of Argeus, ſucceeded his father on the throne of Macedonia, and reigned 38 years B. C. 40.—The ſecond of that name was the fourth ſon of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. He was ſent to Thebes as an hoſtage by his father, where he learnt the art of war under Epaminondas, and ſtudied with the greateſt care the manners and the purſuits of the Greeks. He was recalled to Macedonia, and at the death of his brother Perdiccas, he aſcended the throne as guardian and protector of the youthful years of his nephew. His ambition, however, ſoon diſcovered itſelf, and he made himſelf independent. The valor of a prudent general, and the policy of an experienced ſtateſman ſeemed requiſite to enſure his power. The neighbouring nations ridiculing the youth and inexperience of the new king of Macedonia appeared in arms, but Philip ſoon convinced them of their error. Unable to meet them as yet in the field of battle, he ſuſpended their fury by preſents, and ſoon turned his arms againſt Amphipolis, a colony tributary to the Athenians. Amphipolis was conquered, and added to the kingdom of Macedonia and Philip meſitated no leſs than the deſtruction of a republic which had rendered itſelf ſo formidable to the reſt of Greece, and had even claimed ſubmiſſion from the princes of Macedonia. His deſigns, however, were as yet immature, and before he could make Athens an object of conqueſt, the Thracians and the Illyrians demanded his attention. He made himſelf maſter of a Thracian colony, to which he gave the name of Philippi, and from which he received the greateſt advantages on account of the golden mines in the neighbourhood. In the midſt of his political proſperity, Philip did not neglect the honor of his family. He married Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of the Moloſſi, and when ſome time after he became father of Alexander, the monarch, conſcious of the ineſtimable advantages which ariſe from the leſſons, the example and the converſation of a learned and virtuous preceptor, wrote a letter with his own hand to the philoſopher Ariſtotle, and begged him to retire from his uſual purſuits, and to dedicate his whole time to the inſtruction of the young prince. Every thing ſeemed now to conſpire to his aggrandizement, and hiſtorians have obſerved that Philip received in one day the intelligence of three things which could gratify the moſt unbounded ambition and flatter the hopes of the moſt aſpiring monarch: the birth of a ſon, an honorable crown at the Olympic games, and a victory over the barbarians of Illyricum. But all theſe encreaſed rather than ſatiated his ambition, he declared his inimical ſentiments againſt the power of Athens and the independence of all Greece, by laying ſiege to Olynthus, a place, which on account of its ſituation and conſequence, would prove moſt injurious to the intereſts of the Athenians, and moſt advantageous to the intrigues and military operations of every Macedonian prince. The Athenians, rouſed by the eloquence of Demoſthenes, ſent 17 veſſels and 2000 men to the aſſiſtance of Olynthus, but the money of Philip prevailed over all their efforts. The greateſt part of the citizens ſuffered themſelves to be bribed by the Macedonian gold, and Olynthus ſurrendered to the enemy, and was inſtantly reduced to ruins. His ſucceſſes were as great in every part of Greece, he was declared head of the Amphictyonic council, and was entruſted with the care of the ſacred temple of Apollo at Delphi. If he was recalled to Macedonia, it was only to add freſh laurels to his crown, by victories over his enemies in Illyricum and Theſſaly. By aſſuming the maſk of a moderator and peace-maker he gained confidence, and in attempting to protect the Peloponneſians againſt the encroaching power of Sparta, he rendered his cauſe popular, and by ridiculing the inſults that were offered to his perſon as he paſſed through Corinth, he diſplayed to the world his moderation, and philoſophic virtues. In his attempts to make himſelf maſter of Eubœa, Philip was unſucceſsful, and Phocion, who deſpiſed his gold as well as his meanneſs, obliged him to evacuate an iſland whoſe inhabitants were as inſenſible to the charms of money, as they were unmoved at the horrors of war, and the bold efforts of a vigilant enemy. From Eubœa he turned his arms againſt the Scythians, but the advantages he obtained over this indigent nation were inconſiderable, and he again made Greece an object of plunder, and rapine. He advanced far in Bœotia, and a general engagement was fought at Chæronea. The fight was long and bloody, but Philip obtained the victory. His behaviour after the battle reflects great diſgrace upon him as a man, and as a monarch. In the hour of feſtivity, and during the entertainment which he had given to celebrate the trophies he had won, Philip ſallied from his camp, and with the inhumanity of a brute, he inſulted the bodies of the ſlain, and exulted over the calamities of the priſoners of war. His inſolence, however, was checked when Demades, one of the Athenian captives, reminded him of his meanneſs, by exclaiming, Why do you, O king, act the part of a Therſites, when you can repreſent with ſo much dignity the elevated character of an Agamemnon. The reproof was felt, Damades received his liberty, and Philip learned how to gain popularity even among his fallen enemies, by relieving their wants and eaſing their diſtreſſes. At the battle of Chæronea the independence of Greece was extinguiſhed, and Philip unable to find new enemies in Europe, formed new enterprizes, and meditated new conqueſts. He was nominated general of the Greeks againſt the Perſians, and was called upon as well as from inclination as duty to revenge thoſe injuries which Greece had ſuffered from the invaſions of Darius, and of Xerxes. But he was ſtopped in the midſt of his warlike preparations, he was ſtabbed by Pauſanias as he entered the theatre at the celebration of the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra. This murder has given riſe to many reflections upon the cauſes which produced it, and many who conſider the recent repudiation of Olympias, and the reſentment of Alexander, are apt to inveſtigate the cauſes of his death in the boſom of his family. The ridiculous honors which Olympias paid to her huſband's murderer ſtrengthened the ſuſpicion, yet Alexander declared that he invaded the kingdom of Perſia to revenge his father's death upon the Perſian ſatraps and princes, by whoſe immediate intrigues the aſſaſſination had been committed. The character of Philip is that of a ſagacious, artful, prudent and intriguing monarch, he was brave in the field of battle, eloquent and diſſimulating at home, and he poſſeſſed the wonderful art of changing his conduct according to the diſpoſition and caprice of mankind, without ever altering his purpoſe, or loſing ſight of his ambitious aims. He poſſeſſed much perſeverance, and in the execution of his plans he was always vigorous. The hand of an aſſaſſin prevented him from atchieving the boldeſt and the moſt extenſive of his undertakings, and he might have acquired as many laurels, and conquered as many nations as his ſon Alexander did in the ſucceeding reign, and the kingdom of Perſia might have been added to the Macedonian empire, perhaps with greater moderation, with more glory, and with more laſting advantages. The private character of Philip lies open to cenſure, and raiſes indignation. The admirer of his virtues is diſguſted to find him among the moſt abandoned proſtitutes, and diſgracing himſelf by the moſt unnatural crimes and laſcivious indulgences which can make even the moſt debauched, and the moſt profligate to bluſh. He was murdered in the 47th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign, about 336 years before the Chriſtian era. His reign is become uncommonly intereſting, and his adminiſtration a matter of inſtruction. He is the firſt monarch whoſe life and actions are deſcribed with peculiar accuracy and hiſtorical faithfulneſs. Philip was the father of Alexander the Great and of Cleopatra, by Olympias; he had alſo by Audaca, an Illyrian, Cyna, who married Amyntas the ſon of Perdiccas, Philip's elder brother; by Nicaſipolis, a Theſſalian, Nicæa, who married Caſſander; by Philinna, a Lariſſæan dancer, Aridæus, who reigned ſome time after Alexander's death; by Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, Caranus and Europa, who were both murdered by Olympias; and Ptolemy, the firſt king of Egypt, by Arſinoe, who in the firſt month of her pregnancy was married to Lagus. Demoſth. in Phil. & Olynth.—Juſtin. 7, &c.—Diod. 16. Plut. in Alex. Dem. & Apoph.—Iſocrat. ad Phil.—Curt. 1, &c.—Æſchines.—Pauſ. Boetic. &c.——The laſt king of Macedonia, of that name, was ſon of Demetrius. His infancy at the death of his father, was protected by Antigonus, one of his friends, who aſcended the throne and reigned for 12 years, with the title of independent monarch. When Antigonus died, Philip recovered his father's throne, though only 15 years of age, and he early diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his boldneſs and his ambitious views. His cruelty, however, to Aratus, ſoon diſplayed his character in its true light, and to the gratification of every vice, and every extravagant propenſity, he had the meanneſs to ſacrifice this faithful and virtuous Athenian. Not ſatisfied with the kingdom of Macedonia, Philip aſpired to become the friend of Annibal, and wiſhed to ſhare with him the ſpoils which the diſtreſſes and continual loſs of the Romans ſeemed ſoon to promiſe. But his expectations were fruſtrated, the Romans diſcovered his intrigues, and though weakened by the valor and artifice of the Carthaginian, yet they were ſoon enabled to meet him in the field of battle. The conſul Lævinus entered without delay his territories of Macedonia, and after he had obtained a victory over him near Apollonia, and reduced his fleet to aſhes, he compelled him to ſue for peace. This peaceful diſpoſition was not permanent, and when the Romans diſcovered that he had aſſiſted their immortal enemy Annibal, with men and money, they appointed T. Q. Flaminius to puniſh his perfidy, and the violation of the treaty. The Roman conſul with his uſual expedition, invaded Macedonia, and in a general engagement, which was fought near Cynocephale, the hoſtile army was totally defeated, and the monarch ſaved his life with difficulty by flying from the field of battle. Deſtitute of reſources, without friends either at home or abroad, Philip was obliged to ſubmit to the mercy of the conqueror, and to demand peace by his ambaſſadors. It was granted with difficulty, the terms were humiliating, but the poverty of Philip obliged him to accept the conditions, however diſadvantageous and degrading to his dignity. In the midſt of theſe public calamities, the peace of his family was diſturbed, and Perſes, the eldeſt of his ſons by a concubine, raiſed ſeditions againſt his brother Demetrius, whoſe condeſcenſion and humanity had gained popularity among the Macedonians, and who from his reſidence at Rome, as an hoſtage, had gained the good graces of the ſenate, and by the modeſty and innocence of his manners, had obtained forgiveneſs from that venerable body for the hoſtilities of his father. Philip liſtened with too much avidity to the falſe accuſation of Perſes, and when he heard it aſſerted that Demetrius wiſhed to rob him of his crown, he no longer heſitated to puniſh with death ſo unworthy and ſo ungrateful a ſon. No ſooner was Demetrius ſacrificed to credulity than Philip became convinced of his cruelty, and raſhneſs, and to puniſh the perfidy of Perſes, he attempted to make Antigonus, another ſon, his ſucceſſor on the Macedonian throne. But he was prevented from executing his purpoſe by death, in the 42d year of his reign, 179 years before the Chriſtian era. The aſſaſſin of Demetrius ſucceeded his father, and with the ſame ambition, with the ſame raſhneſs and oppreſſion renewed the war againſt the Romans till his empire was deſtroyed and Macedonia became a Roman province. Philip has been compared with his great anceſtor of the ſame name, but though they poſſeſſed the ſame virtues, the ſame ambition, and were tainted with the ſame vices, yet the father of Alexander was more ſagacious and more intriguing, and the ſon of Demetrius was more ſuſpicious, more cruel, and more implacable, and according to the pretended prophecy of one of the Sibyls, Macedonia was indebted to one Philip for her riſe and conſequence among nations, and under another Philip ſhe lamented the loſs of her power, her empire, and her dignity. Polyb. 16, &c.—Juſtin. 29, &c.—Plut. in Flam.—Pauſ. 7, c. 8.—Liv. 31. &c.——M. Julius, a Roman emperor of an obſcure family in Arabia, from whence he was ſirnamed Arabian. From the loweſt rank in the army he gradually roſe to the higheſt offices, and when he was made general of the pretorian guards he aſſaſſinated Gordian to make himſelf emperor. To eſtabliſh himſelf with more certainty on the imperial throne, he left Meſopotamia a prey to the continual invaſions of the Perſians, and hurried to Rome, where his election was univerſally approved by the ſenate and the Roman people. Philip rendered his cauſe popular by his liberality and profuſion, and it added much to his ſplendor and dignity that the Romans during his reign commemorated the foundation of their city, a ſolemnity which was obſerved but once every hundred years, and which was celebrated with more pomp and more magnificence than under the preceding reigns. The people were entertained with games and ſpectacles, the theatre of Pompey was ſucceſſively crowded during three days and three nights, and 2000 gladiators bled in the circus at once, for the amuſement and pleaſure of a gazing populace. His uſurpation, however, was ſhort, Philip was defeated by Decius, who had proclaimed himſelf emperor in Pannonia, and he was aſſaſſinated by his own ſoldiers near Verona, in the 45th year of his age, and the 5th of his reign, A. D. 249. His ſon who bore the ſame name, and who had ſhared with him the imperial dignity, was alſo maſſacred in the arms of his mother. Young Philip was then in the 12th year of his age, and the Romans lamented in him the loſs of riſing talents, of natural humanity, and endearing virtues. *Aurel. But as he was preparing his medicine, Alexander received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was adviſed to beware of his phyſician Philip, as he had conſpired againſt his life. The monarch was alarmed, and when Philip preſented him the medicine, he gave him Parmenio's letter to peruſe, and began to drink the potion. The ſerenity and compoſure of Philip's countenance, as he read the letter, removed every ſuſpicion from Alexander's breaſt, and he purſued the directions of his phyſician, and in a few days recovered. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3.—Arrian. 2.——A ſon of Alexander the Great, murdered by order of Olympias.——A governor of Sparta.——A ſon of Caſſander.——A man who pretended to be the ſon of Perſes, that he might lay claim to the kingdom of Macedonia. PHILOCTETES, ſon of Pœan and Demonaſſa, was one of the Argonauts according to Flaccus and Hyginus, and the arm bearer and particular friend of Hercules. He was preſent at the death of Hercules, and becauſe he had erected the burning pile on which the hero was conſumed, he received from him the arrows which had been dipped in the gall of the hydra, after he had bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath not to betray the place where his aſhes were depoſited. He had no ſooner paid the laſt offices to Hercules, than he returned to Melibœa, where his father reigned. From thence he viſited Sparta, where he became one of the numerous ſuitors of Helen, and ſoon after like the reſt of thoſe princes who had courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and who had bound themſelves to protect her from injury, he was called upon by Menelaus to accompany the Greeks to the Trojan war, and he immediately ſet ſail from Melibœa with ſeven ſhips, and repaired to Aulis, the general rendezvous of the combined fleet. He was here prevented from joining his countrymen, and the offenſive ſmell which aroſe from a wound in his foot, obliged the Greeks, at the inſtigation of Ulyſſes, to remove him from the camp, and he was accordingly carried to the iſland of Lemnos, or as others ſay to Chryſe, where Philoctetes was ordered to wait upon him. In this ſolitary retreat he was ſuffered to remain for ſome time, till the Greeks, on the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, which were then in the poſſeſſion of Philoctetes. Upon this Ulyſſes, accompanied by Diomedes, or according to others by Pyrrhus, was commiſſioned by the reſt of the Grecian army to go to Lemnos, and to prevail upon Philoctetes to come and finiſh the tedious ſiege. Philoctetes recollected the ill-treatment he had received from the Greeks, and particularly from Ulyſſes, and therefore he not only refuſed to go to Troy, but he even perſuaded Pyrrhus to conduct him to Melibœa. As he embarked the manes of Hercules forbad him to proceed, but immediately to repair to the Grecian camp, where he ſhould be cured of his wounds, and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed, and after he had been reſtored to his former health by Æſculapius, or according to ſome by Machaon, or Podalirus, he deſtroyed an immenſe number of the Trojan enemy, among whom was Paris, the ſon of Priam, with th arrows of Hercules. When by his valor, Troy had been ruined, he ſet ſail from Aſia, but as he was unwilling to viſit his native country, he came to Italy, where, by the aſſiſtance of his Theſſalian followers, he was enabled to build a town in Calabria, which he called Petilia. Authors diſagree about the cauſes of the wound which Philoctetes received on the foot. The moſt antient mythologiſts ſupport, that it was the bite of the ſerpent which Juno had ſent to torment him, becauſe he had attended Hercules in his laſt moments, and had buried his aſhes. According to another opinion, the princes of the Grecian army obliged him to diſcover where the aſhes of Hercules were depoſited, and as he had made an oath not to mention the place, he only with his foot ſtruck the ground where they lay, and by this means concluded he had not violated his ſolemn engagement. For this, however, he was ſoon after puniſhed, and the fall of one of the poiſoned arrows from his quiver upon the foot which had ſtruck the ground, occaſioned ſo offenſive a wound, that the Greeks were obliged to remove h m from their camp. The ſufferings and adventures of Philoctetes are the ſubject of one of the beſt tragedies of Sophocles. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 46.---Pindar. Pyth. 1.---*Dictys. PHĪLŌMĒLA, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, and ſiſter to Procne, who had married Tereus king of Thrace. Procne ſeparated from Philomela, to whom ſhe was particularly attached, ſpent her time in great melancholy till ſhe prevailed upon her huſband, to go to Athens, and bring her ſiſter to Thrace. Tereus obeyed his wife's injunctions, but he had no ſooner obtained Pandion's permiſſion to conduct Philomela to Thrace, then he became enamoured of her, and reſolved to gratify his paſſion. He diſmiſſed the guards, whom the ſuſpicions of Pandion had appointed to watch his conduct, and he offered violence to Philomela, and afterwards cut off her tongue, that ſhe might not be able to diſcover his barbarity, and the indignities which ſhe had ſuffered. He confined her alſo in a lonely caſtle, and after he had taken every precaution to prevent a diſcovery, he returned to Thrace, and he told Procne that Philomela had died by the way, and that he had paid the laſt offices to her remains. Procne, at this ſad intelligence, put on mourning for the loſs of Philomela; but a year had ſcarcely elapſed before ſhe was ſecretly informed that her ſiſter was not dead. Philomela during her captivity deſcribed on a piece of tapeſtry, her misfortunes and the brutality of Tereus, and privately conveyed it to Procne. She was then going to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, when ſhe received it, ſhe diſguiſed her reſentment, and as during the feſtivals of the god of wine, ſhe was permitted to rove about the country, ſhe haſtened to deliver her ſiſter Philomela from her confinement, and ſhe concerted with her on the beſt meaſures of puniſhing the cruelty of Tereus. She murdered her ſon Itylus, who was in the ſixth year of his age, and ſerved him up as food before her huſband during the feſtival. Tereus in the midſt of his re-paſt, called for Itylus, but Procne immediately informed him, that he was then feaſting on his fleſh, and that inſtant Philomela, by throwing on the table the head of Itylus, convinced the monarch of the cruelty of the ſcene. He drew his ſword to puniſh Procne and Philomela, but as he was going to ſtab them to the heart, he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomela into a nightingale, Procne into a ſwallow, and Itylus into a pheaſant. This tragical ſcene happened at Daulis in Phocis, but Pauſanias and Strabo, who mention the whole of the ſtory, are ſilent about the tranſformation, and the former obſerves, that Tereus, after this bloody repaſt, fled to Megara, where he deſtroyed himſelf. The inhabitants of the place raiſed a monument to his memory, where they offered yearly ſacrifices, and placed ſmall pebbles inſtead of barley. It was on this monument that the birds called hoopoes were firſt ſeen, hence the fable of his metamorphoſis. Procne and Philomela died through exceſs of grief and melancholy, and as the nightingale's and the ſwallow's voice is peculiarly plaintive and mournful, the poets have embelliſhed the fable by ſuppoſing, that the two unfortunate ſiſters were changed into birds. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Pauſ. 1, c. 42. l. 10, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 45.—Strab. 9.—*Ovid. PHILOPŒMEN, a celebrated general of the Achæan league, born at Megalopolis. His father's name was Craugis. His education was begun and finiſhed under Caſſander, Ecdemus, and Demophanes, and he early diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field of battle, and appeared fond of agriculture and a country life. He propoſed himſelf Epaminondas for a model, and he was not unſucceſsful in imitating the prudence and the ſimplicity, the diſintereſtedneſs and activity of this famous Theban. When Megalopolis was attacked by the Spartans, Philopœmen, then in the 30th year of his age, gave the moſt deciſive proofs of his valor and intrepidity. He afterwards aſſiſted Antigonus, and was preſent in the famous battle in which the Ætolians were defeated. Raiſed to the rank of chief commander, he ſhewed his ability to diſcharge that important truſt, by killing with his own hand Mechanidas, the tyrant of Sparta, and if he was defeated in a naval battle by Nabis, he ſoon after repaired his loſſes by taking the capital of Laconia, B. C. 188, and by aboliſhing the laws of Lycurgus, which had floriſhed there for ſuch a length of time. Sparta after its conqueſt became tributary to the Achæans, and Philopœmen enjoyed the triumph of having reduced to ruins, one of the greateſt and the moſt powerful of the cities of Greece. Some time after the Meſſenians revolted from the Achæan league, and Philopœmen, who headed the Achæans, unfortunately fell from his horſe, and was dragged to the enemy's camp. Dinocrates, the general of the Meſſenians, treated him with great ſeverity he was thrown into a dungeon and obliged to drink a doſe of poiſon. When he received the cup from the hand of the executioner, Philopœmen aſked him how his countrymen had behaved in the field of battle, and when he heard that they had obtained the victory, he drank the whole with pleaſure, exclaiming that this was comfortable news. The death of Philopœmen, which happened about 183 years before the Chriſtian era, in his 70th year, was univerſally lamented, and the Achæans, to revenge his death, immediately marched to Meſſenia, where Dinocrates, to avoid their reſentment, killed himſelf. The reſt of his murderers were dragged to his tomb, where they were ſacrificed, and the people of Megalopolis, to ſhew farther their great ſenſe of his merit, ordered a bull to be yearly offered on his tomb, and hymns to be ſung in his praiſe, and his actions to be celebrated in a panegyrical oration. He had alſo ſtatues raiſed to his memory, which ſome of the Romans attempted to violate, and to deſtroy, to no purpoſe, when Mummius took Corinth. Philopœmen has been juſtly called by his countrymen, the laſt of the Greeks. Plut. in vitâ.—Juſtin. 32, c. 4.—Polyb.—a native of Pergamus, who died B. C. 138.

PHILOSTRATUS, a famous ſophiſt, born at Lemnos, or according to ſome at Athens. He came to Rome, where he lived under the patronage of Julia the wife of the emperor Severus, and he was entruſted by the empreſs with all the papers which contained ſome account, or anecdotes of Apollonius Thyanæus, and he was ordered to review them, and with them to compile an hiſtory. The life of Apollonius is written with elegance, but the improbable accounts, the fabulous ſtories, and exaggerated details which it gives, render it diſguſting. There is beſides, another treatiſe remaining of his writings, &c. He died A. D. 244. The beſt edition of his writings, is that of Olearius, fol. Lipſ. 1709.——His nephew, who lived in the reign of Heliogabalus, wrote an account of ſophiſts.——A philoſopher in the reign of Nero.——Another in the age of Auguſtus.

PHILOTAS, a ſon of Parmenio diſtinguiſhed in the battles of Alexander, and at laſt accuſed of conſpiring againſt his life. PHILOTERA, the mother of Milo, &c.

PHILOTIMUS, a freed man of Cicero.

PHILOTIS, a ſervant maid at Rome, who ſaved her countrymen from deſtruction. After the ſiege of Rome by the Gauls, the Fidenates aſſembled an army, and marched againſt the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city, as the conditions of peace. This extraordinary demand aſtoniſhed the ſenators, and when they refuſed to comply, Philotis adviſed them to ſend all their female ſlaves diſguiſed in matron's cloaths, and ſhe offered to march herſelf at the head. Her advice was followed, and when the Fidenates had feaſted late in the evening, and were quite intoxicated, and fallen aſleep, Philotis lighted a torch as a ſignal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The whole was ſucceſsful, the Fidenates were conquered, and the ſenate to reward the fidelity of the female ſlaves, permitted them to appear in the dreſs of the Roman matrons. Plut. in Rom.—Varro. de L. L. 4.—Ovid. de art. am. 2.

PHILOXENUS, an officer of Alexander, who received Cilicia, at the general diviſion of the provinces.——A ſon of Ptolemy, who was given to Pelopidas as an hoſtage.——A dithyrambic poet of Cythera, who enjoyed the favor of Dionyſius, tyrant of Sicily for ſome time, till he offended him by ſeducing one of his female ſingers. During his confinement, Philoxenus compoſed an allegorical poem, called Cyclops, in which he had delineated the character of the tyrant under the name of Polyphemus, and repreſented his miſtreſs under the name of Galatæa, and himſelf under that of Ulyſſes. The tyrant, who was fond of writing poetry, and of being applauded, removed Philoxenus from his dungeon, but the poet refuſed to purchaſe his liberty, by ſaying things unworthy of himſelf, and applauding the wretched verſes of Dionyſius, and therefore he was ſent to the quarries. When he was aſked his opinion at a feaſt about ſome verſes which Dionyſius had juſt repeated, and which the courtiers had received with the greateſt applauſe, Philoxenus gave no anſwer, but he ordered the guards that ſurrounded the tyrant's table, to take him back to the quarries. Dionyſius was pleaſed with his pleaſantry, and with his firmneſs, and immediately forgave him. Philoxenus died at Epheſus about 380 years before Chriſt. Plut.——A celebrated muſician of Ionia.——A painter of Eretria.——A philoſopher who wiſhed to have the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taſte of his aliments longer, and with more pleaſure. Arist. eth. 3.

PHILLYLLIUS, a comic poet.

PHILYRA, one of the Oceanides, who was met by Saturn in Thrace. The god, to eſcape from the vigilance of Rhea, changed himſelf into a horſe, to enjoy the company of Philyra, by whom he had a ſon, half a man, and half a horſe, called Chiron. Philyra was ſo aſhamed of giving birth to ſuch a monſter, that ſhe entreated the gods to change her nature. She was metamorphoſed into a tree, called by her name among the Greeks. Hygin. fab. 138.——The wife of Nauplius.

PHILYRES, a people near Pontus.

PHILYRIDES, a patronymic of Chiron, the ſon of Philyra. Ovid. art. am.—Virg. G. 3, v. 550.

PHINEUS, a ſon of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, or according to ſome of Neptune, who became king of Thrace, or as the counterpart of the mythologists support, of Bithynia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Boreas, whom some call Cleobula, by whom he had Plexippus and Pandion. After the death of Cleopatra, he married Idæa, the daughter of Dardanus. Idæa, jealous of Cleopatra's children, accused them of attempts upon their father's life and crown, or according to some of attempts upon her virtue, and they were immediately condemned by Phineus to be deprived of their eyes. This cruelty was soon after punished by the gods, Phineus suddenly became blind, and the Harpyies were sent by Jupiter to keep him under continual alarm, and to spoil the meats which were placed on his table. He was some time after delivered from these dangerous monsters by his brothers-in-law, Zetes and Calais, who pursued them as far as the Strophades. He also recovered his sight by means of the Argonauts, whom he had received with great hospitality, and instructed in the easiest and speediest way by which they could arrive in Colchis. The causes of the blindness of Phineus are a matter of dispute among the antients, some supposing that this was inflicted by Boreas, for his cruelty to his grandson, whilst others attribute it to the anger of Neptune, because he had directed the sons of Phryxus how to escape from Colchis to Greece. Many, however, think that it proceeded from his having rashly attempted to develope futurity, while others assert that Zetes and Calais put out his eyes on account of his cruelty to their nephews. The second wife of Phineus is called by some Dia, Eurytia, Danae and Idothea. Phineus was killed by Hercules. Arg. 2.—Appollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 19.—Orpheus.—Flacc.—The brother of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia. This marriage displeased Phineus: he interrupted the ceremony, and with a number of attendants, attacked Perseus and his friends. Perseus defended himself, and turned into stone Phineus, and his companions, by showing them the Gorgon's head. Apollod. 2, c. 1 & 4.—*Ovid. PHLEGON, a native of Tralles in Lydia, one of the emperor Adrian's freed men. He wrote different treatises on the long lived, on wonderful things, besides an historical account of Sicily, sixteen books on the olympiads, an account of the principal places in Rome, three books of fasti, &c. Of these some fragments remain. His stile was not elegant, and he wrote without judgment or precision. His works have been edited by Meursius, 4to. L. Bat. 1620.——One of the horses of the sun. PHLEGYÆ, a people of Thessaly. Some authors place them in Bœotia. They received their name from Phlegyas the son of Mars, with whom they plundered and burned the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Few of them escaped to Phocis, where they settled. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Homer. Il. 13.—Strab. 9.

PHLEGYAS, a son of Mars, king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly. He was father of Ixion and Coronis, to whom Apollo offered violence. When the father heard that his daughter had been so wantonly abused, he marched an army against Delphi, and reduced the temple of the god to ashes. This was highly resented, Apollo killed Phlegyas and placed him in hell, where a huge stone hangs over his head, and keeps him in continual alarms, by its appearance of falling every moment. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—*Pind. PHOCÆA, a maritime town of Ionia, in Aſia Minor, between Cumæ and Smyrna, founded by an Athenian colony. It received its name from Phocus, the leader of the colony, or from (phocæ) ſea calves, which are found in great abundance in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants called Phocæi & Phocæenſes, were expert mariners, and founded many cities in different parts of Europe. They left Ionia, when Cyrus attempted to reduce them under his power, and they came after many adventures into Gaul, where they founded Maſſilia, now called Marſeilles. The town of Marſeilles is often diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of Phocaica, and its inhabitants called Phocæenſes. Phocæa was declared independent by Pompey, and under the firſt emperors of Rome it became one of the moſt floriſhing cities of Aſia Minor. Mela. 1, c. 17.—Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, v. 165.—Strab. 14.—Horat. epod. 16.—*Ovid. PHOCENSES and PHOCÏCI, the inhabitants of Phocis in Greece.

PHOCILIDES, a Greek poet and philoſopher of Miletus, about 540 years before the Chriſtian era. The poetical piece now extant, attributed to him, is not of his compoſition, but of another poet who lived in the reign of Adrian.

PHOCION, an Athenian, celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. He was educated in the ſchool of Plato, and of Xenocrates, and as ſoon as he appeared among the ſtateſmen of Athens, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his prudence and moderation, his zeal for the public good, and his military abilities. He often checked the violent and inconſiderate meaſures of Demoſthenes, and when the Athenians ſeemed eager to make war againſt Philip, king of Macedonia, Phocion obſerved that war ſhould never be undertaken without the ſtrongeſt and moſt certain expectations of victory and ſucceſs. When Philip endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of Eubœa, Phocion ſtopped his progreſs, and ſoon obliged him to relinquiſh his enterprize. During the time of his adminiſtration he was always inclined to peace, though he never ſuffered his countrymen to become indolent, and to forget the jealouſy and rivalſhip of their neighbours. He was 45 times appointed governor of Athens, and no greater encomium can be paſſed upon his talents as a miniſter and ſtateſman, than that he never ſolicited that high, though dangerous office. In his rural retreat, or at the head of the Athenian armies, he always appeared barefooted, and without a cloak, whence one of his ſoldiers had occaſion to obſerve when he ſaw him dreſſed more warmly than uſual during a ſevere winter, that ſince Phocion wore his cloak it was a ſign of the moſt inclement weather. If he was the friend of temperance and diſcipline, he was not a leſs brilliant example of true heroiſm. Philip as well as his ſon Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpoſe, and Phocion boaſted in being one of the pooreſt of the Athenians, and in deſerving the appellation of the Good. It was through him that Greece was ſaved from an impending war, and he adviſed Alexander rather to turn his arms againſt Perſia, than to ſhed the blood of the Greeks, who were either his allies or his ſubjects. Alexander was ſo ſenſible of his merit, and of his integrity, that he ſent him 100 talents from the ſpoils which he had obtained from the Perſians, but Phocion was too great to ſuffer himſelf to be bribed, and when the conqueror had attempted a ſecond time to oblige him, and to conciliate his favor, by offering him the government and poſſeſſion of five cities, the Athenian rejected the preſents with the ſame indifference, and with the ſame independent mind. But not totally to deſpiſe the favors of the monarch, he begged Alexander to reſtore to their liberty four ſlaves that were confined in the citadel of Sardis. Antipater, who ſucceeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, alſo attempted to corrupt the virtuous Athenian, but with the ſame ſucceſs as his royal predeceſſor, and when a friend had obſerved to Phocion, that if he could ſo refuſe the generous offers of his patrons, yet he ſhould conſider the good of his children, and accept them for their ſake, Phocion calmly replied that if his children were like him they could maintain themſelves as well as their father had done, but if they behaved otherwiſe, he declared that he was unwilling to leave them any thing which might either ſupply their extravagances, or encourage their debaucheries. But virtues like theſe could not long ſtand againſt the inſolence and fickleneſs of an Athenian aſſembly. When the Piræus was taken, Phocion was accuſed of treaſon, and therefore to avoid the public indignation, he fled for ſafety to Polyperchon. Polyperchon ſent him back to Athens, where he was immediately condemned to drink the fatal poiſon. He received the indignities of the people with uncommon compoſure, posure, and when one of his friends lamented his fate, Phocion exclaimed, This is no more than what I expected, this treatment the most illustrious citizens of Athens have received before me. He took the cup with the greatest serenity of mind, and as he drank the fatal draught, he prayed for the prosperity of Athens, and bade his friends to tell his son Phocus not to remember the indignities which his father had received from the Athenians. He died about 318 years before the Christian era. His body was deprived of a funeral by order of the ungrateful Athenians, and if it was at last interred, it was by stealth, under a hearth, by the hand of a woman, who placed this inscription over his bones, Keep inviolate, O sacred hearth, the precious remains of a good man, till a better day restores them to the monuments of their forefathers, when Athens shall be delivered of her phrenzy, and shall be more wise. It has been observed of Phocion, that he never appeared elated in prosperity, or dejected in adversity, he never betrayed pusillanimity by a tear, or joy by a smile. His countenance was stern and unpleasant, but he never behaved with severity, his expressions were mild, and his rebukes gentle. At the age of 80 he appeared at the head of the Athenian armies like the most active officer, and to his prudence and cool valor in every period of life his citizens acknowledged themselves much indebted. His merits were not buried in oblivion, the Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and honored his memory by raising him statues, and putting to a cruel death his guilty accusers. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 16.

Phocis, a country of Greece, bounded on the east by Bœotia, and by Locris on the west. It originally extended from the bay of Corinth to the sea of Eubœa and reached on the north as far as Thermopylæ, but its boundaries were afterwards more contracted. Phocis received its name from Phocus, a son of Ornytion who settled there. The inhabitants were called Phocenses, and from thence the epithet of Phocicus was formed. Parnassus was the most celebrated of the mountains of Phocis, and Delphi was the greatest of its towns. Phocis is rendered famous for a war which it maintained against some of the Grecian republics, and which has received the name of the Phocian war. This celebrated war originated in the following circumstances:—When Philip, king of Macedonia, had by his intrigues, and well concerted policy, fomented divisions in Greece, and disturbed the peace of every republic, the Greeks universally became discontented in their situation, fickle in their resolutions, and jealous of the prosperity of the neighbouring states. The Amphictyons, who were the supreme rulers of Greece, and who at that time were subservient to the views of the Thebans, the inveterate enemies of the Phocians, shewed the same spirit of fickleness, and as the rest of their countrymen were actuated by the same fears, the same jealousy and ambition. As the supporters of religion, they accused the Phocians of impiety for plowing a small portion of land which belonged to the god of Delphi. They immediately commanded, that the sacred field should be laid waste, and that the Phocians to expiate their crime, should pay a heavy fine to the community. The inability of the Phocians to pay the fine, and that of the Amphictyons, to enforce their commands by violence, gave rise to new events. The people of Phocis were roused by the eloquence and the popularity of Philomelus, one of their countrymen, and when this ambitious ringleader had liberally contributed the great riches he possessed to the good of his countrymen, they resolved to oppose the Amphictyonic council by force of arms. He seized the rich temple of Delphi, and employed the treasures it contained to raise a mercenary army. During two years hostilities were carried on between the Phocians and their enemies, the Thebans and the people of Locris, but no decisive battles were fought; and it can only be observed, that the Phocian prisoners were always put to an ignominious death, as guilty of the most abominable sacrilege and impiety, a treatment, which was liberally retaliated on such of the army of the Amphictyons, as became the captives of the enemy. The defeat however, and death of Philomelus, for a while checked their successes, but the deceased general was soon succeeded in the command by his brother called Onomarchus, his equal in boldness and ambition, and his superior in activity and enterprize. Onomarchus rendered his cause popular, the Thessalians joined his army, and the neighbouring states observed at least a strict neutrality, if they neither opposed nor favored his arms. Philip of Macedonia, who had assisted the Thebans, was obliged to retire from the field with dishonor, but a more successful battle was fought near Magnesia, and the monarch by crowning the head of his soldiers, and telling them that they fought in the cause of Delphi and heaven, obtained a complete victory. Onomarchus was slain, and his body exposed on a gibbet, 6000 were slain, and thrown into the sea, as unworthy of funeral honors, and 3000 were taken alive. This fatal defeat, however, did not ruin the Phocians. Phayllus, the only surviving brother of Philomelus, took the command of their armies, and and doubling the pay of his ſoldiers, he encreaſed his forces by the addition of 9000 men from Athens, Lacedæmon, and Achaia. But all this numerous force at laſt proved ineffectual, the treaſures of the temple of Delphi which had long defrayed the expences of the war, began to fail, diſſenſions aroſe among the ringleaders of Phocis, and when Philip had croſſed the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, the Phocians relying on his generoſity, claimed his protection, and implored him to plead their cauſe, before the Amphictyonic council. His feeble interceſſion was not attended with ſucceſs, and the Thebans, the Locrians, and the Theſſalians, who then compoſed the Amphictyonic council, unanimouſly decreed, that the Phocians ſhould be deprived of the privilege of ſending members among the Amphictyons. Their arms and their horſes were to be ſold, for the benefit of Apollo, they were to pay the annual ſum of 60,000 talents, till the temple of Delphi had been reſtored to its antient ſplendor and opulence; their cities were to be diſmantled, and reduced to diſtinct villages, which were to contain no more than ſixty houſes each, at the diſtance of a furlong from one another, and all the privileges and the immunities of which they were ſtripped, were to be conferred on Philip, king of Macedonia, for his eminent ſervices in the proſecution of the Phocian war. The Macedonians were ordered to put theſe cruel commands into execution. The Phocians were unable to make reſiſtance, and ten years after they had undertaken the ſacred war, they ſaw their country laid deſolate, their walls demoliſhed, and their cities in ruins, by the wanton jealouſy of their enemies, and the inflexible cruelty of the Macedonian ſoldiers, B. C. 348. They were not, however, long under this diſgraceful ſentence, their well known valor and courage recommended them to favor, and they gradually regained their influence and conſequence by the protection of the Athenians, and the favors of Philip. Demoſth.—Juſtin. 8, &c.—Diod. 16, &c.——*Plut. in Dem. PHŒNĪCE, or PHŒNĪCIA, a country of Aſia, at the eaſt of the Mediterranean, whoſe boundaries have been different in different ages. Some ſuppoſe that the names of Phœnicia, Syria, and Paleſtine are indiſcriminately uſed for one and the ſame country. Phœnicia, according to Ptolemy, extended on the north as far as the Eleutherus, a ſmall river which falls into the Mediterranean ſea, a little below the iſland of Aradus, and it had Peluſium on the territories of Egypt as its more ſouthern boundary, and Syria on the eaſt. Sidon and Tyre were the moſt capital towns of the country. The inhabitants were naturally induſtrious, the invention of letters is attributed to them, and commerce and navigation were among them in the moſt floriſhing ſtate. They planted colonies in different countries, and their manufactures acquired ſuch a ſuperiority over thoſe of others, that among the antients, whatever was elegant, great, or pleaſing, either in apparel or domeſtic utenſils, received the epithet of Sidonian. The Phœnicians were originally governed by kings. They were ſubdued by the Perſians, and afterwards by Alexander, and remained tributary to his ſucceſſors and the Romans. They were called Phœnicians from Phœnix, ſon of Agenor, who was one of their kings, or according to others, from the great number of palm trees (φοίνικες) which grow in the neighbourhood. Herodot. 4, c. 42.—Homer, od. 15.—Mela. 1, c. 11, l. 2. c. 7.—

Phœnix, son of Amyntor king of Argos, by Cleobule or Hippodamia, was preceptor to young Achilles. When his father proved faithless to his wife, on account of his fondness for a concubine, called Clytia, Cleobule jealous of her husband persuaded her son Phœnix to ingratiate himself into the favors of his father's mistress. Phœnix easily succeeded, but when Amyntor discovered his intrigues, he drew a curse upon him, and the son soon after was deprived of his sight, by divine vengeance. According to some, Amyntor himself put out the eyes of his son which so cruelly provoked him, that he meditated the death of his father. Reason and piety, however, prevailed over passion, and Phœnix, not to become a parricide, fled from Argos to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia. Here he was treated with tenderness, Peleus carried him to Chiron, who restored him to his eye-sight, and soon after he was made preceptor to Achilles, his benefactor's son. He was also presented with the government of many cities, and made king of the Dolopes. He accompanied his pupil to the Trojan war, and Achilles was ever grateful for the instructions and precepts which he had received from Phœnix. After the death of Achilles, Phœnix with others, was commissioned by the Greeks to return into Greece, to bring to the war young Pyrrhus. This commission he performed with success, and after the fall of Troy, he returned with Pyrrhus and died in Thrace. He was buried according to Strabo, near Trachinia, where a small river in the neighbourhood received the name of Phœnix. Strab. 9.—*Homer. Pholus, one of the Centaurs, son of Silenus and Melia, or according to others of Ixion, and the cloud. He kindly entertained Hercules when he was going against the boar of Erimanthus, but he refused to give him wine as that which he had belonged to the rest of the Centaurs. Hercules, upon this, without ceremony, broke the cask and drank the wine. The smell of the liquor drew the Centaurs from the neighbourhood to the house of Pholus, but Hercules stopped them when they forcibly entered the habitation of his friend and killed the greatest part of them. Pholus gave the dead a decent funeral, but he mortally wounded himself with one of the arrows which were poisoned with the venom of the hydra, and which he attempted to extract from the body of one of the Centaurs. Hercules unable to cure him, buried him when dead, and called the mountain where his remains were deposited, by the name of Pholoe. Apollod. 1.—Paus. 3.—*Virg. PHORMIO, an Athenian general, whose father's name was Asopicus. He impoverished himself to maintain and support the dignity of his army. His debts were some time after paid by the Athenians, who wished to make him their general, an office which he refused, while he had so many debts, observing that it was unbecoming an officer to be at the head of an army, when he knew that he was poorer than the meanest of his soldiers.——A general of Crotona.——A Peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, who once gave a lecture upon the duties of an officer, and a military profession. The philosopher was himself ignorant of the subject which he treated, upon which Hannibal the great, who was one of his auditors, exclaimed that he had seen many doating old men, but never one worse than Phormio. Cic. de Nat. D. 2.——An Athenian archon.——A disciple of Plato, chosen by the people of Elis, to make a reformation in their government, and their jurisprudence.

PHORMIS, an Arcadian who acquired great riches at the court of Gelon and Hiero in Sicily. He dedicated the brazen statue of a mare to Jupiter Olympius in Peloponnesus, which so much resembled nature, that horses came near it, as if it had been alive. Paus. 5. c. 27.

PHŌRŌNEUS, the god of a river of Peloponnesus of the same name. He was son of the river Inachus, by Melissa, and he was the second king of Argos. He married a nymph called Cerdo, or Laodice, by whom he had Apis, from whom Argolis was called Apia, and Niobe, the first woman of whom Jupiter became enamoured. Phoroneus taught his subjects the utility of laws, and advantages of a social life, and of friendly intercourse, whence the inhabitants of Argolis are often called Phoronæi. Pausanias relates, that Phoroneus with the Cephisus, Asterion and Inachus, were appointed as umpires in a quarrel between Neptune and Juno, concerning their right of patronizing Argolis. Juno gained the preference, upon which Neptune in a fit of resentment, dried up all the four rivers, whose decision he deemed partial. He afterwards restored them to their dignity and consequence. Phoroneus was the first who raised a temple to Juno. He received divine honors after death. His temple still existed at Argos, under Antoninus the Roman emperor. Paus. 2, c. 15, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 143.

PHORŌNIS, a patronymic of Io as sister of Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 625.

PHORONIUM, a town of Argolis, built by Phoroneus.

PHOTINUS, an eunuch who was prime minister to Ptolemy, king of Egypt. When Pompey fled to the court of Ptolemy, after the battle of Pharsalia, Photinus advised his master not to receive him, but to put him to death. His advice was strictly followed. Julius Cæsar some time after visited Egypt, and Photinus raised seditions against him, for which he was put to death. When Cæsar triumphed over Egypt and Alexandria, the picture of Photinus and of some of the Egyptians, were carried in the procession at Rome, Plut.

PHOXUS, a general of the Phocæans, who burnt Lampsacus, &c.——A tyrant of Chalcis, banished by his subjects, &c.

PHRAATES 1st, a king of Parthia, who succeeded Arsaces the 3d, called also Phriapatius. He made war against Antiochus, king of Syria, and was defeated in three successive battles. He left many children behind him, but as they were all too young, and unable to succeed to the throne, he appointed his brother Mithridates king, of whose abilities, and military prudence he had often been a spectator. Justin. 41, c. 5.——The 2d, succeeded his father Mithridates as king of Parthia; and made war against the Scythians, whom he called to his assistance against Antiochus, king of Syria, and whom he refused to pay, on the pretence that they came too late. He was murdered by some Greek mercenaries who had been once his captives, and who had enlisted in his army, B. C. 129. Justin. 42, c. 1. —Plut. in Pomp.——The 3d, succeeded his father Pacorus on the throne of Parthia, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tigranes the son of Tigranes king of Armenia. Soon after he invaded the kingdom of Armenia, to make his son-in-law sit on the throne of his father. His expedition was attended with ill success. He renewed a treaty of alliance which his father had made with the Romans. At his return in Parthia he was assassinated by his sons Orodes and Mithridates. Justin.——The 4th, was nominated king of Parthia by his father Orodes, whom he soon after murdered, as also his own brothers. He made war against M. Antony with great success, and obliged him to retire with much loss. Some time after he was dethroned by the Parthian nobility, but he soon regained his power, and drove the usurper, called Tiridates. The usurper claimed the protection of Augustus the Ronan emperor, and Phraates ſent ambaſſadors to Rome to plead his cauſe, and gain the favors of his powerful judge. He was ſucceſsful in his embaſſy, he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the Roman emperor, reſtored the enſigns and ſtandards which the Parthians had taken from Craſſus and Antony, and gave up his four ſons with their wives as hoſtages, till his engagements were performed. Some ſuppoſe that Phraates delivered his children into the hands of Auguſtus to be confined at Rome, that he might reign with greater ſecurity, as he knew his ſubjects would revolt as ſoon as they found any one of his family inclined to countenance their rebellion, though at the ſame time, they ſcorned to ſupport the intereſt of any uſurper who was not of the royal houſe of the Arſacidæ. He was however at laſt murdered by one of his concubines, who placed her ſon called Phraatices on the throne. Val. Max. 7, c. 6.—Juſtin. 42, c. 5.—*Dio. PHRURI, a Scythian nation.

PHRYGES, a river of Aſia Minor, dividing Phrygia from Caria, and falling into the Hermus.

PHRYGIA, a country of Aſia Minor, generally divided into Phrygia Major and Minor. Its boundaries are not properly or accurately defined by antient authors, though it appears that it was ſituate between Bithynia, Lydia, Cappadocia and Caria. It received its name from the Bryges, a nation of Thrace, or Macedonia, who came to ſettle there, and from their name by corruption aroſe the word Phrygia. Cybele was the chief deity of the country, and her feſtivals were obſerved with the greateſt ſolemnity. The invention of the pipe of reeds, and of all ſorts of needlework is attributed to the inhabitants, who are repreſented by ſome authors as ſtubborn, imprudent, effeminate, ſervile and voluptuous, and to this Virgil ſeems to allude Æn. 9, v. 617. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2, &c.—*Ovid. PHRYNE, a celebrated proſtitute who floriſhed at Athens about 328 years before the Chriſtian era. She was miſtreſs to Praxiteles, who drew her picture. This was one of his beſt pieces, and it was placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. It is ſaid that Apelles painted his Venus Anadyomene after he had ſeen Phryne on the ſea ſhore naked, and with diſhevelled hair. Phryne became ſo rich by the liberality of her lovers, that ſhe offered to rebuild at her own expence Thebes, which Alexander had deſtroyed, provided this inſcription was placed on the walls: Alexander diruit, ſed meretrix Phryne refecit. This was refuſed. Plin. 34, c. 8.——There was alſo another of the ſame name who was accuſed of impiety. When ſhe ſaw that ſhe was going going to be condemned, she unveiled her bosom, which so influenced her judges, that she was immediately acquitted. Quintil.

PHRYNIS, a musician of Mitylene, the first who obtained a musical prize at the Panathenæa at Athens. He added two strings to the lyre, which had always been used with seven by all his predecessors, B. C. 458. It is said that he was originally a cook at the house of Hiero, king of Sicily.——A writer in the reign of Commodus, who made a collection in 36 books of phrases, and sentences from the best Greek authors, &c.

PHRYNO, a celebrated general of Athens, who died B. C. 590.

PHRYXUS, a son of Athamas, king of Thebes, by Nephele. After the repudiation of his mother, he was persecuted with the most inveterate fury by his step-mother Ino, because he was to sit on the throne of Athamas, in preference to the children of a second wife. He was apprized of Ino's intentions upon his life, by his mother Nephele, or according to others, by his preceptor, and the better to make his escape, he secured part of his father's treasures, and privately left Bœotia with his sister Helle, to go to their friend and relation Æetes king of Colchis. They embarked on board a ship, or according to the fabulous account of the poets and mythologists, they mounted on the back of a ram whose fleece was of gold, and proceeded on their journey through the air. The height to which they were carried, made Helle giddy, and she fell into the sea. Phryxus gave her a decent burial on the sea shore, and after he had called the place Hellespont from her name, he continued his flight, and arrived safe in the kingdom of Æetes, where he offered the ram on the altars of Mars. The king received him with great tenderness, and gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. She had by him Phrontis, Melias, Argos, Cylindrus, whom some call Cytorus, Catis, Lorus, and Hellen. Some time after he was murdered by his father-in-law, who envied him the possession of the golden fleece, and Chalciope to prevent her children from sharing their father's fate, sent them privately from Colchis to Bœotia, as nothing was to be dreaded there from the jealousy or resentment of Ino, who was then dead. The fable of the flight of Phryxus to Colchis on a ram, has been explained by some who observe that the ship on which he embarked, was either called by that name, or carried on her prow the figure of that animal. The fleece of gold is explained by recollecting that Phryxus carried away immense treasures from Thebes. Phryxus was placed among the constellations of heaven after death. The ram which carried him to Asia, is said to have been the fruit of Neptune's amour with Theophane, the daughter of Altis. This ram had been given to Athamas by the gods, to reward his piety and religious life, and Nephele procured it for her children, just as they were going to be sacrificed to the jealousy of Ino. The murder of Phryxus was some time after amply revenged by the Greeks. It gave rise to a celebrated expedition which was atchieved under Jason, and many of the princes of Greece, and which had for its object the recovery of the golden fleece, and the punishment of the king of Colchis for his cruelty to the son of Athamas. Diod. 4.—Herodot. 7, c. 197.—*Apollon. PHYLLA, the wife of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and mother of Stratonice, the wife of Seleucus.

PHYLLALIA, a part of Arcadia.——A place in Thessaly.

PHYLLEIUS, a mountain, country and town of Macedonia.

PHYLLIS, a daughter of Sithon, or according to others of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, who received Demophoon the son of Theseus, who at his return from the Trojan war, had stopped on her coasts. She became enamoured of him, and did not find him insensible to her passion. After some months of mutual tenderness and affection, Demophoon set sail for Athens, where his domestic affairs recalled him. He promised faithfully to return as soon as a month was expired, but either his dislike for Phyllis, or the irreparable situation of his affairs, obliged him to violate his engagements, and the queen, grown desperate on account of his absence, hanged herself, or according to others, threw herself down a precipice into the sea and perished. Her friends raised a tomb over her body, where there grew up certain trees, whose leaves, at a particular season of the year, suddenly became wet, as if shedding tears, for the death of Phyllis. According to an old tradition, mentioned by Servius, Virgil's commentator, Phyllis was changed by the gods into an almond tree, which is called phyllo by the Greeks. Some days after this metamorphosis, Demophoon revisited Thrace, and when he heard of the fate of Phyllis, he ran and clasped the tree, which, though at that time stripped of its leaves, suddenly shot forth and blossomed as if still sensible of tenderness and love. The absence of Demophoon from the house of Phyllis has given rise to a beautiful epistle of Ovid, supposed to have been written by the Thracian queen about the 4th month after her lover's departure. Ovid. Heroid. 2, de art. am. 2, v. 353. Trist. 2.—Hygin. fab. 59.——A country woman introduced in Virgil's eclogues.——The nurse of the emperor Domitian. Suet. in Dom. 17.——A country of Thrace near mount Pangeus. Herodot. 7, c. 113.

PHYLLIUS, a young Boeotian uncommonly fond of Cygnus, the son of Hyria, a woman of Boeotia. Cygnus slighted his passion, and told him that to obtain a return of affection, he must go and destroy an enormous lion, take alive two large vultures, and sacrifice on Ismenus's altars a wild boar that infested the country. This he soon effected by means of artifice, and by the advice of Hercules he forgot his promise for the son of Hyria. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 380.—Nicand. in Heter. 8.——A general remarkable for the courage with which he fought against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus.

PHYLLODOCE, one of Cyrene's attendant nymphs. Virg. G. 4, v. 336.

PHYLLOS, a country of Arcadia.——A town of Thessaly, near Larissa, where Apollo had a temple.

PHYLLUS, a general of Phocis during the Phocian or sacred war against the Thebans. He had assumed the command after the death of his brothers Philomelus and Onomarchus. He is called by some Phayllus. Vid. Phocis.

PICUS, a king of Latium, ſon of Saturn, who married Venilia, who is alſo called Canens, by whom he had Faunus. He was tenderly loved by the goddeſs Pomona, and he returned a mutual affection. As he was one day hunting in the woods, he was met by Circe, who became deeply enamoured of him, and who changed him into a woodpecker, called by the name of picus among the Latins. His wife Venilia was ſo diſconſolate when ſhe was informed of his death, that ſhe pined away. Some ſuppoſe that Picus was the ſon of Pilumnus, and that he gave out prophecies to his ſubjects, by means of a favorite woodpecker, from which circumſtance originated the fable of his being metamorphoſed into a bird. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 48, 171, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 320, &c.

PIDORUS, a town near mount Athos. Herodot. 7, c. 122.

PIDYTES, a man killed by Ulyſſes during the Trojan war.

PIĔLUS, a ſon of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus, after his father. Pauſ. 1, c. 11.

PIĔRA, a fountain of Peloponneſus, between Elis and Olympia. Pauſ. 5, c. 16.

PIĔRIA, a ſmall tract of country in Theſſaly or Macedonia.—A place between Cilicia and Syria.—One of the wives of Danaus, mother of ſix daughters called Actea, Podarce, Dioxippe, Adyte, Ocypete and Pilarge. Apollod. 2.—The wife of Oxylus, the ſon of Hæmon. Pauſ. 5, c. 3.—The daughter of Pythas, a Mileſian, &c.

PIĔRIDES, a name given to the Muſes, either becauſe they were born in Pieria, in Theſſaly, or becauſe they were ſuppoſed by ſome to be the daughters of Pierus, a king of Macedonia, who ſettled in Bœotia.—Alſo, the daughters of Pierus, who challenged the Muſes to a trial in muſic, in which they were conquered, and changed into magpies. It may perhaps be ſuppoſed, that the victorious Muſes aſſumed the name of the conquered daughters of Pierus, and ordered themſelves to be called Pierides, in the ſame manner as Minerva was called Pallas becauſe ſhe had killed the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 300.

PIĔRIS, a mountain of Macedonia. Pauſ. 9, c. 29.

PIĔRUS, a mountain of Theſſaly, ſacred to the Muſes who were from thence, as ſome imagine, called Pierides.—A rich man of Theſſaly, whoſe nine daughters called Pierides, challenged the Muſes, and were changed into magpies, when conquered. Pauſ. 9, c. 29.—A river of Achaia, in Peloponneſus.—A town of Theſſaly. Pauſ. 7, c. 22.—A mountain with a lake of the ſame name in Macedonia.

PIĔTAS, a virtue which denotes veneration for the deity, and love and tenderneſs to our friends. It received divine honors among the Romans, and was made one of their gods. Acilius Glabrion firſt erected a temple to this new divinity, on the ſpot where a woman had fed with her own milk her aged father, who had been impriſoned by the order of the ſenate, and deprived of all aliments. Cic de div. 1.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.

PIGRES & MATTYAS, two brothers, &c. Herodot.—The name of three rivers.

PILUMNUS, the god of bakers at Rome. Vid. Picumnus.

PIMPLA, a mountain of Macedonia, on the confines of Theſſaly, near Olympus, ſacred to the Muſes, who on that account are often called Pimpleæ and Pimpleades. Horat. 1, od. 26.—Strab. 10.

PIMPRANA, a town on the Indus.

PINĂRE, an iſland of the Ægean ſea.

PINĂRIUS & POTITIUS, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy. They were inſtructed by Hercules who viſited the court of Evander, how they were to offer ſacrifices to his divinity, in the morning, and in the evening, immediately at ſun-ſet. The morning ſacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening Potitius was obliged to offer the ſacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time. This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered, that for the future, Pinarius and his deſcendants ſhould preſide over the ſacrifices, but that Potitius, with his poſterity, ſhould wait upon the prieſts as ſervants, when the ſacrifices were annually offered to him on mount Aventine. This was religiouſly obſerved till the age of Appius Claudius, who perſuaded the Potitii by a large bribe, to diſcontinue their ſacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by ſlaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors obſerve, the Potitii were deprived of ſight, and the family was a little time after totally extinguiſhed. Liv. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 269, &c.—Victor. de orig.

PINĂRIUS, a pretor, who conquered Sardinia, and defeated the Corſicans. Cic. de orat. 2. —— A river falling into the ſea near Iſſus, after flowing between Cilicia and Syria.

PINDĂRUS, a celebrated lyric poet, of Thebes. He was carefully trained from his earlieſt years to the ſtudy of muſic and poetry, and he was taught how to compoſe verſes with elegance and ſimplicity, by Myrtis and Corinna. When he was young, it is ſaid that a ſwarm of bees ſettled on his lips, and there left ſome honey combs as he repoſed on the graſs. This was univerſally explained as a prognoſtic of his future greatneſs and celebrity, and indeed he ſeemed intitled to notice when he had conquered Myrtis in a muſical conteſt. He was not however ſo ſucceſsful againſt Corinna, who obtained five times, while he was competitor, a poetical prize, which, according to ſome, was rather adjudged to the charms of her perſon, than to the brilliancy of her genius, or the ſuperiority of her compoſition. In the public aſſemblies of Greece, where females were not permitted to contend, Pindar was rewarded with the prize, in preference to every other competitor, and as the conquerors at Olympia were the ſubject of his compoſitions, the poet was courted by ſtateſmen and princes. His hymns and pæans were repeated before the moſt crowded aſſemblies in the temples of Greece, and the prieſteſs of Delphi declared that it was the will of Apollo, that Pindar ſhould receive the half of all the firſt fruit offerings that were annually heaped on his altars. This was not the only public honor which he received; after his death, he was honored with every mark of reſpect, even to adoration. His ſtatue was erected at Thebes in the public place where the games were exhibited, and ſix centuries after it was viewed with pleaſure and admiration, by the geographer Pauſanias. The honors which had been paid to him while alive, were alſo ſhared by his poſterity, and at the celebration of one of the feſtivals of the Greeks, a portion of the victim which had been offered in ſacrifice, was reſerved for the deſcendants of the poet. Even the moſt inveterate enemies of the Thebans, ſhewed regard for his memory, and the Spartans ſpared the houſe in which the prince of Lyrics had inhabited when they deſtroyed the houſes and the walls of Thebes. The ſame reſpect was alſo paid him by Alexander the Great, when Thebes was reduced to aſhes. It is ſaid that Pindar died at the advanced age of 86, B. C. 435. The greateſt part of his works have periſhed. He had written ſome hymns to the gods, poems in honor of Apollo, dithyrambics to Bacchus, and odes on ſeveral victories obtained at the four greateſt feſtivals of the Greeks, the Olympic, Iſthmian, Pythian, and Nemean games. Of all theſe, the odes are the only compoſitions extant, admired for ſublimity of ſentiments, grandeur of expreſſion, energy and magnificence of ſtile, boldneſs of metaphors, harmony of numbers, and elegance of diction. In theſe odes which were repeated with the aid of muſical inſtruments, and accompanied by the various inflections of the voice, with ſuitable attitudes, and proper motions of body, the poet has not merely celebrated the place were the victory was won, but has introduced beautiful epiſodes, and by unfolding the greatneſs of his heroes, the dignity of their characters, and the glory of the ſeveral republics where they floriſhed, he has rendered the whole truly beautiful and in the higheſt degree intereſting. Horace has not heſitated to call Pindar inimitable, and this panegyric ſhall not perhaps appear too offenſive, when we recollect that ſucceeding critics have agreed in extolling his beauties, his excellence, the fire, animation, and enthuſiaſm of his genius. He has been cenſured for his affectation in compoſing an ode, from which the letter S was excluded. The beſt editions of Pindar are thoſe of Heyne, 4to. Gottingen, 1773, of Glaſgow, 12mo. 1744. and of Schmidius, 4to. Witteberg. 1616. Athen. —Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Horat. 4, od. 2.—Ælian. V. H. 3.—Pauſ. 1, c. 8, l. 9, c. 23.—*Val. PINNA, a town of Italy. Sil. 8, v. 518.

PINTHIAS. Vid. Phinthias.

PION, one of the deſcendants of Hercules who built Pionia near the Caycus in Myſia. It is ſaid that ſmoke iſſued from his tomb as often as ſacrifices were offered to him. Pauſ. 9, c. 18.

PIONIA, a town of Myſia, near the Caycus.

PIRÆUS or PIRÆUS, a celebrated harbour at Athens, at the mouth of the Cephiſus, about 3 miles diſtant from the city. It was joined to the town by two long walls, one of which was built by Pericles, and the other by Themiſtocles. The towers which were raiſed on the walls to ſerve as a defence, were turned into dwelling houſes, as the population of Athens gradually increaſed. It was the moſt capacious of all the harbours of the Athenians, and was naturally divided into three large baſons called Cantharos, Aphrodiſium, and Zea, improved by the labors of Themiſtocles, and made ſufficiently commodious for the reception of a fleet of 400 ſhips in the greateſt ſecurity. The walls which joined it to Athens with all its fortifications, were totally demoliſhed when Lyſander put an end to the Peloponneſian war by the reduction of Attica. Pauſ. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9.—C. Nep. in Them.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Juſtin 5, c. 8.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 446.

PIRENE, a daughter of Danaus.—A daughter of Œbalus, or according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two ſons called Leches and Cenchrius, who gave their name to two of the harbours of Corinth. Pirene was ſo diſconſolate at the death of her ſon Cenchrius, who had been killed by Diana, that ſhe pined away, and was diſſolved by her continual weeping into a fountain of the ſame name which was ſtill ſeen at Corinth in the age of Pauſanias. The fountain Pirene was ſacred to the Muſes, and according to ſome, the horſe Pegaſus was then drinking ſome of its waters, when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Pauſ. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

PIRITHOUS, a ſon of Ixion and the cloud, or according to others, of Dia the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him ſon of Dia, by Jupiter, who aſſumed the ſhape of a horſe whenever he paid his addreſſes to his miſtreſs. He was king of the Lapithæ, and as an ambitious prince he wiſhed to become acquainted with Theſeus king of Athens, of whoſe fame and exploits he had heard ſo many reports. To ſee him, and at the ſame time to be a witneſs of his valor, he reſolved to invade his territories with an army. Theſeus immediately met him on the borders of Attica, but at the ſight of one another the two enemies did not begin the engagement, but ſtruck with the appearance of each other, they ſtepped between the hoſtile armies. Their meeting was like that of the moſt cordial friends, and Pirithous, by giving Theſeus his hand as a pledge of his ſincerity, promiſed to repair all the damages which his hoſtilities in Attica might have occaſioned. From that time, therefore, the two monarchs became the moſt intimate and the moſt attached of friends, ſo much, that their friendſhip, like that of Oreſtes and Pylades, is become proverbial. Pirithous ſome time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only the heroes of his age but alſo the gods themſelves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only one of the gods who was not invited, and to puniſh this neglect, the god of war determined to raiſe a quarrel among the gueſts, and to diſturb the feſtivity of the entertainment. Eurythion, captivated with the beauty of Hippodamia, and intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride, but he was prevented by Theſeus and immediately killed. This irritated the reſt of the Centaurs, the conteſt became general, but the valor of Theſeus, Pirithous, Hercules, and the reſt of the Lapithæ, triumphed over their enemies. Many of the Centaurs were ſlain, and the reſt ſaved their lives by flight. [Vid. Lapithus.] The death of Hippodamia left Pirithous very diſconſolate, and he reſolved, with his friend Theſeus, who had likewiſe loſt his wife, never to marry again, except to a goddeſs, or one of the daughters of the gods. This determination occaſioned the rape of Helen by the two friends, the lot was drawn, and it fell to the ſhare of Theſeus to have the beautiful prize. Pirithous upon this undertook with his friend to carry away Proſerpine and to marry her. They deſcended into the infernal regions, but Pluto, who was apprized of their machinations to diſturb his conjugal peace, ſtopped the two friends, and confined them there. Pirithous was tied to his father's wheel, or according to Higinus, he was delivered to the Furies to be continually tormented. His puniſhment, however, was ſhort, and when Hercules viſited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained from Proſerpine the pardon of Pirithous and brought him back to his kingdom ſafe and unhurt. Some ſuppoſe that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus. [Vid. Theſeus.] Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 4, & 5.—Heſiod in Scut. Her.—*Homer. PIRUS, a captain of the Thracians during the Trojan war, &c.

PISA, a town of Elis on the Alpheus at the weſt of the Peloponneſus, founded by Piſus the ſon of Perieres, and grandſon of Æolus. Its inhabitants accompanied Neſtor to the Trojan war, and they enjoyed long long the privilege of presiding at the Olympic games which were celebrated near their city. This honorable appointment was envied by the people of Elis, who made war against the Pisæans, and after many bloody battles took their city, and totally demolished it. It was at Pisa that Œnomaus murdered the suitors of his daughter, and that he himself was conquered by Pelops. The inhabitants were called Pisæi. Some have doubted the existence of such a place as Pisa, but this doubt originates from Pisa's having been destroyed in so remote an age. The horses of Pisa were famous. The year on which the Olympic games were celebrated, was often called Pisæus annus, and the victory which was obtained there was called Pisææ ramus oliv. Vid. Olympia. Strab. 8.---*Ovid. PISÆ, a town of Etruria, built by a colony from Pisa in the Peloponnesus. The inhabitants were called Pisani. Dionysius of Halicarnassus affirms that it existed before the Trojan war, but others suppose that it was built by a colony of Pisæans who were shipwrecked on the coast of Etruria at their return from the Trojan war. Pisæ was once a very powerful and flourishing city, which conquered the Baleares, together with Sardinia and Corsica. The sea on the neighbouring coast was called the bay of Pisæ. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 179.---Strab. 5.---Lucan. 2, v. 401.

PISÆUS, a surname of Jupiter at Pisa.

PISANDER, a son of Bellerophon killed by the Solymi.——A Trojan chief killed by Menelaus.------One of Penelope's suitors, son of Polyctor. Ovid. Heroid. 1.------A son of Antimachus killed by Agamemnon during the Trojan war.------An admiral of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He abolished the democracy at Athens, and established the aristocratical government of the four hundred tyrants. He was killed in a naval battle by Conon the Athenian general near Cnidus, in which the Spartans lost 50 gallies. He died B. C. 394. Diod.------A poet of Rhodes who composed a poem called Heraclea, in which he gave an account of all the labors and all the exploits of Hercules. He was the first who ever represented his hero armed with a club. Paus. 8, c. 22.

PISÄTES or PISÆI, the inhabitants of Pisa in the Peloponnesus.

PISENOR, a son of Ixion and the cloud.—— One of the ancestors of the nurse of Ulysses. Homer Od. 1.

PISÆUS, a king of Etruria about 860 years before the foundation of Rome.

PISIAS, a general of the Argives in the age of Epaminondas.——A statuary at Athens celebrated for his pieces. Paus.

PISIDIA, an inland country of Asia Minor, between Phrygia, Pamphylia, Galatia, and Lauria. It was rich and fertile. The inhabitants were called Pisidiæ. Cic. de Div. 1.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Strab. 12.

PISIDICE, a daughter of Æolus who married Myrmidon.—— A daughter of Nestor.—— A daughter of Pelias.——The daughter of a king of Methymna in Lesbos. She became enamoured of Achilles when he invaded her father's kingdom, and she promised to deliver the city into his hands if he would marry her. Achilles agreed to the proposal, but when he became master of Methymna, he ordered Pisidice to be stoned to death for her perfidy. Parthenerot. 21.

PISIS, a native of Thespis who gained uncommon influence among the Thebans, and behaved with great courage in the defence of their liberties. He was taken prisoner by Demetrius, who made him governor of Thespiæ.

PISISTRĂTIDÆ, the descendants of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens. Vid. Pisistratus.

PISISTRĂTIDES, a man sent as ambassador to the satraps of the king of Persia by the Spartans.

PISISTRĂTUS, an Athenian who early distinguished himself by his valor in the field, and by his address and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himself the favorite of the populace by his liberality and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he resolved to make himself master of his country. Every thing seemed favorable to his ambitious views, but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs, and who had lately enforced his celebrated laws, opposed him and discovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public assembly. Pisistratus was not disheartened by the measures of his relation Solon, but he had recourse to artifice. In returning from his country house, he cut himself in various places, and after he had exposed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accused his enemies of attempts upon his life, because he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppressed, he claimed a chosen body of 50 men from the populace to defend his person in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unsuspecting people unanimously granted his request, though Solon opposed it with all his influence, and Pisistratus had no sooner received an armed band on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he seized the citadel of Athens, and made himself absolute. The people too late perceived their credulity, yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conspired together against him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His house and all his effects were exposed to sale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private dissentions of the friends of liberty proved favorable to the expelled tyrant, and Megacles who was jealous of Lycurgus, secretly promised to restore Pisistratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens, if he would marry his daughter. Pisistratus consented, and by the assistance of his father-in-law, he was soon enabled to expel Lycurgus, and to re-establish himself. By means of a woman called Phya, whose shape was tall, whose features were noble and commanding, he imposed upon the people, and created himself adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the streets of the city, and showing herself subservient to the artifice of Pisistratus, she was announced as Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, and the patroness of Athens, who was come down from heaven to re-establish her favorite Pisistratus, in a power which was sanctioned by the will of heaven, and favored by the affection of the people. In the midst of his triumph, however, Pisistratus found himself unsupported, and sometime after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after he was drawn from his obscure retreat, by means of his son Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their master and sovereign. Upon this he sacrificed to his resentment the friends of Megacles, but he did not lose sight of the public good, and while he sought the aggrandizement of his family, he did not neglect the dignity and the honor of the Athenian name. He died about 527 years, before the christian era, after he had enjoyed the sovereign power at Athens for 33 years, including the years of his banishment, and he was succeeded by his son Hipparchus. Pisistratus claims our admiration for his justice, his liberality, and his moderation. If he was dreaded and detested as a tyrant, the Athenians loved and respected his private virtues and his patriotism as a fellow citizen, and the opprobrium which generally falls on his head may be attributed not to the severity of his administration, but to the republican principles of the Athenians, who hated and exclaimed against the moderation and equity of the mildest sovereign, while they flattered the pride and gratified the guilty desires of the most tyrannical of their fellow subjects. Pisistratus often refused to punish the insolence of his enemies, and when he had one day been virulently accused of murder, rather than inflict immediate punishment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accusations of his enemies were groundless, and that his life was irreproachable. It is to his labors that we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of Homer, and he was the first, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens, in the order in which they now stand. He also established a public library at Athens, and the valuable books which he had diligently collected were carried into Persia when Xerxes made himself master of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias the sons of Pisistratus, who have received the name Pisistratidæ, rendered themselves as illustrious as their father, but the flames of liberty were too powerful to be extinguished. The Pisistratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of tyrant or sovereign was insupportable to the Athenians. Two of the most respectable of the citizens called Harmodius and Aristogiton, conspired against them, and Hipparchus was dispatched in a public assembly. This murder was not however attended with any advantages, and though the two leaders of the conspiracy who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotism, were supported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmness and prudence, and for a while preserved that peace in Athens, which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue. Hippias was at last expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponnesus, and he left Attica, when he found himself unable to maintain his power and independence. The rest of the family of Pisistratus, followed him in his banishment, and after they had refused to accept the liberal offers of the princes of Thessaly, and the king of Macedonia, who wished them to settle in their respective territories, the Pisistratidæ retired to Sigæum, which their father had in the summit of his power conquered and bequeathed to his posterity. After the banishment of the Pisistratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often sacrificed the most powerful of their citizens, apprehensive of the the influence, which popularity, and a well-directed liberality might gain among a fickle and unſettled populace. The Piſiſtratidæ were baniſhed from Athens about 18 years after the death of Piſiſtratus, B. C. 510. *Ælian. V. Piso, a celebrated family at Rome, which was a branch of the Calpurnians deſcended from Calpus the ſon of Numa. Before the death of Auguſtus, 11 of this family had obtained the conſulſhip, and many had been honored with triumphs, on account of their victories, in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family, the moſt famous were——Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people, about 149 years before Chriſt, and afterwards conſul. His frugality procured him the ſirname of Frugi, and he gained the greateſt honors as an orator, a lawyer, a ſtateſman, and an hiſtorian. He made a ſucceſsful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his ſon, who had behaved with great valor during the war, with a crown of gold, which weighed twenty pounds. He compoſed ſome annals and harrangues, which were loſt in the age of Cicero. His ſtile was obſcure and inelegant.——Caius, a Roman conſul, A. U. C. 685. who ſupported the conſular dignity againſt the tumults of the tribunes, and the clamors of the people. He made a law to reſtrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magiſtrates.——Cneius, another conſul under Auguſtus. He was one of the favorites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty. He was accuſed of having poiſoned Germanicus, and when he ſaw that he was ſhunned and deſpiſed by his friends, he deſtroyed himſelf, A. D. 20.——Lucius a governor of Spain, who was aſſaſſinated by a peaſant, as he was travelling through the country. The murderer was ſeized and tortured, but he refuſed to confeſs the cauſes of the murder.——Lucius, a private man, accuſed of having uttered ſeditious words againſt the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death ſaved him from the hands of the executioner.——Lucius, a governor of Rome for twenty years, an office which he diſcharged with the greateſt juſtice and credit. He was greatly honored by the friendſhip of Auguſtus, as well as of his preceptor, a diſtinction he deſerved, both as a faithful citizen and a man of learning. Some however ſay that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, becauſe he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem de arte Poeticâ to his two ſons, whoſe partiality for literature, had diſtinguiſhed them among the reſt of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leiſure hours.——Cneius, a factious and turbulent youth, who conſpired againſt his country with Catiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæſar.——Caius, a Roman who was at the head of a celebrated conſpiracy againſt the emperor Nero. He had rendered himſelf a favorite of the people by his private, as well as public virtues, by the generoſity of his behaviour, his fondneſs of pleaſure with the voluptuous, and his auſterity with the grave and the reſerved. He had been marked by ſome as a proper perſon to ſucceed the emperor, but the diſcovery of the plot by a freedman who was among the conſpirators ſoon cut him off with all his partizans. He refuſed to court the affections of the people, and of the army, when the whole had been made public, and inſtead of taking proper meaſures for his preſervation, either by proclaiming himſelf emperor, as his friends adviſed, or by ſeeking a retreat in the diſtant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own houſe, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death.——Lucius, a ſenator who followed the emperor Valerian into Perſia. He proclaimed himſelf emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A. D. 261, by Valens, &c.——Lucinianus, a ſenator adopted by the emperor Galba. He was put to death by Otho's orders.——A ſon-in-law of Cicero.——A patrician, whoſe daughter married Julius Cæſar. Horat.—Tacit. Ann. & Hiſt.—*Val. Max. PITHECUSA, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Etruria, antiently called Ænaria and Inarima, with a town of the ſame name, on the top of a mountain. The frequent earthquakes to which it was ſubject, obliged the inhabitants to leave it. There was a vulcano in the middle of the iſland, which has given occaſion to the antients to ſay, that the giant Typhon was buried there. Some ſuppoſe that it received its name from πίθηκοι monkeys, into which the inhabitants were changed by Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 90.—Plin. 3, c. 6.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Strab. 1.

PITHEUS. Vid. Pittheus.

PITHO, the goddeſs of perſuaſion among the Romans, ſuppoſed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. She was repreſented with a diadem on her head, to intimate her influence over the hearts of man. One of her arms appears raiſed as in the attitude of an orator, haranguing in a public aſſembly, and with the other ſhe holds a thunderbolt and fetters, made with flowers, to ſignify the powers of reaſoning, and the attractions of eloquence. A caduceus, as a ſymbol of perſuaſion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demoſthenes and Cicero, the two moſt celebrated among the antients, who underſtood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouſe and animate their various paſſions.——A Roman courtezan. She received this name on account of the allurements which her charms poſſeſſed, and of her winning expreſſions.

PITHOLAUS & LYCOPHRON, ſeized upon the ſovereign power of Pheræ, by killing Alexander. They were ejected by Philip of Macedonia. Diod. 16.

PITHOLEON, an inſignificant poet of Rhodes, who mingled Greek and Latin in his compoſitions. He wrote ſome epigrams. Horat. 1, ſat. 10, v. 21.

PYTHON, one of the body guards of Alexander, put to death by Antiochus.

PITHYS, a nymph beloved by Pan. Boreas was alſo fond of her, but ſhe ſlighted his addreſſes, upon which he daſhed her againſt a rock, and ſhe was changed into a pine tree.

PITTACUS, a native of Mitylene in Lesbos, was one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. His father's name was Hyrradius. With the aſſiſtance of the ſons of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppreſſion of the tyrant Melanchrus, and in the war which the Athenians waged againſt Leſbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to ſingle combat Phrynon the enemy's general. As the event of the war ſeemed to depend upon this combat, Pittacus had recourſe to artifice, and when he engaged, he entangled his adverſary in a net, which he had concealed under his ſhield, and eaſily diſpatched him. He was amply rewarded for this victory, and his countrymen, ſenſible of his merit, unanimouſly appointed him governor of their city with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence, and after he had governed his fellow citizens with the ſtricteſt juſtice, and after he had eſtabliſhed and enforced the moſt ſalutary laws, he voluntarily reſigned the ſovereign power after he had enjoyed it for 10 years, obſerving that the virtues and innocence of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a ſovereign. His diſintereſtedneſs gained him many admirers, and when the Mityleneans wiſhed to reward his public ſervices by preſenting him with an immenſe tract of territory, he refuſed to accept more land than what ſhould be contained in the diſtance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 570 years before Chriſt, after he had ſpent the laſt 10 years of his life in literary eaſe, and peaceful retirement. One of his favorite maxims was that man ought to provide againſt misfortunes, to avoid them, but that if they ever happened he ought to ſupport them with patience and reſignation. In proſperity friends were to be acquired, and in the hour of adverſity their faithfulneſs was to be tried. He alſo obſerved that in our actions it was imprudent to make others acquainted with our deſigns, for if we failed we had expoſed ourſelves to cenſure and to ridicule. Many of his maxims were inſcribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to ſhew to the world how great an opinion the Mityleneans entertained of his abilities as a philoſopher, a moraliſt, and a man. By one of his laws, every fault committed by a man when intoxicated, deſerved double puniſhment. Diog.—Ariſtot. Polit.—Plut. in ſymp.—Pauſ. 10, c. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 2, &c.—*Val. PITTHEA, a town near Trœzene. Hence Hence the epithet of Pittheus in Ovid. Met. lib. v. 296.

PITTHEUS, a king of Trœzene in Argolis, son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was universally admired for his learning, wisdom, and application, he publicly taught in a school at Trœzene, and even composed a book, which was seen by Pausanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus, king of Athens, and he himself took particular care of the youth, and education of his grandson Theseus. He was buried at Trœzene, which he had founded, and on his tomb was seen, for many ages, three seats of white marble, on which he sat with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his subjects, or settled their disputes. Paus. 1 & 2.—Plut. in Thes.—Strab. 8.

PITUANIUS, a mathematician in the age of Tiberius, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, &c. Tacit. Ann. 2.

PITULANI, a people of Umbria. Their chief town was called Pitulum.

PITYÆA, a town of Asia Minor.

PITYASSUS, a town of Pisidia.

PITYONESUS, a small island on the coast of Peloponnesus, near Epidaurus.

PITYUSA, a small island on the coast of Argolis.——Two small islands in the Mediterranean, near the coast of Spain, of which the larger was called Ebusus, and the smaller Ophiusa. Mela. 2, c. 7.

PIUS, a surname given to the emperor Antoninus, on account of his piety and virtue.——A surname given to a son of Metellus, because he interested himself so warmly to have his father recalled from banishment.

PLACENTIA, an ancient town and colony near the Po.——Another, near Lusitania.

PLACIDEIANUS, a gladiator in Horace's age, 2 Sat. 7.

PLACIDIA, a daughter of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus, king of the Goths, and afterwards Constantius, by whom she had Valentinian the 3d. She died A. D. 449.

PLACIDIUS JULIUS, a tribune of a cohort, who imprisoned the emperor Vitellius, &c.

PLANASIA, a small island of the Tyrrhene sea.——Another, on the coast of Gaul, where Tiberius ordered Agrippa, the grandson of Augustus, to be put to death. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.——A town on the Rhone.

PLANCINA, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piso, and was accused with him of having murdered Germanicus, in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the empress Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her person. She had long supported the spirits of her husband, during his confinement, but, when she saw herself freed from the accusation, she totally abandoned him to his fate. Subservient in every thing to the will of Livia, she, at her instigation, became guilty of the greatest crimes, to injure the character of Agrippina. After the death of Agrippina, Plancina was accused of the most atrocious villainies, and, as she knew that she could not elude justice, she put herself to death, A. D. 33. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 26, &c.

L. PLANCUS MUNATIUS, a Roman, who rendered himself ridiculous by his follies and his extravagance. He had been consul, and had presided over a province in the capacity of governor, but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the most servile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen, in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meanest stage dancer, and, in comedy, he personated Glaucus, and painted his body of a green color, dancing on a public stage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had, tied behind his back, the tail of a large sea fish. This exposed him to the public derision, and, when Antony had joined the rest of his friends in censuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deserted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendship and attention. It was he who proposed, in the Roman senate, that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated 1 od. 7 to him; and he certainly deserved the honor, from the elegance of his letters, which are still extant, written to Cicero. He founded a town in Gaul, which he called Lugdunum. Plut. in Anton.——A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it, rather than to expose their persons to danger.——Plangon, a courtezan of Miletus, in Ionia.

PLATÆA, a daughter of Asopus, king of Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 1, &c.——An island on the coast of Africa, in the Mediterranean. It belonged to the Cyreneans. Herodot. 4, c. 157.

PLATÆÆ, (ārum,) a town of Bœotia, near mount Citheron, on the confines of Megaris and Attica, celebrated for a battle fought there, between Mardonius the commander of Xerxes king of Persia, and Pausanias, the Lacedæmonian, and the Athenians. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men, 3000 of which scarce escaped with their lives by flight. The Grecian army, which was greatly inferior, lost but few men, and among these 91 Spartans, 52 Athenians, and 16 Tegeans, were the only ſoldiers found in the number of the ſlain. The plunder which the Greeks obtained in the Perſian camp was immenſe. Pauſanias received the tenth of all the ſpoils, on account of his uncommon valor during the engagement, and the reſt were rewarded each according to their reſpective merit. This battle was fought on the 22d of September, the ſame day as the battle of Mycale, 479 B. C. and by it Greece was totally delivered for ever from the continual alarms to which ſhe was expoſed on account of the Perſian invaſions, and from that time none of the princes of Perſia dared to appear with a hoſtile force beyond the Helleſpont. The Plataeans were naturally attached to the intereſt of the Athenians, and they furniſhed them with a thouſand ſoldiers when Greece was attacked by Datis, the general of Darius. Platæa was taken by the Thebans, after a famous ſiege, in the beginning of the Peloponneſian war, and deſtroyed by the Spartans, B. C. 427. Alexander rebuilt it, and paid great encomiums to the inhabitants on account of their anceſtors who had ſo bravely fought againſt the Perſians at the battle of Marathon, and under Pauſanias. Herodot. 8, c. 50.—Pauſ. 9, c. 1.—Plut. in Arist. &c.—*C. PLATANIUS, a river of Boeotia. Pauſ. 9, c. 24.

PLATO, a celebrated philoſopher of Athens, ſon of Ariſton and Parectonia. His original name was Ariſtocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeneſs of his ſhoulders. As one of the deſcendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illuſtrious, and opulent, family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnaſtic exerciſes, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the ſtudy of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteneſs of judgment, and warmth of imagination, which have ſtamped his character as the moſt ſubtle and flowery writer of antiquity. He firſt began his literary career by writing poems and tragedies; but he was ſoon diſguſted with his own productions, when, at the age of 20, he was introduced into the preſence of Socrates, and when he was enabled to compare and examine, with critical accuracy, the merit of his compoſitions with thoſe of his poetical predeceſſors. He, therefore, committed to the flames theſe productions of his early years, which could not command the attention or gain the applauſe of a matured age. During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and, if he was prevented by a momentary inſpiration from attending the philoſopher's laſt moments, yet he collected, from the converſation of thoſe that were preſent, and from his own accurate obſervations, the minuteſt and moſt circumſtantial accounts, which can exhibit, in its trueſt colors, the concern and ſenſibility of the pupil, and the firmneſs, virtues, and moral ſentiments, of the dying philoſopher. After the death of Socrates, Plato retired from Athens, and, to acquire that information which the accurate obſerver can derive in foreign countries, he began to travel over Greece. He viſited Megara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindeſt reception from his fellow diſciples, whom the violent death of their maſter had likewiſe removed from Attica. He afterwards viſited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philoſophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation, of its profeſſors. He afterwards paſſed into Sicily, and examined the eruptions and fires of the volcano of that iſland. He alſo viſited Egypt, where then the mathematician Theodorus flouriſhed, and where he knew that the tenets of the Pythagorean philoſophy and metempſychoſis had been foſtered and cheriſhed. When he had finiſhed his travels, Plato retired to the groves of Academus, in the neighbourhood of Athens, where his lectures were ſoon attended by a crowd of learned, noble, and illuſtrious, pupils; and the philoſopher, by refuſing to have a ſhare in the adminiſtration of affairs, rendered his name more famous, and his ſchool more frequented. During forty years he preſided at the head of the academy, and there he devoted his time to the inſtruction of his pupils, and compoſed thoſe dialogues which have been the admiration of every age and country. His ſtudies, however, were interrupted for a while, whilſt he obeyed the preſſing calls and invitations of Dionyſius, and whilſt he perſuaded the tyrant to become a man, the father of his people, and the friend of liberty. [Vid. Dionyſius 2d.] In his dreſs the philoſopher was not oſtentatious, his manners were elegant, but modeſt, ſimple, without affectation and the great honors which his learning deſerved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato reſided, during the celebration, in a family who were totally ſtrangers to him. He eat and drank with them, he partook of their innocent pleaſures and amuſements, but, though he told them his name was Plato, yet he never ſpoke of the employment he purſued at Athens, and never introduced the name of that philoſopher whoſe doctrines he followed, and whoſe death and virtues were favorite topics of converſation in every part of Greece. When he returned home, he was attended by the family which had ſo kindly entertained him; and, as being a native of Athens, he was deſired to ſhew them the great philoſopher ſopher whoſe name he bore; their ſurpriſe was great when he told them that he himſelf was the Plato whom they wiſhed to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and, indeed, to ſobriety and temperance in the uſe of food, and to the want of thoſe pleaſures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, ſome have attributed his preſervation during the tremendous peſtilence which raged at Athens with ſo much fury at the beginning of the Peloponneſian war. Plato was never ſubject to any long or lingering indiſpoſition, and, though change of climate had enfeebled a conſtitution naturally ſtrong and healthy, the philoſopher lived to an advanced age, and was often heard to ſay, when his phyſicians adviſed him to leave his reſidence at Athens, where the air was impregnated by the peſtilence, that he would not advance one ſingle ſtep to gain the top of mount Athos, were he aſſured to attain the great longevity which the inhabitants of that mountain were ſaid to enjoy above the reſt of mankind. Plato died on his birth day, in the 81ſt year of his age, about 348 years before the Chriſtian era. His laſt moments were eaſy and without pain, and, according to ſome, he expired in the midſt of an entertainment, or, according to Cicero, as he was writing. The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of dialogue, except 12 letters. He ſpeaks always by the mouth of others, and the philoſopher has no where made mention of himſelf except once, in his dialogue entitled Phædon, and, another time, in his apology for Socrates. His writings were ſo celebrated, and his opinion ſo reſpected, that he was called divine, and, for the elegance, melody, and ſweetneſs, of his expreſſions, he was diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Athenian bee. Cicero had ſuch an eſteem for him, that, in the warmth of panegyric, he exclaimed errare mehercule malo cum Platone, quàm cum iſtis vera ſentire; and Quintilian ſaid, that, when he read Plato, he ſeemed to hear not a man, but a divinity, ſpeaking. His ſtile, however, though admired, and commended by the beſt and moſt refined of critics among the ancients, has not eſcaped the cenſure of ſome of the moderns, and the philoſopher has been blamed, who ſupports that fire is a pyramid tied to the earth by numbers, that the world is a figure conſiſting of 12 pentagons, and who, to prove the metempſychoſis and the immortality of the ſoul, aſſerts, that the dead are born from the living, and the living from the dead. The ſpeculative mind of Plato was employed in examining things divine and human, and he attempted to fix and aſcertain, not only the practical doctrine of morals and politics, but the more ſubtle and abſtruſe theory of myſtical theogony. His philoſophy was univerſally received and adopted, and it has not only governed the opinions of the ſpeculative part of mankind, but it continues ſtill to influence the reaſoning, and to divide the ſentiments, of the moderns. In his ſyſtem of philoſophy, he followed the phyſics of Heraclitus, the metaphyſical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. He maintained the exiſtence of two beings, one ſelf-exiſtent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-exiſtent creature, god and man. The world was created by that ſelf-exiſtent cauſe, from the rude indigeſted maſs of matter which had exiſted from all eternity, and which had ever been animated by an irregular principle of motion. The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a ſtubborn intractability and wildneſs congenial to matter, and from theſe, conſequently, could be demonſtrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant paſſions and appetites of men. From materials like theſe were formed the four elements, and the beautiful ſtructure of the heavens and the earth, and into the active, but irrational, principle of matter, the divinity infuſed a rational ſoul. The ſouls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational ſoul of the world, which had previouſly given exiſtence to the inviſible gods and demons. The philoſopher, therefore, ſupported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-exiſtence of the human mind, which he conſidered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain ſatisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive, with their corporeal ſenſes, the types of immutable things, and the fluctuating objects of the material world; but the ſudden changes to which theſe are continually obnoxious, create innumerable diſorders, and hence ariſes deception, and, in ſhort, all the errors and miſeries of human life. Yet, in whatever ſituation man may be, he is ſtill an object of divine concern, and, to recommend himſelf to the favor of the pre exiſtent cauſe, he muſt comply with the purpoſes of his creation, and, by proper care and diligence, he can recover thoſe immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All ſcience the philoſopher made to conſiſt in reminiſcence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions, of thoſe perfect and immutable eſſences, with which the human mind had been converſant. From obſervations like theſe, the ſummit of felicity might be attained by removing from the material, and approaching nearer to the intellectual, world, by curbing and governing the paſſions, which were ever agitated and inflamed, by real or imaginary objects. The passions were divided into two classes; the first consisted of the irascible passions, which originated in pride or resentment, and were seated in the breast: the other, founded on the love of pleasure, was the concupiscible part of the soul, seated in the belly, and inferior parts of the body. These different orders induced the philosopher to compare the soul to a small republic, of which the reasoning and judging powers were stationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the senses were its guards and servants. By the irascible part of the soul men asserted their dignity, repelled injuries, and scorned dangers; and the concupiscible part provided the support and the necessities of the body, and, when governed with propriety, it gave rise to temperance. Justice was produced by the regular dominion of reason, and by the submission of the passions; and prudence arose from the strength, acuteness, and perfection, of the soul, without which all other virtues could not exist. But, amidst all this, wisdom was not easily attained; at their creation all minds were not endowed with the same excellence, the bodies which they animated on earth were not always in harmony with the divine emanation; some might be too weak, others too strong, and on the first years of a man's life depended his future consequence, as an effeminate and licentious education seemed calculated to destroy the purposes of the divinity, while the contrary produced different effects, and tended to cultivate and improve the reasoning and judging faculty, and to produce wisdom and virtue. Plato was the first who supported the immortality of the soul upon arguments solid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. He did not imagine that the diseases, and the death of the body, could injure the principle of life and destroy the soul, which, of itself, was of divine origin, and of an uncorrupted and immutable essence, which, though inherent for a while in matter, could not lose that power which was the emanation of God. From doctrines like these, the great founder of Platonism concluded, that there might exist in the world a community of men, whose passions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miseries which arise from ill conduct, might aspire to excellence, and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exercise of the rational and moral powers. To illustrate this more fully, the philosopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains with acuteness, judgment, and elegance, the rise and revolution of civil society; and so respected was his opinion as a legislator, that his scholar were employed in regulating the republics of Arcadia, Elis, and Cnidus, at the desire of those states, and Xenocrates gave political rules for good and impartial government to the conqueror of the east. The best editions of Plato are those of Francof. fol. 1602; and Bipont. 12 vols. 8vo. 1788. Plato Dial. &c.—Cic. de offic. 1, &c.—Plut. in Sol. &c.——Seneca ep. Quæst. 10, c. 1, *&c.—Ælian. V. PLAUTIA LEX, was enacted by M. Plautius, the tribune, A. U. C. 664. It required every tribe annually to chuse fifteen persons of their body, to serve as judges, making the honor common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe. ——Another, called also Plotia, A. U. C. 675. It punished with the interdictio ignis & aquæ, all persons who were found guilty of attempts upon the state, or the senators or magistrates, or such as appeared in public armed with an evil design, or such as forcibly expelled any person from his legal possessions.

PLAUTIUS, a Roman, who became so disconsolate at the death of his wife, that he threw himself upon her burning pile. Val. Max. 4, c. 6.——Caius, a consul sent against the Privernates, &c.——Aulus, a governor of Britain, who obtained an ovation for the conquests he had obtained there over the Barbarians.——One of Otho's friends. He dissuaded him from killing himself.——Lateranus, an adulterer of Messalina, who conspired against Nero, and was capitally condemned. ——Aulus, a general who defeated the Umbrians and the Etrurians.——Caius, another general, defeated in Lusitania.——A man put to death by order of Caracalla.——M. Sylvanus, a tribune, who made a law to prevent seditions in the public assemblies.——Rubellius, a man accused before Nero, and sent to Asia, where he was assassinated.

PLAUTIANUS, FULVIUS, an African of mean birth, who was banished for his seditious behaviour in the years of his obscurity. In his banishment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus, who, some years after, ascended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his prosperity; Severus paid the greatest attention to him, and, if we believe some authors, their familiarity and intercourse was carried beyond the bounds of modesty and propriety. Plautianus shared the favors of Severus in obscurity as well as on the throne. He was invested with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces, and, indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. His table was served with more delicate meats than that of the emperor, when he walked in the public ublic ſtreets he received the moſt diſtinguiſhing honors, and a number of criers ordered the moſt noble citizens, as well as the meaneſt beggars, to make way for the favorite of the emperor, and not to fix their eyes upon him. He was concerned in all the rapine and deſtruction which was committed through the empire, and he enriched himſelf with the poſſeſſions of thoſe who had been ſacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himſelf ſtill greater, Plautianus married his favorite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla, the ſon of the emperor, and ſo eager was the emperor to indulge his inclinations in this, and in every other reſpect, that he declared he loved Plautianus ſo much, that he would even wiſh to die before him. The marriage of Caracalla with Plautilla was attended with ſerious conſequences. The ſon of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable in her manners, commanding in aſpect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to puniſh her haughty and imperious behaviour as ſoon as he ſucceeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and, to ſave his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conſpired againſt the emperor and his ſon. The conſpiracy was diſcovered, and Severus forgot his attachment to Plautianus, and the favors he had heaped upon him, when he heard of his perfidy. The wicked miniſter was immediately put to death, and Plautilla baniſhed to the iſland of Lipari, with her brother Plautius, where, ſeven years after, ſhe was put to death by order of Caracalla, A. D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a ſon, who died in his childhood, and a daughter, whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dion. Caſſ.

PLAUTILLA, a daughter of Plautianus, the favorite miniſter of Severus. Vid. Plautianus. —— The mother of the emperor Nerva, deſcended of a noble family.

M. ACCIUS PLAUTUS, a comic poet, born at Sarſina, in Umbria. Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meaneſt poverty by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himſelf, he entered into the family of a baker as a common ſervant, and, while he was employed in grinding corn, he ſometimes dedicated a few moments to the comic muſe. Some, however, confute this account as falſe, and ſupport that Plautus was never obliged to the laborious employments of a bakehouſe for his maintenance. He wrote 25 comedies, of which only 19 are extant. He died about 184 years before the Chriſtian era, and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this ſtanza, which deſerved to be engraved on his tomb;

Poſtquam morte captus eſt Plautus, Comœdia luget, ſcena eſt deſerta, Deinde riſus, ludus, jocuſque, & numeri Innumeri ſimul omnes collacrymarunt.

The plays of Plautus were univerſally eſteemed at Rome, and the purity, the energy, and the elegance, of his language, were, as other writers, conſidered as objects of imitation; and Varro, whoſe judgment is great, and generally deciſive, declares, that, if the Muſes were willing to ſpeak Latin, they would ſpeak in the language of Plautus. In the Auguſtan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expreſſions of a Terence, was cenſured for his negligence in verification, his low wit, execrable puns, and diſguſting obſcenities. Yet, however cenſured as to language or ſentiments, Plautus continued to be a favorite on the ſtage: If his expreſſions were not choice or delicate, it was univerſally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures, the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more intereſting, the characters more truly diſplayed, and the cataſtrophe more natural. In the reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were ſtill acted on the public theatres, and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater cenſure can be paſſed upon his ſucceſſors in dramatic compoſition, than to obſerve, that for 500 years, with all the diſadvantage of obſolete language and diction, in ſpite of the change of manners, and the revolutions of government, he commanded, and received, that applauſe which no other writer dared to diſpute with him. The beſt editions of Plautus are that of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1664; that of Barbou, 12mo. in 3 vols. Paris, 1759; that of Erneſti, 2 vols. 8vo. PLEIADES or VERGILIÆ, a name given to ſeven of the daughters of Atlas by Pleione or Æthra, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a conſtellation called Pleiades, near the back of the bull in the Zodiac. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married Siſyphus, king of Corinth, had ſome of the immortal gods for their ſuitors. On that account, therefore, therefore, Merope's ſtar is dim and obſcure among the reſt of her ſiſters, becauſe ſhe married a mortal. The name of the Pleiades is derived from the Greek word πλεῖν, to ſail, becauſe that conſtellation ſhows the time moſt favorable to navigators, which is in the ſpring. The name of Vergilian they derive from ver, the ſpring. They are ſometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Heſperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas. Hygin. fab. 192. P. A. 2, c. 21.—*Ovid. Their names were Lycophron, Theocritus, Aratus, Nicander, Apollonius, Philicus, and Homerus the Younger.

PLEIONE, one of the Oceanides, who married Atlas, king of Mauritania, by whom ſhe had twelve daughters, and a ſon called Hyas. Seven of the daughters were changed into a conſtellation called Pleiades, and the reſt into another called Hyades. Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 84.

PLEMNEUS, a king of Sicyon, ſon of Peratus. His children always died as ſoon as born, till Ceres, pitying his misfortune, offered herſelf as a nurſe to his wife, as ſhe was going to be brought to bed. The child lived by the care and protection of the goddeſs, and Plemneus was no ſooner acquainted with the dignity of his nurſe than he raiſed her a temple. Pauſ. 2. c. 5 & 11.

C. PLINIUS SECUNDUS, ſirnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field, and, after he had been made one of the auguſs at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleaſures of literature, the day was employed in the adminiſtration of the affairs of his province, and the night was dedicated to ſtudy. Every moment of time was precious to him, at his meals one of his ſervants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts in a memorandum book. Even while he dreſſed himſelf after bathing, his attention was called away from ſurrounding objects, and he was either employed in liſtening to another, or in dictating himſelf. To a mind ſo earneſtly devoted to learning, nothing appeared too laborious, no undertaking too troubleſome. He deemed every moment loſt which was not dedicated to ſtudy, and, from theſe reaſons, he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and, wherever he went, he was always accompanied by his amanuenſis. He even cenſured his nephew, Pliny the Younger, becauſe he had indulged himſelf with a walk, and ſternly obſerved, that he might have employed thoſe moments to better advantage. But, if his literary purſuits made him forget the public affairs, his prudence, his abilities, and the purity and innocence of his character, made him known and reſpected. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Veſpaſian, and he received from them all the favors which a virtuous prince could offer, and an honeſt ſubject receive. As he was at Miſenum, where he commanded the fleet, which was then ſtationed there, Pliny was ſurpriſed at the ſudden appearance of a cloud of duſt and aſhes. He was then ignorant of the cauſe which produced it, and he immediately ſet ſail in a ſmall veſſel for Mount Veſuvius, which he at laſt diſcovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The ſight of a number of boats that fled from the coaſt to avoid the danger, might have deterred another, but the curioſity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldneſs, and, though his veſſel was often covered with ſtones and aſhes, that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coaſt. The place was deſerted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night, the better to obſerve the mountain, which, during the obſcurity, appeared to be one continual blaze. He was ſoon diſturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow prevented him from returning to Miſenum. The eruptions of the volcano encreaſed, and, at laſt, the fire approached the place where the philoſopher made his obſervations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but though he was ſupported by two of his ſervants, he was unable to eſcape. He ſoon fell down, ſuffocated by the thick vapors that ſurrounded him, and the inſupportable ſtench of ſulphurous matter. His body was found three days after, and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Miſenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the Chriſtian era, and the philoſopher who periſhed by the eruptions of the volcano, has been called by ſome the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he compoſed none are extant but his natural hiſtory in 37 books. It is a work as Pliny the Younger ſays, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itſelf. It treats of the ſtars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, mineral, trees, flowers, and plants, beſides an account of all living animals, birds, fiſhes, and beaſts; a geographical deſcription of every place on the globe, and an hiſtory of every art and ſcience, of commerce and navigation, with their riſe, progreſs and ſeveral improvements. He is happy in his deſcriptions as a naturaliſt, he writes with force and energy, and though many of his ideas and conjectures are ſometimes ill founded, yet he poſſeſſes that fecundity of imagination, and vivacity of expreſſion, which are requiſite to treat a ſubject with propriety, and to render an hiſtory of nature pleaſing, intereſting, and above all inſtructive. His ſtile poſſeſſes not the graces of the Auguſtan age, it has neither their purity, elegance, nor their ſimplicity, but is rather cramped, obſcure, and ſometimes unintelligible. Yet for all this it has ever been admired and eſteemed, and it may be called a compilation of every thing which had been written before his age on the various ſubjects which he treats, and a judicious collection from the moſt excellent treatiſes which had been compoſed on the various productions of nature. Pliny was not aſhamed to mention the authors which he quoted, he ſpeaks of them with admiration, and while he pays the greateſt compliment to their abilities, his encomiums ſhow, in the ſtrongeſt light, the goodneſs, the ſenſibility, and the ingenuouſneſs of his own mind. He had written 160 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read, and ſo great was the opinion in his contemporaries, of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Lutinius offered to buy his notes and obſervations for the enormous ſum of about 3242l. Engliſh money. The philoſopher, who was himſelf rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The beſt editions of Pliny are that of Harduin, 3 vols. fol. Paris 1723, that of Brotier 6 vols. 12mo, Paris 1779, and the Variorum 8vo. in 8 vols. Lipſ. 1778 to 1789. Tacit. ann. 1, c. 69, l. 13, c. 20. l. 15, c. 33 — Plin. ep. &c.

C. Cæcilius Secundus, ſirnamed the younger, was ſon of L. Cæcilius by the ſiſter of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his uncle, whoſe name he aſſumed, and whoſe eſtates and goods he inherited. He received the greateſt part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much by his eloquence, that he, with Tacitus, were reckoned the two greateſt orators of their age. He did not make his profeſſion an object of gain like the reſt of the Roman orators, but he refuſed fees from the rich as well as from the pooreſt of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himſelf for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He publiſhed many of his harangues and orations, which have been left. When Trajan was inveſted with the imperial purple, Pliny was created conſul by the emperor. This honor the conſul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric which, at the requeſt of the Roman ſenate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. Some time after he preſided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office, and with the power, of pro-conſul, and by his humanity and philanthropy the ſubject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the perſecution which had been begun againſt the chriſtians of his province was ſtopped when Pliny ſolemnly declared to the emperor that the followers of Chriſt were a meek and inoffenſive ſect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths to abſtain from vice, and to relinquiſh every ſinful purſuit. If he rendered himſelf popular in his province, he was not leſs reſpected at Rome. He was there the friend of the poor, the patron of learning, great without arrogance, affable in his behaviour and an example of good breeding, ſobriety, temperance, and modeſty. As a father and a huſband his character was amiable; as a ſubject he was faithful to his prince, and as a magiſtrate, he was candid, open, and compaſſionate. His native country ſhared among the reſt, his unbounded benevolence, and Comum, a ſmall town of Inſubria which gave him birth, boaſted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books, which he collected there. He alſo contributed towards the expences which attended the education of his countrymen, and liberally ſpent part of his eſtate for the advancement of literature, and for the inſtruction of thoſe whom poverty otherwiſe deprived of the advantages vantages of a public education. He made his preceptor Quintilian, and the poet Martial, objects of his benevolence, and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility, and while he observed that he was rich in the poſſeſſion of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowry for his beloved daughter, 50,000 ſeſterces, about 300l. I would not, continued he, be ſo moderate, were I not aſſured from your modeſty, and diſintereſtedneſs, that the ſmalleſs of the preſent will render it acceptable. He died in the 52d year of his age, A. D. 113. He had written an hiſtory of his own times, which is loſt. It is ſaid, that Tacitus did not begin his hiſtory till he had found it impoſſible to perſuade Pliny to undertake that laborious taſk, and indeed what could not have been expected from the panegyriſt of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himſelf inferior to him in delineating the character of the times. Some ſuppoſe, but falſely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illuſtrious men, univerſally aſcribed to Cornelius Nepos. He alſo wrote poetry, but his verſes have all periſhed, and nothing of his learned works remains, but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and 10 books of letters, which he himſelf collected and prepared for the public, from a numerous and reſpectable correſpondence. Theſe letters contain many curious and intereſting facts, they abound with many anecdotes of the generoſity and the humane ſentiments of the writer. They are written with elegance and great purity, and the reader every where diſcovers that affability, that condeſcenſion and philanthropy which ſo egregiouſly marked the advocate of the chriſtians. Theſe letters are eſteemed by ſome, equal to the voluminous epiſtles of Cicero. In his panegyric, Pliny's ſtile is florid and brilliant, he has uſed, to the greateſt advantage, the liberties of the panegyriſt, and the eloquence of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is diſtinguiſhed by that affectation and pompoſity which marked the reign of Trajan. The beſt editions of Pliny, are thoſe of Geſner 8vo, Lipſ 1770, and of Lallemand 12mo Paris apud Barbou, and of the panegyric ſeparate, that of Schwartz 4to 1746, and of the epiſtles, the Variorum L. PLISTHENES, a ſon of Atreus king of Argos, father of Menelaus and Agamemnon, according to Heſiod and others. Homer, however, calls Menelaus and Agamemnon ſons of Atreus, though they were in reality the children of Pliſthenes. The father died very young, and the two children were left in the houſe of their grandfather, who took care of them and inſtructed them. From his attention to them, therefore it ſeems probable that Atreus was univerſally acknowledged their protector and father. Ovid. Rem. Am. v. 778.—Dictys. Cret. 1.—Homer. Il.

PLISTOANAX & PLISTONAX, ſon of Pauſanias, was general of the Lacedæmonian armies in the Peloponneſian war. He was baniſhed from his kingdom of Sparta for 19 years, and was afterwards recalled by order of the oracle of Delphi. He reigned 58 years. He had ſucceeded Pliſtarchus.

PLOTÆ, ſmall iſlands on the coaſt of Ætolia.

PLOTINA POMPEIA, a Roman lady who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the proceſſion with her huſband when he was ſaluted emperor, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendleſs. She accompanied Trajan in the eaſt, and at his death ſhe brought back his aſhes to Rome, and ſtill enjoyed all the honors and titles of a Roman empreſs under Adrian, who, by her means, had ſucceeded to the vacant throne. At her death, A. D. 122, ſhe was ranked among the gods, and received divine honors, which according to the ſuperſtition of the time, ſhe ſeemed to deſerve, from her regard for the good and the proſperity of the Roman empire, and for her private virtues. Dion.

PLOTINOPOLIS, a town of Thrace built by the emperor Trajan, and called after Plotina, the founder's wife.——Another in Dacia.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philoſopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philoſopher, and after he had profited by all the inſtructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge and to viſit the territories of India and Perſia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the eaſt, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor, nearly terminated the life of the philosopher. He saved himself by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philosophy. His school was frequented by people of every sex, age, and quality; by senators, as well as by plebeians, and so great was the opinion of the public of his honesty and candor, that many, on their death-bed, left all their possessions to his care, and entrusted their children to him, as to a superior being. He was the favorite of all the Romans; and while he charmed the populace by the force of his eloquence, and the senate by his doctrines, the emperor Galienus courted him, and admired the extent of his learning. It is even said, that the emperor and the empress Salonina intended to re-build a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philosopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he presided over a colony of philosophers, the validity and the use of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed, through the envy and the malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philosopher, at last become helpless and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for a while maintained him. He died A. D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his last and most violent efforts to give up what there was most divine in him and in the rest of the universe. Amidst the great qualities of the philosopher, we discover some ridiculous singularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he observed, that to see a painting of himself in the following age, was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. These reasons also induced him to conceal the day, the hour and the place of his birth. He never made use of medicines, and though his body was often debilitated by abstinence or too much study, he despised to have recourse to a physician, and thought that it would degrade the gravity of a philosopher. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They consist of 54 different treatises divided into six equal parts written with great spirit and vivacity; but the reasonings are abstruse, and the subjects metaphysical. The best edition is that of Ficinus, fol, Basil, 1580.

Plutarchus, a native of Chæronea, descended of a respectable family. His father, whose name is unknown, was distinguished for his learning and virtues, and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was also conspicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. Under Ammodius, a reputable teacher at Delphi, Plutarch was made acquainted with philosophy and mathematics, and so well established was his character, that he was appointed by his countrymen, while yet very young, to go to the Roman pro-consul in their name, upon an affair of the most important nature. This commission he executed with honor to himself, and with success for his country. He afterwards travelled in quest of knowledge, and after he had visited, like a philosopher and an historian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he retired to Rome, where he opened a school. His reputation made his school frequented. The emperor Trajan admired his abilities, and honored him with the office of consul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greatest tranquillity, respected by his fellow-citizens and raised to all the honors which his native town could bestow. In this peaceful and solitary retreat, Plutarch closely applied himself to study, and wrote the greatest part of his works, and particularly his lives. He died in an advanced old age at Chæronea, about the 140th year of the christian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife, called Timoxena, four sons and one daughter. Two of the sons and the daughter died when young, and those that survived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honor to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character the historian of Chæronea was the friend of discipline. He boldly asserted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and submissive deference to magistrates, as necessary to preserve the peace of society. He supported that the most violent and dangerous public factions arose too often from private disputes and from misunderstanding. To render himself more intelligent, he always carried a common place-book with him, and he preserved with the greatest care whatever judicious observations fell in the course of conversation. The most esteemed of his works are his lives of illustrious men, of which he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful skill and impartiality. He neither misrepresents the virtues, nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with precision and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many descriptions he is inferior to no historian. In some of his narrations, however, he is often too circumstantial, his remarks are often injudicious, and when he compares the heroes of Greece with those of Rome, the candid reader can easily remember which side of the Adriatic gave the historian birth. Some have accused him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have censured him for his superstition; yet for all this, he is the most entertaining, the most instructive, and interesting of all the writers of ancient history, and were a man of true taste and judgment asked what book he wished to save from destruction, of all the profane compositions of antiquity, he would perhaps without hesitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatises, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his misguided philosophy, and erroneous doctrines, render some of these inferior compositions puerile and disgusting. They however contain many useful lessons and curious facts, and though they are composed without connection, compiled without judgment, and often abound with improbable stories, and false reasonings, yet they contain much information, and many useful reflections. The best editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. fol. 1599, and that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo. 1572. Plut.——A native of Eretria, during the Peloponnesian war. He was defeated by the Macedonians. Plut. in Phoc.

PLUTIA, a town of Sicily.

PLUTO, son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as such he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis Hades, or Ades, Clytopolon, Agelastus, Orcus, &c. As the place of his residence was obscure and gloomy, all the goddesses refused to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his solicitations. As he once visited the island of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he saw Proserpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horses. To make his retreat more unknown, he opened himself a passage through the earth, by striking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephisus in Attica. Proserpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and she became the wife of her raviſher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally represented as holding a trident with two teeth, he has also keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and dismal countenance, and for that reason no temples were raised to his honor as to the rest of the superior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not sprinkled on the altars, or received in vessels, as at other sacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracusians yearly sacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had disappeared with Proserpine. Among plants, the cypress, the narcissus, and the maiden-hair, were sacred to him, as also every thing which was deemed inauspicious, particularly the number two. According to some of the ancients, Pluto sat on a throne of sulphur, from which issued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the harpies hovered around him, Proserpine sat on his left hand, and near to the goddess stood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with snakes. The Parcæ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the symbols of their office, the distaff, the spindle and the scissars. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods, and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet, which rendered the bearer invisible, and gave it to Pluto. Perseus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. *Hesiod. PLUTONIUM, a place of Phrygia.

PLUTUS, son of Jasion or Jasius, by Ceres, the goddess of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologiſts with Pluto, though plainly diſtinguiſhed from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddeſs of peace, and on that account, Pax was repreſented at Athens, as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks ſpoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They repreſented him as blind, becauſe he diſtributed riches indiſcriminately; he was lame, becauſe he came ſlow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity, than he approached mankind. Lucian in Tim.—Pauſ. 9, c. 16, & 26.—*Hygin. PLYNTERIA, a feſtival among the Greeks, in honor of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter of Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word ſeems to be derived from πλυνω, lavare, becauſe, during the ſolemnity, they undreſſed the ſtatue of the goddeſs and waſhed it. The day on which it was obſerved, was univerſally looked upon as unfortunate and inauſpicious, and on that account, no perſon was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purpoſely ſurrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day, was deemed very unfortunate; but however, the ſucceſs that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwiſe. It was cuſtomary at this feſtival to bear in proceſſion a cluſter of figs, which intimated the progreſs of civilization among the firſt inhabitants of the earth, as figs ſerved them for food after they had found a diſlike for acorns. Pollux.

POBLICIUS, a lieutenant of Pompey in Spain.

PODALIRIUS, a ſon of Æſculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himſelf under him ſuch a maſter of medicine, that during the Trojan war the Greeks invited him to their camp, to ſtop a peſtilence which had baffled the ſkill of all their phyſicians. Some however ſuppoſe, that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a phyſician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machaon, in 30 ſhips, with ſoldiers from Œchalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Caria, where he cured of the falling ſickneſs a daughter of the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honors. *Dictys. PODARES, a general of Mantinea, in the age of Epaminondas. Pauſ. 8, c. 9.

PODARGE, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horſes of Achilles, by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the ſwiftneſs of her feet.

PODARGUS, a charioteer of Hector.

PŒAS, ſon of Thaumacus, was among the Argonauts.——The father of Philoctetes. The ſon is often called Pœantid Proles, on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 45.

PŒCILE, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικιλος) of paintings which it contained. It was there that Zeno kept his ſchool, and the ſtoics alſo received their leſſons there, whence their name, à στοα, a porch. The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others was that of the ſiege and ſacking of Troy, the battle of Theſeus againſt the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Œnoe in Argolis, and of Atticus the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon, was to have his picture drawn more conſpicuous than that of the reſt of the officers that fought with him, in the repreſentation which was made of the engagement, which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. C. Nep. in Milt. & in Attic. 3.—Pauſ. 1.—Plin. 36.

PŒNI, a name given to the Carthaginians. It ſeems to be a corruption of the word Phœni or Phœnices, as the Carthaginians were of Phœnician origin.

PŒON. Vid. Pæon.

PŒONIA, a part of Macedonia. Vid. Pæonia.

PŒUS, a part of mount Pindus.

POGON, a harbour of the Trœzenians on the coaſt of the Peloponneſus. It received this name on account of its appearing to come forward before the town of Trœzene, as the beard, (πωγων,) does from the chin. Strab. 8.—Mela. 2.

his works are his lives of illuſtrious men, of which he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful ſkill and impartiality. He neither miſrepreſents the virtues, nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with preciſion and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many deſcriptions he is inferior to no hiſtorian. In ſome of his narrations, however, he is often too circumſtantial, his remarks are often injudicious, and when he compares the heroes of Greece with thoſe of Rome, the candid reader can eaſily remember which ſide of the Adriatic gave the hiſtorian birth. Some have accuſed him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have cenſured him for his ſuperſtition; yet for all this, he is the moſt entertaining, the moſt inſtructive, and intereſting of all the writers of ancient hiſtory, and were a man of true taſte and judgment aſked what book he wiſhed to ſave from deſtruction, of all the profane compoſitions of antiquity, he would perhaps without heſitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatiſes, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his miſguided philoſophy, and erroneous doctrines, render ſome of theſe inferior compoſitions puerile and diſguſting. They however contain many uſeful leſſons and curious facts, and though they are compoſed without connection, compiled without judgment, and often abound with improbable ſtories, and falſe reaſonings, yet they contain much information, and many uſeful reflections. The beſt editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. fol. 1599, and that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo. 1572. Plut.——A native of Eretria, during the Peloponneſian war. He was defeated by the Macedonians. Plut. in Phoc.

PLUTIA, a town of Sicily.

PLUTO, ſon of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as ſuch he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis Hades, or Ades, Clytopolon, Agelaſtus, Orcus, &c. As the place of his reſidence was obſcure and gloomy, all the goddeſſes refuſed to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his ſolicitations. As he once viſited the iſland of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he ſaw Proſerpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horſes. To make his retreat more unknown, he opened himſelf a paſſage through the earth, by ſtriking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephiſus in Attica. Proſerpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and ſhe became the wife of her raviſher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally repreſented as holding a trident with two teeth, he has alſo keys in his hand, to intimate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and diſmal countenance, and for that reaſon no temples were raiſed to his honor as to the reſt of the ſuperior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only ſacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not ſprinkled on the altars, or received in veſſels, as at other ſacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracuſans yearly ſacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had diſappeared with Proſerpine. Among plants, the cypreſs, the narciſſus, and the maiden-hair, were ſacred to him, as alſo every thing which was deemed inauſpicious, particularly the number two. According to ſome of the ancients, Pluto ſat on a throne of ſulphur, from which iſſued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the harpies hovered around him, Proſerpine ſat on his left hand, and near to the goddeſs ſtood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with ſnakes. The Parcæ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the ſymbols of their office, the diſtaff, the ſpindle and the ſciſſars. Pluto is called by ſome the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods, and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet, which rendered the bearer inviſible, and gave it to Pluto. Perſeus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. *Heſiod. PLUTONIUM, a place of Phrygia.

PLUTUS, ſon of Jaſion or Jaſius, by Ceres, the goddeſs of corn, has been con-

founded by many of the mythologiſts with Pluto, though plainly diſtinguiſhed from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddeſs of peace, and on that account, Pax was repreſented at Athens, as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks ſpoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They repreſented him as blind, becauſe he diſtributed riches indiſcriminately; he was lame, becauſe he came ſlow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity, than he approached mankind. Lucian in Tim.—Pauſ. 9, c. 16, & 26.—Hygin. P. A. Ariſtoph. in. Plut.—Diod. 5.

PLUVIUS, a ſirname of Jupiter. He was invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up by continual heat, and was in want of refreſhing rains. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 26.

PLYNTERIA, a feſtival among the Greeks, in honor of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter of Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word ſeems to be derived from πλυνειν, lavare, becauſe, during the ſolemnity, they undreſſed the ſtatue of the goddeſs and waſhed it. The day on which it was obſerved, was univerſally looked upon as unfortunate and inauſpicious, and on that account, no perſon was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purpoſely ſurrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day, was deemed very unfortunate; but however, the ſucceſs that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwiſe. It was cuſtomary at this feſtival to bear in proceſſion a cluſter of figs, which intimated the progreſs of civilization among the firſt inhabitants of the earth, as figs ſerved them for food after they had found a diſlike for acorns. Pollux.

PNICIUS, a village of Egypt.

POLICIUS, a lieutenant of Pompey in Spain.

PODALIRIUS, a ſon of Æſculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himſelf under him ſuch a maſter of medicine, that during the Trojan war the Greeks invited him to their camp, to ſtop a peſtilence which had baffled the ſkill of all their phyſicians. Some however ſuppoſe, that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a phyſician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machon, in 30 ſhips, with ſoldiers from Œchalia, Ithome, and Trica. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Caria, where he cured of the falling ſickneſs a daughter of the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Syrna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honors. *Dictys. PODARCE, a daughter of Danaus.

PODARCES, a ſon of Iphiclus of Theſſaly, who went to the Trojan war.—The firſt name of Priam. When Troy was taken by Hercules, he was redeemed from ſlavery by his ſiſter Heſione, and from thence received the name of Priam. Vid. Priamus.

PODARES, a general of Mantinea, in the age of Epaminondas. Pauſ. 8, c. 9.

PODARGE, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horſes of Achilles, by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the ſwiftneſs of her feet.

PODARGUS, a charioteer of Hector.

PŒAS, ſon of Thaumacus, was among the Argonauts.——The father of Philoctetes. The ſon is often called Pæantia Proles, on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 45.

PŒCILE, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικιλος) of paintings which it contained. It was there that Zeno kept his ſchool, and the ſtoics alſo received their leſſons there, whence their name, à στοα, a porch. The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others was that of the ſiege and ſacking of Troy, the battle of Theſeus againſt the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Œnoe in Argolis, and of Atticus the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon, was to have his picture drawn more conſpicuous than that of the reſt of the officers that fought with him, in the repreſentation which was made of the engagement, which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. *C. PŒONIA, a part of Macedonia. Vid. Pæonia.

PŒUS, a part of mount Pindus.

POGON, a harbour of the Trœzenians on the coaſt of the Peloponneſus. It received this name on account of its appearing to come forward before the town of Trœzene, as the beard, (πωγων,) does from the chin. Strab. 8.—Mela. 2.

POLA, a city of Istria, founded by the Colchians. Mela. 2, c. 3.

POLEMOCRATIA, a queen of Thrace, who fled to Brutus after the murder of Cæsar. She retired from her kingdom because her subjects had lately murdered her husband.

POLEMON, a youth of Athens, son of Philostratus. He was much given to debauchery and extravagance, and spent the greatest part of his life in riot and drunkenness. He once, when intoxicated, entered the school of Xenocrates, while the philosopher was giving his pupils a lecture upon the effects of intemperance, and he was so struck with the eloquence of the academician, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the dissipated life he had led, and applied himself totally to the study of philosophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time he never drank any other liquor but water, and after the death of Xenocrates he succeeded in the school where his reformation had been effected. He died about 270 years before Christ, in an extreme old age. Diog. in vitâ.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 254.——A son of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition against Parthia. After the battle of Actium he was received into favor by Augustus, though he had fought in the cause of Antony. He was killed some time after by the barbarians near the Palus Mæotis, against whom he had made war. Strab.—Dion.——His son of the same name was confirmed on his father's throne by the Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was also added to his kingdom by Claudius.——An officer in the army of Alexander, &c. Curt. 7, c. 1, &c.——A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures, still extant. He was master to Persius the celebrated satyrist, and died in the age of Nero.——A sophist of Laodicea in Asia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was often sent to the emperor with an embassy by his countrymen, which he executed with great success. He was greatly favored by Adrian, from whom he exacted much money. In the 56th year of his age he buried himself alive, as he labored with the gout. He wrote declamations in Greek.

POLIAS, a surname of Minerva, as protectress of cities.

POLIEIA, a festival at Thebes in honor of Apollo who was represented there with grey hair, (πολιος) contrary to the practice of all other places. The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and sacrificed. From that time the sacrifice of laboring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

POLIORCETES, (destroyer of cities) a surname given to Demetrius son of Antigonus. Plut. in Demet.

POLISMA, a town of Troas, on the Simois.

POLISTRATUS, an Epicurean philosopher, born the same day as Hippoclides, with whom he always lived in the greatest intimacy. They both died at the same hour. Diog.—Val. Max. 1.

POLITES, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Pyrrhus in his father's presence. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 526, &c. His son, who bore the same name, followed Æneas into Italy, and was one of the friends of young Ascanius. Id. 5, v. 564.

POLITORIUM, a city of the Latins destroyed by the Romans, before Christ 639.

POLLINEA, a prostitute, &c.—Juv. 2, v. 68.

POLLA ARGENTARIA, the wife of the poet Lucan. She assisted her husband in correcting the three first books of his Pharsalia.

POLLENTIA, a town of Liguria in Italy, famous for wool. There was a celebrated battle fought there between the Romans and Alaric, king of the Huns, about the 403d year of the Christian era, in which the former, according to some, obtained the victory. Mela 2, c. 7.

POLLIO, C. Asinius, a Roman consul, under the reign of Augustus, who distinguished himself as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favored the cause of Antony against Augustus. He patronized with great liberality the poets Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the first who raised a public library at Rome, and indeed his example was afterwards followed by many of the emperors. In his library were placed the statues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only person who was honored there during his lifetime. He was with J. Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon. He was greatly esteemed by Augustus when he had become one of his adherents, after the ruin of Antony. Pollio wrote some tragedies, orations, and an history, which was divided into 17 books. All these compositions are lost, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the 80th year of his age, A. D. 4. He is the person in whose honor Virgil has inscribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Augustus and Antony during his consulship. The poet, it is supposed, makes mention of a son of the the conſul born about this time, and is laviſh in his excurſions into futurity, and his predictions of future proſperity.—Paterc. 2, c. 86.—Horat. 2, od. 1. Sat. 10, l. 1.—*Virg. He afterwards conſpired againſt Nero, &c. Tacit. 6, c. 9. l. 15, c. 56.—One of the friends of Auguſtus, who uſed to feed his fiſhes with human fleſh. This cruelty was diſcovered when one of his ſervants broke a glaſs in the preſence of Auguſtus, who had been invited to a feaſt. The maſter ordered the ſervant to be ſeized; but he threw himſelf at the feet of the emperor, and begged him to interfere, and not to ſuffer him to be devoured by fiſhes. Upon this the cauſes of his apprehenſion were examined, and Auguſtus, aſtoniſhed at the barbarity of his favorite, cauſed the ſervant to be diſmiſſed, all the fiſh-ponds to be filled up, and the cryſtal glaſſes of Pollio to be broken to pieces.—A man who poiſoned Britannicus, at the inſtigation of Nero.—An hiſtorian in the age of Conſtantine the Great.—A ſophiſt in the age of Pompey the Great.—A friend of the emperor Veſpaſian.

Pollius Felix, a friend of the poet Statius, to whom he dedicated his ſecond Sylva.

Pollutia, a daughter of L. Vetus, put to death by order of Nero, &c. Tacit. 16. Ann. c. 10 & 11.

Pollux, a ſon of Jupiter, by Leda the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Caſtor. [Vid. Caſtor.]—A Greek writer, who floriſhed A. D. 186, in the reign of Commodus, and died in the 58th year of his age. He taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote an uſeful work called Onomaſticon, of which the beſt edition is that of Hemſterhuſius, 2 vols. fol. Amſt. 1706.

Poltis, a king of Thrace, in the time the Trojan war.

Polus, a celebrated Grecian actor.—A ſophiſt of Agrigentum.

Polusca, a town of Latium, formerly the capital of the Volſci. The inhabitants are called Polluſtini. Liv. 2, c. 39.

Polyænus, a native of Macedonia, who wrote eight books in Greek of ſtratagems, which he dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, while they were making war againſt the Parthians. He wrote alſo other books which have been loſt, among which was an hiſtory with a deſcription of the city of Thebes. The beſt editions of his ſtratagems are thoſe of Maſvicius, 8vo, L. Bat, 1690, and of Murſinna, 12mo. Berlin, 1756.——A friend of Philopœmen.

Polynus, a mountain of Macedonia, near Pindus.

Polyarchus, the brother of a queen of Cyrene, &c. Polyæn. 8.

Polybidas, a general after the death of Ageſipolis the Lacedæmonian. He reduced Olynthus.

Polybius, or Polybus, a king of Corinth, who married Peribœa, whom ſome have called Merope. He was ſon of Mercury by Chthonophyle, the daughter of Sicyon, king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children, to adopt and educate as her own ſon, Œdipus, who had been found by his ſhepherds expoſed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lyſianaſſa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, ſon of Bias king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adraſtus, who had been baniſhed from his throne, and who had fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66.—Pauſ. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.

Polybius, a native of Megalopolis in Peloponneſus, ſon of Lycortas. He was early initiated in the duties, and made acquainted with the qualifications of a ſtateſman, by his father, who was a ſtrong ſupporter of the Achæan league, and under him Philopœmen was taught the art of war. In Macedonia he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valor againſt the Romans, and when Perſeus had been conquered, he was carried to the capital of Italy as a priſoner of war. But he was not long buried in the obſcurity of a dungeon. Scipio and Fabius were acquainted with his uncommon abilities as a warrior and as a man of learning, and they made him their friend by kindneſs and attention. Polybius was not inſenſible of their merit; he accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and was preſent at the taking of Carthage and Numantia. In the midſt of his proſperity, however, he felt the diſtreſſes of his country, which had been reduced into a Roman province, and, like a true patriot, he relieved its wants, and eaſed its ſervitude by making uſe of the influence which he had acquired by his acquaintance with the moſt powerful Romans. After the death of his friend and benefactor Scipio, he retired from Rome, and paſſed the reſt of his days at Megalopolis, where he enjoyed the comforts and honors which every good man can receive from the gratitude of his citizens, and from the ſelf-ſatisfaction which attends a humane and benevolent heart. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 124 years before Chriſt, of a wound which he had received by a fall from his horſe. He wrote an universal history in Greek, divided into 40 books, which began with the wars of Rome with the Carthaginians, and finished with the conquest of Macedonia by Paulus. The greatest part of this valuable history is lost; the five first books are extant, and of the twelve following the fragments are numerous. The history of Polybius is admired for its authenticity, and he is, perhaps, the only historian among the Greeks, who was experimentally and professedly acquainted with the military operations, and the political measures of which he makes mention. He has been recommended in every age and country as the best master in the art of war, and nothing can more effectually prove the esteem in which he was held among the Romans, than to mention that Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar, perused his history with the greatest attention, epitomized it, and often retired from the field where he had drawn his sword against Octavius and Antony, to read the instructive pages which described the great actions of his ancestors. Polybius, however great and entertaining, is sometimes censured for his unnecessary digressions, for his uncouth and ill-digested narrations, for his negligence, and the inaccurate arrangement of his words. But every where there is instruction to be found, information to be collected, and curious facts to be obtained, and it reflects not much honor upon Livy for calling the historian, from whom he has copied whole books almost word for word, without gratitude or acknowledgment, haudquaquam spernendus auctor. Dionysius also of Halicarnassus, is one of his most violent accusers; but the historian has rather exposed his ignorance of true criticism, than discovered inaccuracy or inelegance. The best editions of Polybius are those of Gronovius, 3 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1670, and of Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo. 1764. Plut. in Phil. in præc.—Liv. 30, c. 45.—Paus. 8, c. 30.—A freed man of Augustus. Suet.—A physician.—A soothsayer of Corinth.

POLYBŒA, a daughter of Amyclas and Diomede, sister to Hyacinthus. Paus. 3, c. 19.

POLYBŒTES, Vid. POLYPŒTES.

POLYBŒTES, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who crushed him under a part of the island of Cos, as he was walking across the Ægean. Paus. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. in præf. fab.

POLYBUS, a king of Egypt in the time of the Trojan war.—One of Penelope's suitors. Ovid. Heroid. 1.——A king of Sicyon.—A king of Corinth. Vid. Polybius.

POLYCÆON, a son of Lelex. He received divine honors after death with his wife Messene, at Lacedæmon, where he had reigned. Paus. 4, c. 1, &c.—A son of Butes, who married a daughter of Hyllus.

POLYCARPUS, a famous Greek writer, born at Smyrna, and educated at the expence of a rich but pious lady. Some suppose that he was St. John's disciple. He became bishop of Smyrna, and went to Rome to settle the festival of Easter, but to no purpose. He was condemned to be burnt at Smyrna, A. D. 167. His epistle to the Philippians is simple and modest, yet replete with useful precepts and rules for the conduct of life. The best edition of Polycarp's epistle, is that of Oxon, 8vo, 1708, being annexed to the works of Ignatius.

POLYCASTE, the youngest of the daughters of Nestor. According to some authors she married Telemachus, when he visited her father's court in quest of Ulysses.

POLYCHĂRES, a rich Messenian, said to have been the cause of the war which was kindled between the Spartans and his countrymen, which was called the first Messenian war.

POLYCLEA, the mother of Thessalus, &c.

POLYCLES, an Athenian in the time of Demetrius, &c.—Polyæn. 5.——A famous athlete, often crowned at the four solemn games of the Greeks. He had a statue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 1.

POLYCLĔTUS, a celebrated statuary of Sicyon, about 232 years before Christ. He was universally reckoned the most skilful artist of his profession among the ancients, and the second rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had represented a body-guard of the king of Persia, was so happily executed, and so nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a most perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was acquainted with architecture. Paus. 2 & 6.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Another who lived about 30 years after.—A favorite of the emperor Nero, put to death by Galba.

POLYCLITUS, an historian of Larissa.

POLYCRĂTES, a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which always attended him. He became very powerful, and made himself master, not only of the neighbouring islands, but also of some cities on the coast of Asia. He had a fleet of a hundred ships of war, and was so universally respected, that Amasis, the king of Egypt, made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continued prosperity, advised him to chequer his enjoyments, by relinquishing some of his most favorite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into the sea a beautiful seal the most

most valuable of his jewels. The voluntary loss of so precious a seal afflicted him for some time, but a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found. Amasis no sooner heard this, than he rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos, and observed, that sooner or later his good fortune would vanish. Some time after Polycrates visited Magnesia on the Mæander, where he had been invited by Orœtes, the governor. He was shamefully put to death, 522 years before Christ, merely because the governor wished to terminate the prosperity of Polycrates. The daughter of Polycrates had dissuaded her father from going to the house of Orœtes, on account of the bad dreams which she had had, but her advice was despised. Paus. 8, c. 14. —Strab. 14.—Herodot. 3, c. 39, &c.—A sophist of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Busiris and Clytemnestra. Quintil. 2, c. 17.—An ancient statuary.

Polycrēta, or Polycrīta, a young woman of Naxos, who became the wife of Diognetus, the general of the Erythreans, &c. Polyæn. 8.—Another woman of Naxos, who died through excess of joy. Plut. de clar. Mul.

Polycrītus, a man who wrote the life of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily.

Polyctor, the husband of Stygna, one of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—The father of Pisander, one of Penelope's suitors. —An athlete of Elis. It is said that he obtained a victory at Olympia by bribing his adversary, who was superior to him in strength and courage. Paus. 5, c. 21.

Polydămas, a Trojan, son of Antenor by Theano, the sister of Hecuba. He married Lycaste, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accused by some of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares. Phry.—A son of Panthous, born the same night as Hector. He was inferior to none of the Trojans, except Hector, who fought against the Greeks. He was at last killed by Ajax, after he had slaughtered a great number of the enemy. Dictys. Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 12, &c.——A celebrated athlete, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fist, and it is said that he could stop a chariot with his hand in its most rapid course. He was one day with some of his friends in a cave, when on a sudden, a large piece of rock came tumbling down, and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the falling fragment in his arms. His prodigious strength, however, was insufficient, and he was instantly crushed to pieces under the rock. Paus. 6, c. 5.—One of Alexander's officers, intimate with Parmenio. Curt. 4, c. 15.

Polydamna, the wife of Thonis, king of Egypt. It is said that she gave Helen a certain powder, which had the wonderful power of driving away care and melancholy. Homer. Od. 4, v. 228.

Polydectes, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was son of Eunomus. Paus. 3, c. 7.——A son of Magnes, king of the island of Seriphos. He received with great kindness Danae and her son Perseus, who had been exposed on the sea by Acrisius. [Vid. Perseus.] He took particular care of the education of Perseus; but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehensive of his resentment. Some time after he paid his addresses to Danae, and when she rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys, the brother of Polydectes, who had himself saved her from the sea-waters, opposed her ravisher, and armed himself in her defence. At this critical moment, Perseus arrived, and with Medusa's head he turned into stones Polydectes, with the associates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys, who had shewn himself so active in the cause of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242.—Hygin. fab. 63, &c.—A sculptor of Greece. Prin.

Polydeucēa, a fountain of Laconia, near Therapne. Strab. 9.

Polydōra, a daughter of Peleus king of Thessaly, by Antigone, the daughter of Eurytion. She married the river Sperchius, by whom she had Mnestheus. Apollod. —One of the Oceanides. Hesiod.—A daughter of Meleager king of Calydon, who married Protesilaus. She killed herself when she heard that her husband was dead. The wife of Protesilaus is more commonly called Laodamia. [Vid. Protesilaus.] Paus. 4, c. 2.—A daughter of Perieres.——An island near the Propontis.

Polydæmon, an Assyrian prince killed by Perseus. Ovid. Met. 5. fab. 3.

Polydōrus, a son of Alcamenes, king of Sparta. He put an end to the war which had been carried on during 20 years, between Messenia and his subjects, and during his reign, the Lacedæmonians planted two colonies, one at Crotona, and the other at Locri. He was universally respected. He was assassinated by a nobleman, called Polemarchus. His son Eurycrates succeeded him 724 years before Christ. Paus. 3.—Herodot. 7, c. 204.—A celebrated carver of Rhodes. Plin. 34.—A son of Hippomedon, who went with the Epigoni to the second Theban war. Paus. 2.—A son of Cadmus and Hermione, who maried Nycteis, by whom he had Labdacus, the father of Laius. He had succeeded to the throne of Thebes, when his father had gone to Illyricum. Apollod. 3.—A brother of Jason of Pheræ, who killed his brother, and seized upon his possessions. Diod. 15.—A son of Priam killed by Achilles.—Another son of Priam by Hecuba, or according to others by Laothoe, the daughter of Altes, king of Pedasus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was besieged by the Greeks, his father removed him to the court of Polymnestor, king of Thrace, and also entrusted to the care of the monarch a large sum of money, and the greatest part of his treasures, till his country was freed from foreign invasion. No sooner was the death of Priam known in Thrace, than Polymnestor made himself master of the riches which were in his possession, and to ensure them the better, he assassinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the sea, where it was found by Hecuba.—[Vid. Hecuba.] According to Virgil, the body of Polydorus was buried near the shore by his assassin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whose boughs dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. Vid. Polymnestor. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 22, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 432.—Homer. Il. 20.—Dictys. Cret. 2 c. 18.

Polygius, a surname of Mercury.

Polygnotus, a celebrated painter of Thasos, about 422 years before the Christian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned one of the public porticos of Athens with his paintings, in which he had represented the most striking events of the Trojan war. He particularly excelled in giving grace, liveliness, and expression to his pieces. The Athenians were so pleased with him, that they offered to reward his labors with whatever he pleased to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was composed of the representatives of the principal cities of Greece, ordered that Polygnotus should be maintained at the public expence wherever he went. Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plin. 33, & 34.—Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 10, c. 25, &c.

Polygonus and Telegonus, sons of Proteus and Coronis, were killed by Hercules. Apollod.

Polyhymnia and Polymnia, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over singing and rhetoric, and was deemed the inventress of harmony. She was represented veiled in white, holding a sceptre in her left hand, and with her right raised up, as if ready to harangue. She had a crown of jewels on her head. *Hesiod. Polymedon, one of Priam's illegitimate children.

Polymela, one of Diana's companions. She was daughter of Phylas. She had a son by Mercury. Homer. Il. 16.———A daughter of Æolus seduced by Ulysses.—A daughter of Actor. She was the first wife of Peleus the father of Achilles.

Polymnestes, a Greek poet of Colophon. Paus. 1, c. 14.—A native of Thera, father of Battus or Aristoles, by Phronima, the daughter of Etearchus, king of Oaxus. Herodot. 4, c. 150.

Polymnestor, a king of the Thracian Chersonesus, who married Ilione the eldest of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks besieged Troy, Priam sent the greatest part of his treasures, together with Polydorus, the youngest of his sons, to Thrace, where they were entrusted to the care of Polymnestor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law; but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become master of the riches which were in his possession. At that time, the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy, followed by all the captives, among whom was Hecuba, the mother of Polydorus. The fleet stopped on the coasts of Thrace, where one of the female captives discovered on the shore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymnestor had thrown into the sea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, and Hecuba, who recollected the frightful dreams which she had had on the preceding night, did not doubt but Polymnestor was the cruel assassin. She resolved to revenge her son's death, and immediately she called out Polymnestor, as if wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him, and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children, who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymnestor to be banished into a distant ant hand for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and obſerves, that when Polydorus was ſent to Thrace, Ilione his ſiſter took him inſtead of her ſon Deiphilus, who was of the ſame age, apprehenſive of her huſband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the impoſition, he looked upon Polydorus as his own ſon, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the deſtruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wiſhed the houſe and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra, the daughter of Agamemnon to Polymneſtor, if he would deſtroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately diſpatched his own ſon Deiphilus, whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who paſſed as the ſon of Polymneſtor, conſulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead, his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the anſwer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the meaſures ſhe had purſued to ſave his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymneſtor, by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Hecub.—Hygin. fab. 109.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 45, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 430, &c.——A king of Arcadia, ſucceeded on the throne by Eemis. Pauſ. 8.——A young Mileſian, who took a hare in running, and afterwards obtained a prize at the Olympic games.

Polynices, a ſon of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by Jocaſta. He inherited his father's throne with his brother Eteocles, and it was mutually agreed between the two brothers, that they ſhould reign each a year alternately. Eteocles firſt aſcended the throne by right of ſeniority; but when the year was expired, he refuſed to reſign the crown to his brother. Polynices, upon this, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Adraſtus, the king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched againſt Thebes. The command of this army was divided among ſeven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the ſeven gates of the city of Thebes. The battle was decided by a ſingle combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. [Vid. Eteocles.] Æſchyl. ſept. ante Theb.—*Eurip. Polyperchon, one of the officers of Alexander. Antipater at his death appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia, in preference to his own ſon Caſſander. Polyperchon, tho' old and a man of experience, ſhewed great ignorance in the adminiſtration of the government. He became cruel not only to the Greeks, or ſuch as oppoſed his ambitious views, but even to the helpleſs and innocent children and friends of Alexander, to whom he was indebted for his riſe and military reputation. He was killed in a battle 309 B. C. Curt.—Diod. 17, &c.—Juſtin. 13.

Polyphemus, a celebrated Cyclops, king of all the Cyclops in Sicily, and ſon of Neptune and Thooſa, the daughter of Phorcys. He is repreſented as a monſter of ſtrength, of a tall ſtature, and one eye in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human fleſh, and kept his flocks on the coaſts of Sicily, when Ulyſſes, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, with twelve of his companions, viſited the coaſt, and were ſeized by the Cyclops, who confined them in his cave, and daily devoured two of them. Ulyſſes would have ſhared the fate of his companions, had he not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while he was aſleep. Polyphemus was awaked by the ſudden pain, he ſtopped the entrance of his cave, but Ulyſſes made his eſcape by creeping between the legs of the rams of the Cyclops, as they were led out to feed on the mountains. Polyphemus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addreſſes were diſregarded, and the nymph ſhunned his preſence. The Cyclops was more earneſt, and when he ſaw Galatæa ſurrender herſelf to the pleaſures of Acis, he cruſhed his rival with a piece of a broken rock. Theocrit. 1.—*Ovid. POLYPHRON, a prince killed by his nephew Alexander, the tyrant of Pheræ.

POLYTROPUS, a man ſent by the Lacedæmonians with an army againſt the Arcadians. He was killed at Orchomenus. Diod. 15.

POLYXĔNA, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, celebrated for her beauty and accompliſhments. Achilles became enamoured of her, and ſolicited her hand, and their marriage would have been conſummated, had not Hector her brother oppoſed it. Polyxena, according to ſome authors, accompanied her father when he went to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his ſon Hector. Some time after the Grecian hero came into the temple of Apollo to obtain a ſight of the Trojan princeſs, but he was murdered there by Paris; and Polyxena, who had returned his affection, was ſo afflicted at his death, that ſhe went and ſacrificed herſelf on his tomb. Some however ſuppoſe, that that ſacrifice was not voluntary, but that the manes of Achilles appeared to the Greeks as they were going to embark, and demanded them the ſacrifice of Polyxena. The princeſs who was in the number of the captives, was upon this dragged to her lover's tomb, and there immolated by Neoptolemus, the ſon of Achilles. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 5, &c.—*Dictyſ. POLYXO, a prieſteſs of Apollo's temple in Lemnos. She was alſo nurſe to queen Hypſipyle. It was by her advice that the Lemnian women murdered all their huſbands. Apollon. 1.—Flacc. 2.—Hygin. fab. 15.——One of the Atlantides.——A native of Argos, who married Tlepolemus, ſon of Hercules. She followed him to Rhodes, after the murder of his uncle Licymnius, and when he departed for the Trojan war with the reſt of the Greek princes, ſhe became the ſole miſtreſs of the kingdom. After the Trojan war, Helen fled from Peloponneſus to Rhodes, where Polyxo reigned. Polyxo detained her, and to puniſh her as being the cauſe of a war, in which Tlepolemus had periſhed, ſhe ordered her to be hanged on a tree by her female ſervants, diſguiſed in the habit of Furies. [Vid. Helena.] Pauſ. 5, c. 19.——The wife of Nycteus.——One of the wives of Danaus.

POLYZELUS, a Greek poet of Rhodes. He had written a poem on the origin and birth of Bacchus, Venus, the Muſes, &c. Some of his verſes are quoted by Athenæus. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 14.

POMAXÆTHRES, a Parthian ſoldier, who killed Craſſus according to ſome. Plut.

POMETIA, POMETII, and POMETIA SUESSA, a town of Italy, totally deſtroyed by the Romans, becauſe it had revolted. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.

POMETĪNA, one of the tribes of the people at Rome.

POMŌNA, a nymph at Rome who was ſuppoſed to preſide over gardens, and to be the goddeſs of all ſorts of fruit-trees. She had a temple at Rome, and a regular prieſt called Flamen Pomonalis, who offered ſacrifices to her divinity, for the preſervation of fruit. She was generally repreſented as ſitting on a baſket full of flowers and fruit, and holding a bough in one hand, and apples in the other. Pomona was particularly delighted with the cultivation of the earth, ſhe diſdained the toils of the field, and the fatigues of hunting. Many of the gods of the country endeavoured to gain her affection, but ſhe received their addreſſes with coldneſs. Vertumnus was the only one, who, by aſſuming different ſhapes, and introducing himſelf in her company, under the form of an old woman, prevailed upon her to break her vow of celibacy, and to marry him. This diety was unknown among the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 14. v. 628. &c.

POMPEIA, a daughter of Sextus Pompey, by Scribonia. She was promiſed to Marcellus, but ſhe married Scribonius Libo.——A daughter of Pompey the Great, Julius Cæſar's third wife. She was accuſed of incontinence, becauſe Clodius had introduced himſelf in woman's cloaths into the room where ſhe was celebrating the myſteries of Cybele. Cæſar repudiated her upon this accuſation. Plut.——The wife of Annæus Seneca, was the daughter of Pompeius Paullinus.—There was a portico at Rome, called Pompeia, much frequented by all orders of people. Ovid. art. am. v. 67.—Mart. 11, ep. 48.

POMPEIA LEX, by Pompey the Great, de ambitu, A. U. C. 701. It ordained that whatever perſon had been convicted of the crime of ambitus, ſhould be pardoned, provided he could impeach two others of the ſame crime, and occaſion the condemnation of one of them.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 701, which forbad the uſe of laudatores in trials, or perſons who gave a good character of the priſoner then impeached.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 683. It reſtored to the tribunes their original power and authority, of which they had been deprived by the Cornelian law.——Another by the ſame A. U. C. 701. It ſhortened the forms of trials, and enacted that the three firſt days of a trial ſhould be employed in examining witneſſes, and it allowed only one day to the parties to make their accuſation and defence. The plaintiff was confined to two hours, and the defendant to three. This law had for its object the riots, which happened from the quarrels of Clodius and Milo.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 698. It required, that the judges ſhould be the richeſt of every century, contrary to the uſual form. It was however requiſite that they ſhould be ſuch as the Aurelian law preſcribed.——Another of the ſame, A. U. C. 701. Pompey was by this empowered to continue in the government of Spain five years longer.

POMPEIĀNUS JUPITER, a large ſtatue of Jupiter, near Pompey's theatre, whence it received its name. Plin. 34, c. 7.

POMPEIĀNUS, a Roman knight of Antioch, raiſed to offices of the greateſt truſt, under the emperor Aurelius, whoſe daughter Lucilla he married. He lived in great popularity at Rome, and retired from the court when Commodus ſucceeded to the imperial crown. He ought, according to Julian's opinion, to have been choſen and adopted as ſucceſſor by M. Aurelius.—A general of Maxentius, killed by Conſtantine.—A Roman put to death by Caracalla.

POMPEII or POMPEIUM, a town of Campania, built, as ſome ſuppoſe, by Hercules. It was partly demoliſhed by an earthquake, A. D. 63. and afterwards rebuilt. Sixteen years after it was ſwallowed up by another earthquake, which accompanied one of the eruptions of mount Veſuvius. Herculaneum, in its neighbourhood, ſhared the ſame fate. The people of the town were then aſſembled in a threatre, where public ſpectacles were exhibited. Vid. Herculaneum. Strab. 6. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Dionyſ. 1.

POMPEIOPŎLIS, a town of Cilicia, formerly called Soli. Mela. 1, c. 13.

Q POMPEIUS, a conſul who carried on war againſt the Numantines, and made a ſhameful treaty. He is the firſt of that noble family, of whom mention is made. Flor. 2, c. 18.——Cneus, a Roman general, who made war againſt the Marſi, and triumphed over the Piceni. He declared himſelf againſt Cinna and Marius, and ſupported the intereſt of the republic. He was ſirnamed Strabo, becauſe he ſquinted. While he was marching againſt Marius, a plague broke out in his army, and raged with ſuch violence, that it carried away 11,000 men in a few days. He was killed by a flaſh of lightening, and as he had behaved with cruelty while in power, the people dragged his body through the ſtreets of Rome with an iron hook, and threw it into the Tiber. Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Pomp.——Rufus, a Roman conſul with Sylla. He was ſent to finiſh the Marſian war, but the army mutinied at the inſtigation of Pompeius Strabo, whom he was to ſucceed in command, and he was aſſaſſinated by ſome of the ſoldiers. Appian. Civ. 1.——A general who ſucceeded Metellus in Spain, and was the occaſion of a war with Numantia.——Another general taken priſoner by Mithridates.——Sextus, a governor of Spain, who cured himſelf of the gout by placing himſelf in corn above the knee. Plin. 22. c. 25.——Rufus a grandſon of Sylla.——A tribune of the ſoldiers in Nero's reign, deprived of his office when Piſo's conſpiracy was diſcovered. Tacit.——A conſul praiſed for his learning and abilities. Ovid. ex pont. 4, ep. 1.——A ſon of Theophanes of Mitylene, famous for his intimacy with Pompey the Great, and for his writings. Tacit. ann 6.——A tribune of a pretorian cohort under Galba.—A Roman knight put to death by the emperor Claudius for his adultery with Meſſalina. Tacit. 11, ann.——Cneus, ſirnamed Magnus, from the greatneſs of his exploits, was ſon of Pompeius Strabo, and Lucilia. He early diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field of battle, and fought with ſucceſs and bravery under his father, whoſe courage and military prudence he imitated. He began his career with great popularity, the beauty and elegance of his perſon gained him admirers, and by pleading at the bar, he diſplayed his eloquence, and received the moſt unbounded applauſe. In the diſturbances which agitated Rome, by the ambition and avarice of Marius and Sylla, Pompey followed the intereſt of the latter, and by levying three legions for his ſervice he gained his friendſhip and his protection. In the 26th year of his age, he conquered Sicily, which was in the power of Marius and his adherents, and in 40 days he regained all the territories of Africa, which had forſaken the intereſt of Sylla. This rapid ſucceſs aſtoniſhed the Romans, and Sylla, who admired and dreaded the riſing power of Pompey, Pompey, recalled him to Rome. Pompey immediately obeyed, and the dictator, by hailing him with the appellation of the Great, shewed to the world what expectations he formed from the maturer age of his victorious lieutenant. This sounding title was not sufficient to gratify the ambition of Pompey, he demanded a triumph; and when Sylla refused to grant it, he emphatically exclaimed, that the sun shone with more ardor at his rising than at his setting. His assurance gained what petitions and entreaties could not obtain, and he was the first Roman knight who, without an office under the appointment of the senate, marched in triumphal procession through the streets of Rome. He now appeared not as a dependant, but as a rival of the dictator, and his opposition to his measures totally excluded him from his will. After the death of Sylla, Pompey supported himself against the remains of the Marian faction, which were headed by Lepidus. He defeated them, put an end to the war which the revolt of Sertorius in Spain had occasioned, and obtained a second triumph, though still a private citizen, about 73 years before the Christian era. He was soon after made consul, and in that office he restored the tribunitial power to its original dignity, and in forty days removed the pirates from the Mediterranean, where they had reigned for many years, and by their continual plunder and audacity, almost destroyed the whole naval power of Rome. While he prosecuted the piratical war, and extirpated these maritime robbers in their obscure retreats in Cilicia, Pompey was called to greater undertakings, and by the influence of his friends at Rome, and of the tribune Manilius, he was empowered to finish the war against two of the most powerful monarchs of Asia, Mithridates, king of Pontus, and Trigranes, king of Armenia. In this expedition Pompey shewed himself no ways inferior to Lucullus, who was then at the head of the Roman armies, and who resigned with reluctance an office which would have made him the conqueror of Mithridates, and the master of all Asia. His operations against the king of Pontus were bold and vigorous, and in a general engagement, the Romans so totally defeated the enemy, that the Asiatic monarch escaped with difficulty from the field of battle. [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Pompey did not lose sight of the advantages dispatch would ensure, he entered Armenia, received the submission of king Tigranes, and after he had conquered the Albanians and Iberians, visited countries which were scarce known to the Romans, and, like a master of the world, disposed of kingdoms and provinces, and received homage from its crowned heads at once, he entered Syria, and pushed his conquests as far as the Red Sea. Part of Arabia was subdued, Judæa became a Roman province, and when he had now nothing to fear from Mithridates, who had voluntarily destroyed himself, Pompey returned to Italy with all the pomp and majesty of an eastern conqueror. The Romans dreaded his approach, they knew his power, and his influence among his troops, and they feared the return of another tyrannical Sylla. Pompey, however, banished their fears, he disbanded his army, and the conqueror of Asia entered Rome like a private citizen. This modest and prudent behaviour gained him more friends and adherents than the most unbounded power aided with profusion and liberality. He was honored with a triumph, and the Romans, for three successive days, gazed with astonishment on the riches and the spoils which their conquests had acquired in the east, and they were uncommonly delighted with the sight of the different nations, habits, and treasures which preceded the conqueror's chariot. But it was not this alone which gratified the ambition, and flattered the pride of the Romans; the advantages of their conquests were more lasting than an empty show, and when 20,000 talents were brought into the public treasury, and when the revenues of the republic were raised from 50 to 85 millions of drachmæ, Pompey became more powerful, more flattered, and more envied. To strengthen himself, and to triumph over his enemies, Pompey soon after united his interest with that of Cæsar and Crassus, and formed the first triumvirate, by solemnly swearing, that their attachment should be mutual, their cause common, and their union permanent. The agreement was completed by the marriage of Pompey with Julia the daughter of Cæsar, and the provinces of the republic were arbitrarily divided among the triumvirs. Pompey was allotted Africa and the two Spains, while Crassus repaired to Syria, to add Parthia to the empire of Rome, and Cæsar remained satisfied with the rest, and the continuation of his power as governor of Gaul for five additional years. But this powerful confederacy was soon broken, the sudden death of Julia, and the total defeat of Crassus in Syria, shattered the political bands which held the jarring interest of Cæsar and Pompey united. Pompey dreaded his father-in-law, and yet he affected to despise him, and by suffering anarchy to prevail in Rome, he convinced his fellow citizens of the necessity of investing him with dictatorial power. But while the conqueror of Mithridates was as a sovereign at Rome, the adherents of Cæsar were not silent. They demanded that either the consulship should be given to him, or that he should be continued in the government of Gaul. This just demand would perhaps have been granted, but Cato opposed it, and when Pompey sent for the two legions which he had lent to Cæsar, the breach became more wide, and a civil war inevitable. Cæsar was privately preparing to meet his enemies, while Pompey remained indolent, and gratified his pride in seeing all Italy celebrate his recovery from an indisposition by universal rejoicings. But he was soon roused from his inactivity, and it was now time to find his friends, if any thing could be obtained from the caprice and the fickleness of a people which he had once delighted and amused, by the exhibition of games and spectacles in a theatre which could contain 20,000 spectators. Cæsar was now near Rome, he had crossed the Rubicon, which was a declaration of hostilities, and Pompey who had once boasted that he could raise legions to his assistance by stamping on the ground with his foot, fled from the city with precipitation, and retired to Brundusium with the consuls, and part of the senators. His cause indeed was popular, he had been invested with discretionary power, the senate had entreated him to protect the republic against the usurpation and tyranny of Cæsar; and Cato, by embracing his cause, and appearing in his camp, seemed to indicate, that he was the friend of the republic, and the assertor of Roman liberty and independence. But Cæsar was now master of Rome, and in sixty days all Italy acknowledged his power, and the conqueror hastened to Spain, there to defeat the interest of Pompey, and to alienate the hearts of his soldiers. He was too successful, and when he had gained to his cause the western parts of the Roman empire, Cæsar crossed Italy and arrived in Greece, where Pompey had retired, supported by all the power of the east, the wishes of the republican Romans, and by a numerous and well-disciplined army. Though superior in numbers, he refused to give the enemy battle, while Cæsar continually harassed him, and even attacked his camp. Pompey repelled him with great success, and he might have decided the war if he had continued to pursue the enemy, while their confusion was great, and their escape almost inevitable. Want of provisions obliged Cæsar to advance towards Thessaly; Pompey pursued him, and in the plains of Pharsalia the two armies engaged. The whole was conducted against the advice and approbation of Pompey, and by suffering his troops to wait for the approach of the enemy, he deprived his soldiers of that advantage which the army of Cæsar obtained by running to discharge with spirit, vigor, and animation. The cavalry of Pompey soon gave way, and the general retired to his camp, overwhelmed with grief and shame. But here there was no safety, the conqueror pushed on every side, and Pompey disguised himself, and fled to the sea coast, whence he passed to Egypt, where he hoped to find a safe asylum, till better and more favorable moments returned, in the court of Ptolemy, a prince whom he had once protected and enthroned on his throne. When Ptolemy was told that Pompey claimed his protection, he consulted his ministers, and had the baseness to betray, and to deceive him. A boat was sent to fetch him on shore, and the Roman general left his galley, after an affectionate and tender parting with his wife Cornelia. The Egyptian sailors sat in sullen silence in the boat, and when Pompey disembarked, Achillas and Septimius assassinated him. His wife, who had followed him with her eyes to the shore, was a spectator of the bloody scene, and she hastened away from the bay of Alexandria, not to share his miserable fate. He died B. C. 48, in the 58th, or 59th year of his age, the day after his birth-day. His head was cut off, and sent to Cæsar, who turned away from it with horror, and shed a flood of tears. The body was left for some time naked on the sea shore, till the humanity of Philip, one of his freed men, and an old soldier, who had often followed his standard to victory, raised a burning pile, and deposited his ashes under a mound of earth. Cæsar erected a monument on his remains, and the emperor Adrian, two centuries after, when he visited Egypt, ordered it to be repaired at his own expence, and paid particular honor to the memory of a great and good man. The character of Pompey, is that of an intriguing and artful general, and the vis probi, and animo invercundo of Sallust, short and laconic as it may appear, is the best and most descriptive picture of his character. He wished it to appear that he obtained all his honors and dignity from merit alone, and as the free and unprejudiced favors of the Romans, while he secretly claimed them by faction and intrigue, and he who wished to appear the patron, and an example of true discipline and ancient simplicity, was not ashamed publicly to bribe the populace to gain an election, or to support his favorites. Yet amidst all this dissimulation, which was perhaps but congenial with the age, we perceive many other striking features; Pompey was kind and clement to the conquered, and generous to his captives, and he buried at his own expence Mithridates, with all the pomp and the ſolemnity which the greatneſs of his power, and the extent of his dominions ſeemed to claim. He was an enemy to flattery, and when his character was impeached by the malevolence of party, he condeſcended, tho' conſul, to appear before the cenſorial tribunal, and to ſhew that his actions and meaſures were not ſubverſive of the peace and the independence of the people. In his private character he was as remarkable, he lived with great temperance and moderation, and his houſe was ſmall, and not oſtentatiouſly furniſhed. He deſtroyed with great prudence the papers which were found in the camp of Sertorius, leſt miſchievous curioſity ſhould find cauſes to accuſe the innocent, and to meditate their deſtruction. With great diſintereſtedneſs he refuſed the preſents which princes and monarchs offered to him, and he ordered them to be added to the public revenue. He might have ſeen a better fate, and terminated his days with more glory if he had not acted with ſuch imprudence when the flames of civil war were firſt kindled; and he reflected with remorſe after the battle of Pharſalia upon his want of uſual ſagacity and military prudence, in fighting at ſuch a diſtance from the ſea, and in leaving the fortified places of Dyrrachium to meet in the open plain an enemy which was without proviſions, without friends, and without reſources. The misfortunes which attended him after the conqueſt of Mithridates, are attributed by Chriſtian writers to his impiety in prophaning the temple of the Jews, and in entering with the inſolence of a conqueror the Holy of Holies, where even the ſacred perſon of the high prieſt of the nation was not admitted but upon the moſt ſolemn occaſions. His duplicity of behaviour in regard to Cicero is deſervedly cenſured, and he ſhould not have violently ſacrificed to party and ſedition a Roman, whom he had ever found his firmeſt friend and adherent. In his meeting with Lucullus he cannot but be taxed with pride, and he might have paid more deference and more honor to a general, who was as able and more entitled than himſelf to finiſh the Mithridatic war. Pompey married four different times. His firſt matrimonial connection was with Antiſtia, the daughter of the pretor Antiſtius, whom he divorced with great reluctance to marry Æmylia, the daughter-in-law of Sylla. Æmylia died in child-bed, and Pompey's marriage with Julia, the daughter of Cæſar, was a ſtep more of policy than affection. Yet Julia loved Pompey with great tenderneſs, and her death in child-bed was the ſignal of war between her huſband and her father. He afterwards married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, a woman commended for her virtues, beauty, and accompliſhments. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 29.—Dio. Caſſ.—Lucan.—Appian.—Cæſ. bell. Civ.—Cic. Orat. 68, ad Attic. &c.—Eutrop.—The two ſons of Pompey the Great, called Cneius and Sextus, were maſters of a powerful army, when the death of their father was known. They prepared to oppoſe the conqueror, but Cæſar purſued them with uncommon vigor and ſucceſs, and at the battle of Munda they were defeated, and Cneius was left among the ſlain. Sextus fled to Sicily, where he for ſome time ſupported himſelf; but the murder of Cæſar gave riſe to new events, and if Pompey had been as prudent and as ſagacious as his father, he might have become perhaps as great and formidable. He treated with the triumvirs as an equal, and when Auguſtus and Antony had the imprudence to truſt themſelves without arms and without attendants in his ſhip, Pompey, by following the advice of his friend Menas, who wiſhed him to cut off the illuſtrious perſons who were maſters of the world, and now in his power, might have made himſelf as abſolute as Cæſar; but he refuſed, and obſerved it was unbecoming the ſon of Pompey to act with ſuch duplicity. This friendly meeting of Pompey with two of the triumvirs was not productive of advantages to him, he wiſhed to have no ſuperior, and hoſtilities began. Pompey was at the head of 350 ſhips, and appeared ſo formidable to his enemies, and ſo confident of ſucceſs in himſelf, that he called himſelf the ſon of Neptune, and the lord of the ſea. He was however ſoon defeated in a naval engagement by Octavius and Lepidus, and of all his numerous fleet only 17 ſail accompanied his flight to Aſia. Here for a moment he raiſed ſeditions, but Antony ordered him to be ſeized, and put to death about 35 years before the Chriſtian era. Plut. in Anton. &c.—Paterc. 2, c. 55, &c.—Flor. 4, c. 2, &c.——Trogus. Vid. Trogus. C. Pomptinus, a Roman officer who conquered the Allobroges after the defeat of Catiline.

Pompus, a king of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 5.

Pons Ælius was built by the emperor Adrian at Rome. It was the second bridge of Rome in following the current of the Tyber. It is still to be seen, the largest and most beautiful in Rome.——Æmylius, an ancient bridge at Rome, originally called Sublicius, because built with wood (sublicæ.) It was raised by Ancus Martius, and dedicated with great pomp and solemnity by the Roman priests. It was rebuilt with stones by Æmylius Lepidus, whose name it assumed. It was much injured by the overflowing of the river, and the emperor Antoninus, who repaired it, made it all with white marble. It was the last of all the bridges of Rome, in following the course of the river, and some vestiges of it may still be seen.——Anienſis was built across the river Anio about three miles from Rome. It was rebuilt by the eunuch Narses, and called after him, when destroyed by the Goths.——Cestus was built in the reign of Tiberius by a Roman called Cestius Gallus, from whom it received its name, and carried back from an island of the Tiber to which the Fabricius conducted.——Aurelianus was built with marble by the emperor Antoninus.—— Armonienſis was built by Augustus, to join the Flaminian to the Æmylian road.—— Bajanus was built at Baiæ in the sea by Caligula. It was supported by boats, and measured about six miles in length.—— Janicularis received its name from its vicinity to mount Janiculum. It is still standing.——Milvius was about one mile from Rome. It was built by the censor Ælius Scaurus. It was near it that Constantine defeated Maxentius.——Fabricius was built by Fabricius, and carried to an island of the Tiber.——Gardius was built by Agrippa. ——Palatinus near mount Palatine, was also called Senatorius, because the senators walked over it in procession when they went to consult the Sibylline books. It was begun by M. Fulvius, and finished in the censorship of L. Mummius, and some remains of it are still visible.——Trajani was built by Trajan across the Danube, celebrated for its bigness and magnificence. The emperor built it to assist more expeditiously the provinces against the barbarians, but his successor destroyed it, as he supposed that it would be rather an inducement for the barbarians to invade the empire. It was raised on 20 piers of hewn stones, 150 feet from the foundation, 60 feet broad, and 170 feet distant one from the other, extending in length above a mile. Some of the pillars are still standing.——Another was built by Trajan over the Tagus, part of which still remains. Of temporary bridges, that of Cæsar over the Rhine was the most famous.—— The largest single arched bridge known is over the river Elaver in France, called Pons Veteris Brivatis. The pillars ſtand on 2 rocks, at the diſtance of 195 feet. The arch is 84 feet high above the water. ——Suffragiorum was built in the Campus Martius, and received its name, becauſe the populace were obliged to paſs over it whenever they delivered their ſuffrages at the elections of magiſtrates and officers of the ſtate. ——Tirenſis, a bridge of Latium between Arpinum and Minturnæ.——Triumphalis was on the way to the Capitol, and paſſed over by thoſe who triumphed.——Narnienſis joined two mountains near Narnia, built by Auguſtus, of ſtupendous height, 60 miles from Rome; one arch of it remains, about 100 feet high.

Pontia, a Roman matron who committed adultery, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13.——A mother famous for her cruelty. Martial. 2, ep. 34.——A ſirname of Venus at Hermione. Pauſ. 2, c. 34. A woman condemned by Nero as guilty of a conſpiracy. She killed herſelf by opening her veins. She was daughter of Petronius, and wife of Bolanus. Juv. 6, v. 637.

Ponticum mare, the ſea of Pontus, generally called the Euxine.

Pontius, a poet of Rome, contemporary with Propertius. Propert. 1, el. 7. A man in Juvenal's age, fond of boaſting of the antiquity and great actions of his family, yet without poſſeſſing himſelf one ſingle virtue.

Pontinæ, a lake in the country of the Volſci. Lucan. 3, v. 85.

Pontius, a friend of Cicero.——A tribune of the people, who refuſed to riſe up when Cæſar paſſed in triumphal proceſſion. He was one of Cæſar's murderers, and was killed at the battle of Mutina. Sueton. in Caſ. 78.—Cic. 10, ad fam.——A mountain of Argolis, with a river of the ſame name. Pauſ. 2, c. 73.

Pontius Aufidianus, a Roman citizen, who upon hearing that violence had been offered to his daughter, puniſhed her and her raviſher with death. Val. Max. 6, c. 1.——Herennius, a general of the Samnites, who ſurrounded the Roman army under the conſuls T. Veturius and P. Poſthumius. As there was no poſſibility of eſcaping for the Romans, Pontius conſulted his father what he could do with an army that were priſoners in his hands. The old man adviſed him either to let them go untouched, or put them all to the ſword. Pontius rejected his father's advice, and ſpared the lives of the enemy, after he had obliged them to paſs under the yoke with the greateſt ignominy. He was afterwards conquered, and obliged in his turn to paſs under the yoke. Fabius Maximus defeated him, when he appeared again at the head of another army, and he was afterward ſhamefully put to death by the Romans, after he had adorned the triumph of the conqueror. Liv.——Cominius, a Roman who gave information to his countrymen, who were beſieged in the capitol that Camillus had obtained a victory over the Gauls. Plut.——A Roman ſlave who told Sylla in a prophetic ſtrain, that he brought him ſucceſs from Bellona.——One of the favorites of Albucilla. He was degraded from the rank of a ſenator. Tacit.—Titus, a Roman centurion, whom Cicero de Senect. mentions as poſſeſſed of uncommon ſtrength.

Pontus, a kingdom of Aſia Minor, bounded on the eaſt by Colchis, weſt by the Halys, north by the Euxine ſea, and ſouth by part of Armenia. It was divided into three parts according to Ptolemy, Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniacus & Pontus Cappadocius. It was governed by kings, the firſt of whom was Artabazes, either one of the ſeven Perſian noblemen who murdered the uſurper Smerdis, or one of their deſcendants. The kingdom of Pontus was in its moſt floriſhing ſtate under Mithridates the Great. When J. Cæſar had conquered it, it became a Roman province, tho' it was often governed by monarchs who were tributary to the power of Rome. Under the emperors a regular governor was always appointed over it. Pontus produced caſtors, whoſe teſticles were highly valued among the ancients for their ſalutary quality in medicinal proceſſes. Virg. G. 1, v. 58. Mela. 1, c. 1, & 19.—Strab. 12.—*Cic. pro Leg. He is the ſame as Oceanus. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

Pontus Euxinus, a celebrated ſea ſituate at the weſt of Colchis between Aſia and Europe, at the north of Aſia Minor. It is called the Black Sea by the moderns. Vid. Euxinus.

M. Popilius, a conſul who was informed, as he was offering a ſacrifice, that a ſedition was raiſed in the city againſt the ſenate. Upon this he immediately went to the populace in his ſacerdotal robes, and quieted the multitude with a ſpeech. He lived about the year of Rome 404. Liv. 9, c. 21.—Val. Max. 7, c. 8.——Lænas, a Roman ambaſſador to Antiochus, king of Syria. He was commiſſioned to order the monarch to abſtain from hoſtilities againſt Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus wiſhed to evade him by by his anſwers, but Popilius, with a ſtick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the ſand, and bade him in the name of the Roman ſenate and people not to go beyond it before he ſpoke deciſively. This boldneſs intimidated Antiochus; he withdrew his garriſons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war againſt Ptolemy. Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 45, c. 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 10.——A tribune of the people who murdered Cicero, to whoſe eloquence he was indebted for his life when he was accuſed of parricide. Plut.——A pretor who baniſhed the friends of Tiberius Gracchus from Italy.——A Roman conſul who made war againſt the people of Numantia, on pretence that the peace had not been firmly eſtabliſhed. He was defeated by them.—— A ſenator who alarmed the conſpirators againſt Cæſar, by telling them that the whole plot was diſcovered.——A Roman emperor. Vid. Nepotianus.

Poplicŏla, one of the firſt conſuls. Vid. Publicola.

Poppæa Sabina, a celebrated Roman matron, daughter of Titus Ollius. She married a Roman knight called Rufus Criſpinus, by whom ſhe had a ſon. Her perſonal charms, and the elegance of her figure, captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favorites. He carried her away and married her; but Nero who had ſeen her, and had often heard her accompliſhments extolled, ſoon deprived him of her company, and ſent him out of Italy, on pretence of preſiding over one of the Roman provinces. After he had taken this ſtep, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, on pretence of barrenneſs, and married Poppæa. The cruelty and avarice of the emperor did not long permit Poppæa to ſhare the imperial dignity, and though ſhe had already made him father of a ſon, he began to deſpiſe her, and even to uſe her with barbarity. She died of a blow which ſhe received from his foot when many months advanced in her pregnancy, about the 65th year of the Chriſtian era. Her funeral was performed with great pomp and ſolemnity, and ſtatues raiſed to her memory. It is ſaid that ſhe was ſo anxious to preſerve her beauty and the elegance of her perſon, that 500 aſſes were kept on purpoſe to afford her milk in which ſhe uſed daily to bathe. Even in her baniſhment ſhe was attended by 50 of theſe animals for the ſame purpoſe, and from their milk ſhe invented a kind of ointment, or pomatum, to preſerve beauty, called poppæanum from her. Plin. 11, c. 41. Dio 62. Juv. 6. Sueton. in Ner. & Oth.—Tacit. 13 & 14.——A beautiful woman at the court of Nero. She was mother to the preceding. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 1, &c.

Poppæus Sabinus, a Roman of obſcure origin, who was made governor of ſome of the Roman provinces. He deſtroyed himſelf, &c. Tacit. 6, Ann. 39.——Sylvanus, a man of conſular dignity, who brought to Veſpaſian a body of 600 Dalmatians. ——A friend of Otho.

Populonia, a town of Etruria, deſtroyed in the civil wars of Sylla. Strab. 5. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 172.

Porcia, a ſiſter of Cato of Utica, greatly commended by Cicero.—A daughter of Cato of Utica, who married Bibulus, and after his death, Brutus. She was remarkable for her prudence, philoſophy, courage, and conjugal tenderneſs. She gave herſelf a heavy wound in the thigh, to ſee with what fortitude ſhe could bear pain; and when her huſband aſked her the reaſon of it, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe wiſhed to try whether ſhe had courage enough to ſhare not only his bed, but to partake of his moſt hidden ſecrets. Brutus was aſtoniſhed at her conſtancy, and no longer detained from her knowledge the conſpiracy which he and many other illuſtrious Romans had formed againſt J. Cæſar. Porcia wiſhed them ſucceſs, and though ſhe betrayed fear, and fell into a ſwoon the day that her huſband was gone to aſſaſſinate the dictator, yet ſhe was faithful to her promiſe, and dropped nothing which might affect the ſituation of the conſpirators. When Brutus was dead, ſhe refuſed to ſurvive him, and attempted to end her life as a daughter of Cato. Her friends attempted to terrify her; but when ſhe ſaw that every weapon was removed from her reach, ſhe ſwallowed burning coals and died, about 42 years before the Chriſtian era. Valerius Maximus ſays, that ſhe was acquainted with her huſband's conſpiracy againſt Cæſar when ſhe gave herſelf the wound. Val. Max. 3, c. 2. l. 4. c. 6.—Plut. in Brut. &c.

Porcia lex, de civitate, by M. Porcius the tribune, A. U. C. 453. It ordained that no magiſtrate ſhould puniſh with death, or ſcourge with rods, a Roman citizen when condemned, but only permit him to go into exile.

M. Porcius Latro, a celebrated orator who killed himſelf when laboring under a quartan ague, A. U. C. 750.——Licinius, a Latin poet during the time of the third Punic war.——A Roman ſenator who joined the conſpiracy of Catiline.——A ſon of Cato at Utica, given much to drinking.

Porzoras, one of the 40 Gauls whom Mithridates ordered to be put to death, and to remain unburied for conſpiring againſt him. His miſtreſs at Pergamus buried him againſt the orders of the monarch. Plut. de virt. mul.

Porina, a river of Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 8, c. 15

Porosselene, an iſland near Lesbos. Strab. 13.

Porphyrion, a son of Cœlus and Terra, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was so formidable, that Jupiter, to conquer him, inspired him with love for Juno, and while the giant endeavoured to obtain his wishes, he, with the assistance of Hercules, overpowered him. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Mart. 13, ep. 78.—Apollod. 1, c. 6.

Porphyrius, a Platonic philosopher of Tyre. He studied eloquence at Athens under Longinus, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he perfected himself under Plotinus. Porphyry was a man of universal information, and, according to the testimony of the ancients, he excelled his contemporaries in the knowledge of history, mathematics, music and philosophy. He expressed his sentiments with elegance and with dignity, and while other philosophers studied obscurity in their language, his style was remarkable for its simplicity and grace. He applied himself to the study of magic, which he called a theourgic or divine operation. The books that he wrote were numerous, and some of his smaller treatises are still extant. His most celebrated work, which is now lost, was against the religion of Christ, and in this theological contest he appeared so formidable, that most of the fathers of the church have been employed in confuting his arguments, and developing the falsehood of his assertions. He has been universally called the greatest enemy which the Christian religion had, and indeed his doctrines were so pernicious, that a copy of his book was publicly burnt by order of Theodosius, A. D. 388. Porphyry resided for some time in Sicily, and died at the advanced age of 71, A. D. 304. The best edition of his life of Pythagoras is that of Kuster, 4to. Amst. 1707, that of his treatise De Abstinentia, is De Rhoer. Traj. ad Rhen. 8vo. 1767, and that De Antro Nympharum, is 8vo. Traj. ad Rhen. 1765.——A Latin poet in the reign of Constantine the Great.

Porrima, one of the attendants of Carmente when she came from Arcadia. Ovid. 1. Fast. v. 633.

Porsenna or Porsena, a king of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans, because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne and his royal privileges. He was at first successful, the Romans were defeated, and Porsenna would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Cocles stood at the head of a bridge, and supported the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. This act of bravery astonished Porsenna; but when he had seen Mutius Scævola enter his camp with an intention to murder him, and when he had seen him burn his hand without emotion, to convince him of his fortitude and intrepidity, he no longer dared to make head against a people so brave and so generous. He made a peace with the Romans, and never after supported the claims of Tarquin. The generosity of Porsenna's behaviour to the captives was admired by the Romans, and to reward his humanity they raised a brazen statue to his honor. Liv. 2, c. 9, &c. Plut. in Public.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Horat. ep. 16.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 646.

Porta Capena, a gate at Rome, which leads to the Appian road. Ovid. Fast. 6. v. 192.——Aurelia, a gate at Rome, which received its name from Aurelius, a consul who made a road which led to Pisa, all along the coast of Etruria.——Asinaria led to mount Cœlius. It received its name from the family of the Asinii.——Carmentalis was at the foot of the capitol, built by Romulus. It was afterwards called Scelerata, because the 300 Fabii marched through when they went to fight an enemy, and were killed near the river Cremera.——Janualis was near the temple of Janus.——Esquilina was also called Metia, Taurica, or Libitinensis, and all criminals who were going to be executed generally passed through, as also dead bodies which were carried to be burnt on mount Esquilinus.——Flaminia, called also Flumentana, was situate between the Capitol and mount Quirinalis, and thro' it the Flaminian road passed.——Fontinalis led to the Campus Martius. It received its name from the great number of fountains that were near it.——Navalis was situate near the place were the ships came from Ostia.——Viminalis was near mount Viminalis.——Trigemina, called also Ostiensis, led to the town of Ostia.——Catularia was near the Carmentalis Porta, at the foot of mount Viminalis.——Collatina received its name from its leading to Collatia. Collina, called also Quirinalis Agonensis, and Salaria, was near Quirinalis Mons. Annibal rode up to this gate and threw a spear into the city. It is to be observed, that at the death of Romulus there were only 3 or 4 gates at Rome, but the number was encreased, and in the time of Pliny there were 37, when the circumference of the walls was 13 miles and 200 paces.

Porus, the god of plenty at Rome. He was son of Metis or Prudence. Plato.——

a king of India when Alexander invaded Asia. The conqueror of Darius ordered him to come and pay homage to him as a dependant prince. Porus scorned his commands, and declared he would go and meet him on the frontiers of his kingdom sword in hand, and immediately he marched a large army to the banks of the Hydaspes. The stream of the river was rapid; but Alexander crossed it in the obscurity of the night, and defeated one of the sons of the Indian monarch. Porus himself renewed the battle; but the valor of the Macedonians prevailed, and the Indian prince retired covered with wounds, on the back of one of his elephants. Alexander sent one of the kings of India to demand him to surrender, but Porus killed the messenger, exclaiming, is not this the voice of the wretch who has abandoned his country? and when he at last was prevailed upon to come before the conqueror, he approached him as an equal. Alexander demanded of him how he wished to be treated; like a king, replied the Indian monarch. This magnanimous answer so pleased the Macedonian conqueror, that he not only restored him his dominions, but he encreased his kingdom by the conquest of new provinces, and Porus; in acknowledgment of such generosity and benevolence, became one of the most faithful and attached friends of Alexander, and never violated the assurances of peace which he had given him. Porus is represented as a man of uncommon stature, great strength, and proportionable dignity. Plut. in Alex.---Philostr. 2, c. 10.---Curt. 8, c. 8, &c.---*Claud. Conf. PRÆTOR, one of the chief magiſtrates at Rome. The office of Prætor was firſt inſtituted A. U. C. 388, by the ſenators, who wiſhed by ſome new honour to compenſate for the loſs of the conſulſhip, of which the plebeians had claimed a ſhare. The Prætor received his name a præeundo. Only one was originally elected, and another A. U. C. 501. One of them was totally employed in adminiſtering juſtice among the citizens, whence he was called Prætor urbanus, and the other appointed judges in all cauſes which related to foreigners. In the year of Rome 520, two more prætors were created to aſſiſt the conſul in the government of the provinces of Sicily and Sardinia, which had been lately conquered, and two more when Spain was reduced into the form of a Roman province, A. U. C. 551. Sylla the dictator added two more, and Julius Cæſar encreaſed the number to ten, and afterwards to 16, and the ſecond triumvirate to 64. After this their numbers fluctuated, being ſometimes 18, 16, or 12, till in the decline of the empire, their dignity decreaſed, and their numbers were reduced to three. In his public capacity the Prætor adminiſtered juſtice, protected the rights of widows and orphans, preſided at the celebration of public feſtivals, and in the abſence of the conſul aſſembled or prorogued the ſenate as he pleaſed. He alſo exhibited ſhows to the people, and in the feſtivals of the Bona Dea, where no males were permitted to appear, his wife preſided over the reſt of the Roman matrons. Feaſts were announced and proclaimed by him, and he had the power to make and repeal laws, if it met with the approbation of the ſenate and people. The quæſtors were ſubject to him, and in the abſence of the conſuls, he appeared at the head of the armies, and in the city he kept a regiſter of all the freedmen of Rome, with the reaſons for which they had received their freedom. In the provinces the Prætors appeared with great pomp, ſix lictors with the faſces walked before them, and when the empire was encreaſed by conqueſt, they divided like the conſuls their government, and provinces were given them by lot. When the year of their prætorſhip was elapſed, they were called proprietors, if they ſtill continued at the head of their province. At Rome, the Prætors appeared alſo with much pomp, two lictors preceded them, they wore the prætexta, or the white robe with purple borders, they ſat in curule chairs, and their tribunal was diſtinguiſhed by a ſword and a ſpear, while they adminiſtered administered Justice. The tribunal was called prætorium. When they rode they appeared on white horses at Rome, as a mark of distinction. The Prætor who appointed judges to try foreign causes, was called prætor peregrinus. The Prætors Cerealis appointed by Julius Cæsar, were employed in providing corn and provisions for the city. They were on that account often called frumentarii.

PRÆTORIUS, a name ironically applied to Al. Sempronius Rufus, because he was disappointed in his solicitations for the prætorship, as being too dissolute and luxurious in his manners. He was the first who had a fork brought to his table. Horat. 2 Sat. 2, v. 50.

PRAXIS, a surname of Venus at Megara. Paus. 1, c. 43.

PRAXITĔLES, a famous sculptor of Magna Græcia, who flourished about 324 years before the Christian era. He chiefly worked on Parian marble, on account of its beautiful whiteness. He carried his art to the greatest perfection, and was so happy in copying nature, that his statues seemed to be animated. The most famous of his pieces was a Cupid which he gave to Phryne. This celebrated courtezan, who wished to have the best of all the statues of Praxiteles, and who could not depend upon her own judgment in the choice, alarmed the sculptor, by telling him his house was on fire. Praxiteles upon this, shewed his eagerness to save his Cupid from the flames, above all his other pieces; but Phryne restrained his fears, and by discovering her artifice, obtained the favorite statue. The sculptor employed his chisel in making a statue of this beautiful courtezan, which was dedicated in the temple of Delphi, and placed between the statues of Archidamus, king of Sparta, and Philip, king of Macedon. He also made a statue of Venus, at the request of the people of Cos, and gave them their choice of the goddess, either naked or veiled. The former was superior to the other in beauty and perfection, but the inhabitants of Cos preferred the latter. The Cnidians, who did not wish to patronize modesty and decorum with the same eagerness as the people of Cos, bought the naked Venus, and it was so universally esteemed, that Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, offered the Cnidians to pay an enormous debt, under which they labored, if they would give him their favourite statue. This offer was not accepted. Paus. 1, c. 40, l. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 34, & 36.

PRAXITHEA, a daughter of Phrasimus and Diogenea. She married Erechtheus, king of Athens, by whom she had Cecrops, Pandarus and Metion, and four daughters, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A daughter of Theslius, mother of some children by Hercules. Id. 2, c. 7.—A daughter of Erechtheus sacrificed by order of the oracle.

PREXASPES, a Persian who put Smerdis to death, by order of king Cambyses. Herodot. 3, c. 30.

PRIĂMIDES, a patronymic applied to Paris as being son of Priam. It is also given to Hector, Deiphobus, and all the other children of the Trojan monarch. Ovid. Heroid. Vir. Æn. 3. v. 295.

PRIĂMUS, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon, by Strymo, called Placia by some. When Hercules took the city of Troy. [Vid. Laomedon.] Priam was in the number of his prisoners, but his sister Hesione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name of Podarcus for that of Priam, which signifies bought or ransomed. [Vid. Podarces.] He was also placed on his father's throne by Hercules, and he employed himself with uncommon diligence in repairing, fortifying, and embellishing the city of Troy. He had married, by his father's orders, Arisba, whom now he divorced for Hecuba, the daughter of Dimas, or Cisseus, a neighbouring prince. He had by Hecuba 17 children according to Cicero, or according to Homer, 19; the most celebrated of whom are Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Besides these he had many others by some concubines. Their names, according to Apollodorus, are Melampus, Gorgythion, Philæmon, Glaucus, Agathon, Evagoras, Hippothous, Chersidamas, Hippodamas, Mestor, Atas, Dorcylus, Dryops, Lycaon, Astygonus, Bias, Evander, Chromius, Telestas, Melius, Cebrion, Laodocus, Idomeneus, Archemachus, Echephron, Hyperion, Ascanius, Arrhetus, Democoon, Dejoptes, Echemon, Clovius, Ægioneus, Hypirychus, Lysithous, Polymedon, Medusa, Lysimache, Medesicaste, and Aristodeme. After he had reigned for some time in the greatest prosperity, Priam expressed a desire to recover his sister Hesione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece, and married to Telamon his friend. To carry this plan into execution, Priam manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his son Paris, with orders to bring back Hesione. Paris, to whom the goddess of beauty had promised the fairest woman in the world, [Vid. Paris.] neglected in some measure his father's injunctions, and as if to make reprisals upon the Greeks, he carried away Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, during the absence of her husband. Priam beheld this with satisfaction, and he countenanced his son by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This rape kindled the flames of war; all the suitors of Helen, at the request of Menelaus, [Vid. Menelaus.] assembled to revenge the violence offered to his bed, and a fleet, according to some, of 140 ships, under the command of the 69 chiefs that furnished them, set sail for Troy. Priam might have averted the impending blow by the restoration of Helen; but this he refused to do, when the ambassadors of the Greeks came to him, and he immediately raised an army to defend himself. Troy was soon besieged, frequent skirmishes took place, in which the success was various, and the advantages on both sides inconsiderable. The siege was continued for ten successive years, and Priam had the misfortune to see the greatest part of his children massacred by the enemy. Hector, the eldest of these, was the only one upon whom now the Trojans looked for protection and support; but he soon fell a sacrifice to his own courage, and was killed by Achilles. Priam severely felt his loss, and as he loved him with the greatest tenderness, he wished to ransom his body which was in the enemy's camp. The gods, according to Homer, interested themselves in favor of old Priam. Achilles was prevailed upon by his mother, the goddess Thetis, to restore Hector to Priam, and the king of Troy passed through the Grecian camp conducted by Mercury the messenger of the gods, who with his rod had made him invisible. The meeting of Priam and Achilles was solemn and affecting, the conqueror paid to the Trojan monarch that attention and reverence which was due to his dignity, his years, and his misfortunes, and Priam in a suppliant manner addressed the prince whose favors he claimed, and kissed the hands that had robbed him of the greatest and the best of his children. Achilles was moved by his tears and entreaties, he restored Hector, and permitted Priam a truce of 12 days for the funeral of his son. Some time after Troy was betrayed into the hands of the Greeks by Antenor and Æneas, and Priam upon this resolved to die in the defence of his country. He put on his armour, and advanced to meet the Greeks, but Hecuba by her tears and entreaties detained him near an altar of Jupiter, whither she had fled for protection. While Priam yielded to the prayers of his wife, Polites, one of his sons, fled also to the altar before Neoptolemus, who pursued him with fury. Polites, wounded and overcome, fell dead at the feet of his parents, and the aged father, fired with indignation, vented the most bitter invectives against the Greek, who paid no regard to the sanctity of altars and temples, and he raised his spear which he darted upon him. The spear, hurled by the feeble hand of Priam, touched the buckler of Neoptolemus, and fell to the ground. This irritated the son of Achilles, he seized the grey hair of Priam, and, without compassion or reverence for the sanctity of the place, he plunged his dagger into his breast. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of slain. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—Dares Phryg.—Herodot. 2.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—Homer. Il. 22, &c.—Eurip. in Troad.—*Cic. PRIAPUS, a deity among the ancients, who presided over gardens, and the parts of generation in the sexes. He was son of Venus by Mercury or Adonis; or according to the more received opinion, by Bacchus. The goddess of beauty, who was enamoured of Bacchus, went to meet him as he returned victorious from his Indian expedition, and by him she had Priapus, who was born at Lampsacus. Priapus was so deformed in all his limbs, particularly the genitals, by means of Juno, who had assisted at the delivery of Venus, that the mother, ashamed to give birth to such a monster, ordered him to be exposed ed on the mountains. His life, however, was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Priapus, propter deformitatem & membri virilis magnitudinem. He soon became a favorite of the people of Lampsacus, but he was expelled by the inhabitants on account of the freedom he took with their wives. This violence was punished by the son of Venus, and when the Lampsacenians had been afflicted with a disease in the genitals, Priapus was recalled, and temples erected to his honor. Festivals were also celebrated, and the people, naturally idle and indolent, gave themselves up to every lasciviousness and impurity during the celebration. His worship was also introduced in Rome; but the Romans revered him more as a god of orchards and gardens, than as the patron of licentiousness. A crown painted with different colors was offered to him in the spring, and in the summer a garland of ears of corn. An ass was generally sacrificed to him, because that animal, by its braying, awoke the nymph Lotis, to whom Priapus was going to offer violence. He is generally represented with an human face and the ears of a goat; he holds a stick in his hand, with which he terrifies birds, as also a club to drive away thieves, and a scythe to prune the trees and cut down the corn. He was crowned with the leaves of the vine, and sometimes with laurel, or rocket. The last of these plants is sacred to him, as it is said to raise the passions and excite love. Priapus is often distinguished by the epithet of phallus, fascinus, Itythallus, or ruber, or rubicundus, which are all expressive of his deformity. Catull. ep. 19 & 20.—Colum. 2. de Cult. hort. Horat. 1 sat. 1.—Tibull. 1, el. 1, v. 18.—*Ovid. PROBA, the wife of the emperor Probus.—A woman who opened the gates of Rome to the Goths.

PROBUS, M. Aurelius Severus, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His faher was originally a gardener, who by entering the army rose to the rank of a military tribune. His son obtained the same office in the 22d year of his age, and he distinguished himself so much by his probity, his valor, his intrepidity, moderation, and clemency, that at the death of the emperor Tacitus, he was invested with the imperial purple by the voluntary and uninfluenced choice of his soldiers. His election was universally approved by the Roman senate and the people, and Probus, strengthened on his throne by the affection and attachment of his subjects, marched against the enemies of Rome, in Gaul and Germany. Several battles were fought, and after he had left 400,000 barbarians dead in the field, Probus turned his arms against the Sarmatians. The same success attended him, and after he had quelled and terrified to peace the numerous barbarians of the north, he marched through Syria against the Blemmyes in the neighbourhood of Egypt. The Blemmyes were defeated with great slaughter, and the military character of the emperor was so well established, that the king of Persia sued for peace by his ambassadors, and attempted to buy the conqueror's favors with the most splendid presents. Probus was then feasting upon the most common food when the ambassadors were introduced, but without even casting his eyes upon them, he said, that if their master did not give proper satisfaction to the Romans, he would by his territories desolate, and as naked as the crown of his head. As he spoke, the emperor took off his cap, and shewed the baldness of his head to the ambassadors. His conditions were gladly accepted by the Persian monarch, and Probus retired to Rome to convince his subjects of the greatness of his conquests, and to claim from them the applause which their ancestors had given to the conqueror of Macedonia or the destroyer of Carthage, as he passed along the streets of Rome. His triumph lasted several days, and the Roman populace were long entertained with shows and combats. But the Roman empire, delivered from its foreign enemies, was torn by civil discord, and peace was not re-established till three usurpers had been severally defeated. While his subjects enjoyed tranquillity, Probus encouraged the liberal arts, he permitted the inhabitants of Gaul and Illyricum to plant vines in their territories, and he himself repaired 70 cities in different parts of the empire which had been reduced to ruins. He also attempted to drain the waters which were stagnated in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, by conveying them to the sea by artificial canals. His armies were employed in this laborious undertaking; but as they were unaccustomed to such toils, they soon mutinied, and fell upon the emperor as he was passing into one of the towns of Illyricum. He fled into an iron tower which he himself had built to observe the marshes, but as he was alone and without arms, he was soon overpowered and murdered in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of six years and four months, on the second of November, before Christ 282. The news of his death was received with the greatest consternation, not only his friends, but his very enemies deplored his fate, and even the army, which had been concerned in his fall, erected a monument over his body, and placed upon it this inscription: Hic Probus imperator, verè probus fuit, victor omnium gentium barbararum, victor etiam tyrannorum. He was then preparing in a few days to march against the Persians that had revolted, and his victories there might have been as great as those he obtained in the two other quarters of the globe. He was succeeded by Carus, and his family who had shared his greatness, immediately returned from Rome, not to become objects either of private or public malice. Zos.—Prob.—Saturn.——A grammarian in the second century.——An oppressive prefect of the pretorian guards, in the reign of Valentinian.

PROCOPIUS, a celebrated officer of a noble family in Cilicia. He was related to the emperor Julian, and lived with him in great intimacy. He was universally admired for his integrity, but he was not destitute of ambition or pride. After he had signalized himself under Julian and his successor, he retired from the Roman provinces among the barbarians in the Thracian Chersonnesus, and sometime after he suddenly made his appearance at Constantinople, when the emperor Valens had marched into the east, and he proclaimed himself master of the eastern empire. His usurpation was universally acknowledged, and his victories were so rapid, that Valens would have resigned the imperial purple, had not his friends intervened. But now fortune changed, Procopius was defeated in Phrygia, and abandoned by his army. His head was cut off, and carried to Valentinian in Gaul, A. D. 366. Procopius was slain the 43d year of his age, and he had usurped the title of emperor for about eight months.——A Greek historian of Cæsarea in Palestine, secretary to the celebrated Belisarius, A. D. 534. He wrote the history of the reign of Justinian, and greatly celebrated the hero whose favors and patronage he enjoyed. This history is divided into 8 books, 2 of which give an account of the Perſian war, 8 of the Vandals, and 4 of the Goths, to the year 553, which was afterwards continued in 5 books by Agathias till 559. Of this performance the character is great, though perhaps the hiſtorian is often too ſevere on the emperor. The works of Procopius were edited in 2 vols. folio Paris, 1662.

Procris, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. She married Cephalus. [Vid. Cephalus.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—A daughter of Theſtius.

Procrustes, a famous robber of Attica, killed by Theſeus, near the Cephiſus. He tied travellers on a bed, and if their length exceeded that of the bed, he uſed to cut it off, but if they were ſhorter, he had them ſtretched to make their length equal to it. Ovid. Heroid. 2, v. 69.—Met. 7, v. 43.—Plut. in Theſ.

Procŭla, a proſtitute in Juvenal's age. 2, v. 68.

Procŭlēius, a Roman knight very intimate with Auguſtus. He is celebrated for his humanity and fraternal kindneſs to his brothers Muræna and Scipio, with whom he divided his poſſeſſions, after they had forfeited their eſtates, and incurred the diſpleaſure of Auguſtus for ſiding with young Pompey. He was ſent by Auguſtus to Cleopatra, to endeavour to bring her alive into his preſence, but to no purpoſe. He deſtroyed himſelf when laboring under a heavy diſeaſe. Horat. 2, od. 2.—Plut. in Anton.—A debauchee in Nero's reign. Juv. 1, v. 40.

Procŭlus Julius, a Roman who after the death of Romulus, declared that he had ſeen him in appearance more than human, and that he had ordered him to bid the Romans to offer him ſacrifices under the name of Quirinus. Plut. in Rom.—Liv. 1, c. 16.—Geganius, a Roman conſul.—Placitius, a Roman who conquered the Hernici.—A friend of Vitellius.—A conſul under Nerva.—A man accuſed of extortion.—An African in the Age of Aurelius. He publiſhed a book intitled de regionibus, or religionibus, on foreign countries, &c.—An officer who proclaimed himſelf emperor in Gaul, in the reign of Probus. He was ſoon after defeated, and expoſed on a gibbet. He was very debauched and licentious in his manners, and had acquired riches by piratical excurſions.

Prodicus, a ſophiſt and rhetorician of Cos, about 396 years before Chriſt. He was ſent as ambaſſador by his countrymen to Athens, where he publicly taught, and had among his pupils Euripides, Socrates, Theramenes, and Iſocrates. He travelled from town to town in Greece, to procure admirers and get money. He made his auditors pay to hear him harangue, which has given occaſion to ſome of the ancients to ſpeak of the orations of Prodicus, for 50 drachmas. In his writings, which were numerous, he compoſed a beautiful epiſode, in which virtue and pleaſure were introduced, to attempt to make Hercules one of their votaries. The hero at laſt yielded to the charms of virtue, and rejected pleaſure. This has been imitated by Lucian. Prodicus was at laſt put to death by the Athenians, on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth.

Proserna, a town of Phthiotis. Liv. 63, c. 14.

Prœtides, the daughters of Prœtus, king of Argolis, were three in number, Lyſippe, Iphinoe, and Iphianaſſa. They became inſane for neglecting the worſhip of Bacchus, or according to others, for preferring themſelves to Juno, and they ran about the fields believing themſelves to be cows, and flying away not to be harneſſed to the plow or the chariot. Prœtus applied to Melampus to cure his daughters of their inſanity, but he refuſed to employ him when he demanded the third part of his kingdom as a reward. This neglect of Prœtus was puniſhed, the inſanity became contagious, and the monarch at laſt promiſed Melampus two parts of his kingdom and one of his daughters, if he would reſtore them and the Argian women to their ſenſes. Melampus conſented, and after he had wrought the cure, he married the moſt beautiful of the Prœtides. Some have called them Lyſippe, Ipponoe, and Cyrianaſſa. Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 15.—Lactant. ad. Stat. Theb. 1, & 3.

Prœtus, a king of Argos, ſon of Abas and Ocalea. He was twin brother to Acriſius, with whom he quarrelled even before their birth. This diſſention between the two brothers encreaſed with their years. After their father's death, they both tried to obtain the kingdom of Argos; but the claims of Acriſius prevailed, and Prœtus left Peloponneſus and retired to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, where he married Stenobœa, called by ſome Antea or Antiope. He afterwards returned to Argolis, and by means of his father in law, he made himſelf maſter of Tirynthus. Stenobœa had accompanied her huſband to Greece, and ſhe became by him mother of the Prœtides, and of a ſon called Megapenthes, who, after his father's death, ſucceeded on the throne of Tirynthus. [Vid. Stenobœa.] Homer. Il. 6.—Apollod. 2, c. 2.

Procyon, a ſtar near Sirius, or the dog ſtar, before which it generally riſes in July. Cic. de nat. D. 2, c. 44.

Progne, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, by Zeuxippe. She married Tereus king of Thrace, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Itylus, or Itys. Vid. Philomela.

Prolăus, a native of Elis, father to Philanthus and Lampus, by Lyſippe. Pauſ. 5, c. 2.

Prosxenus, one of the Epigoni, ſon of Parthenopæus. Pauſ. 2, c. 20.——A ſon of Plophis, daughter of Eryx, king of Sicily. Id. 8, c. 34.——An athlete of Pallene.——A ſon of Æſon, killed by Pelias. Apollod.

Promathĭdas, an hiſtorian of Heraclea.

Promathion, a man who wrote an hiſtory of Italy. Plut. in Rom.

Promĕdon, a native of the iſland of Naxos, &c.

Promenĕa, one of the prieſteſſes of the temple of Dodona. It was from her that Herodotus received the tradition that two doves had flown from Thebes in Egypt, one to Dodona, and the other to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, where they gave oracles. Herodot. 2, c. 55.

Promethei jugum & antrum, a place on the top of mount Caucaſus, in Albania.

Prometheus, a ſon of Iapetus by Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Atlas, Menœtius, and Epimetheus, and ſurpaſſed all mankind in cunning and fraud. He ridiculed the gods, and deceived Jupiter himſelf. He ſacrificed two bulls, and filled their ſkins, one with the fleſh and the other with the bones, and aſked the father of the gods, which of the two he preferred as an offering. Jupiter became the dupe of his artifice, and choſe the bones, and from that time the prieſts of the temples have ever been ordered to burn the whole victims on the altars, the fleſh and the bones altogether. To puniſh Prometheus and the reſt of mankind; Jupiter took fire away from the earth, but the ſon of Iapetus out-witted the father of the gods. He climbed the heavens by the aſſiſtance of Minerva, and ſtole fire from the chariot of the ſun, which he brought down upon the earth, at the end of a ferula. This provoked Jupiter the more; he ordered Vulcan to make a woman of clay, and after he had given her life, he ſent her to Prometheus, with a box of the richeſt and moſt valuable preſents which ſhe had received from the gods. [Vid. Pandora.] Prometheus who ſuſpected Jupiter, took no notice of Pandora or her box, but he made his brother Epimetheus marry her, and the god, now more irritated, ordered Mercury or Vulcan, according to Æſchylus, to carry this artful mortal to mount Caucaſus, and there tie him to a rock, where for 30,000 years, a vulture was to feed upon his liver, which was never diminiſhed, though continually devoured. He was delivered from this painful confinement about 30 years afterwards by Hercules, who killed the bird of prey. The vulture, or according to others, the eagle, which devoured the liver of Prometheus, was born from Typhon and Echidna. According to Apollodorus, Prometheus made the firſt man and woman that ever were upon the earth, with clay, which he animated by means of the fire which he had ſtolen from heaven. On this account, therefore, the Athenians raiſed him an altar in the grove of Academus, where they yearly celebrated games in his honor. During theſe games, there was a race, and he who carried a burning torch in his hand without extinguiſhing it, obtained the prize. Prometheus, as it is univerſally credited, had received the gift of prophecy, and all the gods, and even Jupiter himſelf conſulted him as a moſt infallible oracle. To him mankind are indebted for the invention of many of the uſeful arts; he taught them the uſe of plants with their phyſical power, and from him they received the knowledge of taming horſes and different animals, either to cultivate the ground, or for the purpoſes of luxury. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, & 2.—Pauſ. 1, c. 30, l. 5, c. 11.—Hygin. fab. 144.—Æſchyl. in Prom.—Virg. Ecl. 6, Ovid. Met. 1, v. 82.—Horat. 1, od. 3.—Seneca in Med.

Promethis, & Promethĭdes, a patronymic applied to the children of Prometheus as to Deucalion, &c. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 390.

Promethus & Damasichthon, two ſons of Codrus, who conducted colonies into Aſia Minor. Pauſ. 1, c. 3.

Promŭlus, a Trojan killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 574.

Pronapĭdes, an ancient Greek poet of Athens, who was, according to ſome, preceptor to Homer. It is ſaid that he firſt taught the Greeks how to write from the left to the right, contrary to the cuſtom of writing from the right to the left, which is ſtill obſerved by ſome of the eaſtern nations.

Pronax, a brother of Adraſtus king of Argos, ſon of Talaus and Lyſimache. Pauſ. 3. c. 18.

Pronoe, a daughter of Phorbus, mother of Pleuron and Calydon, by Æolus.

Pronŏmus, a Theban who played ſo ſkilfully on the flute, that the invention of that muſical inſtrument is attributed to him. Pauſ. 9, c. 12.

Pronous, a ſon of Phlegeas, killed by the ſons of Alcmæon.

Pronŭba, a ſirname of Juno, becauſe ſhe preſided over marriages.

Propertius (Sextus Aurelius,) a Latin poet born at Mevania, in Umbria. His father was a Roman knight, whom Auguſtus proſcribed, becauſe he had followed the intereſt of Antony. He came to Rome, where his genius and poetical talents ſoon recommended him to the notice of the great and powerful. Mecænas, Gallus, and Virgil became his friends, and Auguſtus his patron. Mecænas wiſhed him to attempt an

an epic poem, of which he proposed the emperor for hero; but Propertius refused, observing that his abilities were unequal to the task. He died about 19 years before Christ, in the 40th year of his age. His works consist of four books of elegies, which are written with so much spirit, vivacity and energy, that many authors call him the prince of the elegiac poets among the Latins. His poetry, though elegant, is not free from faults, and the many lascivious expressions which he uses, deservedly expose him to censure. Cynthia, who is the heroine of all his elegies, was a Roman lady, whose real name was Hostia, or Hostilia, of whom the poet was deeply enamoured. The best edition is that of Santenius, 4to. Traj. ad Rh. 1780, and when published together with Catullus, and Tibullus, those of Grævius, 8vo. Utr. 1680, of Vulpius, 4 vols. Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755, and the edition of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1754. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 465, l. 4, el. 10, v. 53, de art. am. 3, v. 333.—Martial. 8, ep. 73, l. 14, ep. 189.—Quintil. 10, c. 1. Plin. 6, ep. l. 9, ep. 22.

Propœtides, some women of Cyprus, severely punished by Venus, whose divinity they had despised. They sent their daughters to the sea shore, where they prostituted themselves to strangers. The poets have feigned, that they were changed into stones, on account of their insensibility to every virtuous sentiment. Justin. 18, c. 5. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 238.

Propontis, a sea which has a communication with the Euxine, by the Thracian Bosphorus, and with the Ægean by the Hellespont, now called the sea of Marmora. It is about 300 miles in circumference, and received its name from its vicinity to Pontus. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2.

Propylea, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Eleusis in Attica.

Proschystius, a surname of Neptune, among the Greeks. Paus. 2.

Proserpina, a daughter of Ceres by Jupiter, called by the Greeks Persephone. She was so beautiful, that the father of the gods himself became enamoured of her, and deceived her by changing himself into a serpent, and folding her in his wreaths. Proserpine made Sicily the place of her residence, and delighted herself with the beautiful views, the flowery meadows, and limpid streams, which surrounded the plains of Enna. In this solitary retreat, as she amused herself with her female attendants in gathering flowers, Pluto carried her away into the infernal regions, of which she became the queen. [Vid. Pluto.] Ceres was so disconsolate at the loss of her daughter, that she travelled all over the world, but her inquiries were in vain, and she never would have discovered whither she had been carried, had not she found the girdle of Proserpine on the surface of the waters of the fountain Cyane, near which the ravisher had opened himself a passage to his kingdom by striking the earth with his trident. Ceres soon learned from the nymph Arethusa that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto, and immediately she repaired to Jupiter, and demanded of him to punish the ravisher. Jupiter in vain attempted to persuade the mother, that Pluto was not unworthy of her daughter, and when he saw that she was inflexible for the restitution of Proserpine, he said that she might return on earth, if she had not taken any aliments in the infernal regions. Her return, however, was impossible, Proserpine, as she walked in the Elysian fields, had gathered a pomegranate from a tree and eaten it, and Ascalaphus was the only one who saw it, and for his discovery the goddess instantly turned him into an owl. Jupiter, to appease the resentment of Ceres, and sooth her grief, permitted that Proserpine should remain six months with Pluto in the infernal regions, and that she should spend the rest of the year with her mother on earth. As queen of hell, and wife of Pluto, Proserpine presided over the death of mankind, and, according to the opinion of the ancients, no one could die, if the goddess herself, or Atropos her minister, did not cut off one of the hairs from the head. From this superstitious belief, it was usual to cut off some of the hair of the deceased, and to strew it at the door of the house, as an offering for Proserpine. The Sicilians were very particular in their worship to Proserpine, and as they believed that the fountain Cyane had risen from the earth at the very place were Pluto had opened himself a passage, they annually sacrificed there a bull, of which they suffered the blood to run into the waters. Proserpine was universally worshipped by the ancients, and she was known by the different names of Core, Theogamia, Libitina, Hecate, Juno inferna, Antheſphoria, Cotyto, Deois, Libera, &c. Plut. in Luc.—Paus. 8, c. 37, l. 9, c. 31.—*Ovid. Prosopitis, an island in one of the mouths of the Nile. Herodot. 2, c. 4.

Prosper, one of the fathers who died A. D. 466. His works have been edited by Mangeant, fol. Paris, 1711.

Proxyma, a part of Argolis, where Juno was worshipped. It received its name from a nymph who nursed Juno. Paus. 2.

Protagoras, a Greek philosopher of Abdera in Thrace, who was originally a porter. He became one of the disciples of Democritus, Democritus, when that philoſopher had ſeen him carrying faggots on his head, poiſed in a proper equilibrium. He ſoon rendered himſelf ridiculous by his doctrines, and in a book which he publiſhed, he denied the exiſtence of a ſupreme being. This doctrine he ſupported by obſerving, that his doubts aroſe from the uncertainty of the exiſtence of a ſupreme power, and from the ſhortneſs of human life. This book was publicly burnt at Athens, and the philoſopher baniſhed from the city, as a worthleſs and contemptible being. Protagoras viſited, from Athens, different iſlands in the Mediterranean, and died in Sicily in a very advanced age, about 400 years before the Chriſtian era. He generally reaſoned by dilemmas, and always left the mind in ſuſpence about all the queſtions which he propoſed. Some ſuppoſe that he was drowned. Diog. 9.—Plut. in Protag.——A king of Cyprus, tributary to the court of Perſia.——Another.

PROTAGORIDES, an hiſtorian of Cyzicus, who wrote a treatiſe on the games of Daphne, celebrated at Antioch.

PROTEI COLUMNÆ, a place in the remoteſt parts of Egypt. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 262.

PROTESILAUS, a king of part of Theſſaly, ſon of Iphiclus, originally called Iolaus, grandſon of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimede, the mother of Jaſon. He married Laodamia, the daughter of Acaſtus, and ſometime after he departed with the reſt of the Greeks for the Trojan war with 40 ſail. He was the firſt of the Greeks who ſet foot on the Trojan ſhore, and as ſuch he was doomed by the oracle to periſh, therefore he was killed as ſoon as he had leaped from his ſhip, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the perſon who killed him. His wife Laodamia deſtroyed herſelf, when ſhe heard of his death. [Vid. Laodamia.] Proteſilaus has received the patronymic of Phylacides, either becauſe he was deſcended from Phylacus, or becauſe he was a native of Phylace. He was buried on the Trojan ſhore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which as ſoon as they could be diſcovered and ſeen from Troy, immediately withered and decayed, and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and ſuffered the ſame viciſſitude. Homer. Il. 2.—Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 1. Heroid. 13.—Propert. 1, el. 19.—Hygin. fab. 103, &c.

PROTEUS, a ſea deity, ſon of Oceanus and Tethys, or according to ſome of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune, and from his knowledge of futurity, mankind received the greateſt ſervices. He generally reſided in the Carpathian ſea, and, like the reſt of the gods, he repoſed himſelf on the ſea ſhore, where ſuch as wiſhed to conſult him generally reſorted. He was difficult of acceſs, and when conſulted he refuſed to give anſwers, by immediately aſſuming different ſhapes and eluding the graſp, if not properly ſecured in fetters. Ariſtæus was in the number of thoſe who conſulted him, as alſo Hercules. Some ſuppoſe that he was originally a king of Egypt, known among his ſubjects by the name of Cetes, and they aſſert that he had two ſons, Telegonus and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had alſo ſome daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. Homer. Od. 4, v. 360.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 10. Am. el. 12, v. 36.—Heſiod. Theog.—Virg. G. 4, v. 387.—Hygin. fab. 118.—Herodot. 2, c. 112.—Diod. 1.

PROTHENOR, a Bœotian who went to the Trojan war.

PROTHERUS, a Greek at the Trojan war.——A Spartan who endeavoured to prevent a war with the Thebans.

PROTHOUS, a ſon of Lycaon.—A ſon of Agrius.

PROTO, one of the Nereides.

PROTOGENIA, a daughter of Calydon, by Æolia the daughter of Amythaon. She had a ſon called Oxillus by Mars. Apollod. 1.

PROTOGENES, a painter of Rhodes, who floriſhed about 328 years before Chriſt. He was originally ſo poor that he painted ſhips to maintain himſelf. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes, and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians, they became ſenſible of the merit of their countryman and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for ſeven years in finiſhing a picture of Jaſyſus, a celebrated huntſman, ſuppoſed to have been the ſon of Apollo and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived only upon lupines and water, thinking that ſuch aliments would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not ſeem to make him more ſucceſsful in the perfection of his picture. He was to repreſent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with ſatisfaction to himſelf; and when all his labors ſeemed to be without ſucceſs, he threw his ſponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the labors of art could not do, the fall of the ſponge upon the picture repreſented the froth at the mouth of the dog in the moſt perfect and natural manner, and the piece was univerſally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his repreſentations, and copied nature with the greateſt nicety, and this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius beſieged ſieged Rhodes, he refuſed to ſet fire to a part of the city which might have made him maſter of the whole, becauſe he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found cloſely employed in a garden in finiſhing a picture; and when the conqueror aſked him, why he ſhowed not more concern at the general calamity? he replied, that Demetrius made war againſt the Rhodians, and not againſt the fine arts. Pauſ. 1, c. 3.—Plin. 35, c. 10.—Ælian. V. H. 12.—Juv. 3, v. 120.—Plut. in Dem.——One of Caligula's favorites, famous for his cruelty and extravagance.

PROTOGENIA, a daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom ſhe had Æthlius, the father of Endymion. Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Pauſ. 5, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 155.

PROTOMEDUSA, one of the Nereides, called Protomelia by Heſiod.

PROXENUS, a Bœotian of great authority at Thebes, in the age of Xenophon. Polyæn.——A writer who publiſhed hiſtorical accounts of Sparta.

PRUDENTIUS Aurelius Clemens, a poet who floriſhed A. D. 392, and was ſucceſſively a ſoldier, an advocate, and a judge. His poems are numerous and all theological, devoid of the elegance and purity of the Auguſtan age, and yet greatly valued. The beſt editions are the Delphin, 4to. Paris 1687, that of Cellarius, 12mo. Halæ 1703, and that of Parma, 2 vols. 4to. 1788.

PRUMNIDES, a king of Corinth.

PRUSA, a town of Bithynia, built by king Pruſias, from whom it received its name.

PRUSÆUS, Dion, floriſhed A. D. 105.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, who floriſhed 221 B. C.——Another ſirnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus, king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war againſt Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Pruſias, complained before the Romans of the hoſtilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was ſent from Rome to ſettle the diſputes of the two monarchs, and he was no ſooner arrived in Bithynia, than Pruſias, to gain his favor, prepared to deliver to him, at his requeſt, the celebrated Carthaginian, to whom he was indebted for all the advantages he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. Pruſias was obliged by the Roman ambaſſador to make a reſtitution of the provinces he had conquered, and by his meanneſs he continued to enjoy the favors of the Romans. When ſome time after he viſited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted ſlave, calling himſelf the freedman of the Romans, and when he was introduced into the ſenate-houſe, he ſaluted the ſenators by the name of viſible deities, of ſaviors and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his ſubjects, and when he returned home the Bithynians revolted, and placed his ſon Nicomedes on the throne. The baniſhed monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was aſſaſſinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Chriſt. Some ſay that his ſon became his murderer. Pruſias, according to Polybius, was the meaneſt of monarchs, without honeſty, without morals, virtue, or principle; he was cruel and cowardly, intemperate and voluptuous, and an enemy to all learning. He was naturally deformed, and he often appeared in public in the habit of a woman to render his deformities more viſible. Polyb.—Liv.—Juſtin 31, &c.—C. Nep. in Annib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

PRYMNO one of the Oceanides.

PRYTANES, certain magiſtrates at Athens who preſided over the ſenate, and had the privilege of aſſembling it when they pleaſed, feſtivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered ſacrifices, and feaſted together with all thoſe who had rendered ſignal ſervice to their country. The Prytanes were elected from the ſenators which were in number 500, 50 of which were choſen from each tribe. When they were elected, the names of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one veſſel, and into another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whoſe name was drawn with the white bean, preſided the firſt, and the reſt in the order in which they were drawn. They preſided each for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe preſided the reſt of thoſe days which were ſupernumerary. When the number of tribes was increaſed to 12, each of the Prytanes preſided one full month.—Some of the principal magiſtrates of Corinth were alſo called Prytanes.

PRYTANIS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. Pauſ. 2, c. 36.—One of the friends of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

PSAMATHE, one of the Nereides, mother of Phocus by Æacus, king of Ægina. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 398.—A daughter of Crotopus, king of Argos. She became mother of Linus by Apollo, and, to conceal her ſhame from her father, ſhe expoſed her child, which was found by dogs and torn to pieces. Pauſ. 1, c. 43.——A town of Thebes. Flacc. 1, v. 364.

PSAMATHOS, a town and port of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 25.

PROTAGORĪDES, an hiſtorian of Cyzicus, who wrote a treatiſe on the games of Daphne, celebrated at Antioch.

PROTEI COLUMNÆ, a place in the remoteſt parts of Egypt. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 262.

PRŌTĔSĪLĀUS, a king of part of Theſſaly, ſon of Iphiclus, originally called Iolaus, grandſon of Phylacus, and brother to Alcimede, the mother of Jaſon. He married Laodamia, the daughter of Acaſtus, and ſometime after he departed with the reſt of the Greeks for the Trojan war with 40 ſail. He was the firſt of the Greeks who ſet foot on the Trojan ſhore, and as ſuch he was doomed by the oracle to periſh, therefore he was killed as ſoon as he had leaped from his ſhip, by Æneas or Hector. Homer has not mentioned the perſon who killed him. His wife Laodamia deſtroyed herſelf, when ſhe heard of his death. [Vid. Laodamia.] Proteſilaus has received the patronymic of Phylacides, either becauſe he was deſcended from Phylacus, or becauſe he was a native of Phylace. He was buried on the Trojan ſhore, and, according to Pliny, there were near his tomb certain trees which grew to an extraordinary height, which as ſoon as they could be diſcovered and ſeen from Troy, immediately withered and decayed, and afterwards grew up again to their former height, and ſuffered the ſame viciſſitude. *Homer. PROTEUS, a ſea deity, ſon of Oceanus and Tethys, or according to ſome of Neptune and Phœnice. He had received the gift of prophecy from Neptune, and from his knowledge of futurity, mankind received the greateſt ſervices. He generally reſided in the Carpathian ſea, and, like the reſt of the gods, he repoſed himſelf on the ſea ſhore, where ſuch as wiſhed to conſult him generally reſorted. He was difficult of acceſs, and when conſulted he refuſed to give answers, by immediately aſſuming different ſhapes and eluding the graſp, if not properly ſecured in fetters. Ariſtæus was in the number of thoſe who conſulted him, as alſo Hercules. Some ſuppoſe that he was originally a king of Egypt, known among his ſubjects by the name of Cetes, and they aſſert that he had two ſons, Telegonus and Polygonus, who were both killed by Hercules. He had alſo ſome daughters, among whom were Cabira, Eidothea, and Rhetia. Homer. Od. 4, v. 360.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 10. Am. el. 12, v. 36.—Heſiod. Theog.—*Virg. PROTHĔNOR, a Bœotian who went to the Trojan war.

PROTHRUS, a Greek at the Trojan war.——A Spartan who endeavoured to prevent a war with the Thebans.

PROTHOUS, a ſon of Lycaon.—A ſon of Agrius.

PROTO, one of the Nereides.

PROTOGĔNĒA, a daughter of Calydon, by Æolia the daughter of Amythaon. She had a ſon called Oxillus by Mars. Apollod. 1.

PROTOGĔNES, a painter of Rhodes, who floriſhed about 328 years before Chriſt. He was originally ſo poor that he painted ſhips to maintain himſelf. His countrymen were ignorant of his ingenuity before Apelles came to Rhodes, and offered to buy all his pieces. This opened the eyes of the Rhodians, they became ſenſible of the merit of their countryman and liberally rewarded him. Protogenes was employed for ſeven years in finiſhing a picture of Jaſyſus, a celebrated huntſman, ſuppoſed to have been the ſon of Apollo and the founder of Rhodes. During all this time the painter lived only upon lupines and water, thinking that ſuch aliments would leave him greater flights of fancy; but all this did not ſeem to make him more ſucceſsful in the perfection of his picture. He was to repreſent in the piece a dog panting, and with froth at his mouth, but this he never could do with ſatisfaction to himſelf; and when all his labors ſeemed to be without ſucceſs, he threw his ſponge upon the piece in a fit of anger. Chance alone brought to perfection what the labors of art could not do, the fall of the ſponge upon the picture repreſented the froth at the mouth of the dog in the moſt perfect and natural manner, and the piece was univerſally admired. Protogenes was very exact in his repreſentations, and copied nature with the greateſt nicety, and this was blamed as a fault by his friend Apelles. When Demetrius beſieged ged Rhodes, he refused to set fire to a part of the city which might have made him master of the whole, because he knew that Protogenes was then working in that quarter. When the town was taken, the painter was found closely employed in a garden in finishing a picture; and when the conqueror asked him, why he showed not more concern at the general calamity? he replied, that Demetrius made war against the Rhodians, and not against the fine arts. Paus. 1, c. 3.—Plin. 35, c. 10.—*Ælian. PROTOMEDUSA, one of the Nereides, called Protomelia by Hesiod.

PROXENUS, a Bœotian of great authority at Thebes, in the age of Xenophon. Polyæn.——A writer who published historical accounts of Sparta.

PRUDENTIUS Aurelius Clemens, a poet who flourished A. D. 392, and was successively a soldier, an advocate, and a judge. His poems are numerous and all theological, devoid of the elegance and purity of the Augustan age, and yet greatly valued. The best editions are the Delphin, 4to. Paris 1687, that of Cellarius, 12mo. Halæ 1703, and that of Parma, 2 vols. 4to. 1788.

PRUMNIDES, a king of Corinth.

PRUSA, a town of Bithynia, built by king Prusias, from whom it received its name.

PRUSÆUS, Dion, flourished A. D. 105.

PRUSIAS, a king of Bithynia, who flourished 221 B. C.——Another surnamed Venator, who made an alliance with the Romans when they waged war with Antiochus, king of Syria. He gave a kind reception to Annibal, and by his advice he made war against Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and defeated him. Eumenes, who was an ally of Rome as well as Prusias, complained before the Romans of the hostilities of the king of Bithynia. Q. Flaminius was sent from Rome to settle the disputes of the two monarchs, and he was no sooner arrived in Bithynia, than Prusias, to gain his favor, prepared to deliver to him, at his request, the celebrated Carthaginian, to whom he was indebted for all the advantages he had obtained over Eumenes; but Annibal prevented it by a voluntary death. Prusias was obliged by the Roman ambassador to make a restitution of the provinces he had conquered, and by his meanness he continued to enjoy the favors of the Romans. When some time after he visited the capital of Italy, he appeared in the habit of a manumitted slave, calling himself the freedman of the Romans, and when he was introduced into the senate-house, he saluted the senators by the name of visible deities, of saviors and deliverers. Such abject behaviour rendered him contemptible not only in the eyes of the Romans, but of his subjects, and when he returned home the Bithynians revolted, and placed his son Nicomedes on the throne. The banished monarch fled to Nicomedia, where he was assassinated near the altar of Jupiter, about 149 years before Christ. Some say that his son became his murderer. Prusias, according to Polybius, was the meanest of monarchs, without honesty, without morals, virtue, or principle; he was cruel and cowardly, intemperate and voluptuous, and an enemy to all learning. He was naturally deformed, and he often appeared in public in the habit of a woman to render his deformities more visible. Polyb.—Liv.—Justin 31, &c.—C. Nep. in Annib.—Plut. in Flam. &c.

PRYMNO one of the Oceanides.

PRYTANES, certain magistrates at Athens who presided over the senate, and had the privilege of assembling it when they pleased festivals excepted. They generally met in a large hall, called prytaneum, where they gave audiences, offered sacrifices, and feasted together with all those who had rendered signal service to their country. The Prytanes were elected from the senators which were in number 500, 50 of which were chosen from each tribe. When they were elected, the names of the 10 tribes of Athens were thrown into one vessel, and into another were placed nine black beans and a white one. The tribe whose name was drawn with the white bean, presided the first, and the rest in the order in which they were drawn. They presided each for 35 days, as the year was divided into 10 parts; but it is unknown what tribe presided the rest of those days which were supernumerary. When the number of tribes was increased to 12, each of the Prytanes presided one full month.—Some of the principal magistrates of Corinth were also called Prytanes.

PRYTANIS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. Paus. 2, c. 36.—One of the friends of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 767.

PSAMATHE, one of the Nereides, mother of Phocus by Æacus, king of Ægina. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 398.—A daughter of Crotopus, king of Argos. She became mother of Linus by Apollo, and, to conceal her shame from her father, she exposed her child, which was found by dogs and torn to pieces. Paus. 1, c. 43.——A town of Thebes. Flacc. 1, v. 364.

PSAMATHOS, a town and port of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 25.

PSAMMENITUS succeeded his father Amasis on the throne of Egypt. Cambyses made war against him, and as he knew that the Egyptians paid the greatest veneration to cats, the Persian monarch placed some of these animals at the head of his army, and the enemy unable to defend themselves, and unwilling to kill those objects of adoration, were easily conquered. Psammenitus was twice beaten at Pelusium and in Memphis, and became one of the prisoners of Cambyses, who treated him with great humanity. Psammenitus however raised seditions against the Persian monarch, and attempted to make the Egyptians rebel, for which he was put to death by drinking bull's blood. He had reigned about six months. He flourished about 525 years before the Christian era. Herodot. 3, c. 10, &c.

PSAMMETICHUS, a king of Egypt. He was one of the 12 princes who shared the kingdom among themselves; but as he was more popular than the rest, he was banished from his dominions, and retired into the marshes near the sea shore. A descent of some of the Greeks upon Egypt proved favorable to his cause; he joined the enemies, and defeated the 11 princes who had expelled him from the country. He rewarded the Greeks, by whose valor he had recovered Egypt, he allotted them some territory on the sea coast, patronized the liberal arts, and encouraged commerce among his subjects. He made useless enquiries to find the sources of the Nile, and he stopped, by bribes and money, a large army of Scythians that were marching against him. He died 617 years before the Christian era, and was buried in Minerva's temple at Sais. During his reign there was a contention among some of the neighbouring nations about the antiquity of their language. Psammetichus took a part in the contest. He confined two young children, and fed them with milk; the shepherd to whose care they were entrusted, was ordered never to speak to them, but to watch diligently their articulations. After some time the shepherd observed that whenever he entered the place of their confinement they repeatedly exclaimed Beccos, and he gave information of this to the monarch. Psammetichus made enquiries, and found that the word Beccos signified bread in the Phœnician language, and from that circumstance, therefore, it was universally concluded that the language of Phœnicia was of the greatest antiquity. Herodot. 2, c. 28, &c.—Polyæn. 8.—Strab. 16.——A son of Gordius, brother to Periander, who held the tyranny at Corinth for three years, B. PSAMMIS or Psammuthis, a king of Egypt, B. C. 376.

PSAPHIS, a town on the confines of Attica and Bœotia. There was there an oracle of Amphiaraus.

PSAPHO, a Libyan who taught a number of birds which he kept to say, Psapho is a god, and afterwards gave them their liberty. The birds did not forget the words which they had been taught, and the Africans paid divine honors to Psapho. Elian.

PSECAS, one of Diana's attendant nymphs. Ovid. Met. 3.

PSOPHIS, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 24.—Ovid Met. 5, v. 607.——A river and town of Elis.——A daughter of Eryx.—A town of Acarnania.—Another of Libya.

PSYCHE, a nymph whom Cupid married and carried into a place of bliss, where he long enjoyed her company. Venus put her to death because she had robbed the world of her son; but Jupiter, at the request of Cupid, granted immortality to Psyche. The word signifies the soul, and this personification of Psyche is posterior to the Augustan age, though still it is connected with ancient mythology. Psyche is generally represented with the wings of a butterfly, to intimate the lightness of the soul, of which the butterfly is the symbol, and on that account, among the ancients, when a man had just expired, a butterfly appeared fluttering above, as if rising from the mouth of the deceased.

PSYCHRUS, a river of Thrace. When sheep drank of its waters they were said always to bring forth black lambs. Aristot.

PSYLLI, a people of Libya near the Syrtes, very expert in curing the venomous bite of serpents. Herodot. 4, c. 173.—Paus. 9, c. 28.

PTELEUM, a town of Thessaly on the borders of Bœotia. Lucan. 6, v. 852.

PTERELAUS, a son of Taphius, presented with immortality by Neptune, provided he kept on his head a yellow lock. His daughter cut it off, and he died. He reigned at Taphos in Argos, &c.

PTERIA, a well fortified town of Cappadocia. It was in the neighbourhood, according to some, that Crœsus was defeated by Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 76.

PTOLEDERMA, a town of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 27.

PTOLEMÆUM, a certain place at Athens dedicated to exercise and study. Cic. 5. de fin.

PTOLEMÆUS 1st, surnamed Lagus, a king of Egypt, son of Arsinoe, who, when pregnant by Philip of Macedonia, married Lagus, a man of mean extraction. [Vid. Lagus.] Ptolemy was educated in the court of the king of Macedonia, he became one of the friends and associates of Alexander, and when that monarch invaded Asia, the son of Arsinoe attended him as one of his generals. During the expedition, he behaved with uncommon valor; he killed one of the the Indian monarchs in single combat, and it was to his prudence and courage that Alexander was indebted for the reduction of the rock Aornus. After the conqueror's death, in the general division of the Macedonian empire, Ptolemy obtained as his share the government of Egypt, with Libya, and part of the neighbouring territories of Arabia. In this appointment the governor soon gained the esteem of the people by acts of kindness, by benevolence and clemency, and though he did not assume the title of independent monarch, till 19 years after, yet he was so firmly established, that the attempts of Perdiccas to drive him away from his possessions proved abortive, and Ptolemy, after the murder of his rival by Grecian soldiers, might have added the kingdom of Macedonia to his Egyptian territories. He made himself master of Cœlesyria, Phœnicia, and the neighbouring coast of Syria, and when he had reduced Jerusalem, he carried above 100,000 prisoners to Egypt to people the extensive city of Alexandria, which became the capital of his dominions. After he had rendered these prisoners the most attached and faithful of his subjects by his liberality and the grant of privileges, Ptolemy assumed the title of king of Egypt, and soon after reduced Cyprus under his power. He made war with success against Demetrius and Antigonus, who disputed his right to the provinces of Syria; and from the assistance he gave to the people of Rhodes against their common enemies, he received the name of Soter. While he extended his dominions, Ptolemy was not negligent of the advantages of his people. The bay of Alexandria being dangerous of access, he built a tower to conduct the sailors in the obscurity of the night, [Vid. Pharos.] and that his subjects might be acquainted with literature he laid the foundation of a library, which, under the succeeding reigns, became the most celebrated in the world. He also established in the capital of his dominions a society called museum, of which the members maintained at the public expence were employed in philosophical researches, and in the advancement of science and the liberal arts. Ptolemy died in the 84th year of his age, after a reign of 39 years, about 284 years before Christ. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had been his partner on the throne the last ten years of his reign. Ptolemy Lagus has been commended for his abilities, not only as a sovereign, but as a writer; and among the many valuable compositions which have been lost, we are to lament an history of Alexander the Great, by the king of Egypt, greatly admired and valued for elegance and authenticity. All his successors were called Ptolemies from him. Paus. 10, c. 7.—Justin. 13, &c.—Polyb. 5.—Arrian.—Curt.—Plut. in Alex.—The 2d. son of Ptolemy the first, succeeded his father on the Egyptian throne and was called Philadelphus by antiphrasis because he killed two of his brothers. He shewed himself worthy, in every respect to succeed his great father, and conscious of the advantages which arise from an alliance with powerful nations, he sent ambassadors to Italy to solicit the friendship of the Romans, whose name and military reputation had become universally known for the victories which they had just obtained over Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. His ambassadors were received with marks of the greatest attention, and immediately after four Roman senators came to Alexandria, where they gained the admiration of the monarch and of his subjects, and by refusing the crowns of gold and rich presents which were offered to them, convinced the world of the virtue and of the disinterestedness of their nation. But while Ptolemy strengthened himself by alliances with foreign powers, the internal peace of his kingdom was disturbed by the revolt of Magas his brother, king of Cyrene. The sedition however was stopped, though kindled by Antiochus king of Syria, and the death of the rebellious prince re-established peace for some time in the family of Philadelphus. Antiochus the Syrian king married Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy, and the father, though old and infirm, conducted his daughter to her husband's kingdom, and assisted at the nuptials. Philadelphus died in the 64th year of his age, 246 years before the christian era. He left two sons and a daughter, by Arsinoe the daughter of Lysimachus. He had afterwards married his sister Arsinoe whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, and to whose memory he began to erect a celebrated monument. [Vid. Dinocrates.] During the whole of his reign Philadelphus was employed in exciting industry, and in encouraging the liberal arts, and useful knowledge among his subjects. The inhabitants of the adjacent countries were allured by promises and presents to encrease the number of the Egyptian subjects, and Ptolemy could boast of reigning over 33,339 well peopled cities. He gave every possible encouragement to commerce, and by keeping two powerful fleets, one in the Mediterranean, and the other in the Red sea, he made Egypt the mart of the world. His army consisted of 200,000 foot, 40,000 horse besides 300 elephants and 2000 armed chariots. With justice therefore he has been called the richest of all the princes and monarchs of his age, and indeed the remark is not false when it is observed, that at his death he left in his treasury 740,000 Egyptian talents, a sum equivalent to two hundred dred millions sterling. His palace was the asylum of learned men, whom he admired and patronized. He paid particular attention to Euclid, Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron, and by encreasing the library, which his father had founded, he shewed his taste for learning, and his wish to encourage genius. This celebrated library at his death contained 200,000 volumes of the best and choicest books, and it was afterwards encreased to 700,000 volumes. Part of it was burnt by the flames of Cæsar's fleet when he set it on fire to save himself, a circumstance however not mentioned by the general, and the whole was again magnificently repaired by Cleopatra, who added to the Egyptian library that of the kings of Pergamus. It is said that the old testament was translated into Greek during his reign, a translation which has been called Septuagint, because translated by the labors of 70 different persons. Eutrop.—Justin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut.—Theocrit.—Athen. 12. Plin. 13, c. 12. Dio. 42. Gellius. 6, c. 17.—The 3d, succeeded his father Philadelphus on the Egyptian throne. He early engaged in a war against Antiochus Theus, for his unkindness to Berenice the Egyptian king's sister, whom he had married with the consent of Philadelphus. With the most rapid success he conquered Syria and Cilicia, and advanced as far as the Tigris, but a sedition at home stopped his progress, and he returned to Egypt loaded with the spoils of conquered nations. Among the immense riches which he brought he had above 2500 statues of the Egyptian gods, which Cambyses had carried away into Persia when he conquered Egypt. These were restored to the temples, and the Egyptians called their sovereign Evergetes, in acknowledgment for his attention, beneficence, and religious zeal for the gods of his country. The last years of Ptolemy's reign were passed in peace, if we except the refusal of the Jews to pay the tribute of 20 silver talents which their ancestors had always paid to the Egyptian monarchs. He also interested himself in the affairs of Greece, and assisted Cleomenes the Spartan king against the leaders of the Achæan league; but he had the mortification to see his ally defeated, and even a fugitive in Egypt. Evergetes died 221 years before Christ, after a reign of 25 years, and, like his two illustrious predecessors, he was the patron of learning, and indeed he is the last of the Lagides who gained popularity among his subjects by clemency, moderation, and humanity, and who commanded respect even from his enemies, by valor, prudence, and reputation. It is said that he deposited 15 talents in the hands of the Athenians to be permitted to translate the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. Plut. in Cleom. &c.—Polyb. 2.—Justin. 29, &c. The 4th, succeeded his father Evergetes on the throne of Egypt and received the surname of Philopator by antiphrasis, because according to some historians, he destroyed his father by poison. He began his reign with acts of the greatest cruelty, and he successfully sacrificed to his avarice his own mother, his wife, his sister, and his brother. He received the name of Tiphon, from his extravagance and debauchery, and that of Gallus, because he appeared in the streets of Alexandria like one of the bacchanals, and with all the gestures of the priests of Cybele. In the midst of his pleasures Philopater was called to war against Antiochus king of Syria, and at the head of a powerful army he soon invaded his enemy's territories, and might have added the kingdom of Syria to Egypt, if he had made a prudent use of the victories which attended his arms. In his return he visited Jerusalem, but the Jews prevented him forcibly from entering their temple, for which insolence to his majesty the monarch determined to extirpate the whole nation. He ordered an immense number of Jews to be exposed in a plain, and trodden under the feet of elephants, but by a supernatural instinct the generous animals turned their fury not on those that had been devoted to death, but upon the Egyptian spectators. This circumstance terrified Philopater, and he behaved with more than common kindness to a nation which he had so lately devoted to destruction. In the latter part of his reign the Romans, whom a dangerous war with Carthage had weakened and rendered active, renewed, for political reasons the treaty of alliance which had been made with the Egyptian monarchs. Philopater at last, weakened and enervated by intemperance and continual debauchery, died in the 37th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years 204 years before the Christian era. His death was immediately followed by the murder of the companions of his voluptuousness and extravagance, and their carcases were dragged with the greatest ignominy through the streets of Alexandria. Polyb.—Justin. 30, &c.—Plut. in Cleom.——The 5th, succeeded his father Philopator as king of Egypt, though only in the 4th year of his age. During the years of his minority he was under the protection of Sosicius and of Aristomenes, by whose prudent administration Antiochus was dispossessed of the provinces of Cœlosyria and Palestine, which he had conquered by war. The Romans also renewed their alliance with him after their victories over Annibal, and the conclusion of the second Punic war. This flattering embassy induced Aristomenes to offer the care of the patronage of the young monarch to the Romans, but the regent was confirmed in his honorable office, and by making a treaty of alliance with the people of Achaia, he convinced the Egyptians that he was qualified to wield the ſceptre and to govern the nation. But now that Ptolemy had reached his 14th year, according to the laws and cuſtoms of Egypt, the years of his minority had expired. He received the ſirname of Epiphanes, or illuſtrious, and was crowned at Alexandria with the greateſt ſolemnity, and the faithful Ariſtomenes reſigned into his hands an empire which he had governed with honor to himſelf, and with credit to his ſovereign. Young Ptolemy was no ſooner delivered from the ſhackles of a ſuperior, than he betrayed the ſame vices which had characterized his father, the counſels of Ariſtomenes were deſpiſed, and the miniſter who for ten years had governed the kingdom with equity and moderation, was ſacrificed to the caprice of the ſovereign, who abhorred him for the ſalutary advice which his own vicious inclinations did not permit him to follow. His cruelties raiſed ſeditions among his ſubjects, but theſe were twice quelled by the prudence and the moderation of one Polycrates, the moſt faithful of his corrupt miniſters. In the midſt of his extravagance Epiphanes did not forget his alliance with the Romans; above all others he ſhewed himſelf eager to cultivate friendſhip with a nation from whom he could derive ſo many advantages, and during their war againſt Antiochus he offered to aſſiſt them with money againſt a monarch, whoſe daughter Cleopatra he had married, but whom he hated on account of the ſeditions he had raiſed in the very heart of Egypt. After a reign of 24 years, 180 years before Chriſt, Ptolemy was poiſoned by his miniſters, whom he had threatened to rob of their poſſeſſions to carry on a war againſt Seleucus king of Syria. Liv. 35, c. 13, &c.—Juſtin &c.——The 6th, ſucceeded his father Epiphanes on the Egyptian throne, and received the ſirname of Philometor, on account of his hatred againſt his mother Cleopatra. He was in the 6th year of his age when he aſcended the throne, and during his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother, and at her death by an eunuch who was one of his favorites. He made war againſt Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, to recover the provinces of Paleſtine and Cœloſyria, which were part of the Egyptian dominions, and after ſeveral ſucceſſes he fell into the hands of his enemy, who detained him in confinement. During the captivity of Philometor, the Egyptians raiſed to the throne his younger brother Ptolemy Evergetes, or Phyſcon, alſo ſon of Epiphanes, but he was no ſooner eſtabliſhed in his power than Antiochus turned his arms againſt Egypt, drove the uſurper, and reſtored Philometor to all his rights and privileges as king of Egypt. This artful behaviour of Antiochus, was ſoon comprehended by Philometor, and when he ſaw that Peluſium, the key of Egypt had remained in the hands of his Syrian ally, he recalled his brother Phyſcon, and made him partner on the throne, and concerted with him how to repel their common enemy. This union of intereſt in the two royal brothers incenſed Antiochus; he entered Egypt with a large army, but the Romans checked his progreſs, and obliged him to retire. No ſooner were they delivered from the impending war than Philometor and Phyſcon, whom the fear of danger had united, began with mutual jealouſy to oppoſe each other's views. Phyſcon was at laſt baniſhed by the ſuperior power of his brother, and as he could find no ſupport in Egypt, he immediately repaired to Rome. To excite more effectually the compaſſion of the Romans, and to gain their aſſiſtance, he appeared in the meaneſt dreſs, and took his reſidence in the moſt obſcure corner of the city. He received an audience from the ſenate, and the Romans ſettled the diſpute between the two royal brothers, by making them independent of one another, and giving the government of Lybya and Cyrene to Phyſcon, and confirming Philometor in the poſſeſſion of Egypt, and the iſland of Cyprus. Theſe terms of accommodation were gladly accepted, but Phyſcon ſoon claimed the dominion of Cyprus, and in this he was ſupported by the Romans, who wiſhed to aggrandize themſelves by the diminution of the Egyptian power. Philometor refuſed to deliver up the iſland of Cyprus, and to call away his brother's attention he fomented the ſeeds of rebellion in Cyrene. But the death of Philometor 145 years before the Chriſtian era, left Phyſcon maſter of Egypt, and all the dependent provinces. Philometor has been commended by ſome hiſtorians for his clemency and moderation. Diod.—Liv.—Polyb.——The 7th Ptolemy ſirnamed Phyſcon, on account of the prominence of his belly, aſcended the throne of Egypt after the death of his brother Philometor, and as he had reigned for ſome time conjointly with him, [Vid. Ptolemæus 6th] his ſucceſſion was approved, though the wife and the ſon of the deceaſed monarch laid claims to the crown. Cleopatra was ſupported in her claims by the Jews, and it was at laſt agreed that Phyſcon ſhould marry the queen, and that her ſon ſhould ſucceed on the throne at his death. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but on that very day the tyrant murdered Cleopatra's ſon in her arms. He ordered himſelf to be called Evergetes, but the Alexandrians refuſed to do it, and ſtigmatiſed him with the appellation of Kakergetes, or evil doer, a ſirname which he deſerved by his tyranny and oppreſſion. A ſeries of barbarity rendered him odious, but as no one attempted to fly from Egypt of her tyrant, the Alexandrians abandoned their habitations, and fled from a place which continually ſtreamed with the blood of their maſſacred fellow citizens. If their migration proved fatal to the commerce and proſperity of Alexandria, it was of the moſt eſſential ſervice to the countries where they retired; and the numbers of Egyptians that ſought a ſafer aſylum in Greece and Aſia, introduced among the inhabitants of thoſe countries the different profeſſions that were practiſed with ſucceſs in the capital of Egypt. Phyſcon endeavoured to re-people the city which his cruelty had laid deſolate, but the fear of ſharing the fate of its former inhabitants, prevailed more than the promiſe of riches, rights, and immunities. The king at laſt diſguſted with Cleopatra, repudiated her and married her daughter by Philometor, called alſo Cleopatra. He ſtill continued to exerciſe the greateſt cruelty upon his ſubjects, but the prudence and vigilance of his miniſters kept the people in tranquillity, till all Egypt revolted when the king had baſely murdered all the young men of Alexandria. Without friends or ſupport in Egypt, he fled to Cyprus, and Cleopatra, the divorced queen, aſcended the throne. In his baniſhment Phyſcon dreaded leſt the Alexandrians ſhould alſo place the crown on the head of his ſon, by his ſiſter Cleopatra, who was then governor of Cyrene, and under theſe apprehenſions he ſent for the young prince, called Memphitis, to Cyprus, and murdered him as ſoon as he reached the ſhore. To make the barbarity more complete, he ſent the limbs of Memphitis to Cleopatra, and they were received as the queen was going to celebrate her birth day. Soon after this he invaded Egypt with an army, and obtained a victory over the forces of Cleopatra, who being left without friends or aſſiſtance, fled to her eldeſt daughter Cleopatra, who had married Demetrius, king of Syria. This deciſive blow reſtored Phyſcon to his throne, where he continued to reign for ſome time hated by his ſubjects and feared by his enemies. He died at Alexandria in the 67th year of his age, after a reign of 29 years, about 116 years before Chriſt. Some authors have extolled Phyſcon for his fondneſs for literature, they have obſerved, that from his extenſive knowledge he was called the philologiſt, and that he wrote a comment upon Homer, beſides an hiſtory in 24 books, admired for its elegance, and often quoted by ſucceeding authors whoſe pen was employed on the ſame ſubject. Diod. —Juſtin. 38, &c.—Athen. 2.—Porphyr.—— The 8th, ſirnamed Lathyrus, from an excreſcence like a pea on the noſe, ſucceeded his father Phyſcon as king of Egypt. He had no ſooner aſcended the throne than his mother Cleopatra, who reigned conjointly with him, expelled him to Cyprus, and placed the crown on the head of his brother Ptolemy Alexander her favorite ſon. Lathyrus, baniſhed from Egypt, became king of Cyprus and ſoon after he appeared at the head of a large army, to make war againſt Alexander Jannæus, king of Judæa, through whoſe aſſiſtance and intrigue he had been expelled by Cleopatra. The Jewiſh monarch was conquered, and 50,000 of his men were left on the field of battle. Lathyrus, after he had exerciſed the greateſt cruelty upon the Jews, and made vain attempts to recover the kingdom of Egypt, retired to Cyprus till the death of his brother Alexander reſtored him to his native dominions. Some of the cities of Egypt refuſed to acknowledge him as their ſovereign, and Thebes, for its obſtinacy, was cloſely beſieged for three ſucceſſive years, and from a powerful and populous city it was reduced to ruins. In the latter part of his reign Lathyrus was called upon to aſſiſt the Romans with a navy for the conqueſt of Athens, but Lucullus, who had been ſent to obtain the wanted ſupply, though received with kingly honors, was diſmiſſed with evaſive and unſatisfactory anſwers, and the monarch refuſed to part with troops which he deemed neceſſary to preſerve the peace of his kingdom. Lathyrus died 81 years before the Chriſtian era, after a reign of 35 years ſince the death of his father Phyſcon, eleven of which he had paſſed with his mother Cleopatra on the Egyptian throne, eighteen in Cyprus, and ſeven after his mother's death. He was ſucceeded by his only daughter Cleopatra, whom Alexander the ſon of Ptolemy Alexander, by means of the dictator Sylla, ſoon after married and murdered. Joſeph. Hiſt.—Juſtin. 39.—Plut. in Luc.—Appian. in Mithrid.——The 9th, Vid. Alexander Ptolemy 1ſt, for the 10th Ptolemy Vid. Alexander Ptolemy 2d, for the 11th Vid. Alexander Ptolemy 3d.——The 12th, the illegitimate ſon of Lathyrus, aſcended the throne of Egypt at the death of Alexander 3d. He received the ſirname of Auletes, becauſe he played ſkilfully on the flute. His riſe ſhowed great marks of prudence and circumſpection, and as his predeceſſor by his will had left the kingdom of Egypt to the Romans, Auletes knew that he could not be firmly eſtabliſhed on his throne, without the approbation of the Roman ſenate. He was ſucceſsful in his applications, and Cæſar, who was then conſul, and in want of money, eſtabliſhed his ſucceſſion, and granted him the alliance of the Romans after he had received the enormous ſum of about a million and 162,500l. ſterling. But theſe meaſures rendered him unpopular at Rome, and when he had ſuffered the Romans quietly to take poſſeſſion of Cyprus the Egyptians revolted, and Auletes was obliged to fly from his kingdom and ſeek protection among the moſt powerful of his allies. His complaints were heard at Rome at firſt with indifference, and the murder of 100 noblemen of Alexandria, whom the Egyptians had ſent to juſtify their proceedings before the Roman ſenate, rendered him him unpopular and ſuſpected. Pompey, however, ſupported his cauſe, and the ſenators decreed to re-eſtabliſh Auletes on his throne, but as they proceeded but ſlowly in the execution of their plans, the monarch retired from Rome to Epheſus, where he lay concealed for ſome time in the temple of Diana. During his abſence from Alexandria, his daughter Berenice had made herſelf abſolute, and eſtabliſhed herſelf on the throne by a marriage with Archelaus, a prieſt of Bellona's temple at Comana, but ſhe was ſoon driven from Egypt when Gabinius, at the head of a Roman army, approached to replace Auletes on his throne. Auletes was no ſooner reſtored to power than he ſacrificed to his ambition his daughter Berenice, and behaved with the greateſt ingratitude and perfidy to Rabirius a Roman who had ſupplied him with money when expelled from his kingdom. Auletes died four years after his reſtoration, about 51 years before the Chriſtian era. He left two ſons and two daughters, and by his will ordered the eldeſt of his ſons to marry the eldeſt of his ſiſters, and to aſcend with her the vacant throne. As theſe children were young the dying monarch recommended them to the protection and paternal care of the Romans, and accordingly Pompey the Great was appointed by the ſenate to be their patron and their guardian. Their reign was as turbulent as that of their predeceſſors, and it is remarkable for no uncommon events, only we may obſerve that the young queen was the Cleopatra who ſoon after became ſo celebrated as being the miſtreſs of J. Cæſar, the wife of M. Antony, and the laſt of the Egyptian monarchs of the family of Lagus. Cic. pro Rabir.—Strab. 17.—Dion. 39.—Appien. de Cv.——The 13th, ſirnamed Dionyſius or Bacchus, aſcended the throne of Egypt conjointly with his ſiſter Cleopatra, whom he had married, according to the directions of his father Auletes. He was under the care and protection of Pompey the Great, [Vid. Ptolemæus 12th.] but the wickedneſs and avarice of his miniſters ſoon obliged him to drive away his ſiſter from the throne, and to reign independent. He was then in the 13th year of his age when his guardian, after the fatal battle of Pharſalia, came to the ſhores of Egypt, and claimed his protection. He refuſed to grant the required aſſiſtance, and by the advice of his miniſters he baſely murdered Pompey after he had brought him to ſhore under the maſk of friendſhip and cordiality. To curry the favor of the conqueror of Pharſalia, Ptolemy cut off the head of Pompey, but Cæſar turned with indignation from ſuch perfidy, and when he arrived at Alexandria he found the king of Egypt as faithleſs to his cauſe as to that of his fallen enemy. Cæſar ſat as judge to hear the various claims of the brother and ſiſter to the throne; and to ſatisfy the people, he ordered the will of Auletes to be read, and confirmed Ptolemy and Cleopatra in the poſſeſſion of Egypt, and appointed the two younger children maſters of the iſland of Cyprus. This fair and candid deciſion might have left no room for diſſatisfaction, but Ptolemy was governed by cruel and avaricious miniſters, and therefore he refuſed to acknowledge Cæſar as a judge or a mediator. The Roman enforced his authority by arms, and three victories were obtained over the Egyptian forces. Ptolemy, who had been for ſome time a priſoner in the hands of Cæſar, now headed his armies, but a defeat was fatal, and as he attempted to ſave his life by flight, he was drowned in the Nile, about 46 years before Chriſt, and three years and eight months after the death of Auletes. Cleopatra, at the death of her brother, became ſole miſtreſs of Egypt, but as the Egyptians were no friends to female government, Cæſar obliged her to marry her younger brother Ptolemy who was then in the eleventh year of his age. Appian. Civ.—Cæſar in Alex.—Strab. 17.—Joſeph Ant.—Dio.—Plut. in Art. &c.—Sueton. in Cæſ.——Apion king of Cyrene, was the illegitimate ſon of Ptolemy Phyſcon. After a reign of 20 years he died; and as he had no children he made the Romans heirs of his dominions. The Romans preſented his ſubjects with their independence. Liv. 70.——Ceraunus, a ſon of Ptolemy Soter by Eurydice the daughter of Antipater. Unable to ſucceed to the throne of Egypt, Ceraunus fled to the court of Seleucus, where he was received with uncommon attention. Seleucus was then king of Macedonia, an empire which he had lately acquired by the death of Lyſimachus in a battle in Phrygia, but his reign was ſhort, and Ceraunus perfidiouſly murdered him and aſcended his throne 280, B. C. The murderer, however, could not be firmly eſtabliſhed in Macedonia, as long as Arſinoe the widow, and the children of Lyſimachus were alive, and entitled to claim his kingdom as the lawful poſſeſſion of their father. To remove theſe obſtacles Ceraunus made offers of marriage to Arſinoe who was his own ſiſter. The queen at firſt refuſed, but the proteſtations and ſolemn promiſes of the uſurper at laſt prevailed upon her to conſent. The nuptials, however, were no ſooner celebrated than Ceraunus murdered the two young princes, and confirmed his uſurpation by rapine and cruelty. But now three powerful princes claimed the kingdom of Macedonia as their own; Antiochus, the ſon of Seleucus; Antigonus, the ſon of Demetrius and Pyrrhus, the king of Epirus. Theſe enemies, however, were ſoon removed; Ceraunus conquered Antigonus in the field of battle, and ſtopped the hoſtilities of his two other rivals by promiſes and money. He did not long remain inactive, a barbarian army of Gauls claimed a tribute from him, and the monarch immediately marched to meet them in the field. The battle was long and bloody. The Macedonians might have obtained the victory if Ceraunus had shown more prudence. He was thrown down from his elephant, and taken prisoner by the enemy who immediately tore his body to pieces. Ptolemy had been king of Macedonia only 18 months. Justin. 24, &c.—Paus. 10, c. 10.——An illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus, of which he was tyrannically dispossessed by the Romans. Cato was at the head of the forces which were sent against Ptolemy by the senate, and the Roman general proposed to the monarch to retire from the throne, and to pass the rest of his days in the obscure office of high priest in the temple of Venus at Paphos. This offer was rejected with the indignation which it merited, and the monarch poisoned himself at the approach of the enemy. The treasures found in the island amounted to the enormous sum of 1,356,250l. sterling, which were carried to Rome by the conquerors. Plut. in Cat.—*Val. He was for some time governor of Jericho, about 135 years before Christ.——A powerful Jew during the troubles which disturbed the peace of Judæa, in the reign of Augustus.——A son of Antony by Cleopatra surnamed Philadelphus, by his father and made master of Phœnicia, Syria, and all the territories of Asia Minor, which were situated between the Ægean and the Euphrates. Plut. in Anton.——A general of Herod, king of Judæa.——A son of Chrysermus, who visited Cleomenes, king of Sparta, when imprisoned in Egypt.——A governor of Alexandria, put to death by Cleomenes.——A celebrated geographer and Astrologer in the reign of Adrian and Antoninus. He was a native of Alexandria, or according to others, of Pelusium, and on account of his great learning, he received the name of most wise, and most divine, among the Greeks. In his system of the world, he places the earth in the center of the universe, a doctrine universally believed and adopted till the 16th century, when it was confuted and rejected by Copernicus. His geography is valued for its learning, and the very useful information which it gives. Besides his system and geography, Ptolemy wrote other books, in one of which he gives an account of the fixed stars, of 1022 of which he gives the certain and definite longitude and latitute. The best edition of Ptolemy's geography, is that of Bertius fol. Amst. 1618, and that of his treatise de Judiciis Astrologicis by Camerar. 4to. 1535, and of the Harmonica 4to. Wallis, Oxon, 1683.

Ptolemăis, a town of Thebais in Egypt, called after the Ptolemies who beautified it. There was also another city of the same name in the territories of Cyrene. ther, by which it was ordained, that all laws ſhould be previouſly approved by the ſenators, before they were propoſed by the people.

PUBLIUS SYRUS, a Syrian mimic poet, who floriſhed about 44 years before Chriſt. He was originally a ſlave ſold to a Roman patrician, called Domitius, who brought him up with great attention, and gave him his freedom when of age. He gained the eſtrem of the moſt powerful at Rome, and reckoned J. Cæſar among his patrons. He ſoon eclipſed the poet Laberius, whoſe burleſque compoſitions were in general eſteem. There remains of Publius, a collection of moral ſentences, written in iambics, and placed in alphabetical order, the neweſt edition of which is that of Patav. Comin. 1740.

PUBLIUS, a prænomen, common among the Romans——Caius, a man who conſpired with Brutus againſt J. Cæſar.——A prætor who conquered Palæpolis. He was only a plebeian, and though neither conſul nor dictator, he obtained a triumph in ſpite of the oppoſition of the ſenators. He was the firſt who was honored with a triumph during a prætorſhip.——A Roman conſul who defeated the Latins, and was made dictator.——A Roman flatterer in the court of Tiberius.——A tribune who accuſed Manlius, &c.

PULCHĔRIA, a daughter of the emperor Theodoſius the great, famous for her piety moderation, and virtues.——A daughter of Arcadius, who held the government of the Roman empire for many years. She was mother of Valentinian. Her piety, and her private, as well as public virtues have been univerſally admired. She died A. D. 452, and was interred at Ravenna, where her tomb is ſtill to be ſeen.——A ſiſter of Theodoſius, who reigned abſolute for ſome time in the Roman empire.

PUNĬCUM BELLUM, the firſt Punic war was undertaken by the Romans againſt Carthage, B. C. 264. The ambition of Rome was the origin of this war. For upwards of 240 years, the two nations had beheld with ſecret jealouſy each other's power, but they had totally eradicated every cauſe of contentions, by ſettling in three different treaties the boundaries of their reſpective territories the number of their allies, and how far one nation might ſail in the Mediterranean without giving offence to the other. Sicily, an iſland of the higheſt conſequence to the Carthaginians as a commercial nation, was the ſeat of the firſt diſſentions. The Mamertini, a body of Italian mercenaries, were appointed by the king of Syracuſe to guard the town of Meſſana, but this tumultuous tribe, inſtead of protecting the citizens, baſely maſſacred them and ſeized their poſſeſſions. This act of cruelty raiſed the indignation of all the Sicilians, and Hiero king of Syracuſe, who had employed them, prepared to puniſh the perfidy and the Mamertini beſieged in Meſſana, and without friends or reſources, reſolved to throw themſelves for protection into the hands of the firſt power that could relieve them. They were however divided in their ſentiments, and while ſome implored the aſſiſtance of Carthage, others called upon the Romans for protection. Without heſitation or delay, the Carthaginians entered Meſſana, and the Romans alſo haſtened to give to the Mamertini, that aid which had been claimed from them with as much eagerneſs as from the Carthaginians. At the approach of the Roman troops, the Mamertini, who had implored their aſſiſtance, took up arms and forced the Carthaginians to evacuate Meſſana. Freſh forces were poured in on every ſide, and though Carthage ſeemed ſuperior in arms and in reſources, yet the valour and intrepidity of the Romans, daily appeared more formidable, and Hiero, the Syracuſan king, who hitherto embraced the intereſt of the Carthaginians, became the moſt faithful ally of the republic. From a private quarrel the war became general. The Romans obtained a victory in Sicily, but as their enemies were maſters at ſea, the advantages they gained were ſmall and inconſiderable. To make themſelves equal to their adverſaries, they aſpired to the dominion of the ſea, and in 60 days timber was cut down and a fleet of 120 gallies completely manned and proviſioned. The ſucceſſes they met by ſea were trivial, and little advantage could be gained over an enemy that were ſailors by actual practice and long experience. Duilius at laſt obtained a victory, and he was the firſt Roman who ever received a triumph after a naval battle. The loſſes they had already ſuſtained, induced the Carthaginians to ſue for peace, and the Romans, whom an unſucceſsful deſcent upon Africa under Regulus, [Vid. Regulus.] had rendered diffident, liſtened to the propoſal, and the firſt Punic war was concluded B. C. 241, on the following terms.—The Carthaginians pledged themſelves to pay to the Romans within 20 years, the ſum of 3000 Euboic talents, they promiſed to releaſe all the Roman captives without ranſom, to evacuate Sicily, and the other iſlands in the Mediterranean, and not to moleſt Hiero king of Syracuſe, or his allies. After this treaty the Carthaginians who had loſt the dominion of Sardinia and Sicily, made new conqueſts in Spain, and ſoon began to repair their loſſes by induſtry and labor. They planted colonies and ſecretly prepared to revenge themſelves upon their powerful rivals. The Romans were not inſenſible of their ſucceſſes in Spain, and to ſtop their progreſs towards Italy they made a ſtipulation with the Carthaginians, by which they were not permitted to croſs the Iberus, or to moleſt the cities of their allies, the Saguntines. This was for ſome time obſerved, but when Annibal ſucceeded to the command of the Carthaginian armies in in Spain, he ſpurned the boundaries which the jealouſy of Rome had ſet to his arms, and he immediately formed the ſiege of Saguntum. The Romans were appriſed of the hoſtilities which had been begun againſt their allies, but Saguntum was in the hands of the active enemy before they had taken any ſteps to oppoſe him. Complaints were carried to Carthage, and war was determined upon by the influence of Annibal in the Carthaginian ſenate. Without delay or diffidence B. C. 218. Annibal marched a numerous army of 90,000 foot and 12,000 horſe, towards Italy, reſolved to carry on the war to the gates of Rome. He croſſed the Rhone, the Alps, and the Apennines, with uncommon celerity, and the Roman conſuls who were ſtationed to ſtop his progreſs, were ſeverally defeated. The battle of Trebia, and that of the lake of Thraſymenus threw Rome into the greateſt apprehenſions, but the prudence and the dilatory meaſures of the dictator Fabius ſoon taught them to hope for better times. Yet the conduct of Fabius was univerſally cenſured as cowardice, and the two conſuls who ſucceeded him in the command, by purſuing a different plan of operations, ſoon brought on a deciſive action at Cannæ, in which 45,000 Romans were left in the field of battle. This bloody victory cauſed ſo much conſternation at Rome that ſome authors have declared that if Annibal had immediately marched from the plains of Cannæ, to the city, he would have met with no reſiſtance, but would have terminated a long and dangerous war with glory to himſelf, and the moſt ineſtimable advantages to his country. This celebrated victory at Cannæ left the conqueror maſter of two camps, and of an immenſe booty; and the cities which had hitherto obſerved a neutrality no ſooner ſaw the defeat of the Romans, than they eagerly embraced the intereſt of Carthage. The news of this victory was carried to Carthage by Mago, and the Carthaginians refuſed to believe it till three buſhels of golden rings were ſpread before them, which had been taken from the Roman knights in the field of battle. After this Annibal called his brother Aſdrubal from Spain with a large reinforcement, but the march of Aſdrubal was intercepted by the Romans, his army was defeated, and himſelf ſlain. Affairs now had taken a different turn, and Marcellus who had the command of the Roman legions in Italy, ſoon taught his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible in the field. In different parts of the world the Romans were making very rapid conqueſts, and if the ſudden arrival of a Carthaginian army in Italy, at firſt raiſed fears and apprehenſions, they were ſoon enabled to diſpute with their enemies for the ſovereignty of Spain, and the dominion of the ſea. Annibal no longer appeared formidable in Italy; if he conquered towns in Campania or Magna Græcia, he remained maſter of them only while his army hovered in the neighbourhood, and if he marched towards Rome the alarm he occaſioned was but momentary, the Romans were prepared to oppoſe him, and his return was therefore the more diſhonorable. The conqueſts of young Scipio in Spain had now raiſed the expectations of the Romans, and he had no ſooner returned to Rome than he propoſed to remove Annibal from the capital of Italy by carrying the war to the gates of Carthage. This was a bold and hazardous enterprize, but though Fabius oppoſed it, it was univerſally approved by the Roman ſenate, and young Scipio was empowered to ſail to Africa. The conqueſts of the young Roman were as rapid in Africa as in Spain, and the Carthaginians, apprehenſive for the fate of their capital, recalled Annibal from Italy, and preferred their ſafety at home, to the maintaining of a long and expenſive war in another quarter of the globe. Annibal received their orders with indignation, and with tears in his eyes he left Italy, where for 16 years he had known no ſuperior in the field of battle. At his arrival in Africa, the Carthaginian general ſoon collected a large army, and met his exulting adverſary in the plains of Zama. The battle was long and bloody, and though one nation fought for glory, and the other for the dearer ſake of liberty, the Romans obtained the victory, and Annibal, who had ſworn eternal enmity to the gods of Rome, fled from Carthage after he had adviſed his countrymen to accept the terms of the conqueror. This battle of Zama was deciſive, the Carthaginians ſued for peace, which the haughty conquerors granted with difficulty. The conditions were theſe: Carthage was permitted to hold all the poſſeſſions which ſhe had in Africa before the war, and to be governed by her own laws and inſtitutions. She was ordered to make reſtitution of all the ſhips and other effects which had been taken in violation of a truce that had been agreed upon by both nations. She was to ſurrender the whole of her fleet, except 10 gallies; ſhe was to releaſe and deliver up all the captives, deſerters, or fugitives, taken or received during the war; to indemnify Maſiniſſa for all the loſſes which he had ſuſtained, to deliver up all their elephants, and for the future never more to tame or break any more of theſe animals. She was not to make war upon any nation whatever, without the conſent of the Romans, and ſhe was to reimburſe the Romans, to pay the ſum of 10,000 talents, at the rate of 200 talents a year for fifty years, and ſhe was to give up hoſtages from the nobleſt families for the performance of theſe ſeveral articles; and till the ratification of the treaty, to ſupply the the Roman forces with money and provisions. These humiliating conditions were accepted 201 B. C. and immediately 4000 Roman captives were released, five hundred gallies were delivered and burnt on the spot, but the immediate exaction of 200 talents was more severely felt, and many of the Carthaginian senators burst into tears. During the 50 years which followed the conclusion of the second Punic war, the Carthaginians were employed in repairing their losses by unwearied application and industry; but they found still in the Romans a jealous rival, and a haughty conqueror, and in Masinissa the ally of Rome, an intriguing and ambitious monarch. The king of Numidia made himself master of one of their provinces; but as they were unable to make war without the consent of Rome, the Carthaginians sought relief by embassies, and made continual complaints in the Roman senate of the tyranny and oppression of Masinissa. Commissioners were appointed to examine the cause of their complaints; but as Masinissa was the ally of Rome, the interest of the Carthaginians was neglected, and whatever seemed to depress their republic, was agreeable to the Romans. Cato, who was in the number of the commissioners, examined the capital of Africa with a jealous eye; he saw it with concern, rising as it were from its ruins; and when he returned to Rome he declared in full senate, that the peace of Italy would never be established while Carthage was in being. The senators, however, were not guided by his opinion, and the delenda est Carthago of Cato did not prevent the Romans from acting with moderation. But while the senate were debating about the existence of Carthage, and while they considered it as a dependent power, and not as an ally, the wrongs of Africa were without redress, and Masinissa continued his depredations. Upon this the Carthaginians resolved to do to their cause that justice which the Romans had denied them; they entered the field against the Numidians, but they were defeated in a bloody battle by Masinissa, who was then 90 years old. In this bold measure they had broken the peace; and as their late defeat had rendered them desperate, they hastened with all possible speed to the capital of Italy to justify their proceedings, and to implore the forgiveness of the Roman senate. The news of Masinissa's victory had already reached Italy, and immediately some forces were sent to Sicily, and from thence ordered to pass into Africa. The ambassadors of Carthage received evasive and unsatisfactory answers from the senate; and when they saw the Romans landed at Utica, they resolved to purchase peace by the most submissive terms which even the most abject slaves could offer. The Romans acted with the deepest policy, no declaration of war had been made, though hostilities appeared inevitable; and in answer to the submissive offers of Carthage the consuls replied, that to prevent every cause of quarrel, the Carthaginians must deliver into their hands 300 hostages all children of senators, and of the most noble and respectable families. The demand was great and alarming, but it was no sooner granted, than the Romans made another demand, and the Carthaginians were told that peace could not continue if they refused to deliver up all their ships, their arms, engines of war, with all their naval and military stores. The Carthaginians complied, and immediately 40,000 suits of armour, 20,000 large engines of war, with a plentiful store of ammunitions and missile weapons were surrendered. After this duplicity had succeeded, the Romans laid open the final resolutions of the senate, and the Carthaginians were then told that to avoid hostilities, they must leave their antient habitations and retire into the inland parts of Africa, and found another city, at the distance of not less than ten miles from the sea. This was heard with horror and indignation; the Romans were fixed and inexorable, and Carthage was filled with tears and lamentations. But the spirit of liberty and independence was not yet extinguished in the capital of Africa, and the Carthaginians determined to sacrifice their lives for the protection of their gods, the tombs of their forefathers, and the place which had given them birth. Before the Roman army approached the city, preparations to support a siege were made, and the ramparts of Carthage were covered with stones, to compensate for the weapons and instruments of war which they had ignorantly betrayed to the duplicity of their enemies. Asdrubal, whom the despair of his countrymen had banished on account of the unsuccessful expedition against Masinissa, was immediately recalled; and in the moment of danger, Carthage seemed to have possessed more spirit and more vigor, than when Annibal was victorious at the gates of Rome. The town was blocked up by the Romans, and a regular siege begun, two years were spent in useless operations, and Carthage seemed still able to rise from its ruins, to dispute for the empire of the world; when Scipio, the descendant of the great Scipio, who finished the second Punic war, was sent to conduct the siege. The vigor of his operations soon baffled the efforts and the bold resistance of the besieged; the communications which they had with the land were cut off, and the city, which was twenty miles in circumference, was completely surrounded on all sides by the enemy. Despair and famine now raged in the city, and Scipio gained access to the city walls, where the battlements were low and ungarded. His entrance into the streets was disputed with uncommon fury, the houses as he advanced were set on fire to stop his progress; but when a body of 50,000 persons of either sex had claimed quarter, the rest of the inhabitants were disheartened, and such as disdained to be prisoners of war, perished in the flames, which gradually destroyed their habitations, 147 B. C. after a continuation of hostilities for three years. During 17 days Carthage was in flames; and the soldiers were permitted to redeem from the fire whatever possessions they could. But while others profited from the destruction of Carthage, the philosophic general, struck by the melancholy aspect of the scene, repeated two lines from Homer, which contained a prophecy concerning the fall of Troy. He was asked by the historian Polybius, to what he then applied his prediction? To my country, replied Scipio, for her too I dread the vicissitude of human affairs, and in her turn she may exhibit another flaming Carthage. This remarkable event happened about the year of Rome 606. The news of this victory caused the greatest rejoicings at Rome; and immediately commissioners were appointed by the Roman senate, not only to raze the walls of Carthage, but even to demolish and burn the very materials with which they were made; and in a few days, that city which had been once the seat of commerce, the model of magnificence, the common store of the wealth of nations, and one of the most powerful states of the world, left behind no traces of its splendor, of its power, or even of its existence. Polyb.—Orosius.—Appian. de Punic &c.—Flor.—Plut. in Cat. &c.—Strab.—Liv. epit.—Diod.

Pupia lex de senatu, required that the senate should not be assembled from the 18th of the calends of February to the calends of the same month, and that before the embassies were either accepted or rejected, the senate should be held on no account.

Pupius, a centurion of Pompey's army, seized by Cæsar's soldiers, &c.

Pupiēnus, Marcus Claudius Maximus, a man of an obscure family, who raised himself by his merit to the highest offices in the Roman armies, and gradually became a pretor, consul, prefect of Rome, and a governor of the provinces. His father was a blacksmith. After the death of the Gordians, Pupienus was elected with Balbinus to the imperial throne, and to rid the world of the usurpation and tyranny of the Maximini. He immediately marched against these tyrants, but he was soon informed that they had been sacrificed to the fury and resentment of their own soldiers; and therefore he retired to Rome, to enjoy the tranquility which his merit claimed. He soon after prepared to make war against the Persians, who insulted the majesty of Rome, but in this he was prevented, and was massacred A. D. 236, by the pretorian guards. Balbinus shared his fate. Pupienus is sometimes called Maximus. In his private character he appeared always grave and serious, he was the constant friend of justice, moderation, and clemency, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his virtues, than to say that he was invested with the purple without soliciting for it, and that the Roman senate said that they had selected him from thousands, because they knew no person more worthy or better qualified to support the dignity of an emperor.

Puppius, a tragic poet in the age of J. Cæsar. His tragedies were so pathetic, that when they were represented on the Roman stage, the audience melted into tears, from which circumstance Horace calls them lacrymosa, 1 ep. 7, v. 67.

Puteŏli, a maritime town of Campania, between Baiæ and Naples, founded by a colony from Cumæ. It was originally called Dicæarchia, and afterwards Puteoli, from the great number of wells that are in the neighbourhood. It was much frequented by the Romans, on account of its mineral waters and hot baths. Strab. 5.—Varro. L. L. 4, c. 5.—Cic. Phil. 8, c. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Paus. 8, c. 7.

Pyanepsia, an Athenian festival, celebrated in honor of Theseus and his companions; who, after their return from Crete, were entertained with all manner of fruits, and particularly pulse. From this circumstance the Pyanepsia was ever after commemorated by the boiling of pulse, απο του εψειν πυανα. Some however suppose, that it is observed in commemoration of the Heraclidæ, who were entertained with pulse by the Athenians.

Pydna, a town of Macedonia, originally called Citron, situate between the mouth of the rivers Aliacmon and Lydius. It was in this city that Cassander massacred Olympias the mother of Alexander the Great, his wife Roxane and his son Alexander. Pydna is famous for a battle which was fought there, on the 22d of June, B. C. 168, between the Romans under Paulus and king Philip, in which the latter was conquered, and Macedonia soon after reduced into the form of a Roman province. Justin. 14, c. 6.—Flor.—Plut. in Paul.—Liv. 44, c. 10.

Pygela, a town of Ionia.

Pygmæi, a nation of dwarfs, in the extremest parts of India, or according to others, in Æthiopia. Some authors affirm, that they were no more than one foot high, and that they built their houses with egg-shells. Aristotle says that they lived in holes under the earth, and that they came out in the harvest time with hatchets to cut down the corn as if to fell a forest. They went on goats and lambs of proportionable stature to themselves, to make war against certain birds, whom some call cranes, which came there yearly from Scythia to plunder them. They were originally governed by a princess, who was changed into a crane, for boasting herself fairer than Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 90.—Homer. Il. 3. Strab. 7.—*Ariſt. The hero, pleaſed with their courage, wrapped the greateſt number of them in the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, and carried them to Euryſtheus.

PYGMĂLION, a king of Tyre, ſon of Belus, and brother to the celebrated Dido, who founded Carthage. At the death of his father, he aſcended the vacant throne, and ſoon became odious by his cruelty and avarice. He ſacrificed every thing to the gratification of his predominant paſſions, and he did not even ſpare the life of Sichæus, Dido's huſband, becauſe he was the moſt powerful and opulent of all the Phœnicians. This murder he committed in a temple, of which Sichæus was the prieſt, but inſtead of obtaining the riches which he deſired, Pygmalion was ſhunned by his ſubjects, and Dido, to avoid further acts of cruelty, fled away with her huſband's treaſure, and a large colony to the coaſt of Africa, where ſhe founded a city. Pygmalion died in the 56th year of his age, and in the 47th of his reign. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Juſtin. 18, c. 5—Apollod. 3, Ital. 1.——A celebrated ſtatuary of the iſland of Cyprus. The debauchery of the females of Amathus, of which he was a witneſs, created in him ſuch an averſion for the fair ſex, that he reſolved never to marry. The affection which he had denied to the other ſex, he liberally beſtowed upon the works of his own hands. He became enamoured of a beautiful ſtatue of marble which he had made, and at his earneſt requeſt and prayers, according to the mythologiſts, the goddeſs of beauty changed this favorite ſtatue into a woman, whom the artiſt married, and by whom he had a ſon called Paphus, who founded the city of that name in Cyprus. Ovid. Met. 10, fab. 9.

PYLĂDES, a ſon of Strophius, king of Phocis, by one of the ſiſters of Agamemnon. He was educated, together with his couſin Oreſtes, with whom he formed the moſt inviolable friendſhip, and whom he aſſiſted to revenge the murder of Agamemnon, by aſſaſſinating Clytemneſtra and Ægyſthus. He alſo accompanied him in Taurica Cherſoneſus, and for his ſervices Oreſtes rewarded him, by giving him his ſiſter Electra in marriage. Pylades had by her two ſons, Medon and Strophius. The friendſhip of Oreſtes and Pylades became proverbial. [Vid. Oreſtes.] Eurip. in Iphig.—Æſchyl in Ag. &c.—Pauſ. 1.——A celebrated Greek muſician, in the age of Philopœmen. Plut. in Phil.——A mimic in the reign of Auguſtus, baniſhed, and afterwards recalled.

PYLÆ, a town of Aſia, between Cappadocia and Cilicia. Cic. 5, ad att. The word Pylæ which ſignifies gates, was often applied by the Greeks to any ſtreights or paſſages which opened a communication between one country and another, ſuch as the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, of Perſia, Hyrcania, &c.

PYLÆMĔNES, a Paphlagonian, who came to the Trojan war, and was killed by Menelaus. His ſon, called Harpalion, was killed by Meriones. Dictyſ. Cret. 2, c. 34.—Homer. Il. 2, &c.——A king of Mæonia, who ſent his ſons, Meſtes and Antiphus, to the Trojan war.

PYLAGŎRÆ, a name given to the Amphictyonic council, becauſe they always aſſembled at Pylæ, near the temple of Delphi.

PYLĂON, a ſon of Neleus and Chloris, killed by Hercules with his brothers. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

PYLARTES, a Trojan killed by Patroclus. Homer. Il. 16.

PYLARGE, a daughter of Danaus. Apollod.

PYLAS, a king of Megara. He had the misfortune accidentally to kill his uncle Bias, for which he fled away, leaving his kingdom to Pandion, his ſon-in-law, who had been driven from Athens. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 39.

PYLĒNE, a town of Ætolia. Homer. Il. 2.

PYLEUS, a Trojan chief, killed by Achilles.——A ſon of Clymenus, king of Orchomenos.

PYLLEON, a town of Theſſaly.

PYLO, a daughter of Theſpius.

PYLOS, a town of Meſſenia, ſituate on the weſtern coaſt of the Peloponneſus, oppoſite the iſland Sphacteria in the Ionian ſea. It was alſo called Coryphaſion, from the promontory on which it was erected. It was built by Pylos, at the head of a colony from Megara. The founder was diſpoſſeſſed of it by Neleus, and fled into Elis, where he dwelt in a ſmall town, which he alſo called Pylos.——A town of Elis, at the mouth of the river Alpheus, between the Peneus and the Selleis.——Another town of Elis, called Triphyliacha, from Triphylia, a province of Elis, where it was ſituate. Theſe three cities, which bore the name of Pylos, diſputed their reſpective right to the honor of having given birth to the celebrated Neſtor, ſon of Neleus. The Pylos, which is ſituate near the Alpheus, ſeems to win the palm, as it had in its neighbourhood a ſmall village called Geranus, and a river called Geron, of which Homer makes mention. Pindar, however, calls Neſtor king of Meſſenia, and therefore gives the preference to the firſt mentioned of theſe three cities. Apollod. 1, c. 19; l. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 39.—Strab. 9—*Homer. PYRA a part of mount Œta, on which the body of Hercules was burnt. Liv. 36, c. 30.

PYRACMON, one of Vulcan's workmen in the forges of Mount Ætna. The name is derived from two Greek words, which signify fire and an anvil. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

PYRACMOS, a man killed by Cæneus. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 460.

PYRÆCHMES, a king of Eubœa.——A king of Pæonia during the Trojan war.

PYRÄMUS, a youth of Babylon, who became enamoured of Thisbe, a beautiful virgin, who dwelt in the neighbourhood. The flame was mutual, and the two lovers, whom their parents forbad to marry, regularly received each other's addresses, through the chink of a wall, which separated their houses. After the most solemn vows of sincerity, they both agreed to elude the vigilance of their friends, and to meet one another at the tomb of Ninus, under a white mulberry tree, without the walls of Babylon. Thisbe came first to the appointed place, but the sudden arrival of a lioness frightened her away; and as she fled into a neighbouring cave she dropped her veil, which the lioness found and covered with blood. Pyramus soon arrived, he found Thisbe's veil all bloody, and concluding that she had been torn to pieces by the wild beasts of the place, he stabbed himself with his sword. Thisbe, when her fears were vanished, returned from the cave, and at the sight of the dying Pyramus, she fell upon the sword which still reeked with his blood. This tragical scene happened under a mulberry tree, which, as the poets mention, was stained with the blood of the lovers, and ever after bore fruit but of the color of blood. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 55, &c.—Hygin. fab. 243.——A river of Cilicia, rising in mount Taurus, and falling into the Pamphylian sea. Dionys. Perieg.

PYRENÆA VENUS, a town of Gallia Narbonensis.

PYRĒNÆI, a mountain, or a long ridge of high mountains, which separate Gaul from Spain, and extends from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean sea. They receive their name from Pyrene the daughter of Bebrycius, or from the fire (πυρ) which once raged there for several days. This fire was originally kindled by shepherds, and so intense was the heat which it occasioned, that all the silver mines of the mountains were melted, and ran down in large rivulets. This account is deemed fabulous by Strabo and others. Diod. 5.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Ital. 3, v. 415.—Liv. 21, c. 60.—Plin. 4, c. 20.

PYRENÆUS, a king of Thrace, who during a shower of rain, gave shelter in his house to the nine Muses, and attempted to offer them violence. The goddesses upon this, took to their wings and flew away. Pyrenæus, who attempted to follow them, as if he had wings, threw himself down from the top of a tower and was killed. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 274.

PYRĒNE, a daughter of Bebrycius, king of the southern parts of Spain. Hercules offered violence to her before he went to attack Geryon, and she brought into the world a serpent, which so terrified her, that she fled into the woods, where she was torn to pieces by wild beasts.——A nymph, mother of Cycnus by Mars.——A fountain near Corinth.——A small village in Celtic Gaul, near which, according to some, the river Ister took its rise.

PYRGI, an ancient town of Etruria. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 184.

PYRGION, an historian.

PYRGO, the nurse of Priam's children who followed Æneas in his flight from Troy. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 645.

PYRGOTĒLES, a celebrated engraver on gems, in the age of Alexander the Great. He had the exclusive privilege of engraving the conqueror, as Lysippus was the only sculptor who was permitted to make statues of him. Plin. 37.

PYRGUS, a fortified place of Elis in the Peloponnesus.

PYRIPTE, a daughter of Thespius.

PYROIS, one of the horses of the sun. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 153.

PYRONIA, a surname of Diana.

PYRRHA, a daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora, who married Deucalion, the son of Prometheus, who reigned in Thessaly. In her age all mankind were destroyed by a deluge, and she alone, with her husband escaped from the general destruction, by saving themselves in a boat which Deucalion had made by his father's advice. When the waters had retired from the surface of the earth, Pyrrha, with her husband, went to the oracle of Themis, were they were directed, to repair the loss of mankind, to throw stones behind their backs. They obeyed, and the stones which Pyrrha threw were changed into women, and those of Deucalion into men. [Vid. Deucalion.] Pyrrha became mother of Amphictyon, Hellen, and Protogenea, by Deucalion. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 350, &c.—Hygin. fab. 153.—Apollon. Rhod. 3, v. 1085.——A daughter of Creon, king of Thebes. Pausan. 9, c. 10.——The name which Achilles bore when he disguised himself in woman's cloaths, at the court of Lycomedes. Hygin. fab. 96.——A town of Eubœa. Mela. 2, c. 7.——A promontory of Phthiotis, on the bay of Malia.——A town of Lesbos.——A beautiful courtezan at Rome, of whom Horace was long an admirer. Horat. 1, od. 5.

PYRRHIAS, a boatman of Ithaca, remarkable for his humanity. He delivered from slavery an old man who had been taken by pirates, and robbed of some pots full of pitch. The old man was so grateful for this this kindneſs, that he gave the pots to his deliverer, after he had told him that they contained gold under the pitch. Pyrrhias upon this, offered the ſacrifice of a bull to the old man, and retained him in his houſe with every act of kindneſs and attention, till the time of his death. Plut. in quæſt. G ——A general of the Ætolians, defeated by Philip, king of Macedonia.

PYRRHICUS, a free town of Laconia. Paſ. 3, c. 21.

PYRRHIDÆ, a patronymic given to the ſucceſſors of Neoptolemus in Epirus.

PYRRHO, a philoſopher of Elis, diſciple to Anaxarchus and originally, a painter. His father's name was Pliſtarchus or Piſtocrates. He was in continual ſuſpenſe of judgment, he doubted of every thing, never made any concluſions, and when he had carefully examined a ſubject, and inveſtigated all its parts, he concluded by ſtill doubting of its evidence. This manner of doubting in the philoſopher has been called Pyrrhoniſm, and his diſciples have received the appellation of ſceptics, inquiſitors, examiners, &c. He pretended to have acquired an uncommon dominion over opinion and paſſions. The former of theſe virtues he called ataraxia, and the latter matriopathia, and ſo far did he carry his want of common feeling and ſympathy, that he paſſed with unconcern, near a ditch in which his maſter Anaxarchus had fallen, and where he nearly periſhed. He was once in a ſtorm, and when all hopes were vaniſhed, and deſtruction certain, the philoſopher remained unconcerned; and while the reſt of the crew were loſt in lamentations, he plainly told them to look at a pig which was then feeding himſelf on board the veſſel, exclaiming, This is a true model for the wiſe man. As he ſhowed ſo much indifference in every thing, and declared that life and death were the ſame thing, ſome of his diſciples aſked him, why he did not hurry himſelf out of the world; becauſe, ſays he, there is no difference between life and death. When he walked in the ſtreets he never looked behind, or moved from the road for a chariot, even in its moſt rapid courſe, and indeed, as ſome authors remark, this indifference for his ſafety, often expoſed him to the greateſt and moſt imminent dangers, from which he was ſaved by the interference of his friends who followed him. He floriſhed B. C. 304 and died at the advanced age of 90. He left no writings behind him. His countrymen were ſo partial to him, that they raiſed ſtatues to his memory, and exempted all the philoſophers of Elis from taxes. Diog. 9.—Cic. de orat. 3.—Pauſ. 6, c. 24.

PYRRHUS, a ſon of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes, who received this name from the yellowneſs of his hair. He was alſo called Neoptolemus, or new warrior, becauſe he came to the Trojan war in the laſt years of the celebrated ſiege of the capital of Troas. Vid. Neoptolemus. ——A king of Epirus, deſcended from Achilles, by the ſide of his mother, and from Hercules by that of his father, and ſon of Æacides and Phthia. He was ſaved when an infant, by the fidelity of his ſervants from the purſuits of the enemies of his father, who had been baniſhed from his kingdom, and he was carried to the court of Glautias king of Illyricum, who educated him with great tenderneſs. Caſſander, king of Macedonia, wiſhed to diſpatch him, as he had ſo much to dread from him; but Glautias, not only refuſed to deliver him up into the hands of his enemy, but he even went with an army, and placed him on the throne of Epirus, though only 12 years of age. About five years after the abſence of Pyrrhus to attend the nuptials of one of the daughters of Glautias, raiſed new commotions. The monarch was expelled from his throne by Neoptolemus, who had uſurped it after the death of Œacides, and being ſtill without reſources, he applied to his brother-in-law Demetrius for aſſiſtance. He accompanied Demetrius at the battle of Ipſus, and fought there with all the prudence and intrepidity of an experienced general. He afterwards paſſed into Egypt, where by his marriage with Antigone the daughter of Berenice, he ſoon obtained a ſufficient force to attempt the recovery of his throne. He was ſucceſsful in the undertaking, but to remove all cauſes of quarrel, he took the uſurper to ſhare with him the royalty, and ſome time after he put him to death under pretence that he had attempted to poiſon him. In the ſubſequent years of his reign, Pyrrhus engaged in the quarrels which diſturbed the peace of the Macedonian monarchy, he marched againſt Demetrius, and gave the Macedonian ſoldiers freſh proofs of his valor and activity. By diſſimulation he ingratiated himſelf in the minds of his enemy's ſubjects, and when Demetrius labored under a momentary illneſs, Pyrrhus made an attempt upon the crown of Macedonia, which if not then ſucceſsful, ſoon after rendered him maſter of the kingdom. This he ſhared with Lyſimachus for ſeven months, till the jealouſy of the Macedonians, and the ambition of his colleague, obliged him to retire. Pyrrhus was meditating new conqueſts, when the Tarentines invited him to Italy to aſſiſt them againſt the encroaching power of Rome. He gladly accepted the invitation, but his paſſage acroſs the Adriatic proved nearly fatal and he reached the ſhores of Italy, after the loſs of the greateſt part of his troops in a ſtorm. At his entrance into Tarentum B. C. 280, he began to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and by introducing the ſtricteſt diſcipline among their troops, to accuſtom them to bear fatigue and to diſpiſe dangers. In the firſt battle which he fought with the Romans, he obtained the victory, but for this he was more particularly indebted to his elephants, phants, whose bulk, and uncommon appearance, astonished the Romans, and terrified their cavalry. The number of the slain was equal on both sides, and the conqueror said that such another victory would totally ruin him. He also sent Cineas, his chief minister, to Rome, and though victorious, he sued for peace. These offers of peace were refused, and when Pyrrhus questioned Cineas about the manners and the character of the Romans, the sagacious minister replied, that their senate was a venerable assembly of kings, and that to fight against them was to attack another Hydra. Another battle was soon after fought near Asculum, but the slaughter was so great, and the valor so conspicuous on both sides, that the Romans and their enemies reciprocally claimed the victory as their own. Pyrrhus still continued the war in favor of the Tarentines, when he was invited into Sicily by the inhabitants, who laboured under the yoke of Carthage, and the cruelty of their own petty tyrants. His fondness of novelty soon determined him to quit Italy, he left a garrison at Tarentum, and crossed over to Sicily, where he obtained two victories over the Carthaginians, and took many of their towns. He was for a while successful, and formed the project of invading Africa, but soon his popularity vanished, his troops became insolent, and he behaved with haughtiness, and shewed himself oppressive, so that his return to Italy was deemed a fortunate event for all Sicily. He had no sooner arrived at Tarentum, than he renewed hostilities with the Romans with great acrimony, but when his army of 80,000 men had been defeated by 20,000 of the enemy, under Curius, he left Italy with precipitation, B. C. 274, ashamed of the enterprize, and mortified by the victories which had been obtained, over one of the descendants of Achilles. In Epirus he began to repair his military character, by attacking Antigonus, who was then on the Macedonian throne. He gained some advantages over his enemy, and was at last restored to the throne of Macedonia. He afterwards marched against Sparta, at the request of Cleonymus, but when all his vigorous operations were insufficient to take the capital of Laconia, he retired to Argos, where the treachery of Aristeus invited him. The Argives desired him to retire, and not to interfere in the affairs of their republic, which were confounded by the ambition of two of their nobles. He complied with their wishes, but in the night he marched his forces into the town, and might have made himself master of the place, had not he retarded his progress by entering it with his elephants. The combat that ensued was obstinate and bloody, and the monarch, to fight with more boldness, and to encounter dangers with more facility, exchanged his dress. He was attacked by one of the enemy, but as he was going to run him through in his own defence, the mother of the Argive, who saw her son's danger from the top of a house, threw down a tile, and brought Pyrrhus to the ground. His head was cut off, and carried to Antigonus, who gave his remains a magnificent funeral, and presented his ashes to his son Helenus, 272 years before the Christian era. Pyrrhus has been deservedly commended for his talents as a general; and not only his friends, but also his enemies, have been warm in extolling him; and Annibal declared, that for experience and sagacity the king of Epirus was the first of commanders. He had chosen Alexander the Great for a model, and in every thing he wished not only to imitate, but to surpass him. In the art of war none were superior to him, he made it not only his study as a general, but even he wrote many books on encampments, and the different ways of training up an army, and whatever he did, was by principle and rule. His uncommon understanding, and his penetration, are also admired; but the general is severely censured, who has no sooner conquered a country, than he looks for other victories, without regarding, or securing what he has already obtained, by measures and regulations honorable to himself, and advantageous to his subjects. The Romans passed great encomiums upon him, and Pyrrhus was no less struck with their magnanimity and valor; so much indeed, that he exclaimed, that if he had soldiers like the Romans, or if the Romans had him for a general, he would leave no corner of the earth unseen, and no nation unconquered. Pyrrhus married many wives, and all for political reasons; besides Antigone he had Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as also a daughter of Autoleon king of Pæonia. His children, as his biographer observes, derived a warlike spirit from their father, and when he was asked by one to which of them he should leave the kingdom of Epirus, he replied, to him who has the sharpest sword. *Ælian. Pythagŏras, a celebrated philosopher, born at Samos. His father Mnesarchus was a person of distinction, and, therefore, the son received that education which was most calculated to enlighten his mind and invigorate his body. Like his contemporaries, he was early made acquainted with poetry and music; eloquence and astronomy became his private studies, and, in gymnastic exercises, he often bore the palm for strength and dexterity. He first made himself known in Greece, at the Olympic games, where he obtained obtained, in the 18th year of his age, the prize for wreſtling; and, after he had been admired for the elegance and the dignity of his perſon, and the brilliancy of his underſtanding, he retired into the eaſt. In Egypt and Chaldæa he gained the confidence of the prieſts, and learned from them the artful policy, and the ſymbolic writings, by which they governed the princes as well as the people, and, after he had ſpent many years in gathering all the information which could be collected from antique tradition concerning the nature of the gods and the immortality of the ſoul, Pythagoras reviſited his native iſland. The tyranny of Polycrates at Samos diſguſted the philoſopher, who was a great advocate for national independence, and, though he was the favorite of the tyrant, he retired from the iſland, and a ſecond time aſſiſted at the Olympic games. His fame was too well known to eſcape notice; he was ſaluted in the public aſſembly by the name of Sophiſt, or wiſe man; but he refuſed the appellation, and was ſatisfied with that philoſopher, or, the friend of wiſdom. "At the Olympic games," ſaid he, in explanation of this new appellation he wiſhed to aſſume, "ſome are attracted with the deſire of obtaining crowns and honors, others come to expoſe their different commodities to ſale, while curioſity draws a third claſs, and the deſire of contemplating whatever deſerves notice in that celebrated aſſembly: thus, on the more extenſive theatre of the world, while many ſtruggle for the glory of a name, and many pant for the advantages of fortune, a few, and indeed but a few, who are neither deſirous of money, nor ambitious of fame, are ſufficiently gratified to be ſpectators of the wonders, the hurry, and the magnificence of the ſcene." From Olympia the philoſopher viſited the republics of Elis and Sparta, and retired to Magna Græcia, where he fixed his habitation in the town of Crotona, about the 40th year of his age. Here he founded a ſect which has received the name of the Italian, and he ſoon ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by a great number of pupils, which the recommendation of his mental, as well as his perſonal, accompliſhments, had procured. His ſkill in muſic and medicine, and his knowledge of mathematics, and of natural philoſophy, gained him friends and admirers, and, amidſt the voluptuouſneſs that prevailed among the inhabitants of Crotona, the Samian ſage found his inſtructions reſpected, and his approbation courted: the moſt debauched and effeminate were pleaſed with the eloquence and the graceful delivery of the philoſopher, who boldly upbraided them for their vices, and called them to more virtuous and manly purſuits. Theſe animated harangues were attended with rapid ſucceſs, and a reformation ſoon took place in the morals and the life of the people of Crotona. The females were exhorted to become modeſt, and they left off their gaudy ornaments; the youths were called away from the purſuits of pleaſure, and inſtantly they forgot their intemperance, and paid to their parents that ſubmiſſive attention and deference which the precepts of Pythagoras required. As to the old, they were directed no longer to ſpend their time in amaſſing money, but to improve their underſtanding, and to ſeek that peace and thoſe comforts of mind which frugality, benevolence, and philanthropy, alone can produce. The ſober and religious behaviour of the philoſopher ſtrongly recommended the neceſſity and importance of theſe precepts. Pythagoras was admired for his venerable aſpect, his voice was harmonious, his eloquence perſuaſive, and the reputation he had acquired by his diſtant travels, and by being crowned at the Olympic games, was great and important. He regularly frequented the temples of the gods, and paid his devotion to the divinity at an early hour; he lived upon the pureſt and moſt innocent food, he cloathed himſelf like the prieſts of the Egyptian gods, and by his continual purifications, and regular offerings, he ſeemed to be ſuperior to the reſt of mankind in ſanctity. Theſe artful meaſures united to render him an object not only of reverence, but of imitation. To ſet himſelf at a greater diſtance from his pupils, a number of years was required to try their various diſpoſitions; the moſt talkative were not permitted to ſpeak in the preſence of their maſter before they had been his auditors for five years, and thoſe who poſſeſſed a natural taciturnity were allowed to ſpeak after a probation of two years. When they were capable of receiving the ſecret inſtructions of the philoſopher, they were taught the uſe of cyphers and hieroglyphic writings, and Pythagoras might boaſt that his pupils could correſpond together, though in the moſt diſtant regions, in unknown characters, and by ſigns and words, they had received, they could diſcover, though ſtrangers and barbarians, thoſe that had been educated in the Pythagorean ſchool. So great was his authority among his pupils, that, to diſpute his word was deemed a crime, and the moſt ſtubborn were drawn to coincide with their opinions when they helped their arguments by the words of the maſter ſaid ſo, an expreſſion which became proverbial in jurare in verba magiſtri. The great influence which the philoſopher poſſeſſed in his ſchool was tranſferred to the world; the pupils divided the applauſe and the approbation of the people with their venerated maſter, and, in a ſhort time, the rulers and the legiſlators of all the principal towns of Greece, Sicily, and Italy, boaſted in being the diſciples of Pythagoras. The Samian philoſopher was the firſt who ſupported the doctrine of metempſychoſis, or tranſmigration of the ſoul into different bodies, and thoſe notions he ſeemed to have imbibed imbibed among the prieſts of Egypt, or in the ſolitary retreats of the Brachmans. More ſtrenuouſly to ſupport this chimerical ſyſtem, he declared he recollected the different bodies his ſoul had animated before that of the ſon of Mneſarchus. He remembered to have been Æthalides, the ſon of Mercury, to have aſſiſted the Greeks during the Trojan war in the character of Euphorbus, [Vid. Euphorbus] to have been Hermotimus, afterwards a fiſherman, and laſt of all Pythagoras. He forbad his diſciples to eat fleſh, as alſo beans, becauſe he ſuppoſed them to have been produced from the ſame putrified matter from which, at the creation of the world, man was formed. In his theological ſyſtem Pythagoras ſupported that the univerſe was created from a ſhapeleſs heap of paſſive matter, by the hands of a powerful being, who himſelf was the mover and ſoul of the world, and of whoſe ſubſtance the ſouls of mankind were a portion. He conſidered numbers as the principles of every thing, and perceived, in the univerſe regularity, correſpondence, beauty, proportion, and harmony, as intentionally produced by the creator. In his doctrines of morality, he perceived in the human mind, propenſities common to us with the brute creation; but, beſides theſe, and the paſſions of avarice and ambition, he diſcovered the nobler ſeeds of virtue, and ſupported that the moſt ample and perfect gratification was to be found in the enjoyment of moral and intellectual pleaſures. The thoughts of the paſt he conſidered as always preſent to us, and he believed that no enjoyment could be had where the mind was diſturbed by conſciouſneſs of guilt, or fears about futurity. This opinion induced the philoſopher to recommend to his followers a particular mode of education. The tender years of the Pythagoreans were employed in continual labor, in ſtudy, in exerciſe, and repoſe; and the philoſopher maintained this well known and important maxim, that many things, eſpecially love, are beſt learnt late. In a more advanced age, the adult was deſired to behave with caution, ſpirit, and patriotiſm, and to remember, that the community and civil ſociety demanded his exertions, and that the good of the public, and not his own private enjoyments, were the ends of his creation. From leſſons like theſe, the Pythagoreans were ſtrictly enjoined to call to mind, and carefully to review, the actions, not only of the preſent, but of the preceding days. In their acts of devotion, they early repaired to the moſt ſolitary places of the mountains, and after they had examined their private and public conduct, and converſed with themſelves, they joined in the company of their friends, and early refreſhed their body with light and frugal aliments. Their converſation was of the moſt innocent nature; political or philoſophic ſubjects were diſcuſſed with propriety, but without warmth, and, after the conduct of the following day was regulated, the evening was ſpent with the ſame religious ceremony as the morning, in a ſtrict and partial ſelf-examination. From ſuch regularity nothing but the moſt ſalutary conſequences could ariſe, and it will not appear wonderful, that the diſciples of Pythagoras were ſo much reſpected and admired as legiſlators, and imitated for their conſtancy, friendſhip, and humanity. The authors that lived in, and after, the age of Alexander, have rather tarniſhed than brightened the glory of the founder of the Pythagorean ſchool, and they have obſcured his fame by attributing to him actions which were diſſonant with his character as a man and a moraliſt. To give more weight to his exhortations, as ſome writers mention, Pythagoras retired into a ſubterraneous cave, where his mother ſent him intelligence of every thing which happened during his abſence. After a certain number of months he again re-appeared on the earth with a grim and ghaſtly countenance, and declared, in the aſſembly of the people, that he was returned from hell. From ſimilar exaggerations, it has been aſſerted that he appeared at the Olympic games with a golden thigh, and that he could write in letters of blood whatever he pleaſed on a looking glaſs, and that, by ſetting it oppoſite to the moon, when full, all the characters which were on the glaſs became legible on the moon's diſc. They alſo ſupport, that, by ſome magical words, he tamed a bear, ſtopped the flight of an eagle, and appeared on the ſame day and at the ſame inſtant in the cities of Crotona and Metapontum, &c. The time and the place of the death of this great philoſopher are unknown; yet many ſuppoſe that he died at Metapontum about 497 years before Chriſt; and ſo great was the veneration of the people of Magna Græcia for him, that he received the ſame honors as were paid to the immortal gods, and his houſe became a ſacred temple. Pythagoras had a daughter, called Damo. There is now extant a poetical compoſition aſcribed to the philoſopher, and called the golden verſes of Pythagoras, which contain the greateſt part of his doctrines, and moral precepts; but many ſupport, that it is a ſuppoſitious compoſition, and that the true name of the writer was Lyſis. Pythagoras diſtinguiſhed himſelf alſo by his diſcoveries in geometry, aſtronomy, and mathematics, and it is to him that the world is indebted for the demonſtration of the 47th propoſition of the firſt book of Euclid's elements, about the ſquare of the hypothenuſe. It is ſaid, that he was ſo elated after making the diſcovery, that he made an offering of a hetacomb to the gods; but the ſacrifice was undoubtedly of ſmall oxen, made with wax, as the philoſopher was ever an enemy to ſhedding the blood blood of all animals. His ſyſtem of the univerſe, in which he placed the ſun in the center, and all the planets moving in elliptical orbits round it, was deemed chimerical and improbable, till the deep enquiries and the philoſophy of the 16th century proved it, by the moſt accurate calculations, to be true and inconteſtible. Diogenes, Porphyry, Iamblicus, and others, have written an account of his life, but with more erudition, perhaps, than veracity. *Cic. de Nat. Pytheas, an archon at Athens.——A native of Maſſilia, famous for his knowledge of aſtronomy, mathematics, philoſophy, and geography. He alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his travels, and, with a mind that wiſhed to ſeek information in every corner of the earth, he advanced far into the northern ſeas, and diſcovered the iſland of Thule, and entered that then unknown ſea which is now called the Baltic. His diſcoveries in aſtronomy and geography were ingenious, and, indeed, modern navigators have found it expedient to juſtify and accede to his concluſions. He was the firſt who eſtabliſhed a diſtinction of climate by the length of days and nights. He wrote different treatiſes in Greek, which have been loſt, though ſome of them were extant in the beginning of the fifth century. Pytheas lived, according to ſome, in the age of Ariſtotle. Strab. 2, &c.—Plin. 37.——An Athenian rhetorician, in the age of Demoſthenes, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his intrigues and oppoſition to the meaſures of Demoſthenes, of whom he obſerved, that his orations ſmelt of the lamp. Pytheas joined Antipater after the death of Alexander the Great. Plut. in Dem.

Pythes, a native of Abdera, in Thrace, who obtained a crown at the Olympian games. Pauſ. 6.

Pytheus, a Lydian, famous for his riches, in the age of Xerxes. He kindly entertained the monarch and all his army, when he was marching on his expedition againſt Greece, and offered him to defray the expences of the whole war. Xerxes thanked him with much gratitude, and promiſed to give him whatever he ſhould require. Pytheus aſked him to diſmiſs his ſon from the expedition: upon which the monarch ordered the young man to be cut into two, and one half of the body to be placed on the right hand of the way, and the other on the left, that his army might march between them. Herodot.

Pythia, the prieſteſs of Apollo at Delphi. She delivered the anſwers of the god to ſuch as came to conſult the oracle, and was ſuppoſed to be ſuddenly inſpired by the ſulphureous vapors which iſſued from the hole of a ſubterraneous cavity within the temple, over which ſhe ſat bare on a three legged ſtool, called a tripod. In the ſtool was a ſmall aperture, through which the vapor was exhaled by the prieſteſs, and, at this divine inſpiration, her eyes ſuddenly ſparkled, her hair ſtood on end, and a ſhivering ran over all her body. In this convulſive ſtate ſhe ſpoke the oracles of the god, often with loud howlings and cries, and her articulations were taken down by the prieſt, and ſet in order. Sometimes the ſpirit of inſpiration was more gentle, and not always violent; yet Plutarch mentions one of the prieſteſſes who was thrown into ſuch an exceſſive fury, that not only thoſe that conſulted the oracle, but alſo the prieſts that conducted her to the ſacred tripod, and attended her during the inſpiration, were terrified, and forſook the temple; and ſo violent was the fit, that ſhe continued for ſome days in the moſt agoniz ng ſituation, and at laſt died. The Pythia, before ſhe placed herſelf on the tripod, uſed to waſh her whole body, and particularly her hair, in the waters of the fountain Caſtalis, at the foot of mount Parnaſſus. She alſo ſhook a laurel tree that grew near the place, and ſometimes eat the leaves with which ſhe crowned herſelf. The prieſteſs was originally a virgin, but the inſtitution was changed when Echechrates, a Theſſalian, had offered violence to one of them, and none but women who were above the age of fifty were permitted to enter upon that ſacred office. They always appeared dreſſed in the garments of virgins to intimate their purity and modeſty, and they were ſolemnly bound to obſerve the ſtricteſt laws of temperance and chaſtity, that neither phantaſtical dreſſes nor laſcivious behaviour might bring the office, the religion, or the ſanctity of the place into contempt. There was originally but one Pythia, beſides ſubordinate prieſts, and afterwards two were choſen, and ſometimes more. The moſt celebrated of all theſe is Phemonoe, who is ſuppoſed by ſome to have been the firſt who gave oracles at Delphi. The oracles were always delivered in hexameter verſes, a cuſtom which was ſome time after diſcontinued. The Pythia was conſulted only one month in the year, about the ſpring. It was always required that thoſe who conſulted the oracle ſhould make large preſents to Apollo, and from thence aroſe the opulence, ſplendor, and the magnificence of that celebrated temple of Delphi. Sacrifices were alſo offered to the divinity, and if the omens proved unfavorable the prieſteſs refuſed to give an anſwer. There were generally five prieſts who aſſiſted at the offering of the ſacrifices, and there was alſo another who attended the Pythia, and aſſiſted her in receiving the oracle. 16.—Strab. 6 & 9.—Justin. 24, c. 5.—Plut. de orac. def.—Eurip. in Ion.—Chrysost.——Games celebrated in honor of Apollo, near the temple of Delphi. They were first instituted, according to the more received opinion, by Apollo himself, in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained over the serpent Python, from which they received their name; though others maintain that they were first established by Agamemnon, or Diomedes, or by Amphictyon, or lastly by the council of the Amphictyons. B. C. 1263. They were originally celebrated once in nine years, but afterwards every fifth year, on the second year of every olympiad, according to the number of the Parnassian nymphs who congratulated Apollo after his victory. The gods themselves were originally among the number of the combatants, and according to some authors the first prizes were won by Pollux, in boxing; Castor, in horse-races; Hercules in the pancratium; Zetes, in fighting with the armour; Calais, in running; Telamon, in wrestling; and Peleus in throwing the quoit. These illustrious conquerors were rewarded by Apollo himself, who was present, with crowns and laurel. Some however observe, that at first it was nothing but a musical contention, in which he who sang best the praises of Apollo, obtained the prize, which was presents of gold or silver, which were afterwards exchanged for a garland of the palm tree, or of beech leaves. It is said, that Hesiod was refused admission to these games, because he was not able to play upon the harp, which was required of all such as entered the lists. The songs which were sung were called πυθικοι νομοι, the Pythian modes, divided into five parts, which contained a representation of the fight and victory of Apollo over Python; ανακρουσις, the preparation for the fight; εμπειρια, the first attempt; καταχελευσμος, taking breath and collecting courage; ιαμβοι και δακτυλοι, the insulting sarcasms of the god over his vanquished enemy; συριγγες, an imitation of the hisses of the serpent, just as he expired under the blows of Apollo. A dance was also introduced; and in the 48th Olympiad, the Amphictyons, who presided over the games, encreased the number of musical instruments by the addition of a flute, but, as it was more peculiarly used in funeral songs and lamentations, it was soon rejected, as unfit for merriment, and the festivals which represented the triumph of Apollo over the conquered serpent. The Romans, according to some, introduced them into their city, and called them Apollinares ludi.—Paus. 10, c. 13 & 37.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 237.—Plin. 7.—Liv. 25.

PYTHIUS, a surname of Apollo, which he received for his having conquered the serpent Python.

PYTHO, the ancient name of the town of Delphi, which it received απο του πυθεσθαι because the serpent which Apollo killed rotted there. It was also called Parnassia Nape. Vid. Delphi.

PYTHOCHARIS, a musician who assuaged the fury of some wolves by playing on a musical instrument, &c. Ælian.

PYTHOCLES, an Athenian descended from Aratus. It is said, that on his account, and for his instruction, Plutarch wrote the life of Aratus.——A man put to death with Phocion.——A man who wrote on Italy.

PYTHODORUS an Athenian archon in the age of Themistocles.

PYTHOLAUS, the brother of Thebe the wife of Alexander tyrant of Pheræ. He assisted his sister in dispatching her husband. Plut.

PYTHON, a native of Byzantium in the age of Philip of Macedonia. He was a great favorite of the monarch who sent him to Thebes, when that city, at the instigation of Demosthenes, was going to take up arms against Philip. Plut. in Dem.—Diod.—One of the friends of Alexander put to death by Ptolemy Lagus.—A man who killed Cotys king of Thrace at the instigation of the Athenians.—A celebrated serpent sprung from the mud and stagnated waters which remained on the surface of the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. Some, however, suppose that it was produced from the earth by Juno, and sent by the goddess to persecute Latona, who was then pregnant by Jupiter. Latona escaped his fury by means of her lover who changed her into a quail during the remaining months of her pregnancy, and afterwards restored her to her original shape in the island of Delos, where she gave birth to Apollo and Diana. Apollo, as soon as he was born, attacked the monster, and killed him with his arrows, and in commemoration of the victory which he had obtained, he instituted the celebrated Pythian games. Strab. 8.—Paus. 2, c. 7, l. 10, c. 6.—Hygin.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 438, &c.—Lucan. 5, v. 134.

PYTHONICE, an Athenian prostitute greatly honored by Harpalus, whom Alexander sometime before had intrusted with the treasures of Babylon. He married her; and according to some, she died the very moment that the nuptials were going to be celebrated. He raised her a splendid monument on the road which led from Athens to Eleusis, which cost him 30 talents. Diod. 17.—Paus. 1.—Athen. 13. &c.

PYTHONISSA, a name given to the priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi. She is more generally called Pythia. [Vid. Pythia.] The word Pythonissa was commonly applied to women who attempted to explain futurity.

PYTNA, a part of Mount Ida.

PYTTALUS, a celebrated athlete who obtained a prize at the olympic games. Paus. 9, c. 16.

QUADERNA,

QUADERNA, a town of Italy.

QUADI, an antient nation of Germany, near the country of the Marcomanni, on the borders of the Danube. They rendered themſelves celebrated by their oppoſition to the Romans, by whom they were often defeated, though not totally ſubdued. Tacit. in Germ. 42.

QUADRĀTUS, a ſirname given to Mercury, becauſe ſome of his ſtatues were ſquare. ——A governor of Syria in the age of Nero.

QUADRIFRONS or QUADRICEPS, a ſirname of Janus, becauſe he was repreſented with four heads. He had a temple on the Tarpeian rock, raiſed by L. Catulus.

QUÆSTORES, two officers at Rome, firſt created A. U. C. 269. They received their name a quærendo, becauſe they collected the revenues of the ſtate, and had the total management of the public treaſury. The quæſtorſhip was the firſt office which could be had in the ſtate. It was requiſite that the candidates ſhould be 24 or 25 years of age, or according to ſome 27. In the year 332, U. C. two more were added to the others, to attend the conſuls, to take care of the pay of the armies abroad, and to ſell the plunder and booty which had been acquired by conqueſt. Theſe were called Peregrini, whilſt the others whoſe employment was in the city, received the name of Urbani. When the Romans were maſters of Italy, four more were created, A. U. C. 439, to attend the pro-conſuls and proprætors in their provinces, and to collect all the taxes and cuſtoms which each particular diſtrict owed to the republic. They were called Provinciales. Sylla the dictator created 20 quæſtors, and J. Cæſar 40, to fill up the vacant ſeats in the ſenate; from whence it is evident that the quæſtors ranked as ſenators in the ſenate. The quæſtors were always appointed by the ſenate at Rome, and if any perſon was appointed to the quæſtorſhip without their permiſſion he was only called Proquæſtor. The quæſtores urbani were apparently of more conſequence than the reſt, the treaſury was entruſted to their care, they kept an account of all receipts and diſburſements, and the Roman eagles or enſigns were always in their poſſeſſion when the armies were not on an expedition. They required every general before he triumphed to tell them upon his oath, that he had given a juſt account of the number of the ſlain on both ſides, and that he had been ſaluted imperator by the ſoldiers, a title which every commander generally received from his army after he had obtained a victory, and which was afterwards confirmed and approved by the ſenate. The city quæſtors had alſo the care of the ambaſſadors, they lodged and received them, and ſome time after when Auguſtus was declared emperor, they kept the decrees of the ſenate, which had been before entruſted with the ediles and the tribunes. This gave riſe to two new offices of truſt and honor, one of which was quæſtor palatii, and the other quæſtor principis or auguſti, ſometimes called candidatus principis. The tent of the quæſtor in the camp was called quæſtorium. It ſtood near that of the general.

QUARI, a people of Gaul.

QUARIUS, a river of Bœotia.

QUERCENS, a Rutulian who fought againſt the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 9. v. 684.

QUIETIS FANUM, a temple without the walls of the city of Rome. Quies was the goddeſs of reſt. Her temple was ſituate near the Colline gate.

L. QUIETUS, an officer under the emperor Trajan, who behaved with great valor in the expeditions which were undertaken by the army which he commanded. He was put to death by Adrian.

QUINCTIANUS, a man who conſpired againſt Nero, for which he was put to death.

QUINCTILIA, a comedian who refuſed to betray a conſpiracy which had been formed againſt Caligula.

QUINCTIUS T. a Roman conſul who gained ſome victories over the Æqui and the Volſci, and obtained a triumph for ſubduing Prænesſte.——Cæſo, a man accuſed before the Roman people, and vindicated by his father Cincinnatus.——A Roman celebrated for his frugality. [Vid. Cincinnatus.]——A maſter of horſe.——A Roman conſul when Annibal invaded Italy.——A brother of Flaminius, baniſhed from the ſenate by Cato, for killing a Gaul.——An officer killed by the Carthaginians.——An officer under Dolabella.——Another who defeated the Latins.——A conſul who obtained a victory over the Volſci.——Hirpinus. Vid. Hirpinus.

QUINDA, a town of Cilicia.

QUINDECIMVIRI, an order of prieſts whom Tarquin the proud appointed to take care of the Sibyline books. They were originally two, but afterwards the number was increaſed to ten, to whom Sylla added five more, whence their name. Vid. Decemviri & Duumviri.

QUINQUATRIA, a feſtival in honor of Minerva at Rome, which continued during five days. The beginning of the celebration was the 18th of March. The firſt day's ſacrifices and oblations were preſented, but, however, without the effuſion of blood. On the ſecond, third and fourth days, ſhows of gladiators were exhibited, and on the fifth day there was a ſolemn proceſſion through the ſtreets of the city. On the days of the celebration, ſcholars obtained holydays, and it was uſual for them to offer prayers to Minerva for learning and wiſdom, which the goddeſs patronized; and on their return to ſchool, they preſented their maſter with a gift which has received the name of Minerval. They were much the ſame at the Panathenæa of the Greeks. Plays were alſo acted and diſputations were held on ſubjects of literature. They received their name from the five days which were devoted for the celebration.

QUINQUENNĀLES LUDI, games celebrated by the Chians in honor of Homer every fifth year. There were alſo ſome games among the Romans which bore this name. They are the ſame as the Actian games. Vid. Actia.

QUINTIA PRATA, a place on the borders of the Tiber near Rome. Liv. 3, c. 26.

QUINTILIĀNUS Marcus Fabius, a celebrated rhetorician born in Spain. He opened a ſchool of rhetoric at Rome, and was the firſt who obtained a ſalary from the ſtate as being a public teacher. After he had remained twenty years in this laborious employment, and obtained the merited applauſe of the moſt illuſtrious Romans, not only as a preceptor, but as a pleader at the bar, Quintilian, by the permiſſion of the emperor Domitian, retired to enjoy the fruits of his labors and induſtry. In his retirement he aſſiduouſly dedicated his time to the ſtudy of literature, and wrote a treatiſe on the cauſes of the corruption of eloquence. Some time after, at the preſſing ſolicitations of his friends, he wrote his inſtitutiones oratoriæ, the moſt perfect and complete ſyſtem of oratory extant. It is divided into 12 books, in which the author explains from obſervation, as well as from experience, what can conſtitute a good and perfect orator, and in this he not only mentions the purſuits and the employments of the rhetorician, but he alſo ſpeaks of his education, and begins with the attention which ought to be ſhewn him even in his cradle. He was appointed preceptor to the two young princes whom Domitian deſtined for his ſucceſſors on the throne, but the pleaſures which the rhetorician received from the favors and the attention of the emperor, and from the ſucceſs which his writings met in the world, were embittered by the loſs of his wife, and of his two ſons. It is ſaid that Quintilian was poor in his retirement, and that his indigence was relieved by the liberality of his pupil Pliny, the younger. He died A. D. 95. His inſtitutions were diſcovered in the 1415th year of the Chriſtian era, in an old tower of a monaſtery at St. Gal, by Poggio Bracciolini, a native of Florence. The beſt editions of Quintilian are thoſe of Geſner, 4to. Gotting. 1738; of L. Bat. 8vo. cum notis variorum 1665; and of Gibſon, 4to. Oxon. 1693.

QUINTILIUS VARUS, a Roman governor of Syria. [Vid Varus.]——A friend of the emperor Alexander.——A man put to death by the emperor Severus.

QUINTILLA, a courtezan at Rome, &c. Juv. 7, v. 75.

QUINTILLUS M. Aurelius Claudius, a brother of Claudius, who proclaimed himſelf emperor, and 17 days after deſtroyed himſelf by opening his veins in a bath, when he heard that Aurelian was marching againſt him, about the 270th year of the Chriſtian era.

QUINTIUS, one of the names of Cincinnatus, Perſ. 1, v. 73.

QUINTUS CURTIUS RUFUS, a Latin hiſtorian, who floriſhed, as ſome ſuppoſe, in the reign of Veſpaſian or Trajan. He has rendered himſelf known by his hiſtory of the reign of Alexander the great. This hiſtory was divided into 10 books, of which the two firſt, the end of the fifth, and the beginning of the ſixth are loſt. This work is admired for its elegance, the purity, and the floridneſs of the ſtyle. It is however blamed for great anachroniſms, and glaring miſtakes in geography, as well as hiſtory. Freinſhemius has written a ſupplement to Curtius, in which he ſeems to have made ſome very ſatisfactory amends for the loſs which the hiſtory has ſuffered, by a learned collection of facts and circumſtances from all the different authors who have employed their pen in writing an account of Alexander, and of his Aſiatic conqueſts. Some ſuppoſe that the hiſtorian is the ſame with that Curtius Rufus, who lived in the age of Claudius, under whom he was made conſul. This Rufus was born of an obſcure family, and he attended a Roman quæſtor in Africa, when he was met at Adrumetum by a woman above an human ſhape, as he was walking under the porticos in the middle of the day. This extraordinary character addreſſed the indigent Roman, and told him that the day ſhould come in which he ſhould govern Africa with conſular power. This ſtrange prophecy animated Rufus, he repaired to Rome, where he gained the favors of the emperor, obtained conſular honors, and at laſt retired as proconſul to Africa, where he died. The beſt editions of Curtius are thoſe of Elzevir, 8vo. Amſt. 1673; of Snakenburg 4to. L. Bat. 1724; and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris 1757. Tacit. ann. 11, c. 23, &c.

REDŎNES, a nation among the Armorici. Cæſ.

REGILLÆ, a town in the country of the Sabines in Italy, about 20 miles from Rome, celebrated celebrated for a battle which was fought there, A. U. C. 258, between 24,000 Romans, and 40,000 Etrurians, who were headed by the Tarquins. The Romans obtained the victory, and scarce 10,000 of the enemy escaped from the field of battle. Castor and Pollux, according to some accounts, were seen mounted on white horses, and fighting at the head of the Roman army. Liv. 2.—Dionys. Hal. 5.—Plut. in Cor.—Val. Max. 1.—Flor. 1.

Regillianus, Q. Nonius, a Dacian who entered the Roman armies, and was raised to the greatest honors under Valerian. He was elected emperor by the populace, who were dissatisfied with Gallienus, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers, A. D. 262.

Regillus, a small lake of Latium.

M. Attilius Regulus, a consul during the first Punic war. He reduced Brundusium, and in his second consulship he took 64, and sunk 30, gallies of the Carthaginian fleet, on the coasts of Sicily. Afterwards he landed in Africa, and so rapid was his success, that in a short time he made himself master of about 200 places of consequence on the coast. The Carthaginians sued for peace, but the conqueror refused to grant it, and soon after he was defeated in a battle by Xanthippus, and 30,000 of his men were left on the field of battle, and 15,000 taken prisoners. Regulus was in the number of the captives, and he was carried in triumph to Carthage. He was sent by the enemy to Rome, to propose an accommodation, and an exchange of prisoners; and if his commission was unsuccessful, he was bound by the most solemn oaths to return to Carthage without delay. When he came to Rome, Regulus dissuaded his countrymen from accepting the terms which the enemy proposed, and when his opinion had had due influence on the senate, Regulus retired to Carthage agreeable to his engagements. The Carthaginians were told that their offers of peace had been rejected at Rome, by the means of Regulus, and therefore they prepared to punish him with the greatest severity. His eye-brows were cut, and he was exposed for some days to the excessive heat of the meridian sun, and afterwards confined in a barrel, whose sides were every where filled with large iron spikes, till he died in the greatest agonies. His sufferings were heard at Rome, and the senate permitted his widow to inflict whatever punishment she pleased on some of the most illustrious captives of Carthage, which were in their hands. She confined them also in presses filled with sharp iron points, and was so exquisite in her cruelty, that the senate at last interfered, and stopped the barbarity of her punishments. Regulus died about 251 years before Christ. Sil. 6, v. 319.—Flor. 2, c. 3.—Horat. 3, Od. 5.—Cic. de off. 1. c. 13.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 2.—Liv. ep. 16.——Memmius, a Roman made governor of Greece by Caligula. While Regulus was in his province, the emperor wished to bring the celebrated statue of Jupiter Olympius by Phidias to Rome; but this was supernaturally prevented, and according to antient authors, the ship which was to convey it was destroyed by lightening, and the workmen who attempted to remove the statue, were terrified away by sudden noises. Dio. Cass.——A man who condemned Sejanus.——Roscius, a man who held the consulship but for one day, in the reign of Vitellius.

Remi, a nation of Gaul.

Remmia lex de judiciis, was enacted to punish all calumniators. The letter K was marked on their forehead. Cic. pro Ros.

Rĕmŭlus Sylvius, a king of Alba, destroyed by lightening on account of his impiety. Ovid. Trist. 4, v. 50.

Remuria, festivals established at Rome by Romulus, to appease the manes of his brother Remus. They were afterwards called Lemuria, and celebrated yearly.

Remus, the brother of Romulus, was exposed together with him, by the cruelty of his grandfather. In the contest which happened between the two brothers about building a city, Romulus obtained the preference, and Remus, for ridiculing the rising walls, was put to death by his brother's orders, or by Romulus himself. [Vid. Romulus.] The Romans were afflicted with a plague after this murder, upon which the oracle was consulted, and the manes of Remus appeased by the institution of the Remuria. Ovid.——One of the auxiliaries of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 330.

Rhacōtis, an antient name of Alexandria, the capital of Egypt. Pauſ. 5, c. 21.

Rhadamanthus, a ſon of Jupiter and Europa. He was born in Crete, which he abandoned about the 30th year of his age. He paſſed into ſome of the Cyclades, where he reigned with ſo much juſtice and impartiality, that the antients have ſaid he became one of the judges of hell, and that he was employed in the infernal regions in obliging the dead to confeſs their crimes, and in puniſhing them for their offences. Rhadamanthus reigned not only over ſome of the Cyclades, but over many of the Greek cities of Aſia. Pauſ. 8, c. 53.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 435.—Diod. 5.—Plato.—Homer. Il. 4, v. 564.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 566.

Rhadamistus, a ſon of Pharnaſmanes king of Iberia. He married Zenobia, the daughter of his uncle Mithridates, king of Armenia, and ſome time after put him to death. He was put to death by his father for his cruelties, about the year 52d of the Chriſtian era. Tacit. ann. 13, c. 37.

Rhadius, a ſon of Neleus.

Rhæteum, a city of Phrygia.

Rhæti or Ræti, an antient and warlike nation of Etruria. They were driven from their native country by the Gauls, and went to ſettle on the other ſide of the Alps. Plin. 3, c. 20.—Juſtin. 20, c. 5.

Rhætia, a country at the north of Italy, between the Alps and the Danube, which now forms the territories of the Griſons of Tyrol and part of Italy. It was divided into two parts, Rhætia prima and Rhætia ſecunda. The firſt extended from the ſources of the Rhine to thoſe of the Licus, a ſmall river which falls into the Danube. The other, called alſo Vindelicia, extended from the Licus to another ſmall river called Œnus, towards the eaſt. The principal towns of Rhætia were called Curia, Tridentum, Belunum, Feltria. The Rhætians rendered themſelves formidable by the frequent invaſions they made upon the Roman empire, and were at laſt conquered by Druſus, the brother of Tiberius, and others under the Roman emperors. Strab. 4.—Plin. 3, c. 20, l. 14, c. 2, &c.—Horat. 4, Od. 4, & 14.

Rhea, a daughter of Cœlus and Terra, who married Saturn, by whom ſhe had Veſta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, &c. Her huſband, however, devoured them all as ſoon as born, as he had ſucceeded to the throne with the ſolemn promiſe that he would raiſe no male children, or according to others, becauſe he had been informed by an oracle, that one of his ſons would dethrone him. To ſtop the cruelty of her huſband, Rhea conſulted her parents, and was adviſed to impoſe upon him, or perhaps to fly into Crete. Accordingly, when ſhe brought forth, the child was immediately concealed, and Saturn devoured up a ſtone which his wife had given him as her own child. The fears of Saturn were ſoon proved to be well founded. A year after the child, whoſe name was Jupiter, became ſo ſtrong and powerful, that he drove his father from his throne. Rhea has been confounded by the mythologiſts with ſome of the other goddeſſes, and ſome have ſuppoſed that it was the ſame divinity that received adoration under the various names of Bona Dea, Cybele, Dindymena, Magna mater, Ceres, Veſta, Titæa and Terra, Tellus, & Ops. [Vid. Cybele, Ceres, Veſta, &c.] Rhea, after the expulſion of her huſband from his throne, followed him to Italy, where he eſtabliſhed a kingdom. Her benevolence in this part of Europe was ſo great that the golden age of Saturn is often called the age of Rhea. Heſiod. Theog.—Orpheus. in Hymn.—Homer. ib.—Æſchyl. Prom.—*Euripid. Rhegium, a town of Italy, in the country of the Brutii, oppoſite Meſſana in Sicily, where a colony of Meſſenians, under Alcidamidas ſettled, B. C. 723. It was originally called Rhegium, and afterwards Rhegium Julium, to diſtinguiſh it from Rhegium Lepidi, a town of Ciſalpine Gaul. Some ſuppoſe that it received its name from the Greek word ῥηγνυμι, to break, becauſe it is ſituate on the ſtreights of Carybdis, which were formed when the iſland of Sicily, as it were, was broken and ſeparated from the continent of Italy. This town has always been ſubject to great earthquakes, by which it has often been deſtroyed. Sil. 13, v. 94.—Cic. pro Arch. 3.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 5, & 48.—Juſtin. 4, c. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 6.

Rhēgusci, a people of the Alps.

Rhemi, Vid. Remi.

Rhēnea, a ſmall iſland of the Ægean, about 200 yards from Delos, 18 miles in circumference. The inhabitants of Delos always buried their dead there, as their own iſland was conſecrated to Apollo, where no dead bodies were to be inhumated. Strabo ſays, that it was uninhabited, though it was once as populous and floriſhing as the reſt of the Cyclades. Polycrates conquered it, and conſecrated it to Apollo, after he had tied it to Delos by means of a long chain. Rhene was ſometimes called the ſmall Delos, and the iſland of Delos the great Delos. Thucyd. 3.—Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

Rheni, a people on the borders of the Rhine.

Rhēnus, one of the largeſt rivers of Europe, which divides Germany from Gaul. It riſes in the Rhætian Alps, and falls into the German ocean. Virgil has called it bicornis, becauſe it divides itſelf into two ſtreams. The river Rhine was a long time a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, and on that account its banks were covered with ſtrong caſtles. J. Cæſar was the firſt Roman who croſſed it to invade Germany. The waters of that river were held in great veneration, and were ſuppoſed by the antient Germans to have ſome peculiar virtue, as they threw their children into it, either to try the fidelity of the mothers, or to brace and invigorate their limbs. If the child ſwam on the ſurface, the mother was acquitted of ſuſpicion, but if it ſunk to the bottom, its origin was deemed illegitimate. In modern geography the Rhine is known as dividing itſelf into four large branches, the Waal, Lech, Iſſel, and the Rhine. That branch which ſtill retains the name of Rhine loſes itſelf in the ſands above modern Leyden, and is afterwards no longer known by its antient appellation, ſince the year 860, A. D. when the inundations of the ſea deſtroyed the regularity of its mouth. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 258.—Strab. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 5, l. 3, c. 2.—Cæſar. de bell. G. 4, c. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 6.—*Virg. Rhēsus, a king of Thrace, ſon of the Strymon and Terpſichore, or, according to others, of Eioneus by Euterpe. After many warlike exploits and conqueſts in Europe, he marched to the aſſiſtance of Priam, king of Troy, againſt the Greeks. He was expected with great impatience, as an antient oracle had declared, that Troy ſhould never be taken, if the horſes of Rheſus drank the waters of the Xanthus, and fed upon the graſs of the Trojan plains. This oracle was well known to the Greeks, and therefore two of their beſt generals, Diomedes and Ulyſſes were commiſſioned by the reſt to go in queſt of the Thracian prince. The Greeks entered his camp in the night, ſlew him, and carried away his horſes to their camp. Homer. Il. 10.—Dictys. Cret. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 473.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 98.

Rhodus, a celebrated iſland in the Carpathian ſea, 120 miles in circumference, at the ſouth of Caria, from which it is diſtant about 20 miles. Its principal cities were Rhodes, founded about 408 years before the Chriſtian era, Lindus, Camiſus, Jalyſus. Rhodes was famous for a celebrated ſtatue of Apollo. [Vid. Coloſſus.] The Rhodians were originally governed by kings, and were independent, and this government was at laſt exchanged for democracy and ariſtocracy. They were naturally given up to commerce, and during many ages, they were the moſt powerful nation by ſea. Their authority was reſpected, and their laws were ſo univerſally approved, that every country made uſe of them to decide diſputes concerning maritime affairs, and they were at laſt adopted by other commercial nations, and introduced into the Roman codes. When Alexander made himſelf maſter of Aſia, the Rhodians loſt their independence, but they ſoon after aſſerted their natural privileges under his cruel ſucceſſors, and continued to hold that influence among nations to which their maritime power and conſequence entitled them. They aſſiſted Pompey againſt Cæſar, and were defeated by Caſſius, and became dependent upon the Romans. The iſland of Rhodes has been known by the ſeveral names of Ophiuſa, Stadia, Telchinis, Corymbia, Trinacria, Æthrea, Aſteria, Poeſſa, Atabyria, Oloeſſa, Marcia, and Pelagia. It received the name of Rhodes, either on account of Rhode, a beautiful nymph who dwelt there, and who was one of the favorites of Apollo, or becauſe roſes (ῥοδον) grew in great abundance all over the iſland. Strab. 14.—Homer Il. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 87, l. 5, c. 31.—Flor. 2, c. 7.—*Pindar. Roma, a city of Italy, the capital of the Roman empire; ſituate on the banks of the river Tiber, at the diſtance of about 16 miles from the ſea. The name of its founder, and the manner of its foundation are not preciſely known. Romulus, however, is univerſally ſuppoſed to have laid the foundations of that celebrated city, on the 20th of April, according to Varro, in the year 3961 of the Julian period, 3251 years after the creation of the world, 753 before the birth of Chriſt, and 431 years after the Trojan war, and in the 4th year of the ſixth Olympiad. In its original ſtate, Rome was but a ſmall caſtle on the ſummit of mount Palatine, and the founder, to give his followers the appearance of a nation, or a barbarian horde, was obliged to erect a ſtandard as a common aſylum for every criminal, debtor, or murderer, who fled from their native country to avoid the puniſhment which attended them. From ſuch an aſſemblage a numerous body was ſoon collected, and before the death of the founder, the Romans had covered with their habitations, the Palatine, Capitoline, Aventine, Eſquiline hills, with mount Cœlius, and Quirinalis. After many ſucceſsful wars againſt the neighbouring ſtates, the views of Romulus were directed to regulate a nation naturally fierce, warlike, and uncivilized. The people were divided into claſſes, the intereſts of the whole were linked in a common chain, and the labors of the ſubject, as well as thoſe of his patron, tended to the ſame end, the aggrandizement of the ſtate. Under the ſucceſſors of Romulus, the power of Rome was encreaſed, and the boundaries of her dominions extended; while one was employed in regulating the forms of worſhip, and in inculcating in the minds of his ſubjects a reverence for the deity, the other was engaged in enforcing diſcipline among the army, and raiſing the conſequence of the ſoldiers in the government of the ſtate, and a third made the object of his adminiſtration conſiſt in adorning his capital, in beautifying the edifices, and in fortifying all with towers and walls. During 244 years, the Romans were governed by kings, but the tyranny, the oppreſſion, and the violence of the laſt of theſe monarchs, and of his family, became ſo atrocious, that a revolution happened in the ſtate, and the democratical government was eſtabliſhed. The monarchical government exiſted under ſeven princes, who began to reign in the following order: Romulus, B. C. 753; and after one year's interregnum, Numa, 715; Tullus Hoſtilius, 672; Ancus Martius, 640; Tarquin Priſcus, 616; Servius Tullius, 578; and Tarquin the Proud, 534, expelled 25 years after, B. C. 509; and this regal adminiſtration has been properly denominated the infancy of the Roman empire. After the expulſion of the Tarquins from the throne, the Romans became more ſenſible of their conſequence, with their liberty they acquired a ſpirit of faction, and they became ſo jealous of their independence, that the firſt of their conſuls who had been the moſt zealous and animated in the aſſertion of their freedom, was baniſhed from the city becauſe he bore the name, and was of the family, of the tyrants; and another, to ſtop their ſuſpicions, was obliged to pull down his houſe, whoſe ſtateline ſs and magnificence above the reſt, ſeemed incompatible with the duties and the rank of a private citizen. They knew more effectually their power when they had fought with ſucceſs againſt Porſenna, the king of Etruria, and ſome of the neighbouring ſtates who ſupported the claim of the tyrant, and attempted to replace him on his throne by force of arms. A government which is entruſted into the hands of two of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of its members, for the limited ſpace of one year, cannot but give riſe to great men, glorious exploits, and tremendous ſeditions. The general who is placed at the head of an army during a campaign, muſt be active and diligent, when he knows that his power is terminated with the year, and if he has a becoming ambition, he will diſtinguiſh his conſulſhip by ſome uncommon act of valor, before fore he deſcends from the dignity of an abſolute magiſtrate to the dependence of a fellow citizen. Yet theſe attempts for the attainment of glory, often fail of ſucceſs; and though the Romans could once boaſt that every individual in their armies could diſcharge with fidelity and honor the ſuperior offices of magiſtrate and conſul, there are to be found in their annals many years marked by overthrows, or diſgraced by the ill conduct, the oppreſſion, and the wantonneſs of their generals, [Vid. Conſul.] To the fame which their conqueſts and daily ſucceſſes had gained abroad, the Romans were not a little indebted for their gradual riſe to ſuperiority; and to this may be added the policy of the cenſus, which every fifth year told them their actual ſtrength, and how many citizens were able to bear arms. And indeed it was no ſmall ſatisfaction to a people who were continually making war, to ſee, that in ſpite of all the loſſes which they might ſuſtain in the field, the encreaſe of the inhabitants of the city was prodigious, and almoſt incredible, and had Romulus lived after the battle of Actium, he never would have been perſuaded that above four millions of inhabitants were contained within thoſe walls, which in the moſt floriſhing period of his reign could ſcarce muſter an army of 3000 infantry, and 300 horſe. But when Rome had floriſhed under the conſular government for about 120 years, and had beheld with pleaſure the conqueſts of her citizens over the neighbouring ſtates and cities which, according to a Roman hiſtorian, ſhe was aſhamed to recollect in the ſummit of her power, an irruption of barbarians rendered its very exiſtence precarious, and her name was nearly extinguiſhed. The valor of an injured individual, [Vid. Camillus,] ſaved it from deſtruction, yet not before its buildings and temples were reduced to aſhes. This celebrated event, which gave the appellation of another founder of Rome to Camillus, has been looked upon as a glorious æra to the Romans. The huts and cottages which Romulus had erected, and all his ſucceſſors repaired, were totally conſumed, and when the city aroſe again from its ruins, the ſtreets were enlarged, convenience as well as order was obſerved, taſte and regularity were conſulted, and the poverty, ignorance, and ruſticity of the Romans, ſeemed to be extinguiſhed with the old habitations. But no ſooner were they freed from the fears of their barbarian invaders, than they turned their arms againſt thoſe ſtates which refuſed to acknowledge their ſuperiority, or yield their independence. Their wars with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, diſplayed their character in a different view; if they before had fought for freedom and independence, they now drew their ſwords for glory; and here we may ſee them conquered in the field, and yet refuſing to grant that peace for which their conqueror himſelf had ſued. The advantages they gained from their battles with Pyrrhus, were many. The Roman name became known in Greece, Sicily, and Africa, and in loſing or gaining a victory, the Romans were enabled to examine the manœuvres, obſerve the diſcipline, and contemplate the order and the encampments of thoſe ſoldiers whoſe friends and anceſtors had accompanied Alexander the great in the conqueſt of Aſia. Italy became ſubjected to the Romans at the end of the war with the Tarentines, and that period of time has been called the ſecond age, or the adoleſcence of the Roman empire. After this memorable æra they tried their ſtrength not only with diſtant nations, but alſo upon a new element; and in the long wars which they waged againſt Carthage, they acquired territory, and obtained the ſovereignty of the ſea, and though Annibal for ſixteen years kept them in continual alarms, hovered round their gates, and deſtroyed their armies almoſt before their walls, yet they were doomed to conquer, [Vid. Punicum bellum,] and ſoon to add the kingdom of Macedonia, [Vid. Macedonicum bellum,] and the provinces of Aſia, [Vid. Mithridaticum bellum,] to their empire. But while we conſider the Romans as a nation ſubduing their neighbours by war, their manners, their counſels, and their purſuits at home are not to be forgotten. To be warriors was their profeſſion; their aſſemblies in the Campus Martius were a meeting of armed men, and very properly denominated an army. Yet while their conqueſts were ſo extenſive abroad, we find them torn by factions at home, and ſo far was the reſentment of the poorer citizens carried, that we ſee the enemy at the gates of the city, while all are unwilling to take up arms and to unite in the defence of their common liberty. The ſenators and the nobles were ambitious of power, and endeavored to retain in their hands that influence which had been exerciſed with ſo much ſucceſs, and ſuch cruelty by their monarchs. This was the continual occaſion of tumults and ſedition. The people were jealous of their liberty. The oppreſſion of the nobles irritated them, and the ſtripes to which they were too often expoſed without mercy, was often productive of revolutions. The plebeians, though originally the pooreſt and moſt contemptible citizens of an indigent nation, whoſe food in the firſt ages of the empire was only bread and ſalt, and whoſe drink was water, ſoon gained rights and privileges by their oppoſition. Though really ſlaves, they became powerful in the ſtate; one conceſſion from the patricians produced another, and when their independence was boldly aſſerted by their tribunes, they were admitted to ſhare in the higheſt offices of the ſtate, and the laws which forbad the intermarriage of plebeian and patrician families, were repealed, and the meaneſt peaſant could by valor and fortitude be raiſed to the dignity of dictator and conſul. It was not till theſe privileges were obtained by the people from the ſenate, that Rome began to enjoy internal peace and tranquility, her battles were then fought with more vigor, her ſoldiers were more animated, and her ſovereignty was more univerſally eſtabliſhed. But the ſovereign power which was lodged in the hands of a factious and ambitious citizen, was too often dangerous. The greateſt oppreſſion and tyranny was the conſequence, and from thoſe cauſes proceeded the unparalleled ſlaughter and effuſion of blood under a Sylla or a Marius. It has been juſtly obſerved, that the firſt Romans conquered their enemies by valor, temperance and fortitude; their moderation alſo and their juſtice were well known among their neighbours, and not only private poſſeſſions, but even mighty kingdoms and empires were left in their power, to be diſtributed among a family, or to be enſured in the hands of a ſucceſſor. They were alſo choſen umpires, to decide quarrels, but in this honorable office they conſulted their own intereſt; they always ſupported the weaker ſide, that the more powerful might be reduced, and gradually become their prey. Under J. Cæſar and Pompey, the rage of civil war was carried to unprecedented exceſs; it was not merely to avenge a private injury, but it was a conteſt for the ſovereignty, and though each of the adverſaries wore the maſk of ſincerity, and profeſſed himſelf to be the ſupporter of the republic, not leſs than the abolition of freedom and public liberty was the aim. What Julius began, his adopted ſon atchieved, the antient ſpirit of national independence was extinguiſhed at Rome, and after the battle of Actium, the Romans ſeemed unable to govern themſelves without the aſſiſtance of a chief, who under the title of imperator, an appellation given to every commander by his army after ſome ſignal victory, reigned with as much power and as much ſovereignty as another Tarquin. Under their emperors the Romans lived a luxurious and indolent life, they had long forgot to appear in the field, and their wars were left to be waged by mercenary troops, who fought without ſpirit or animoſity, and who were ever ready to yield to him who bought their allegiance and fidelity with the greateſt ſums of money. Their leaders themſelves were not the moſt prudent or the moſt humane, the power which they had acquired by bribery was indeed precarious, and among a people, where not only the higheſt offices of the ſtate but even the imperial purple itſelf are expoſed to ſale, there cannot be expected much happineſs or tranquility in the palace of the emperor. The reigns of the ſucceſſors of Auguſtus were diſtinguiſhed by variety; one was the moſt abandoned and profligate of men, whom his own vices and extravagance hurried out of the world, while his ſucceſſor, perhaps the moſt clement, juſt, and popular of princes, was ſacrificed in the midſt of his guards and attendants by the dagger of ſome offended favorite or diſappointed eunuch. Few indeed were the emperors of Rome whoſe days were not ſhortened by poiſon, or the ſword of an aſſaſſin. If one for ſome time had the imprudence to truſt himſelf in the midſt of a multitude, at laſt to periſh by his own credulity, the other conſulted his ſafety, but with no better ſucceſs, in the innumerable chambers of his palace, and changed every day, to elude diſcovery, the place of his retirement. After they had been governed by a race of princes, remarkable for the variety of their characters, the Roman poſſeſſions were divided into two diſtinct empires, by the enterprizing Conſtantine, A. D. 328. Conſtantinople became the ſeat of the eaſtern empire, and Rome remained in the poſſeſſion of the weſtern emperors, and continued to be the capital of their dominions. In the year 800 of the Chriſtian æra, Rome with Italy was delivered by Charlemagne, the then emperor of the weſt, into the hands of the Pope, who ſtill continues to hold the ſovereignty, and to maintain his independence under the name of the Eccleſiaſtical States.—The original poverty of the Romans has often been diſguiſed by their poets and hiſtorians, who wiſhed it to appear, that a nation who were maſters of the world, had had better beginning, than to be a race of ſhepherds and robbers. Yet it was to this ſimplicity they were indebted for their ſucceſſes. Their houſes were originally deſtitute of every ornament, they were made with unequal boards, and covered with mud, and theſe ſerved them rather as a ſhelter againſt the inclemency of the ſeaſons than for relaxation and eaſe. Till the age of Pyrrhus, they deſpiſed riches, and many ſalutary laws were enacted to reſtrain luxury and to puniſh indolence. They obſerved great temperance in their meals; young men were not permitted to drink wine till they had attained their 30th year, and it was totally forbidden to women. Their national ſpirit was ſupported by policy; the triumphal proceſſion of a conqueror along the ſtreets amidſt the applauſe of thouſands, was well calculated to promote emulation, and the numbers of gladiators which were regularly introduced not only in public games and ſpectacles, but alſo at private meetings, ſerved to cheriſh their fondneſs for war, when they could gaze with pleaſure upon wretches whom they forcibly obliged to murder one another. In their puniſhments, civil as well as military, the Romans were ſtrict and rigorous; a deſerter was ſeverely whipped and ſold as a ſlave, and the degradation from the rank of a ſoldier and dignity of a citizen was the moſt ignominious ſtigma which could be affixed upon a ſeditious mutineer. The tranſmarine victories of the Romans proved at laſt the ruin of their innocence and bravery. They were fond of the luxury of the Aſiatics; they were conquered by the vices and indolence of thoſe nations whom they had ſubdued, and became as effeminate and as luxurious as their captives. Marcellus was the firſt who introduced a taſte for the fine arts among his countrymen. The ſpoils and treaſures that were obtained in plundering Syracuſe and Corinth, rendered the Romans fond of elegance and ornament. Though Cato had deſpiſed philoſophy [Vid. Carneades] and declared that war was the only profeſſion of his countrymen, the Romans, by their intercourſe with the Greeks, ſoon became fond of literature; and though they had once baniſhed the ſophiſts of Athens from their city, yet they beheld with rapture their ſettlement among them, in the principal towns of Italy, after the conqueſt of Achaia. They ſoon after began to imitate their poliſhed captives, and to cultivate poetry with ſucceſs. They had originally rejected with horror a law which propoſed the building of a public theatre, and the exhibition of plays, like the Greeks, but they ſoon proved favorable to the compoſitions of their countrymen. Livius was the firſt dramatic writer of conſequence at Rome, whoſe plays began to be exhibited A. U. C. 514. After him Nævius and Ennius wrote for the ſtage; and in a nearer period Plautus, Terence, Cæcilius and Afranius claimed the public attention, and gained the moſt unbounded applauſe. Satire did not make its appearance at Rome till 100 years after the introduction of comedy, and ſo celebrated was Lucilius in this kind of writing, that he was called the inventor of it. In hiſtorical writing the progreſs of the Romans was ſlow and inconſiderable, and for many years they employed the pen of foreigners to compile their annals, till the ſuperior abilities of a Livy were known.—In their worſhip and ſacrifices the Romans were uncommonly ſuperſtitious, the will of the gods was conſulted on every occaſion, and no general marched to an expedition without the previous aſſurance from the augurs, that the omens were propitious, and his ſucceſs almoſt indubitable. Their ſanctuaries were numerous, they raiſed altars not only to the gods, who, as they ſuppoſed, preſided over their city, but alſo to the deities of conquered nations, as well as to the different paſſions and virtues. There were no leſs than 420 temples at Rome, crouded with ſtatues, the prieſts were numerous, and each divinity had a particular college of ſacerdotal ſervants. Their wars were declared in the moſt awful and ſolemn manner, and prayers were always offered in the temples for the proſperity of Rome, when a defeat had been ſuſtained, or a victory won. The power of the fathers over their children was very extenſive, and indeed unlimited; they could ſell them or put them to death at pleaſure, without the forms of trial or the interference of the civil magiſtrates. Many of their antient families were celebrated for the great men which they had produced, but the vigorous and intereſted part they took in the management of the republic expoſed them often to danger, and ſome have obſerved that the Romans ſunk into indolence and luxury when the Cornelii, the Fabii, the Æmylii, the Marcelli, &c. who had ſo often ſupported their ſpirit, and led them to victory, had been extinguiſhed in the bloody wars of Marius and of the two triumvirates. When Rome was become powerful, ſhe was diſtinguiſhed from other cities by the flattery of her neighbours and citizens, a form of worſhip was eſtabliſhed to her as a deity, and temples were raiſed in her honor not only in the city but in the provinces. The goddeſs Roma was repreſented like Minerva all armed and ſitting on a rock, holding a pike in her hand, with her head covered with a helmet, and a trophy at her feet. Liv. 1, &c.—*Cato de R. Rōmŭlus, a ſon of Mars and Ilia, grandſon of Numitor king of Alba, was born born at the ſame birth with Remus. Theſe two children were thrown into the Tiber by order of Amulius, who uſurped the crown of his brother Numitor; but they were preſerved, and according to Florus the river ſtopped its courſe, and a ſhe-wolf came and fed them with her milk till they were found by Fauſtulus, one of the king's ſhepherds, who educated them as his own children. When they knew their real origin, the twins called Romulus and Remus, put Amulius to death, and reſtored the crown to their grandfather Numitor. They afterwards undertook to build a city, and to determine which of the two brothers ſhould have the management of it, they had recourſe to omens and the flight of birds. Remus went to mount Aventine, and Romulus to mount Palatine. Remus ſaw firſt a flight of ſix vultures, and ſoon after, Romulus, twelve; and therefore, as his number was greater, he began to lay the foundations of the city, hopeful that it would become a warlike and powerful nation, as the birds from which he had received the omen were fond of prey and ſlaughter. Romulus marked with a furrow the place where he wiſhed to erect the walls; but their ſlenderneſs was ridiculed by Remus, who leaped over them with the greateſt contempt. This irritated Romulus, and Remus was immediately put to death, either by the hand of his brother or one of the workmen. When the walls were built, the city was without inhabitants; but Romulus, by making an aſylum of a ſacred grove, ſoon collected a multitude of fugitives, foreigners and criminals, whom he received as his lawful ſubjects. Yet, however numerous theſe might be, they were deſpiſed by the neighbouring inhabitants, and none were willing to form matrimonial connections with them. But Romulus obtained by force what was denied to his petitions. The Romans celebrated games in honor of the god Conſus, and forcibly carried away all the females who had aſſembled there to be ſpectators of theſe unuſual exhibitions. Theſe violent meaſures offended the neighbouring nations; they made war againſt the raviſhers with various ſucceſs, till at laſt they entered Rome, which had been betrayed to them by one of the ſtolen virgins. A violent engagement was begun in the middle of the Roman forum; but the Sabines were conquered, or, according to Ovid, the two enemies laid down their arms when the women had ruſhed between the two armies and by their tears and entreaties raiſed compaſſion in the boſoms of their parents and huſbands. The Sabines left their original poſſeſſions and came to live in Rome, where Tatius, their king, ſhared the ſovereign power with Romulus. The introduction of the Sabines into the city of Rome was attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences, and the Romans by purſuing this plan, and admitting the conquered nations among their citizens, rendered themſelves more powerful and more formidable. Afterwards Romulus divided the lands which he had obtained by conqueſt; one part was preſerved for religious uſes, to erect temples, and to conſecrate altars; the other was appropriated for the expences of the ſtate; and the third part was equally diſtributed among his ſubjects, who were divided into three claſſes or tribes. The moſt aged and experienced, to the number of 100, were alſo choſen, whom the monarch might conſult in matters of the higheſt importance, and from their age they were called ſenators, and from their authority patres. The whole body of the people was alſo diſtinguiſhed by the name of patricians and plebeians, patron and client, who by mutual intereſt were induced to preſerve the peace of the ſtate, and to promote the public good. Some time after Romulus diſappeared as he was giving inſtructions to the ſenators, and the eclipſe of the ſun, which happened at that time, was favorable to the rumor which aſſerted that the king had been taken up to heaven, 714 B. C. after a reign of 37 years. This was further confirmed by J. Proculus, one of the ſenators, who ſolemnly declared, that as he returned from Alba, he had ſeen Romulus in a form above human, and that he had directed him to tell the Romans to pay him divine honors under the name of Quirinus, and to aſſure them that their city was doomed one day to become the capital of all nations. This report was immediately credited, and the more ſo as the ſenators dreaded the reſentment of the people, who ſuſpected them of having offered him violence. A temple was raiſed to him, and a regular prieſt, called Flamen Quirinalis, was appointed to offer him ſacrifices. Romulus was ranked by the Romans among the 12 great gods, and it is not to be wondered that he received ſuch diſtinguiſhed honors, when the Romans conſidered him as the founder of their city and empire, and the ſon of the god of war. He is generally repreſented as his father, ſo much that it is difficult to diſtinguiſh them. Roscia Lex de theatris, by L. Roscius Otho the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It required that none should set in the 14 first seats of the theatre, if they were not in possession of 400 sestertia, which was the fortune required to be a Roman knight.

Roscius, a Roman actor so celebrated on the stage, that every comedian of excellence and merit has received his name. His eyes were naturally distorted, and he always appeared on the stage with a mask, but the Romans obliged him to act his characters without, and they overlooked the deformities of his face, that they might the better hear his elegant pronunciation, and be delighted with the sweetness of his voice. He was accused on suspicion of murder; but Cicero, who had been one of his pupils, undertook his defence, and cleared him of the malevolent aspersions of his enemies, in an elegant oration still extant. Roscius wrote a treatise, in which he compared with great success and much learning, the profession of the orator with that of the comedian. Rutilius, a rich man reduced to beggary by his extravagance. Juv. 11, v. 2.

Rutilius Rufus, a Roman consul in the age of Sylla, celebrated for his virtues and writings. He refused to comply with the requests of his friends because they were unjust. When Sylla had banished him from Rome he retired to Smyrna amidst the acclamations and praises of the people, and when some of his friends wished him to be recalled home by means of a civil war, he severely reprimanded them, and said, that he wished rather to see his country blush at his exile, than to plunge it into distress by his return. He was the first who taught the Roman soldiers to fabricate their own arms. During his banishment he employed his time in study, and wrote an history of Rome in Greek, and an account of his own life in Latin, besides many other works. Ovid Fast. 6, v. 563.—Seneca de Benef.—Cic. in Brut.—Val. Max. 2, c. 3, l. 6, c. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.——A Roman proconsul, who is supposed to have encouraged Mithridates to murder all the Romans who were in his provinces.——Lupus, a pretor who fled away with three cohorts from Tarracina.——A rhetorician. Quintil. 3, c. 1.——A man who went against Jugurtha.——A friend of Nero.——A poet of Gaul in the reign of Honorius. According to some, he wrote a poem on mount Ætna. He wrote also an itinerary, published by Burman in the poetæ Latini minores, L. Bat. 4to. 1731.

Rutuba, a river of Liguria, falling from the Apennine into the Mediterranean, Lucan. 2, v. 422.

Rutubus, a gladiator, &c. Horat. 2, Sat. 7, v. 96.

Rutuli, a people of Latium, known as well as the Latins, by the name of Aborigines. When Æneas came into Italy, Turnus was their king, and they supported him in the war which he made with this foreign prince. The capital of their dominions was called Ardea. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 883. Met. 14, v. 455, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

Rutupæ, a sea port town on the southern coasts of Britain, abounding in excellent oysters, whence the epithet of Rutupinus. Some suppose that it is the modern town of Dover. Lucan. 6, v. 67.—Juv. 4, v. 141.

Rypnæi montes. Vid. Rhipæi.

Saba, a town of Arabia, famous for frank incense, myrrh, and aromatic plants. The inhabitants were called Sabæi. Strab. 16.—Diod. 3.—Virg. G. 1, v. 57. Æn. 1, v. 420.

Sabacus, or Sabacon, a king of Æthiopia, who invaded Egypt and reigned there, after the expulsion of king Amasis. After a reign of 50 years he was terrified by a dream and retired into his own kingdom. Herodot. 2, c. 137, &c.

Sabbas, a king of India.

Sabella, the nurse of the poet Horace. 1 Sat. 9, v. 29.

Sabelli, a people of Italy, descended from the Sabines, or according to some from the Samnites. They inhabited that part of the country which lies between the Sabines and the Marsi. Hence the epithet of Sabellicus. Horat. 3, od. 6.—Virg. G. 3, v. 255.

Sabellus, a Latin poet in the reign of Domitian and Nerva.

Julia Sabina, a Roman matron who married Adrian by means of Plotina the wife of Trajan. She is celebrated for her private as well as public virtues. Adrian treated her her with the greateſt aſperity, though he had received from her the imperial purple; and the empreſs was ſo ſenſible of his unkindneſs, that ſhe boaſted in his preſence that ſhe had diſdained to make him a father, leſt his children ſhould become more odious or more tyrannical than he himſelf was. The behaviour of Sabina at laſt ſo exaſperated Adrian that he poiſoned her, or, according to ſome, obliged her to deſtroy herſelf. The emperor at that time labored under a mortal diſeaſe, and therefore he was the more encouraged to ſacrifice Sabina to his reſentment, that ſhe might not ſurvive him. Divine honors were paid to her memory. She died after ſhe had been married 38 years to Adrian, A. D. 138.

SABĪNI, an antient people of Italy, reckoned among the Aborigines, or thoſe inhabitants whoſe origin was not known. Some ſuppoſe that they were originally a Lacedæmonian colony who ſettled in that part of the country. The poſſeſſions of the Sabines were ſituated in the neighbourhood of Rome, between the river Nar and the Anio, and bounded on the north by the Apennines and Umbria, ſouth by Latium, eaſt by the Æqui, and Etruria on the weſt. The greateſt part of the contiguous nations were deſcended from them, ſuch as the Umbrians, the Campanians, the Sabelli, the Oſci, Samnites, Hernici, Æqui, Marſi, Brutii, &c. The Sabines are celebrated in antient hiſtory as being the firſt who took up arms againſt the Romans, to avenge the rape of their females at a ſpectacle where they had been invited. After ſome engagements the greateſt part of the Sabines left their antient poſſeſſions and migrated to Rome, where they ſettled with their new allies. They were at laſt totally ſubdued, about the year of Rome 373, and ranked as Roman citizens. Their chief cities were Cures, Fidenæ, Reate, Cruſtumerium, Corniculum, Nomentum, Collatia, &c. Plin. 3, c. 12.—Liv. 1, c. 9.—Dionyſ. 2, c. 51.—Strab. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 1, l. 3, c. 18.—Ital. 8, v. 424.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 775 & 797.—Juv. 10, v. 197.

SABINIĀNUS, a general who revolted in Africa, in the reign of Gordian, and was defeated ſoon after, A.D. 240.——A general of the eaſtern empire, &c.

SABINUS AULUS, a Latin poet intimate with Ovid. He wrote ſome epiſtles and elegies now loſt.——A man from whom the Sabines received their name. He received divine honors after death, and was one of thoſe deities whom Æneas invoked when he entered Italy. He was ſuppoſed to be of Lacedæmonian origin. Vid. Æn. 7, v. 178.——An officer in Cæſar's army defeated by the Gauls.——Julius, an officer who proclaimed himſelf emperor in the beginning of Veſpaſian's reign. He was ſoon after defeated in a battle, and to eſcape from the conqueror, he hid himſelf in a ſubterraneous cave with two faithful domeſtics, where he continued unſeen for 9 ſucceſſive years. His wife found out his retreat, and ſpent her time with him, till her frequent viſits to the cave diſcovered the place of his concealment. He was dragged before Veſpaſian, and by his orders put to death, though his friends intereſted themſelves in his cauſe, and his wife endeavoured to raiſe the emperor's pity by ſhowing him the twins whom ſhe had brought forth in the ſubterraneous retreat.——Corn. a man who conſpired againſt Caligula, and afterwards deſtroyed himſelf.——Titius, a Roman ſenator ſhamefully accuſed and condemned by Sejanus. His body after execution was dragged through the ſtreets of Rome, and treated with the greateſt indignities. His dog conſtantly followed the body, and when it was thrown into the Tiber, the faithful animal plunged in after it and was drowned. Plin. 8, c. 40.——Poppæus, a Roman conſul who preſided above 24 years over Mœſia, and obtained a triumph for his victories over the barbarians. He was a great favorite of Auguſtus, and of Tiberius. Tacit. Ann.——Flavius, a brother of Veſpaſian, killed by the populace. He was well known for his fidelity to Vitellius. He commanded in the Roman armies 35 years, and was governor of Rome for 12.——A friend of Domitian.——A Roman who attempted to plunder the temple of the Jews.—A friend of the emperor Alexander.——A lawyer.

SABIS, a river of Belgic Gaul. Cæſar.

SABRACÆ, a powerful nation of India.

SABŪRA, a general of Juba, king of Numidia, defeated and killed in a battle. Lucan. 4, v. 722.

SABURĀNUS, an officer of the pretorian guards. When he was appointed to this office by the emperor Trajan, the prince preſented him with a ſword, ſaying, Uſe this weapon in my ſervice as long as my commands are juſt, but turn it againſt my own breaſt, whenever I become cruel or malevolent.

SABRATA, a maritime town of Africa. It was a Roman colony. Ital. 3, v. 256.

SACÆ, a people of Scythia, who inhabited the country that lies at the eaſt of Bactriana and Sogdiana, and towards the north of mount Imaus. The name of Sacæ was given in general to all the Scythians, by by the Perſians. They had no towns, according to ſome writers, but lived in tents, Ptol. 6, c. 13.—Herodot. 3, c. 93, l. 7, c. 63.

SACER MONS, a mountain near Rome. Vid. Mons ſacer.

SACER LUCUS, a wood of Campania, on the Liris.

SACER PORTUS or SACRI PORTUS, a place of Italy, near Præneste, famous for a battle that was fought there between Sylla and Marius, in which the former obtained the victory. Paterc. 2, c. 26.—Lucan. 2, v. 134.

SACRĀNI, a people of Latium, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. They were deſcended from the Pelaſgians. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 796.

SACRĀTOR, one of the friends of Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 747.

SACRA VIA, a celebrated ſtreet of Rome. where a treaty of peace and alliance was made between Romulus and Tatius. It led from the amphitheatre to the capitol, by the temple of the goddeſs of Peace, and the temple of Cæſar. The triumphal proceſſions paſſed through it to go to the capitol. Horat. 4, od. 2, l. 1, ſat. 9.

SACRĀTA LEX militaris. A. U. C. 411, by the dictator Valerius Corvus, as ſome ſuppoſe, enacted that the name of no ſoldier which had been entered in the muſter roll ſhould be ſtruck out but by his conſent, and that no perſon who had been a military tribune ſhould execute the office of ductor ordinum.

M. SACRĀTĪVIR, a friend of Cæſar, killed at Dyrrachium. Cæſ. bell. C.

SACRUM BELLUM, a name given to the wars carried on concerning the temple of Delphi. The firſt began B. C. 448, and in it the Athenians and Lacedæmonians were auxiliaries on oppoſite ſides. The ſecond war began 357 B. C. and finiſhed 9 years after by Philip of Macedonia, who deſtroyed all the cities of the Phocians. Vid. Phocis.

SAGITTA, an officer who encouraged Piſo to rebel againſt the emperor Nero, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 4, c. 49.

SAGUNTUM or SAGUNTUS, a town of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis at the weſt of the Iberus, about one mile from the ſea coaſt, now called Morvedro. It had been founded by a colony of Zacynthians, and by ſome of the Rutuli of Ardea. Saguntum is celebrated as being the cauſe of the ſecond Punic war, and the inhabitants are well known for their attachment to the Romans. Hannibal took it after a ſiege of about eight months; and the inhabitants, not to fall into the enemy's hands, burnt themſelves with their houſes, and all their effects. The conqueror afterwards rebuilt it, and placed a garriſon there, with all the noblemen whom he detained as hoſtages from the ſeveral neighbouring nations of Spain. Some ſuppoſe that he called it Spartagene. Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv. 21, c. 9.—Lucan. 3, v. 350.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.

SAIS, a town in the Delta of Egypt, ſituate between the Canopic and Sebennytica mouths of the Nile, and antiently the capital of Lower Egypt. There was there a celebrated temple dedicated to Minerva, with a room cut out of one ſtone, which had been conveyed by water from Elephantis by the labors of 2000 men in three years. The ſtone meaſured on the outſide 21 cubits long, 14 broad, and 8 high. Oſiris was alſo buried near the town of Sais. The inhabitants were called Saitæ. One of the mouths of the Nile, which is adjoining to the town, has received the name of Saiticum. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, &c.

SALA, a town of Thrace, near the mouths of the Hebrus.

SALĂCON, a poor man who pretended to be uncommonly rich, &c. Cic.

SALAMĪNIA, a name given to a ſhip of Athens, which was employed by the republic in conveying the officers of ſtate to their different adminiſtrations abroad, &c.—A name given to the iſland of Cyprus, on account of Salamis, one of its capital cities.

SĂLĂMIS, a daughter of the river Aſopus, by Methone. Neptune became enamoured of her, and carried her to an iſland of the Ægean, which afterwards bore her name, and where ſhe gave birth to a ſon called Cenchreus. Diod. 4.

SĂLĂMIS, SALAMĪNA, or SALAMĪNA, an iſland in the Saronicus Sinus, on the ſouthern coaſt of Attica, oppoſite Eleuſis, at the diſtance of about a league, with a town and harbour of the ſame name. It is about 50 miles in circumference. It was originally peopled by a colony of Ionians, and afterwards by ſome of the Greeks from the adjacent iſlands and countries. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the fleets of the Greeks and that of the Perſians, when Xerxes invaded Attica. The enemy's ſhips amounted to above 2000, and thoſe of the Peloponneſians to about 380 ſail. In this engagement which was fought on the 20th of October, October, B. C. 480, the Greeks loſt 40 ſhips, and the Perſians about 200, beſides an immenſe number which were taken, with all the ammunition they contained. The iſland of Salamis was antiently called Sciras, Cychria, or Cenchria, and is now known by the name of Coluri, and its bay of the gulf of Engia. It is ſaid that Xerxes attempted to join it to the continent. Teucer and Ajax, who went to the Trojan war, were natives of Salamis. Strab. 2.—Herodot. 8, c. 56, &c.—Plut. & C. Nep. in Them. &c.—Diod. 4.—Val. Max. 5, c. 3.—Pauſ. 1, c. 35, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

SĂLĂMIS or SALĂMĪNA, a town at the eaſt of the iſland of Cyprus. It was built by Teucer, who gave it the name of the iſland Salamis, from which he had been baniſhed, about 1270 years before the Chriſtian era. His deſcendants continued maſters of the town for above 800 years. It was deſtroyed by an earthquake, and rebuilt in the 4th century and called Conſtantia. Strab. 9.—Herodot. 8, c. 94, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7, v. 21.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.

SĂLĂPIA or SĂLĂPIÆ, a town of Apulia, where Annibal retired after the battle of Cannæ. It was taken from the Carthaginian general by Marcellus. Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Val. Max. 3, c. 8.

SALĂRA, a town of Africa propria, taken by Scipio. Liv. 29, c. 34, &c.

SALARIA, a ſtreet and gate at Rome which led towards the country of the Sabines. It received the name of Salaria, becauſe ſalt, (ſal) was generally conveyed to Rome that way. Mart. 4, ep. 64.

SALASCI, a people of Ciſalpine Gaul, who were in continual war with the Romans. They cut off 10,000 Romans under Appius Claudius, A. U. C. 610, and were ſoon after defeated, and at laſt totally ſubdued and ſold as ſlaves by Auguſtus.

SALEIUS, a poet of great merit in the age of Domitian, yet pinched by poverty, though born of illuſtrious parents, and diſtinguiſhed by purity of manners and integrity of mind. Juv. 7, v. 80.—Quint. 10, c. 1.

SALĒNI, a people of Spain. Mela. 3, c. 1.

SALENTĪNI, a people of Italy, near Apulia, on the ſouthern coaſt of Calabria. Their chief towns were Brunduſium, Tarentum, and Hydruntum. Ital. 8, v. 579.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 400.—Varro de R. R. 1, c. 24.—Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

SALERNUM, a town of Etruria, on the ſhores of the Tyrrhene ſea. Lucan. 2, v. 425.—Paterc. 1, c. 15.—Horat. 1, ep. 15.

SALGANEUS or SALGANEA, a town of Bœotia, on the Euripus. Liv. 35, c. 37, &c.

SALII, a college of prieſts at Rome, inſtituted in honor of Mars, and appointed by Numa, to take care of the ſacred ſhields called Ancylia, B. C. 709. [Vid. Ancyle.] They were twelve in number, the three elders among them had the ſuperintendance of all the reſt; the firſt was called præſul, the ſecond vates, and the third magiſter. Their number was afterwards doubled by Tullus Hoſtilius, after he had obtained a victory over the Fidenates, in conſequence of a vow which he had made to Mars. The Salii were all of patrician families, and the office was very honorable. The firſt of March was the day in which the Salii obſerved their feſtivals in honor of Mars. They were generally dreſſed in a ſhort ſcarlet tunic, of which only the edges were ſeen, they wore a large purple coloured belt about the waiſt, which was faſtened with braſs buckles. They had on their heads round bonnets with two corners ſtanding up, and they wore in their right hand a ſmall rod, and in their left a ſmall buckler. In the obſervation of their ſolemnity they firſt offered ſacrifices, and afterwards went through the ſtreets dancing in meaſured motions, ſometimes all together, or at other times ſeparately, while muſical inſtruments were playing before them. They placed their body in different attitudes, and ſtruck with their rods the ſhields which they held in their hands. They alſo ſung hymns in honor of the gods, particularly of Mars, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, and they were accompanied in the chorus by a certain number of virgins, habited like themſelves, and called Sallæ. The Salii inſtituted by Numa were called Palatini, in contradiſtinction from the others, becauſe they lived on mount Palatine, and offered their ſacrifices there. Thoſe that were added by Tullus were called Collini, Agonales, or Quirinales, from a mountain of the ſame name, where they had fixed their reſidence. Their name ſeems to have been derived a ſaliendo, or ſaltando, becauſe, during their feſtivals, it was particularly requiſite that they ſhould leap and dance. Their feaſts and entertainments were uncommonly rich and ſumptuous, whence dapes ſaliares is proverbially applied to ſuch repaſts as are moſt ſplendid and coſtly. It was uſual among the Romans when they declared war, for the Salii to ſhake their ſhields with great violence, as if to call upon the god Mars to come to their aſſiſtance. Liv. 1, c. 20.—Varo de L. L. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 387.—Dionyſ. 3.—Flor. 1, c. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 285.——A nation of Gaul conquered by the emperor Julian.

SALINĀTOR, a ſirname common to the family of the Livii, and others.

SALIUS, an Acarnanian at the games exhibited by Æneas in Sicily, and killed in the wars with Turnus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 298. l. 10, v 753.

CRISPUS SALLUSTIUS, a Latin hiſtorian born at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He received his education at Rome, and made himſelf known as a public magiſtrate in the office of queſtor and conſul. His licentiouſneſs and the depravity of his manners did not eſcape the cenſure of the age, and Salluſt was degraded from the dignity of a ſenator, B. C. 50. His amour with Fauſta, the daughter of Sylla, was a ſtrong proof of his debauchery; and Milo, the huſband, who diſcovered the adulterer in his houſe, revenged the violence offered to his bed by beating him with ſtripes, and ſelling him his liberty at a high price. A continuation of extravagance could not long be ſupported by the income of Salluſt, but he extricated himſelf from all difficulties by embracing the cauſe of Cæſar. He was reſtored to the rank of ſenator, and made governor of Numidia. In the adminiſtration of his province Salluſt behaved with uncommon tyranny; he enriched himſelf by plundering the Africans, and at his return to Rome he built himſelf a magnificent houſe, and bought gardens, which from their delightful ſituation and pleaſantneſs, ſtill preſerve the name of the gardens of Salluſt. He married Terentia, the divorced wife of Cicero; and from this circumſtance, according to ſome, aroſe an immortal hatred between the hiſtorian and the orator. Salluſt died in the 51ſt year of his age, 35 years before the Chriſtian era. As a writer he is peculiarly diſtinguiſhed. He had compoſed a hiſtory of Rome, but nothing remains of it except a few fragments, and his only compoſitions extant are his hiſtory of Catiline's conſpiracy, and of the wars of Jugurtha, king of Numidia. In theſe celebrated works the author is greatly commended for his elegance, the vigor and animation of his ſentences; he every where diſplays a wonderful knowledge of the human heart, and paints with a maſterly hand what gave riſe to the great events which he relates. No one was better acquainted with the vices that prevailed in the capital of Italy, and no one ſeems to have been more ſevere againſt the follies of the age, and the failings of which he himſelf was guilty in the eyes of the world. His deſcriptions are uncommonly correct, and his harangues are nervous and animated, and well ſuiting the character and the different purſuits of the great men in whoſe mouth they are placed. The hiſtorian however, is blamed for tedious and inſipid exordiums, which often diſguſt the reader without improving him; his affectation of old and obſolete words and phraſes is alſo cenſured, and particularly his unwarrantable partiality in ſome of his narrations. Though faithful in every other reſpect, he has not painted the character of Cicero with all the fidelity and accuracy which the reader claims from the hiſtorian; and in paſſing in ſilence over many actions which reflect the greateſt honor on the firſt huſband of Terentia, the rival of Cicero, has diſgraced himſelf, and rendered his compoſitions leſs authentic. There are two orations or epiſtles to Cæſar concerning the regulation of the ſtate, attributed to him, as alſo an oration againſt Cicero, whoſe authenticity ſome of the moderns have diſputed. The beſt editions of Salluſt, are thoſe of Haverkamp, 2 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1742; and of Edinburg, 12mo. 1755. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Suet. de Gram. in Cæſ.—Martial 14, ep. 191.——A nephew of the hiſtorian, by whom he was adopted. He imitated the moderation of Mæcenas, and remained ſatisfied with the dignity of a Roman knight, when he could have made himſelf powerful by the favors of Auguſtus and Tiberius. He was very effeminate and luxurious. Horace dedicated 2, od. 2, to him. Tacit. Ann. 1.—Plin. 34, c.——Secundus Promotus, a native of Gaul, very intimate with the emperor Julian. He is remarkable for his integrity, and the ſoundneſs of his counſels. Julian made him prefect of Gaul. There is alſo another Salluſt, called Secundus, whom ſome have improperly confounded with Promotus. Secundus was alſo one of Julian's favorites, and was made by him prefect of the eaſt. He conciliated the good graces of the Romans by the purity of his morals, his fondneſs of diſcipline, and his religious principles. After the death of the emperor Jovian, he was univerſally named by the officers of the Roman empire to ſucceed on the imperial throne; but he refuſed this great though dangerous honor, and pleaded infirmities of body and old age. The Romans wiſhed upon this to inveſt his ſon with the imperial purple, but Secundus oppoſed it, and obſerved that he was too young to ſupport the dignity.——A prefect of Rome in the reign of Valentinian.——An officer in Britain.

Salmăcis, a fountain of Caria, near Halicarnaſſus, which rendered effeminate all thoſe who drank of its waters. It was there that Hermaphroditus changed his ſex, though he ſtill retained the characteriſtics of his own. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 285. l. 15, v. 319.—Hygin. fab. 271.

Salmōne, a town of Peloponneſus, with a fountain, from which the Enipeus takes its ſource, and falls into the Alpheus, about 40 ſtadia from Olympia, which on account of that is called Salmonis. Ovid. 3. amor. el. 6, v. 43.

Salmoneus, a king of Elis, ſon of Æolus and Enarete, who married Alcidice, by whom he had Tyro. He wiſhed to be called a god, and to receive divine honors from his ſubjects; therefore, to imitate the thunder, he uſed to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every ſide, as if if to imitate the lightening. This impiety provoked Jupiter. Salmoneus was ſtruck with a thunderbolt, and placed in the infernal regions near his brother Siſyphus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 235.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 60.—Diod. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 585.

SALMUS, a town of Aſia near the Red ſea.

SALMYDESSUS, a bay on the Euxine ſea.

SALO, a river in Spain. Mart. 10, ep. 20.

SALŌMĒ, a queen of Judæa. This name was common to ſome of the princeſſes in the family of Herod, &c.

SALON, a country of Bithynia.

SALŌNA or SALŌNÆ, a town of Dalmatia, about 10 miles diſtant from the coaſt of the Adriatic. It was the native place of the emperor Diocleſian, and he retired there to enjoy peace and tranquillity, after he had abdicated the imperial purple. Lucan. 4, v. 404.—Cæſ. bell. civ. 9—Mela. 2, c. 3.

SALONĪNA, a celebrated matron who married the emperor Gallienus, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her private as well as public virtues. She was the patroneſs of all the fine arts, and to her clemency, mildneſs and benevolence Rome was indebted ſome time for her peace and proſperity. She accompanied her huſband in ſome of his expeditions, and often called him away from the purſuits of pleaſure to make war againſt the enemies of Rome. She was put to death by the hands of the conſpirators, who alſo aſſaſſinated her huſband and family, about the year 268 of the Chriſtian era.

SALONĪNUS, a ſon of Aſinius Pollio. He received his name from the conqueſt of Salonæ by his father. Some ſuppoſe that he is the hero of Virgil's fourth eclogue, in which the return of the golden age is ſo warmly and beautifully anticipated.

SALONĪNUS, P. Licinius Cornelius, a ſon of Gallienus, by Salonina, ſent into Gaul, there to be taught the art of war. He remained there ſome time, till the uſurper Poſthumius aroſe, and proclaimed himſelf emperor. Saloninus was upon this delivered up to his enemy, and put to death in the 10th year of his age.

SALONIUS, a friend of Cato the cenſor. The daughter of Cenſorius married Salonius in his old age. Plut.——A tribune and centurion of the Roman army hated by the populace for his ſtrictneſs.

SALPIS, a colony of Etruria, whoſe inhabitants are called Salpinates. Liv. 5, c. 31.

SALSUM, a river in Spain.

SALVIAN, one of the fathers of the 5th century, of whoſe works the beſt edition, is the 12mo. Paris 1684.

SALVIDIĒNUS, an officer in the army of Auguſtus. He was betrayed by Antony, and put to death.——A Latin writer in the age of the emperor Probus.

SALVIUS, a flute player ſaluted king by the rebellious ſlaves of Sicily in the age of Marius. He maintained for ſome time war againſt the Romans.——A nephew of the emperor Otho.——A friend of Pompey.——A man put to death by Domitian.

SAMARIA, a city and country of Paleſtine.

SAMBŪLOS, a mountain near Meſopotamia, where Hercules was worſhipped.

SAMBUS, an Indian king defeated by Alexander. Diod. 17.

SAME or SAMOS, a ſmall iſland in the Ionian ſea near Ithaca, called alſo Cephallenia. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 271.

SAMIA, a daughter of the river Mæander. Pauſ. 7, c. 4.——A ſirname of Juno, becauſe ſhe was worſhipped at Samos.

SAMNĪTÆ or AMNITÆ, a people of Gaul.

SAMNĪTES, a people of Italy, who inhabited the country ſituate between Picenum, Campania, Apulia, and antient Latium. They diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their implacable hatred againſt the Romans, in the firſt ages of that empire, till they were at laſt totally extirpated, B. C. 272, after a war of 71 years. Their chief town was called Samnium or Samnis. Liv. 7, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 16, &c. l. 3, c. 18.—Strab. 5.—Lucan 2.—Eutrop. 2.

SAMNIUM, a town and part of Italy inhabited by the Samnites. Vid. Samnites.

SAMONIUM, a promontory of Crete.

SAMOS, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, on the coaſt of Aſia Minor, from which it is divided by a narrow ſtreight, with a capital of the ſame name built B. C. 986. It is about 87 miles in circumference. It has been antiently called Parthenia, Anthemuſa, Stephane, Melamphyllus, Anthemus, Cypariſſia, and Dryuſa. It was firſt in the poſſeſſion of the Leleges, and afterwards of the Ionians. The Samnites were at firſt governed by kings, and afterwards the form of their government became democratical and oligarchical. Samos was in its moſt floriſhing ſituation under Polycrates, who had made himſelf abſolute there. The Samians aſſiſted the Greeks againſt the Perſians when Xerxes invaded Europe, and were reduced under the power of Athens, after a revolt by Pericles, B. C. 441. They were afterwards ſubdued by Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and were reſtored to their antient liberty by Auguſtus. Under Veſpaſian, Samos became a Roman province. Juno was held in the greateſt veneration there, her temple was uncommonly magnificent, and it was even ſaid that the goddeſs had been born there, on the banks of the Imbraſus Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 7, c, 2, & 4.—Plut. in Per.—Plin. 5, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 20.—Thucyd.——The iſlands of Samothrace and Cephallenia were alſo known by the name of Samos.

SAMOSĂTA, a town of Syria, near the Euphrates, below mount Taurus, where Lucian was born.

SAMOTHRĂCE, or SAMOTHRĂCIA, an island in the Ægean sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus, on the coast of Thrace, from which it is distant about 32 miles. It was known by the antient names of Leucosia, Melitis, Electria, Leucania, and Dardania. It was afterwards called Samos, and distinguished from the Samos which lies on the coast of Ionia, by the epithet of Thracian, or by the name of Samothrace. It is about 38 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, or only 20 according to modern travellers. The origin of the first inhabitants of Samothrace is unknown. Some, however, suppose that they were Thracians, and that the place was afterwards peopled by the colonies of the Pelasgians, Samians, and Phœnicians. Samothrace is famous for a deluge which inundated the country, and reached the very top of the highest mountains. This inundation, which happened before the age of the Argonauts, was owing to the sudden overflow of the waters of the Euxine, which the ancients considered merely as a lake. The Samothracians were very religious; and as all mysteries were supposed to have taken their origin there, the island received the surname of sacred, and was a safe and inviolable asylum to all fugitives and criminals. The island was originally governed by kings, but afterwards the government became democratical. It enjoyed all its rights and immunities under the Romans till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced it with the rest of the islands in the Ægean into the form of a province. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 10.—Herdot. 7, c. 108, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 208.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 7, c. 4.

SAMUS, a son of Ancæus and Samia, grandson of Neptune. Paus. 7, c. 4.

SANA, a town of mount Athos, near which Xerxes began to make a channel to convey the sea.

SANAOS, a town of Phrygia.

SANCHONIĂTHON, a Phœnician historian born at Berytus, or, according to others, at Tyre. He flourished a few years before the Trojan war, and wrote in the language of his country, an history in nine books, in which he amply treated of the theology and antiquities of Phœnicia and the neighbouring places. It was compiled from the various records found in cities and the annals which were usually kept in the temples of the gods among the antients. This history was translated into Greek by Philo, a native of Byblus, who lived in the reign of the emperor Adrian. Some few fragments of this Greek translation are extant. Some however suppose them to be spurious, while others contend that they are true and authentic.

SANCUS, SANGUS, or SANCTUS, a deity of the Sabines introduced among the gods of Rome under the name of Dius Fidius. According to some, Sancus was father to Sabus, or Sabinus, the first king of the Sabines. Ital. 8, v. 421.—Varro de L. L. 4.—Ovid Fast. 6, v. 213.

SANDACE, a sister of Xerxes.

SANDALIUM, a small island of the Ægean, near Lesbos.——A port of Pisidia.

SANDANIS, a Lydian who advised Crœsus not to make war against the Persians.

SANDANUS, a river of Thrace.

SANDROCOTTUS, an Indian of a mean origin. His impertinence to Alexander was the beginning of his greatness; the conqueror ordered him to be seized, but Sandrocottus fled away, and at last laid down overwhelmed with fatigue. As he slept on the ground a lion came to him and gently licked the sweat from his face. This uncommon tameness of the animal appeared supernatural to Sandrocottus, and raised his ambition. He aspired to the monarchy, and after the death of Alexander he made himself master of a part of the country which was in the hands of Seleucus. Justin 15, c. 4.

SANGĂLA, a town of India destroyed by Alexander.

SANGĂRIUS, or SANGĂRIS, a river of Phrygia, rising in mount Dindymus and falling into the Euxine. The daughter of the Sangarius became pregnant of Attes only from gathering the boughs of an almond tree on the banks of the river. Hecuba, according to some, was daughter of this river. Some of the poets call it Sagaris. Ovid ex Pont. 4, el. 10.—Claudian in Eutrop. 2.—Paus. 7.

SANGUINIUS, a man condemned for ill language, &c. Tacit. An. 6, c. 7.

SANNYRION, a tragic poet of Athens. He composed many dramatical pieces, one of which was called Io, and another Danaë. Athen. 9.

SANTŎNES & SANTŎNÆ, a people with a town of the same name in Gaul. Lucan 1, v. 422.—Martial 3, ep. 96——

SAON, an historian.——A man who first discovered the oracle of Trophonius.

SAPÆI, or SAPHÆI, a people of Thrace.

SAPOR, a king of Persia who succeeded his father Artaxerxes about the 238th year of the Christian era. Naturally fierce and ambitious, Sapor wished to encrease his paternal dominions by conquest; and as the indolence of the emperors of Rome seemed favorable to his views, he laid waste the provinces of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Cilicia; and he might have become master of all Asia, if Odenatus had not stopped his progress. If Gordian attempted to repel him, his efforts were weak; and Philip, who succeeded him on the imperial throne, bought the peace of Sapor with money. Valerian, who was afterwards invested with the purple, marched against the Persian monarch, but he was defeated and taken prisoner. Odenatus no sooner heard that the Roman emperor was a captive in the hands of Sapor, than he attempted to release him by force of arms. The forces of Persia were cut to pieces, the wives and the treasures of the monarch fell into the hands of the conqueror, and Odenatus penetrated, with little opposition, into the very heart of the kingdom. Sapor, soon after this defeat, was assassinated by his subjects, A. D. 273, after a reign of 32 years. He was succeeded by his son called Hormisdas. Marcellin, &c.—The 2d of that name succeeded his father Hormisdas on the throne of Persia. He was as great as his ancestor of the same name; and by undertaking a war against the Romans, he attempted to enlarge his dominions, and to add the provinces on the west of the Euphrates to his empire. His victories alarmed the Roman emperors, and Julian would have perhaps seized him in the capital of his dominions, if he had not received a mortal wound. Jovian, who succeeded Julian, made peace with Sapor; but the monarch, always restless and indefatigable, renewed hostilities, invaded Armenia and defeated the emperor Valens. Sapor died A. D. 380, after a reign of 70 years, in which he had often been the sport of fortune. He was succeeded by Artaxerxes, and Artaxerxes by Sapor the third, a prince who died after a reign of five years, A. D. 389, in the age of Theodosius the Great. Marcellin, &c.

Sapor

Sappho, or Sapho, celebrated for her beauty, her poetical talents, and her amorous disposition, was born in the island of Lesbos, about 600 years before Christ. Her father's name, according to Herodotus, was Scamandronymus, or, according to others, Symon, or Semus, or Etarchus, and her mother's name was Cleis. Her tender passions were so violent, that some have represented her attachment with three of her female companions, Telesiphe, Atthis, and Megara, as criminal, and, on that account, have given her the surname of Tribas. She conceived such a passion for Phaon, a youth of Mitylene, that upon his refusal to gratify her desires, she threw herself into the sea from mount Leucas. She had composed nine books in lyric verses, besides epigrams, elegies, &c. Of all these compositions, nothing now remains but two fragments, whose uncommon sweetness and elegance show how meritoriously the praises of the antients have been bestowed upon a poetess who for the sublimity of her genius was called the tenth Muse. Her compositions were all extant in the age of Horace. The Lesbians were so sensible of the merit of Sappho, that after her death they paid her divine honors, and raised her temples and altars, and stamped their money with her image. The poetess has been censured for writing with that licentiousness and freedom which so much disgraced her character as a woman. The Sapphic verse has been called after her name. Ovid. Heroid. 15. Trist. 2, v. 365. —Horat. 2. Od. 13.—Herodot. 2, c. 135. —Stat. 5. Sylv. 3, v. 155.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 18 & 29.—Plin. 22, c. 8.

Saptine, a daughter of Darius, the last king of Persia.

Saracoki, a people who go to war riding on asses. Ælian. V. H. 12.

Saranges, a river of India, falling into the Hydraotes and thence into the Indus.

Sarapani, a people of Colchis.

Sarapus, a surname of Pittacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece.

Sarasa, a fortified place of Mesopotamia, on the Tigris.

Saraspades, a son of Phraates king of Parthia, sent as an hostage to Augustus, &c.

Sardanapalus, the 40th and last king of Assyria, celebrated for his luxury and voluptuousness. The greatest part of his time was spent in the company of his eunuchs, and the monarch generally appeared in the midst of his concubines disguised in the habit of a female, and spinning wool for his amusement. This effeminacy irritated his officers; Belesis and Arsaces conspired against him, and collected a numerous force to dethrone him. Sardanapalus quitted his voluptuousness for a while, and appeared at the head of his armies. The rebels were defeated in three successive battles, but at last Sardanapalus was beaten and besieged in the city of Ninus for two years. When he despaired of success, he burned himself in his palace, with his eunuchs, concubines, and all his treasures, and the empire of Assyria was divided among the conspirators. This famous event happened B. C. 820, according to Eusebius; though Justin and others, with less probability, place it 80 years earlier. Sardanapalus was made a god after death. Herodot. 2, c. 150.—Diod. 2.—Strab. 14.—Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 35.

Sardi, the inhabitants of Sardinia. Vid. Sardinia.

Sardes. Vid. Sardis.

Sardinia, the greatest island in the Mediterranean after Sicily, is situate between Italy and Africa, at the south of Corsica. It was originally called Sandaliotis or Ichnussa, from its resembling the human foot, (ἴχνος) and it received the name of Sardinia from Sardus, a son of Hercules, who settled there with a colony which he had brought with him from Libya. Other colonies, under Aristæus, Norax and Iolas, also settled there. The Carthaginians were masters of it till they were dispossessed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars, B. C. 231. Some call it with Sicily, one of the granaries of Rome. The air air was very unwholesome. Tacit. Ann. 2. c. 85.—Mela. 3, c. 7.—Strab. 2 & 5.—Cic. pro Manil. ad Q. frat. 2, ep. 3.—Plin. 3, c. 7.—Paus. 10, c. 17.—Varro. de R. R.—Val. Max. 7, c. 6.

SARDIS or SARDES, a town of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Lydia, situate at the foot of mount Tmolus, on the banks of the Pactolus. It is celebrated for the many sieges it sustained against the Cimmerians, Persians, Medes, Macedonians, Ionians, and Athenians, and for the battle in which, B. C. 262, Antiochus Soter was defeated by Eumenes, king of Pergamus. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who ordered it to be rebuilt. It fell into the hands of Cyrus, B. C. 548, and was burnt by the Athenians, B. C. 504, which became the cause of the invasion of Attica by Darius. Plut. in Alx.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 137, 152, &c.—Strab. 13.—Herodot. 1, c. 7, &c.

SARDUS, a son of Hercules, who led a colony to Sardinia, and gave it his name.

SARIASTER, a son of Tigranes, king of Armenia, who conspired against his father. &c. Val. Max. 9, c. 11.

SARMĂTIA, an extensive country at the north of Europe and Asia, divided into European and Asiatic. The European was bounded by the ocean on the north, Germany and the Vistula on the west, the Jazygæ on the south, and Tanais on the east. The Asiatic was bounded by Hyrcania, the Tanais, and the Euxine sea. The former contained the modern kingdoms of Russia, Poland, Lithuania, and Little Tartary; and the latter, Great Tartary, Circassia, and the neighbouring country. The Sarmatians were a savage uncivilized nation, often confounded with the Scythians, naturally warlike, and famous for painting their bodies to appear more terrible in the field of battle. They were well known for their lewdness, and they passed among the Greeks and Latins by the name of Barbarians. Under the Roman emperors they became very powerful, and disturbed the peace of the empire by their frequent incursions. They generally lived on the mountains without any habitation, except their chariots. Strab. 7, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 2.—Her. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Juv. 2.—Ovid, Trist. 3, &c.

SARMATĬCUM MARE, a name given to the Euxine sea, because on the coast of Sarmatia. Ovid. 4, ex Pont. ep. 10, v. 38.

SARMENTUS, a scurrilous person, mentioned by Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 56.

SARNIUS, a river of Asia.

SARNUS, a river of Picenum, dividing it from Campania, and falling into the Tuscan sea. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.—Strab. 5.

SARON, a king of Trœzene, uncommonly fond of hunting. He was drowned in the sea, where he had swum for some miles in pursuit of a stag. He was made a sea god by Neptune, and divine honors were paid to him by the Trœzenians. It was usual for sailors to offer him sacrifices before they embarked. That part of the sea where he was drowned, was called Saronicus sinus, on the coast of Achaia near the Isthmus of Corinth. Saron built a temple to Juno at Trœzene, and instituted festivals to her honor, called from himself Saronia. Paus. 2, c. 30.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Strab. 8.

SARONĬCUS SINUS, a bay of the Ægean sea, lying at the south of Attica, and on the north of the Peloponnesus. The entrance into it is between the promontory of Sunium and that of Scylla. Some suppose that this part of the sea received its name from Saron, who was drowned there, or from a small river which discharges itself on the coast, or from a small harbour of the same name. The Saronic bay is about 62 miles in circumference, 23 miles in its broadest, and 25 in its longest part, according to modern calculation.

SARPĒDON, a son of Jupiter by Europa, the daughter of Agenor. He banished himself from Crete, after he had in vain attempted to make himself king in preference to his elder brother Minos, and he retired to Caria, where he built the town of Miletus. He went to the Trojan war to assist Priam against the Greeks, where he was attended by his friend and companion Glaucus. He was at last killed by Patroclus, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy. According to some mythologists, the brother of king Minos, and the prince who assisted Priam, were two different persons. This last was king of Lycia, and son of Jupiter, by Laodamia, the daughter of Bellerophon, and lived about a hundred years after the age of the son of Europa. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 12.—Homer. Il. 16.——A son of Neptune killed by Hercules.——A learned preceptor of Cato of Utica. Plut. in Cat.——A town of Cilicia, famous for a temple sacred to Apollo and Diana.——Also a promontory of the same name in Cilicia, beyond which Antiochus was not permitted to sail by a treaty of peace which he had made with the Romans. Liv. 38, c. 38.——A promontory of Thrace.——A Syrian general who flourished B. C. 143.

SARRA, a town of Phœnicia, the same as Tyre. It receives this name from a small shell-fish of the same name, which was found in the neighbourhood, and with whose blood garments were dyed. Hence came the epithet of sarranus, so often applied to Tyrian colors. Virg. G. 2, v. 506.

SARRASTES,

Sarrastes, a people of Campania, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 738.

Sarron, a king of the Celtæ, ſo famous for his learning, that from him philoſophers were called Sarronidæ.

Sarsina, an antient town of Umbria, where the poet Plautus was born. The inhabitants are called Sarſinates. Martial. 9, ep. 59.—Ital. 8, v. 462.

Sasanda, a town of Caria.

Sason, an iſland at the entrance of the Adriatic ſea, lying between Brunduſium and Aulon, on the coaſt of Greece. It is barren and inhoſpitable.——A river falling into the Adriatic.

Sataspes, a Perſian hung on a croſs by order of Xerxes, for offering violence to the daughter of Megabyzus. His father's name was Theaſpes. Herodot. 4.

Satiæ, a people of Thrace, at the eaſt of the Neſtus. Herodot. 7, c. 111.

Satibarzanes, a Perſian made ſatrap of the Arians by Alexander, from whom he afterwards revolted. Curt. 6 & 7.

Saticŭla & Saticulus, a town near Capua. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 729.

Sătis, a town of Macedonia.

Satrapēni, a people of Media, under Tigranes.

Satrĭcum, a town of Italy, taken by Camillus.

Satropaces, an officer in the army of Darius, &c. Curt. 4, c. 9.

Satŭra, a lake of Latium, between Antium and Circeii. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 801.

Saturēium, or Saturēum, a town of Calabria, near Tarentum, whence the epithet of ſatureianus in Horat. 1, Sat. 6.

Saturēius, one of Domitian's murderers.

Saturnālia, feſtivals in honor of Saturn, celebrated the 16th or the 17th, or, according to others, the 18th of December. They were inſtituted long before the foundation of Rome, in commemoration of the freedom and equality which prevailed on earth in the golden reign of Saturn. Some however ſuppoſe, that the Saturnalia were firſt obſerved at Rome in the reign of Tullus Hoſtilius, after a victory obtained over the Sabines, while others ſupport, that Janus firſt inſtituted them in gratitude to Saturn, from whom he had learnt agriculture. Others ſuppoſe, that they were firſt celebrated in the year of Rome 257, after a victory obtained over the Latins by the dictator Poſthumius. The Saturnalia were originally celebrated only for one day, but afterwards the ſolemnity continued for 3, 4, 5, and at laſt for 7 days. The celebration was remarkable for the liberty which univerſally prevailed. The ſlaves were permitted to ridicule their maſters, and to ſpeak with freedom upon every ſubject. It was uſual for friends to make preſents one to another, all animoſity ceaſed, no criminals were executed, ſchools were ſhut, war was never declared, but all was mirth, riot, and debauchery. In the ſacrifices the prieſts made their offerings with their heads uncovered, a cuſtom which was never obſerved at other feſtivals. Senec. ep. 18.—Cato de R. R.—Sueton. in Veſp, 19.—Cic. ad Attic. &c.

Saturnia, a name given to Italy, becauſe Saturn had reigned there during the golden age. Virg. G. 2, v. 173.——A name given to Juno, as being the daughter of Saturn. Virg. G. 2, v. 173, Æn. 3, v. 380.

Saturninus, P. Sempronius, a general of Valerian, proclaimed emperor in Egypt by his troops after he had rendered himſelf celebrated by his victories over the barbarians. His integrity, his complaiſance and affability, had gained him the affection of the people, but his fondneſs of antient diſcipline provoked his ſoldiers, who wantonly murdered him in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 262.——Sextus Julius, a Gaul intimate with Aurelian. The emperor eſteemed him greatly, not only for his private virtues, but for his abilities as a general, and for the victories which he had obtained in different parts of the empire. He was ſaluted emperor at Alexandria, and compelled by the clamorous army to accept of the purple, which he rejected with diſdain and horror. Probus, who was then emperor, marched his forces againſt him, and beſieged him in Apamea, where he deſtroyed himſelf when unable to make head againſt his powerful adverſary.——Appuleius, a man who raiſed a ſedition at Rome, intimidated the ſenate, and tyrannized for three years. Meeting at laſt with oppoſition, he ſeized the capitol, but being induced by the hopes of a reconciliation to truſt himſelf amidſt the people, he was ſuddenly torn to pieces. His ſedition has received the name of Appuleiana in the Roman annals. Flor.——Lucius, a ſeditious tribune, who ſupported the oppreſſion of Marius. He was at laſt put to death on account of his tumultuous diſpoſition. Plut.——An officer in the court of Theodoſius, murdered for obeying the emperor's orders, &c.——Pompeius, a writer in the reign of Trajan. He was greatly eſteemed by Pliny, who ſpeaks of him with great warmth and approbation, as an hiſtorian, a poet, and an orator. Pliny always conſulted the opinion of Saturninus before he publiſhed his compoſitions.——Sentius, a friend of Auguſtus and Tiberius. He ſucceeded Agrippa in the government of the provinces of Syria and Phœnicia.——Vitellius, an officer among the friends of the emperor Otho.

Saturnius, a name given to Jupiter

Pluto, and Neptune, as being the ſons of Saturn.

SĂTURNUS, a ſon of Cœlus or Uranus by Terra, called alſo Titea, Thea, or Titheia. He was naturally artful, and by means of his mother, he revenged himſelf on his father, whoſe cruelty to his children had provoked the anger of Thea. The mother armed her ſon with a ſcythe, which was fabricated with the metals drawn from her bowels, and as Cœlus was going to unite himſelf to Thea, Saturn mutilated him, and for ever prevented him from encreaſing the number of his children, whom he treated with unkindneſs, and confined in the infernal regions. After this the ſons of Cœlus were reſtored to liberty, and Saturn obtained his father's kingdom by the conſent of his brother, provided he did not bring up any male children. Purſuant to this agreement, Saturn always devoured his ſons as ſoon as born, becauſe, as ſome obſerve, he dreaded from them a retaliation of his unkindneſs to his father, till his wife Rhea, unwilling to ſee her children periſh, concealed from her huſband the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and inſtead of the children, ſhe gave him large ſtones, which he immediately ſwallowed without perceiving the deceit. Titan was ſome time after informed that Saturn had concealed his male children, therefore he made war againſt him, dethroned and impriſoned him with Rhea; and Jupiter, who was ſecretly educated in Crete, was no ſooner grown up, than he flew to deliver his father, and to replace him on his throne. Saturn, unmindful of his ſon's kindneſs, conſpired againſt him, when he heard that he raiſed cabals againſt him, but Jupiter baniſhed him from his throne, and the father fled for ſafety into Italy, where the country retained the name of Latium, as being the place of his concealment (lateo.) Janus, who was then king of Italy, received Saturn with marks of attention, he made him his partner on the throne; and the king of heaven employed himſelf in civilizing the barbarous manners of the people of Italy, and in teaching them agriculture and the uſeful and liberal arts. His reign there was ſo mild and popular, ſo beneficent and virtuous, that mankind have called it the golden age, to intimate the happineſs and tranquillity which the earth then enjoyed. Saturn was father of Chiron the centaur by Philyra, whom he had changed into a mare, to avoid the importunities of Rhea. The worſhip of Saturn was not ſo ſolemn or ſo univerſal as that of Jupiter. It was uſual to offer human victims on his altars, but this barbarous cuſtom was aboliſhed by Hercules who ſubſtituted ſmall images of clay. In the ſacrifices of Saturn, the prieſt always performed the ceremony with his head uncovered, which was unuſual at other ſolemnities. The god is generally repreſented as an old man bent through age and infirmity. He holds a ſcythe in his right hand, with a ſerpent which bites its own tail, which is an emblem of time and of the revolution of the year. In his left hand he holds a child which he raiſes up as if inſtantly to devour it. Tatius, king of the Sabines, firſt built a temple to Saturn on the Capitoline hill, a ſecond was afterwards added by Tullus Hoſtilius, and a third by the firſt conſuls. On his ſtatues were generally hung fetters in commemoration of the chains he had worn when impriſoned by Jupiter. From this circumſtance, all ſlaves that obtained their liberty, generally dedicated their fetters to him. During the celebration of the Saturnalia, the chains were taken from the ſtatues to intimate the freedom and the independence which mankind enjoyed during the golden age. One of his temples at Rome was appropriated for the public treaſury, and it was there alſo that the names of foreign ambaſſadors were enrolled. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. SATŬRUM, a town of Calabria, where ſtuffs of all kinds were dyed in different colors with great ſucceſs. Virg. G. 2, v. 197.

SĂTŸRI, demigods of the country, whoſe origin is unknown. They are repreſented like men, but with the feet and the legs of goats, ſhort horns on the head, and the whole body covered with thick hair. They chiefly attended upon Bacchus, and rendered themſelves known in his orgies by their riot and laſciviouſneſs. The firſt fruits of every thing were generally offered to them. The Romans promiſcuouſly called them Fauni, Panes and Sylvani. It is ſaid that a Satyr was brought to Sylla, as that general returned from Theſſaly. The monſter had been ſurpriſed aſleep in a cave; but his voice was inarticulate when brought into the preſence of the Roman general, and Sylla was ſo diſguſted with it, that he ordered it to be inſtantly removed. This monſter anſwered in every degree the deſcription which the poets and painters have given of the Satyrs. Pauſ. 1, c. 23.—Plut. in Syll.—Virg. Ecl. 5, v. 13.—Ovid. Heroid. 4, v. 171.

SCAMANDER, or SCAMANDROS, a celebrated river of Troas, riſing at the eaſt of mount Ida, and falling into the ſea below Sigæum. It receives the Simois in its courſe, and towards its mouth it is very muddy, and flows through marſhes. This river, according to Homer, was called Xanthus by the gods and Scamander by men. The waters of the Scamander had the ſingular property of giving a beautiful color to the hair or the wool of ſuch animals as bathed in them, and from this circumſtance the three goddeſſes, Minerva, Juno and Venus bathed there before they appeared before Paris, to obtain the golden apple. It was uſual among all the virgins of Troas to bathe in the Scamander, when they were arrived to nubile years, and to offer to the god their virginity in theſe words, Λαβε μου, Σκαμανδρε, την παρθενιαν. The god of the Scamander had a regular prieſt and ſacrifices offered to him. Some ſuppoſe that the river received its name from Scamander the ſon of Corybas. *Ælian. SCATINIA LEX de pudicitiâ, by C. Scatinius Aricinus, the tribune, was enacted againſt thoſe who kept catamites, and ſuch as proſtituted themſelves to any vile or unnatural ſervice. The penalty was originally a fine, but it was afterwards made a capital crime under Auguſtus. It is ſometimes called Scantinia from a certain Scantinius upon whom it was firſt executed.

SCAURUS, (M. Æmilius) a Roman conſul, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence at the bar, and by his ſucceſſes in Spain, in the capacity of commander. He was ſent againſt Jugurtha, and ſome time after accuſed of ſuffering himſelf to be bribed by the Numidian prince. Scaurus conquered the Ligurians, and in his cenſorſhip he built the Milvian bridge at Rome, and began to pave the road, which from him was called the Æmylian. He was originally very poor. He wrote ſome books, and among theſe an hiſtory of his own life, all now loſt. His ſon of the ſame name made himſelf known by the large theatre he built during his edileſhip.

ſhip. This theatre, which could contain 30,000 ſpectators, was ſupported by 360 columns of marble, 38 feet in height, and adorned with 3000 brazen ſtatues. This celebrated edifice, according to Pliny, proved more fatal to the manners and the ſimplicity of the Romans, than the proſcriptions and wars of Sylla had done to the inhabitants of the city. Scaurus married Murcia.——A Roman of conſular dignity. When the Cimbri invaded Italy, the ſon of Scaurus behaved with great cowardice, upon which the father ſternly ordered him never to appear again in the field of battle. The ſeverity of this command rendered young Scaurus melancholy, and he plunged a ſword into his own heart, to free himſelf from farther ignominy.——Aurelius, a Roman conſul taken priſoner by the Gauls. Scipio, a celebrated family at Rome, who obtained the greateſt honors in the republic. The name ſeems to be derived from Scipio, which ſignifies a ſtick, becauſe one of the family had conducted his blind father, and had been to him as a ſtick. The Scipio's were a branch of the Cornelian family. The moſt illuſtrious were——P. Corn. a man made maſter of horſe by Romulus, &c.——A Roman dictator.——L. Cornel. a conſul A. U. C. 454, who defeated the Etrurians near Volaterra.——Another conſul A. U. C. 493.——Cn. ſirnamed Aſina, was conſul A. U. C. 492 & 498. He was conquered in his firſt conſulſhip in a naval battle, and loſt 17 ſhips. The following year he took Aleria in Corſica, and defeated Hanno the Carthaginian general in Sardinia. He alſo took 200 of the enemy's ſhips, and the city of Panormum in Sicily. He was father to Publius and Cneus Scipio. Publius in the beginning of the ſecond Punic war was ſent with an army to Spain to oppoſe Annibal; but when he heard that his enemy had paſſed over into Italy, he attempted by his quick marches and ſecret evolutions to ſtop his progreſs. He was conquered by Annibal near the Ticinus, where he nearly loſt his life, had not his ſon who was afterwards ſirnamed Africanus, courageouſly defended him. He again paſſed into Spain, where he obtained ſome memorable victories over the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants of the country. His brother Cneus ſhared the ſupreme command with him, but their great confidence proved their ruin,

spain. They separated their armies, and soon after Publius was furiously attacked by the two Asdrubals and Mago, who commanded the Carthaginian armies. The forces of Publius were too few to resist with success the three Carthaginian generals. The Romans were cut to pieces, and their commander was left on the field of battle. No sooner had the enemy obtained this victory than they immediately marched to meet Cneus Scipio, whom the revolt of 30,000 Celtiberians had weakened and alarmed. The general, who was already apprized of his brother's death, secured an eminence, where he was soon surrounded on all sides. After desperate acts of valor he was left among the slain, or according to some, he fled into a tower, where he was burnt with some of his friends by the victorious enemy. Liv. 21, &c.—Polyb. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 6, &c.—Eutrop. 3, c. 8, &c.

—Publius Cornelius, surnamed Africanus, was son of Publius Scipio, who was killed in Spain. He first distinguished himself at the battle of Ticinus, where he saved his father's life by deeds of uncommon valor and boldness. The battle of Cannæ, which proved so fatal to the Roman arms, instead of disheartening Scipio, raised his expectations, and he no sooner heard that some of his desperate countrymen wished to abandon Italy, and to fly from the insolence of the conqueror, than with his sword in his hand, and by his firmness and example, he obliged them to swear eternal fidelity to Rome, and to put to immediate death the first man who attempted to retire from his country. In his 21st year, Scipio was made an edile, an honorable office which was never given but to such as had reached their 27th year. Some time after, the Romans were alarmed by the intelligence that the commanders of their forces in Spain, Publius and Cneus Scipio, had been slaughtered, and immediately young Scipio was appointed to avenge the death of his father, and of his uncle, and to vindicate the military honor of the republic. It was soon known how able he was to be at the head of an army; the various nations of Spain were conquered, and in four years the Carthaginians were banished from that part of the continent, the whole province became tributary to Rome, New Carthage submitted in one day, and in one battle 54,000 of the enemy were left dead on the field. After these signal victories Scipio was recalled to Rome, which still trembled at the continual alarms of Annibal, who was at her gates. The conqueror of the Carthaginians in Spain was looked upon as a proper general to encounter Annibal in Italy; but Scipio opposed the measures which his countrymen wished to pursue, and he declared in the senate, that if Annibal was to be conquered, he must be conquered in Africa. These bold measures were immediately adopted, though opposed by the eloquence, age and experience of the great Fabius, and Scipio was impowered to conduct the war on the coasts of Africa. With the dignity of consul he embarked for Carthage. Success attended his arms, his conquests were here as rapid as in Spain; the Carthaginian armies were routed, the camp of the crafty Asdrubal was set on fire during the night, and his troops totally defeated in a drawn battle. These repeated losses alarmed Carthage; Annibal who was victorious at the gates of Rome was instantly recalled to defend the walls of his country, and the two greatest generals of that age met each other in the field. Terms of accommodation were proposed; but in the parley which the two commanders had together, nothing satisfactory was offered, and while the one enlarged on the vicissitudes of human affairs, the other wished to dictate like a conqueror, and recommended the decision of the controversy to the sword. This celebrated battle was fought near Zama, and both generals displayed their military knowledge in drawing up their armies and in chusing their ground. Their courage and intrepidity were not less conspicuous in charging the enemy; a thousand acts of valor were performed on both sides, and though the Carthaginians fought in their own defence, and the Romans for fame and glory, yet the conqueror of Italy was vanquished. About 20,000 Carthaginians were slain, and the same number made prisoners of war, B. C. 202. Only 2,000 of the Romans were killed. This battle was decisive; the Carthaginians sued for peace, which Scipio at last granted on the most severe and humiliating terms. The conqueror after this returned to Rome, where he was received with the most unbounded applause, honored with a triumph, and dignified with the appellation of Africanus. Here he enjoyed for some time the tranquility and the honors which his exploits merited, but in him also, as in other great men, fortune shewed herself inconstant. Scipio offended the populace in wishing to distinguish the senators from the rest of the people at the public exhibitions, and when he canvased for the consulship for two of his friends, he had the mortification to see his application slighted, and the honors which he claimed, bestowed on a man of no character, and recommended by no quality or meritorious deed. He retired from Rome no longer to be a spectator of the ingratitude of his countrymen, and in the capacity of lieutenant he accompanied his brother against Antiochus king of Syria. In this expedition his arms were attended with usual success, and the Asiatic monarch submitted to the conditions which the conquerors offered. At his return to Rome, Africanus found the malevolence of his enemies ſtill unabated. Cato, his inveterate rival, raiſed ſeditions againſt him, and the Petilii, two tribunes of the people, accuſed the conqueror of Annibal of extortion in the provinces of Aſia, and of living in an indolent and luxurious manner. Scipio condeſcended to anſwer to the accuſation of his calumniators; the firſt day was ſpent in hearing the different charges, but when he again appeared on the ſecond day of his trial, the accuſed interrupted his judges, and exclaimed, Tribunes and fellow citizens, on this day, this very day, did I conquer Annibal and the Carthaginians, come therefore with me, Romans; let us go to the capitol, and there return our thanks to the immortal gods for the victories which have attended our arms. Theſe words had the deſired effect, the tribes, and all the aſſembly followed Scipio, the court was deſerted, and the tribunes were left alone in the ſeat of judgment. Yet when this memorable day was paſt and forgotten, Africanus was a third time ſummoned to appear; but he had fled before the impending ſtorm, and retired to his country houſe at Liternum. The accuſation was therefore ſtopped, and the accuſers ſilenced, when one of the tribunes formerly diſtinguiſhed for his malevolence againſt Scipio, roſe to defend him, and declared in the aſſembly, that it reflected the higheſt diſgrace on the Roman people, that the conqueror of Annibal ſhould become the ſport of the populace, and be expoſed to the malice and envy of diſappointed ambition. Some time after Scipio died in the place of his retreat, about 184 years before Chriſt, in the 48th year of his age; and ſo great an averſion did he expreſs, as he expired, for the depravity of the Romans and the ingratitude of their ſenators, that he ordered his bones not to be conveyed to Rome. They were accordingly inhumated at Liternum, where his wife Æmilia, the daughter of Paulus Æmilius, who fell at the battle of Cannæ, raiſed a mauſoleum on his tomb, and placed upon it his ſtatue, with that of the poet Ennius, who had been the companion of his peace and of his retirement. If Scipio was robbed during his life time of the honors which belonged to him as conqueror of Africa, he was not forgotten when dead. The Romans viewed his character with reverence; with raptures they read of his warlike actions, and Africanus was regarded in the following ages as a pattern of virtue, of innocence, courage and liberality. As a general, the fame and the greatneſs of his conqueſts explain his character, and indeed we hear that Annibal declared himſelf inferior to no general that ever lived except Alexander the Great, and Pyrrhus king of Epirus; and when Scipio aſked him what rank he would claim if he had conquered him, the Carthaginian general anſwered, If I had conquered you, Scipio, I would call myſelf greater than the conqueror of Darius, and the ally of the Tarentines. As an inſtance of Scipio's continence, antient authors have faithfully recorded that the conqueror of Spain refuſed to ſee a beautiful princeſs that had fallen into his hands after the taking of new Carthage, and that he not only reſtored her inviolate to her parents, but alſo added immenſe preſents for the perſon to whom ſhe was betrothed. It was to the artful complaiſance of Africanus, that the Romans owed their alliance with Maſiniſſa, king of Numidia, and alſo that with king Syphax. The friendſhip of Scipio and Lælius is well known. Polyb. 6. —Plut.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Cic. in Brut. &c. —Eutrop.——Lucius Cornelius, ſirnamed Aſiaticus, accompanied his brother Africanus in his expeditions in Spain and Africa. He was rewarded with the conſulſhip, A. U. C. 562, for his ſervices to the ſtate, and he was empowered to attack Antiochus, king of Syria, who had declared war againſt the Romans. Lucius was accompanied in this campaign by his brother Africanus; and by his own valor, and the advice of the conqueror of Annibal, he ſoon routed the enemy, and in a battle near the city of Sardes he killed 50,000 foot and 4000 horſe. The peace was ſoon after ſettled by the ſubmiſſion of Antiochus, and the conqueror, at his return home, obtained a triumph, and the ſirname of Aſiaticus. He did not, however, long enjoy his proſperity; Cato, after the death of Africanus, turned his fury againſt Aſiaticus, and the two Petilii his devoted favorites, preſented a petition to the people, in which they prayed that an enquiry might be made to know what money had been received from Antiochus and from his allies. The petition was inſtantly received, and Aſiaticus, charged to have ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by Antiochus, was ſummoned to appear before the tribunal of Terentius Culeo, who was on this occaſion created prætor. The judge, who was an inveterate enemy to the family of the Scipio's, ſoon found Aſiaticus, with his two lieutenants and his quæſtor, guilty of having received, the firſt 6,000 pounds weight of gold, and 480 pounds weight of ſilver, and the others nearly an equal ſum, from the monarch, againſt whom, in the name of the Roman people, they were enjoined to make war. Immediately they were condemned to pay large fines; but while the others gave ſecurity, Scipio declared that he had accounted to the public for all the money which he had brought from Aſia, and therefore that he was innocent. For this obſtinacy Scipio was dragged to priſon, but his

couſin Naſica pleaded his cauſe before the people, and the prætor inſtantly ordered the goods of the priſoner to be ſeized and confiſcated. The ſentence was executed, but the effects of Scipio were inſufficient to pay the fine, and it was the greateſt juſtification of his innocence, that whatever was found in his houſe, had never been in the poſſeſſion of Antiochus or his ſubjects. This, however, did not totally liberate him, he was reduced to poverty, and refuſed to accept the offers of his friends and of his clients. Some time after he was appointed to ſettle the diſputes between Eumenes and Seleucus, and at his return, the Romans, aſhamed of their ſeverity towards him, rewarded his merit with ſuch uncommon liberality, that Aſiaticus was enabled to celebrate games in honor of his victory over Antiochus, for ten ſucceſſive days, at his own expence. Liv. 38, c. 55, &c.—Eutrop. 4.——Naſica was ſon of Cneus Scipio, and couſin to Scipio Africanus. He was refuſed the conſulſhip, though ſupported by the intereſt and the fame of the conqueror of Annibal; but he afterwards obtained it, and in that honorable office conquered the Boii, and gained a triumph. He was alſo ſucceſsful in an expedition which he undertook in Spain. When the ſtatue of Cybele was brought to Rome from Phrygia, the Roman ſenate delegated one of their body who was the moſt remarkable for the purity of his manners and the innocence of his life, to go and meet the goddeſs in the harbour of Oſtia. Naſica was the object of their choice, and as ſuch he was enjoined to bring the ſtatue of the goddeſs to Rome with the greateſt pomp and ſolemnity. Naſica alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the active part he took in confuting the accuſations laid againſt the two Scipio's, Africanus and Aſiaticus. There was alſo another of the ſame name who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his enmity againſt the Gracchi, to whom he was nearly related. Paterc. 2, c. 1, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Liv. 29, c. 14, &c.——Publ. Æmilianus, ſon of Paulus the conqueror of Perſeus, was adopted by the ſon of Scipio Africanus. He received the ſame firname as his grandfather, and was called Africanus the younger, on account of his victories over Carthage. Æmilianus firſt appeared in the Roman armies under his father, and afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a legionary tribune in the Spaniſh provinces, where he killed a Spaniard of gigantic ſtature, and obtained a mural crown at the ſiege of Intercatia. He paſſed into Africa to demand a reinforcement from king Maſiniſſa, the ally of Rome, and he was the ſpectator of a long and bloody battle which was fought between that monarch and the Carthaginians, and which ſoon produced the third Punic war. Some time after Æmilianus was made edile, and next appointed conſul, though under the age required for that important office. The firname which he had received from his grandfather, he was doomed lawfully to claim as his own. He was empowered to finiſh the war with Carthage, and as he was permitted by the ſenate to chuſe his colleague, he took with him his friend Lælius, whoſe father of the ſame name had formerly enjoyed the confidence and ſhared the victories of the firſt Africanus. The ſiege of Carthage was already begun, but the operations of the Romans were not continued with vigor. Scipio had no ſooner appeared before the walls of the enemy than every communication with the land was cut off, and that they might not have the command of the ſea, a ſtupendous mole was thrown acroſs the harbour with immenſe labor and expence. This, which might have diſheartened the moſt active enemy, rendered the Carthaginians more eager in the cauſe of freedom and independence; all the inhabitants, without diſtinction of rank, age, or ſex, employed themſelves without ceſſation to dig another harbour, and to build and equip another fleet. In a ſhort time, in ſpite of the vigilance and activity of Æmilianus, the Romans were aſtoniſhed to ſee another harbour formed, and 50 gallies ſuddenly iſſuing under ſail, ready for the engagement. This unexpected fleet, by immediately attacking the Roman ſhips, might have gained the victory, but the delay of the Carthaginians proved fatal to their cauſe, and the enemy had ſufficient time to prepare themſelves. Scipio ſoon got the poſſeſſion of a ſmall eminence in the harbour, and by the ſucceſs of his ſubſequent operations he broke open one of the gates of the city and entered the ſtreets, where he made his way by fire and ſword. The ſurrender of above 50,000 men was followed by the reduction of the citadel, and the total ſubmiſſion of Carthage, B. C. 147. The captive city was ſet on fire, and though Scipio was obliged to demoliſh its very walls to obey the orders of the Romans, yet he wept bitterly over the melancholy and tragical ſcene; and in bewailing the miſeries of Carthage, he expreſſed his fears leſt Rome, in her turn, in ſome future age, ſhould exhibit ſuch a dreadful conflagration. The return of Æmilianus to Rome was that of another conqueror of Annibal, and like him he was honored with a magnificent triumph, and received the firname of Africanus. He was not long left in the enjoyment of his glory before he was called to obtain freſh honors. He was choſen conſul a ſecond time, and appointed to finiſh the war which the Romans had hitherto carried on without ſucceſs or vigorous exertions againſt Numantia. The fall of Numantia was more noble than that of the capital of Africa,

Africa, and the conqueror of Carthage obtained the victory only when the enemies had been conſumed by famine, or by ſelf deſtruction, B.C. 133. From his conqueſts in Spain, Æmilianus was honored with a ſecond triumph, and with the ſurname of Numantinus. Yet his popularity was ſhort, and by telling the people that the murder of their favorite, his brother-in-law, Gracchus, was lawful, ſince he was turbulent and inimical to the peace of the republic, Scipio incurred the diſpleaſure of the tribunes, and was received with hiſſes. His authority, for a moment, quelled their ſedition, when he reproached them of their cowardice, and exclaimed, Factious wretches, do you think that your clamors can intimidate me; me whom the fury of your enemies never daunted? Is this the gratitude that you owe to my father Paulus who conquered Macedonia, and to me? Without my family you were ſlaves. Is this the reſpect you owe to your deliverers? Is this your affection? This firmneſs ſilenced the murmurs of the aſſembly, and ſometime after Scipio retired from the clamors of Rome to Caieta, where, with his friend Lælius, he paſſed the reſt of his time in innocent pleaſures and amuſement, in diverſions which had pleaſed them when children; and the two greateſt men that ruled the ſtate were often ſeen on the ſea ſhore picking up light pebbles, and throwing them on the ſmooth ſurface of the waters. Though fond of retirement and literary eaſe, yet Scipio often intereſted himſelf in the affairs of the ſtate. His enemies accuſed him of aſpiring to the dictatorſhip, and the clamors were moſt loud againſt him, when he had oppoſed the Sempronian law, and declared himſelf the patron of the inhabitants of the provinces of Italy. This active part of Scipio was ſeen with pleaſure by the friends of the republic, and not only the ſenate, but alſo the citizens, the Latins, and neighbouring ſtates, conducted their illuſtrious friend and patron to his houſe. It ſeemed almoſt the univerſal wiſh that the troubles might be quieted by the election of Scipio to the dictatorſhip, and many preſumed that that honor would be on the morrow conferred upon him. In this, however, the expectations of Rome were fruſtrated, Scipio was found dead in his bed to the aſtoniſhment of the world; and thoſe who enquired for the cauſes of this ſudden death, perceived violent marks on his neck, and concluded that he had been ſtrangled, B. C. 128. This aſſaſſination, as it was then generally believed, was committed by the triumvirs, Papirius Carbo, C. Gracchus, and Fulvius Flaccus, who ſupported the Sempronian law, and by his wife Sempronia, who is charged with introducing the murderers into his room. No enquiries were made after the authors of his death; Gracchus was the favorite of the mob, and the only atonement which the populace made for the death of Scipio was to attend his funeral, and to ſhow their concern by their cries and loud lamentations. The ſecond Africanus has often been compared to the firſt of that name; they ſeemed to be equally great, and equally meritorious, and the Romans were unable to diſtinguiſh which of the two was entitled to a greater ſhare of their regard and admiration. Æmilianus, like his grandfather, was fond of literature, and he ſaved from the flames of Carthage many valuable compoſitions, written by Phœnician and Punic authors. In the midſt of his greatneſs he died poor, and his nephew Q. Fabius Maximus, who inherited his eſtate, ſcarce found in his houſe thirty-two pounds weight of ſilver, and two and a half of gold. His liberality to his brother and to his ſiſters deſerves the greateſt commendations, and indeed no greater encomium can be paſſed upon his character, private as well as public, than the words of his rival Metellus, who told his ſons, at the death of Scipio, to go and attend the funeral of the greateſt man that ever lived or ſhould live in Rome. Liv. 44, &c.—Cic. de Senect. Orat. in Brut. &c.—Polyb.—Appian.—Paterc. 1, c. 12, &c.—Flor.——A ſon of the firſt Africanus, taken captive by Antiochus king of Syria, and reſtored to his father without a ranſom. He adopted as his ſon, young Æmilianus, the ſon of Paulus Æmilius, who was afterwards ſirnamed Africanus. Like his father Scipio, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his fondneſs for literature, and his valor in the Roman armies.——Metellus, the father-in-law of Pompey, appointed commander in Macedonia. He was preſent at the battle of Pharſalia, and afterwards retired to Africa with Cato. He was defeated by Cæſar at Thapſus. Plut.——Salutio, a mean perſon in Cæſar's army in Africa. The general appointed him his chief commander, either to ridicule him, or becauſe there was an antient oracle that declared that the Scipios would ever be victorious in Africa. Plut.——L. Cornelius, a conſul who oppoſed Sylla. He was at laſt deſerted by his army, and proſcribed.——The commander of a cohort in the reign of Vitellius.

SCIRA, an annual ſolemnity obſerved at Athens in honor of Minerva, or, according to others, of Ceres and Proſerpine. It received its name either from Sciras, a ſmall town of Attica, or from a native of Eleuſis called Scirus.

SCIRADIUM, a promontory of Attica on the Saronicus ſinus.

SCIRAS, a name of Ægina. Minerva was alſo called Sciras.

SCIRON, a celebrated thief in Attica, who plun-plundered the inhabitants of the country, and threw them down from the higheſt rocks into the ſea, after he had obliged them to wait upon him and to waſh his feet. Theſeus attacked him, and treated him as he treated travellers. According to Ovid, the earth, as well as the ſea, refuſed to receive the bones of Sciron, which remained for ſome time ſuſpended in the air, till they were changed into large rocks called Scironia Saxa, ſituate between Megara and Corinth. There was a road near them, which bore the name of Sciron, naturally ſmall and narrow, but afterwards enlarged by the emperor Adrian. Some ſuppoſe that Ino threw herſelf into the ſea from one of theſe rocks. Sciron had married the daughter of Cychreus a king of Salamis. He was brother-in-law to Telamon the ſon of Æacus. Ovid. 7, Met. v. 444. Heroid. 2, v. 69.—Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 13.

Scirus, a village of Arcadia.——A plain and river of Attica near Megara. Pauſ. 1, c. 36.

Scolus, a mountain of Bœotia.——A town of Macedonia.

Scombrus, a mountain of Thrace near Rhodope.

Scopas, an architect and ſculptor of Epheſus, for ſome time employed in making the mauſoleum which Artemiſia raiſed to her huſband, and which was reckoned one of the ſeven wonders of the world. One of his ſtatues of Venus was among the antiquities with which Rome was adorned. Scopas lived about 430 years before Chriſt. Pauſ. 1, c. 43, &c.—Horat. 4, Od. 8.—Vitr. 9. c. 9——An Ætolian who raiſed ſome forces to aſſiſt Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, againſt his enemies Antiochus and his allies. He afterwards conſpired againſt the Egyptian monarch, and was put to death, B. C. 196. ——An ambaſſador to the court of the emperor Domitian.

Scopium, a town of Theſſaly.

Scordisci and Scordiscæ, a people of Pannonia and Thrace, well known during the reign of the Roman emperors for their barbarity and uncivilized manners. They were fond of drinking human blood, and they generally ſacrificed their captive enemies to their gods. Strab. 7.—Flor. 3, c. 4.

Scotinus, a ſirname of Heraclitus.

Scotussa, a town of Theſſaly deſtroyed by Alexander of Pheræ.

Scribonia, a daughter of Scribonius, who married Auguſtus after he had divorced Claudia. He had by her a daughter, the celebrated Julia. Scribonia was ſometime after repudiated, that Auguſtus might marry Livia. She had been married twice before ſhe became the wife of the emperor. Sueton. in Aug. 62.——A woman who married Craſſus.

Scribonianus, a man in the age of Nero. Some of his friends wiſhed him to be competitor for the imperial purple againſt Veſpaſian, which he declined. —— There were alſo two brothers of that name who did nothing without each other's conſent.

Scribonius, a man who made himſelf maſter of the kingdom of Boſporus.——A phyſician in the age of Auguſtus and Tiberius.——A man who wrote annals, A. D. 22. The beſt edition of Scribonius is that of Patav. 4to. 1655.

Scylacēum, a town of Calabria, built by an Athenian colony. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 553. —Strab. 6.

Scylax, a geographer and mathematician of Caria, in the age of Darius, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, about 550 years before Chriſt. He was commiſſioned by Darius to make diſcoveries in the eaſt, and after a journey of 30 months he viſited Egypt. Some ſuppoſe that he was the firſt who invented geographical tables. The lateſt edition of the Periplus of Scylax, is that of Gronovius, 4to. L. Bat. 1697.—Herodot. 4, c. 44.—Strab.——A river of Cappadocia.

Scylla, a daughter of Niſus, king of Megara, who became enamoured of Minos, as that monarch beſieged her father's capital. To make him ſenſible of her paſſion, ſhe informed him that ſhe would deliver Megara into his hands, if he promiſed to marry her. Minos conſented, and as the proſperity of Megara depended on a golden hair, which was on the head of Niſus, Scylla cut it off as her father was aſleep, and from that moment the ſallies of the Megareans were unſucceſsful, and the enemy eaſily became maſter of the place. Scylla was diſappointed in her expectations, and Minos treated her with ſuch contempt and ridicule, that ſhe threw herſelf from a tower into the ſea, or, according to other accounts, ſhe was changed into a lark by the gods, and her father into a hawk. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 393.—Pauſ. 2, c. 34.—Propert. 3. el. 19, v. 21.—Hygin. fab. 198.—Virg. G. 1, v. 405, &c.—— A daughter of Typhon, or, as ſome ſay, of Phorcys, who was greatly loved by Glaucus, one of the deities of the ſea. Scylla ſcorned the addreſſes of Glaucus, and the god, to render her more propitious, applied to Circe, whoſe knowledge of herbs and incantations was univerſally admired. Circe no ſooner ſaw him than ſhe became enamoured of him, and inſtead of giving him the required aſſiſtance, ſhe attempted to make him forget Scylla, but in vain. To puniſh her rival, Circe poured the juice of ſome poiſonous herbs into the waters of the fountain where Scylla bathed, and no ſooner had the nymph touched the place, than ſhe found every part of her body below the waiſt, changed into frightful monſters like dogs, which never never ceaſed barking. The reſt of her body aſſumed an equally hideous form. She found herſelf ſupported by twelve feet, and ſhe had ſix different heads, each with three rows of teeth. This ſudden metamorphoſis ſo terrified her, that ſhe threw herſelf into that part of the ſea which ſeparates the coaſt of Italy and Sicily, where ſhe was changed into rocks, which continued to bear her name, and which were univerſally deemed very dangerous to navigators, as well as the whirlpool of Charybdis on the coaſt of Sicily. Homer. Od. 12, v. 85.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 66, &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 34.—Hygin. fab. 199. Some authors, as Propert. 4, el. 4, v. 39, & Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 74. with Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 500, have confounded the daughter of Typhon with the daughter of Niſus. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 424, &c.——A ſhip in the fleet of Æneas, commanded by Cloanthus, &c. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 122.

Scyllæum, a promontory of Peloponneſus on the coaſt of Argolis.

Scyllias, a celebrated ſwimmer who enriched himſelf by diving after the goods which had been ſhipwrecked in the Perſian ſhips near Pelium. It is ſaid that he could dive 80 ſtadia under the water. Herodot. 8, c. 8.

Scyllis, a ſtatuary of Crete before the age of Cyrus king of Perſia. Pauſ.

Scyllus, a town of Achaia, given to Xenophon by the Lacedæmonians.

Scylūrus, a monarch who left 80 ſons. He called them to his bed-ſide as he expired, and by enjoining them to break a bundle of ſticks tied together, and afterwards ſeparately, he convinced them, that when altogether firmly united, their power would be inſuperable, but if ever diſunited, they would fall an eaſy prey to their enemies.

Scyppium, a town in the neighbourhood of Colophon. Pauſ. 7, c. 3.

Scyras, a river of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 25.

Scyros, a rocky and barren iſland in the Ægean, at the diſtance of about 28 miles north eaſt from Eubœa, ſixty miles in circumference. It was originally in the poſſeſſion of the Pelaſgians and Carians. Achilles retired there not to go to the Trojan war, and became father of Neoptolemus by Deidamia, the daughter of king Lycomedes. Scyros was conquered by the Athenians under Cimon. Homer. Od. 10, v. 508.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 464, l. 13, v. 156.—Pauſ. 1, c. 7.—Strab. 9.

Scythæ, the inhabitants of Scythia. Vid. Scythia.

Scythes, or Scytha, a ſon of Jupiter by a daughter of Tellus. Half his body was that of a man, and the reſt that of a ſerpent. He became king of a country which he called Scythia. Diod. 2.—— A ſon of Hercules and Echidna.

Scythia, a large country ſituate on the moſt northern parts of Europe and Aſia, from which circumſtance it is generally denominated European and Aſiatic. The moſt northern parts of Scythia were uninhabited on account of the extreme coldneſs of the climate. The more ſouthern in Aſia that were inhabited were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Scythia intra & extra Imaum, &c. The boundaries of Scythia were unknown to the antients, as no traveller had penetrated beyond the vaſt tracts of land which lay at the north, eaſt and weſt. Scythia comprehended the modern kingdoms of Tartary, Ruſſia in Aſia, Siberia, Muſcovy, the Crimea, Poland, part of Hungary, Lithuania, the northern parts of Germany, Sweden, Norway, &c. The Scythians were divided into ſeveral nations or tribes, they had no cities, but continually changed their habitations. They inured themſelves to bear labor and fatigue; they deſpiſed money, and lived upon milk, and covered themſelves with the ſkins of their cattle. The virtues ſeemed to floriſh among them, and that philoſophy and moderation which other nations wiſhed to acquire by ſtudy, ſeemed natural to them. Some authors however repreſent them as a ſavage and barbarous people, who fed upon human fleſh, who drank the blood of their enemies, and uſed the ſkulls of travellers as veſſels in their ſacrifices to their gods. The Scythians made ſeveral irruptions upon the more ſouthern provinces of Aſia, eſpecially B. C. 624, when they remained in poſſeſſion of Aſia minor for 28 years, and we find them at different periods extending their conqueſts in Europe, and penetrating as far as Egypt. Their government was monarchical, and the deference which they paid to their ſovereigns was unparalleled. When the king died, his body was carried through every province, where it was received in ſolemn proceſſion, and afterwards buried. Herodot. 1, c. 4, &c.—Strab. 7.—Diod. 2.—Val. Max. 5, c. 4.—Juſtin. 2, c. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 64, l. 2, v. 224.

Scythīnus, a Greek poet of Ionia.

Scython, a man changed into a woman.

Scythopŏlis, a town of Syria, ſaid to have been built by Bacchus.

Sebasta, a town of Judæa.——Another in Cilicia.

Sebastia, a city of Armenia.

Sebennȳtus, a town of the Delta in Egypt. That branch of the Nile which flows near it has been called the Sebennytic. Plin. 5, c. 10.

Sebĕtus, a ſmall river of Campania, whence the epithet Sebethis, given to one of the nymphs who frequented its borders and became mother of Œbalus by Telon. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

Sebusiāni or Segusiani, a people of Celtic Gaul.

Sectānus, an infamous debauchee in the age of Horace. 1, Sat. 4, v. 112.

Secundus Julius, a man who publiſhed ſome harangues and orations in the age of the emperor Titus.——A favorite of Nero.——One of the aſſociates of Sejanus.

Seditāni or Sedentāni, a people of Spain. Ital. 3, v. 372.

Sedūni, an antient nation of Belgic Gaul. Cæſ.

Sedusii, a people of Germany near the Suevi.

Segesta, a town of Sicily founded by Æneas, or, according to ſome, by Criniſus.

Segestes, a German, friendly to the Roman intereſt in the time of Germanicus.

Segni, a people with a town of the ſame name in Belgic Gaul.

Segōnax, a prince in the ſouthern parts of Britain, who oppoſed Cæſar by order of Caſſivelaunus, &c. Cæſ. Bell. G. 5, c. 22.

Segontia or Seguntia, a town of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis.

Segontiāci, a people of Belgic Gaul, who ſubmitted to J. Cæſar.

Segovia, a town of Spain, of great power in the age of the Cæſars.——There was alſo another of the ſame name in Luſitania. Both had been founded by the Celtiberi.

Seguntium, a town of Britain.

Ælius Sejānus, a native of Vulſinum in Tuſcany, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the court of Tiberius. His father's name was Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the pretorian guards. His mother was deſcended from the Junian family. Sejanus firſt gained the favors of Caius Cæſar, the grandſon of Auguſtus, but afterwards he attached himſelf to the intereſt and the views of Tiberius, who then ſat on the imperial throne. The emperor, who was naturally of a ſuſpicious temper, was free and open with Sejanus, and while he diſtruſted others, he communicated his greateſt ſecrets to this fawning favorite. Sejanus improved this confidence, and when he had found that he poſſeſſed the eſteem of Tiberius, he next endeavoured to become the favorite of the ſoldiers and the darling of the ſenate. As commander of the prætorian guards he was the ſecond man in Rome, and in that important office he made uſe of inſinuations and every mean artifice to make himſelf beloved and revered. His affability and condeſcenſion gained him the hearts of the common ſoldiers, and by appointing his own favorites and adherents to places of truſt and honor, all the officers and centurions of the army became devoted to his intereſt. The views of Sejanus in this were well known, yet to advance with more ſucceſs, he attempted to gain the affection of the ſenators. In this he met with no oppoſition. A man who has the diſpoſal of places of honor and dignity, and who has the command of the public money, cannot but be the favorite of thoſe who are in need of his aſſiſtance. It is even ſaid, that Sejanus gained to his views all the wives of the ſenators, by a private and moſt ſecret promiſe of marriage to each of them, whenever he had made himſelf independent and ſovereign of Rome. Yet however ſucceſsful with the beſt and nobleſt families in the empire, Sejanus had to combat numbers in the houſe of the emperor; but theſe ſeeming obſtacles were ſoon removed. All the children and grand-children of Tiberius were ſacrificed to the ambition of the favorite under various pretences, and Druſus the ſon of the emperor, by ſtriking Sejanus, made his deſtruction ſure and inevitable. Livia, the wife of Druſus was gained by Sejanus, and though the mother of many children, ſhe was prevailed upon to aſſiſt her adulterer in the murder of her huſband, and ſhe conſented to marry him when Druſus was dead. No ſooner was Druſus poiſoned, than Sejanus openly declared his wiſh to marry Livia. This was ſtrongly oppoſed by Tiberius; and the emperor by recommending Germanicus to the ſenators for his ſucceſſor, rendered Sejanus bold and determined. He was more urgent in his demands; and when he could not gain the conſent of the emperor, he perſuaded him to retire to ſolitude from the noiſe of Rome, and the troubles of the government. Tiberius, naturally fond of eaſe and luxury, yielded to his repreſentations, and retired to Campania, leaving Sejanus at the head of the empire. This was highly gratifying to the favorite, but he was not without a maſter. Prudence and moderation might have made him what he wiſhed to be; but Sejanus offended the whole empire when he declared that he was emperor of Rome, and Tiberius only the dependent prince of the iſland of Capreæ, where he had retired. Tiberius was upon this fully convinced of the deſigns of Sejanus, and when he had been informed that his favorite had had the meanneſs and audacity to ridicule him by introducing him on the ſtage, the emperor ordered him to be accuſed before the ſenate. Sejanus was deſerted by all his pretended friends, as ſoon as by fortune; and the man who aſpired to the empire, and who called himſelf the favorite of the people, the darling of the prætorian guards, and the companion of Tiberius, was ſeized without reſiſtance, and the ſame day ſtrangled in priſon, A. D. 31. His remains were expoſed to the fury and inſolence of the populace, and afterwards thrown into the Tiber. His children and all his relations were involved in his ruin, and Tiberius ſacriceed to his reſentment and ſuſpicions, all thoſe who were even connected with Sejanus, or had ſhared his favors and enjoyed his confidence. Tacit. 3, Ann. &c.—Dio. 58.—Suet. in Tib.

SEIUS STRABO, the father of Sejanus, was a Roman knight, and commander of the prætorian guards.

SELEMNUS, a river of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 23. Vid. Selimnus.

SELENE, the wife of Antiochus king of Syria, put to death by Tigranes, king of Armenia. She was daughter of Phyſcon, king of Egypt, and had firſt married her brother Lathurus, according to the cuſtom of her country, and afterwards by deſire of her mother, her other brother Gryphus. At the death of Gryphus ſhe had married Antiochus, firnamed Euſebes, the ſon of Antiochus Cyzicenus, by whom ſhe had two ſons. According to Appian, ſhe firſt married the father, and after his death, his ſon Euſebes. Appian. Syr. &c.

SELEUCENA, or SELEUCIS, a country of Aſia in Syria.

SELEUCIA, a town of Syria, generally called Pieria, to diſtinguiſh it from others of the ſame name. There were no leſs than eight other cities which were called Seleucia, and which had all received their name from Seleucus Nicator. They were all ſituate in the kingdom of Syria, in Cilicia, and near the Euphrates. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Plut. in Dem. —Mela. 1, c. 12.—Strab. 11 & 15.—Plin. 6, c. 26.

SELEUCIDÆ, a firname given to thoſe monarchs who ſat on the throne of Syria, which was founded by Seleucus the ſon of Antiochus, from whom the word is derived. The era of the Seleucidæ begins with the taking of Babylon by Seleucus, B. C. 312, and ends at the conqueſt of Syria by Pompey, B. C. 65. The order in which theſe monarchs reigned, is ſhown in the account of Syria. Vid. Syria.

SELEUCIS, a diviſion of Syria. It received its name from Seleucus, who was the founder of the Syrian empire, after the death of Alexander the Great.

SELEUCUS, 1ſt, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, firnamed Nicator or Victorious, was ſon of Antiochus. After the king's death, he received Babylon as his province; but his ambitious views, and his attempt to deſtroy Eumenes as he paſſed through his territories, rendered him ſo unpopular that he fled for ſafety to the court of his friend Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was ſoon after enabled to recover Babylon, which Antigonus had ſeized in his abſence, and he encreaſed his dominions by the immediate conqueſt of Media, and ſome of the neighbouring provinces. When he had ſtrengthened himſelf in his empire, Seleucus imitated the example of the reſt of the generals of Alexander, and aſſumed the title of independent monarch. He afterwards made war againſt Antigonus, with the united forces of Ptolemy, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus; and after this monarch had been conquered and ſlain, his territories were divided among his victorious enemies. When Seleucus became maſter of Syria, he built a city there, which he called Antioch, in honor of his father, and made it the capital of his dominions. He alſo made war againſt Demetrius and Lyſimachus, though he had originally married Stratonice, the daughter of the former, and had lived in the cloſeſt friendſhip and amity with the latter. Seleucus was at laſt murdered by one of his ſervants called Ptolemy Ceraunus, a man on whom he beſtowed the greateſt favors, and whom he had diſtinguiſhed by acts of the moſt unbounded liberality. According to Arrian, Seleucus was the greateſt and moſt powerful of the princes who inherited the Macedonian empire after the death of Alexander. His benevolence has been commended; and it has been obſerved, that he conquered, not to enſlave nations, but to make them more happy. He founded no leſs than 34 cities in different parts of his empire, which he peopled with Greek colonies, whoſe national induſtry, learning, religion, and ſpirit, were communicated to the indolent and luxurious inhabitants of Aſia. Seleucus was a great benefactor to the Greeks; he reſtored to the Athenians the library and the ſtatues which Xerxes had carried away from their city when he invaded Greece, and among them were thoſe of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. Seleucus was murdered 280 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 32d year of his reign, and the 78th, or according to others the 73d year of his age, as he was going to conquer Macedonia, where he intended to finiſh his days in peace and tranquillity in that province where he was born. He was ſucceeded by Antiochus Soter. Juſtin. 13, c. 4. l. 15, c. 4. l. 16, c. 3, &c.—Plut. in Dem.—Plin. 6, c. 17.—Pauſ. 8, c. 51.—Joſeph. Ant. 12.—The 2d, firnamed Callinicus, ſucceeded his father Antiochus Theus on the throne of Syria. He attempted to make war againſt Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but his fleet was ſhipwrecked in a violent ſtorm, and his armies ſoon after conquered by his enemy. He was at laſt taken priſoner by Arſaces, an officer who made himſelf powerful by the diſſenſions which reigned in the houſe of the Seleucidæ, between the two brothers, Seleucus and Antiochus; and after he had been a priſoner for ſome time in Parthia, he died of a fall from his horſe, B. C. 226, after a reign of 20 years. Seleucus had received the firname of Pogon, from his long beard, and that of Callinicus, Cinicus, ironically to express his very unfortunate reign. He had married Laodice, the sister of one of his generals, by whom he had two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus, and a daughter whom he gave in marriage to Mithridates king of Pontus. Strab. 16.—Justin. 27.—Appian. de Syr.——The 3d, succeeded his father Seleucus 2d on the throne of Syria, and received the surname of Ceraunus, by antiphrasis, as he was a very weak, timid, and irresolute monarch. He was murdered by two of his officers after a reign of three years, B. C. 223, and his brother Antiochus, though only 15 years old, ascended the throne, and rendered himself so celebrated that he acquired the name of the Great. Appian.——The 4th, succeeded his father Antiochus the Great, on the throne of Syria. He was surnamed Philopator, or according to Josephus, Soter. His empire had been weakened by the Romans when he became monarch, and the yearly tribute of a thousand talents to these victorious enemies, contributed in lessening his power and consequence among nations. Seleucus was poisoned after a reign of 12 years, B. C. 175. His son Demetrius had been sent to Rome, there to receive his education, and he became a prince of great abilities. Strab. 16.—Justin. 32.—Appian.——The 5th, succeeded his father Demetrius Nicator on the throne of Syria, in the 20th year of his age. He was put to death in the first year of his reign by Cleopatra his mother, who had also sacrificed her husband to her ambition. He is not reckoned by many historians in the number of the Syrian monarchs.——The 6th, one of the Seleucidæ, son of Antiochus Gryphus, killed his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who wished to obtain the crown of Syria. He was some time after banished from his kingdom by Antiochus Pius, son of Cyzicenus, and fled to Cilicia, where he was burnt in a palace by the inhabitants, B. C. 93. Appian.—Joseph.——A prince of Syria, to whom the Egyptians offered the crown of which they had robbed Auletes. Seleucus accepted it, but he soon disgusted his subjects, and received the surname of Cybiosactes or Scullion, for his meanness and avarice. He was at last murdered by Berenice whom he had married.——A servant of Cleopatra, the last queen of Egypt, who accused his mistress before Octavianus, of having secreted part of her jewels and treasures.——A mathematician intimate with Vespasian the Roman emperor.——A part of the Alps.——A Roman consul.——A celebrated singer. Juv. 10, v. 11.——A king of the Bosporus, who died B. C. 429.

SELGE, a town of Pamphylia.

SELIMNUS, a shepherd of Achaia, who for some time enjoyed the favors of the nymph Argyra, without interruption. Argyra was at last disgusted with her lover, and the shepherd died through melancholy, and was changed into a river of the same name. Argyra was also changed into a fountain, and was fond of mingling her waters with those of the Selimnus. Paus. 7, c. 23.

SELINUNS, or SELINUS, a town on the southern parts of Sicily, founded A. U. C. 127, by a colony from Megara. It received its name from σέλινον, parsley, which grew there in abundance. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 705.—Paus. 6, c. 19.——A river of Elis in Peloponnesus.——Another in Achaia.——Another in Sicily.

SELLASIA, a town of Laconia where Cleomenes was defeated by the Achæans, B. C. 222. Scarce 200 of a body of 5000 Lacedæmonians survived the battle. Plut.

SELLEIS, a river of Peloponnesus falling into the Ionian sea. Homer Il.

SELLI, a nation of Epirus.

SELYMBRIA, a town of Thrace.

SEMELE, a daughter of Cadmus by Hermione, the daughter of Mars and Venus. She was tenderly beloved by Jupiter; but Juno, who was always jealous of her husband's amours, and who hated the house of Cadmus, because they were related to the goddess of beauty, determined to punish this successful rival. She borrowed the girdle of Ate, which contained every wickedness, deceit, and perfidy, and in the form of Beroe, Semele's nurse, she visited the house of Jupiter's mistress. Semele listened with attention to the artful admonitions of the false Beroe, and was at last persuaded to entreat her lover to come to her arms with the same majesty as he approached Juno. This rash request was heard with horror by Jupiter; but as he had sworn by the Styx to grant Semele whatever she required, he came to her bed attended by the clouds, the lightning, and thunderbolts. The mortal nature of Semele could not endure so much majesty, and she was instantly consumed with fire. The child, however, of which she was pregnant, was saved from the flames by Mercury, or according to others by Dirce, one of the nymphs of the Achelous, and Jupiter placed him in his thigh the rest of the time which he ought to have been in his mother's womb. This child was called Bacchus, or Dionysius. Semele immediately after death was honored with immortality under the name of Thyone. Some however suppose that she remained in the infernal regions till Bacchus her son was permitted to bring her back. There were in the temple of Diana, at Trœzene, two altars raised to the infernal gods, one of which was over an aperture, through which, as Pausanias reports, Bacchus returned from hell with his mother. Semele was particularly worshipped at Braſiæ in Laconia, where, according to a certain tradition, ſhe had been driven by the winds with her ſon, after Cadmus had expoſed her on the ſea, on account of her incontinent amour with Jupiter. The mother of Bacchus, though ſhe received divine honors, had no temples; ſhe had a ſtatue in a temple of Ceres, at Thebes, in Bœotia. Pauſ. 3, c. 24, l. 9, c. 5.—*Heſiod. SEMIGERMĀNI, a name given to the Helvetii, a people of Germany.

SEMIGUNTUS, a general of the Cheruſci, taken priſoner by Germanicus, &c.

SEMIRĀMIS, a celebrated queen of Aſſyria, daughter of the goddeſs Derceto, by a young Aſſyrian. She was expoſed in a deſert, but her life was preſerved by doves for one whole year, till Simmas, one of the ſhepherds of Ninus, found her and brought her up as his own child. Semiramis when grown up, married Menones, the governor of Nineveh, and accompanied him to the ſiege of Bactra, where, by her advice and prudent directions, ſhe haſtened the king's operations and took the city. Theſe eminent ſervices, but chiefly her uncommon beauty, endeared her to Ninus. The monarch aſked her of her huſband, and offered him inſtead, his daughter Soſana; but Menones, who tenderly loved Semiramis, refuſed, and when Ninus had added threats to entreaties he hung himſelf. No ſooner was Menones dead than Semiramis, who was of an aſpiring ſoul, married Ninus, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Ninyas. Ninus was ſo fond of Semiramis, that at her requeſt he reſigned the crown to her, and commanded her to be proclaimed queen and ſole empreſs of Aſſyria. Of this however he had cauſe to repent: Semiramis put him to death, the better to eſtabliſh herſelf on the throne, and when ſhe had no enemies to fear at home, ſhe began to repair the capital of her empire, and by her means Babylon became the moſt ſuperb and magnificent city in the world. She viſited every part of her dominions, and left every where immortal monuments of her greatneſs and benevolence. To render the roads paſſable and communication eaſy, ſhe hollowed mountains and filled up vallies, and water was conveyed at a great expence by large and convenient aqueducts to barren deſarts and unfruitful plains. She was not leſs diſtinguiſhed as a warrior, many of the neighbouring nations were conquered, and when Semiramis was once told as ſhe was dreſſing her hair, that Babylon had revolted, ſhe left her toilette with precipitation, and though only half dreſſed, ſhe refuſed to have the reſt of her head adorned before the ſedition was quelled, and tranquillity re-eſtabliſhed. Semiramis has been accuſed of licentiouſneſs, and ſome authors have obſerved that ſhe regularly called the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt men in her army to her arms, and afterwards put them to death that they might not be living witneſſes of her incontinence. Her paſſion for her ſon was alſo unnatural, and it was this criminal propenſity which induced Ninyas to deſtroy his mother with his own hands. Some ſay that Semiramis was changed into a dove after death, and received immortal honors in Aſſyria. It is ſuppoſed that ſhe lived about 1965 years before the Chriſtian era, and that ſhe died in the 62d year of her age, and the 25th of her reign. Many fabulous reports have been propagated about Semiramis, and ſome have declared that for ſome time ſhe diſguiſed herſelf and paſſed for her ſon Ninyas. *Val. SEMNŌNES, a people of Italy on the borders of Umbria.

SEMŌNES, inferior deities of Rome, that were not in the number of the 12 great gods. Among theſe were Faunus, the Satyrs, Priapus, Vertumnus, Janus, Pan, Silenus, and all ſuch illuſtrious heroes as had received divine honors after death. The word ſeems to be the ſame as ſemi homines, becauſe they were inferior to the ſupreme gods, and ſuperior to men.

SEMOSANCTUS, one of the gods of the Romans among the Indigetes, or ſuch as were born and educated in their country.

SEMPRONIA, a Roman matron, mother of the two Gracchi, celebrated for her learning, and her private as well as public virtues.——Alſo a ſiſter of the Gracchi, who is accuſed of having aſſiſted the triumvirs Carbo, Gracchus and Flaccus, to murder her huſband, Scipio Africanus the younger. The name of Sempronia was common to the female deſcendants of the family of the Sempronii, Gracchi, and Scipios.

SEMPRŌNIA LEX de magiſtratibus by C. Sempronius Gracchus, the tribune, A. U. C. 630, ordained that no perſon who had been legally deprived of a magiſtracy for miſdemeanors, ſhould be capable of bearing an office again. This law was afterwards repealed by the author.——Another de civitate, by the ſame, A. U. C. 630. It ordained that no capital judgment ſhould be paſſed over a Roman citizen without the concurrence and authority of the ſenate. There were alſo ſome other regulations included in this law.——Another de comitiis, by the ſame, A. U. C. 635. It ordained that in giving their votes the the centuries ſhould be choſen by lot, and not give it according to the order of their claſſes.——Another, de comitiis, by the ſame, the ſame year, which granted to the Latin allies of Rome, the privilege of giving their votes at elections, as if they were Roman citizens.——Another, de provinciis, by the ſame, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the ſenators ſhould be permitted before the aſſembly of the conſular comitia, to determine as they pleaſed the particular provinces which ſhould be propoſed to the conſuls, to be divided by lot, and that the tribunes ſhould be deprived of the power of interpoſing againſt a decree of the ſenate.——Another called Agraria prima, by T. Sempronius Gracchus the tribune, A. U. C. 620. It confirmed the lex agraria Licinia, and enacted that all ſuch as were in poſſeſſion of more lands than that law allowed, ſhould immediately reſign them, to be divided among the poorer citizens. Three commiſſioners were appointed to put this law into execution, and its conſequences were ſo violent, as it was directly made againſt the nobles and the ſenators, that it coſt the author his life.——Another called Agraria altera, by the ſame. It required that all the ready money which was found in the treaſury of Attalus king of Pergamus, who had left the Romans his heirs, ſhould be divided among the poorer citizens of Rome, to ſupply them with all the various inſtruments requiſite in huſbandry, and that the lands of that monarch ſhould be farmed by the Roman cenſors, and the money drawn from thence ſhould be divided among the people.——Another, frumentaria, by C. Sempronius Gracchus. It required that a certain quantity of corn ſhould be diſtributed among the people, ſo much to every individual, for which it was required that they ſhould only pay the trifling ſum of a ſemiſſis and a triens.——Another, de uſurâ, by M. Sempronius, the tribune, A. U. C. 560. It ordained that in lending money to the Latins and the allies of Rome, the Roman laws ſhould be obſerved as well as among the citizens.——Another, de judicibus, by the tribune C. Sempronius, A. U. C. 630. It required that the right of judging, which had been aſſigned to the ſenatorian order by Romulus, ſhould be tranſferred from them to the Roman knights.——Another, militaris, by the ſame, A. U. C. 630. It enacted that the ſoldiers ſhould be cloathed at the public expence, without any diminution of their uſual pay. It alſo ordered that no perſon ſhould be obliged to ſerve in the army before the age of 17.

SEMPRONIUS (A. ATRATINUS,) a ſenator who oppoſed the Agrarian law, which was propoſed by the conſul Caſſius ſoon after the election of the tribunes.——L. Atratinus, a conſul, A. U. C. 311. He was one of the firſt cenſors with his colleague in the conſulſhip, Papirius.——Caius, a conſul ſummoned before an aſſembly of the people becauſe he had fought with ill ſucceſs againſt the Volſci.——Blæſus, a conſul who obtained a triumph for ſome victories gained in Sicily.——Sophus, a conſul againſt the Æqui. He alſo fought againſt the Picentes, and during the engagement there was a dreadful earthquake. The ſoldiers were terrified, but Sophus encouraged them, and obſerved that the earth trembled only for fear of changing its old maſters.——A man who propoſed a law that no perſon ſhould dedicate a temple or altar without the previous approbation of the magiſtrates, A. U. C. 449. He repudiated his wife becauſe ſhe had gone to ſee a ſpectacle without his permiſſion or knowledge.——Rufus, a ſenator baniſhed from the ſenate becauſe he had killed a crane to ſerve him as food.——Tuditanus, a man ſent againſt Sardinia by the Romans.——A legionary tribune who led away from Cannæ the remaining part of the ſoldiers who had not been killed by the Carthaginians. He was afterwards conſul, and fought in the field againſt Annibal with great ſucceſs. He was killed in Spain.——Tiberius Longus, a Roman conſul defeated by the Carthaginians in an engagement which he had begun againſt the approbation of his colleague C. Scipio. He afterwards obtained victories over Hanno and the Gauls.——Tiberius Gracchus, a conſul who defeated the Carthaginians and the Campanians. He was afterwards betrayed by Fulvius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginians, and was killed, after he had made a long and bloody reſiſtance againſt the enemy. Hannibal ſhewed great honor to his remains, a funeral pile was raiſed at the head of the camp, and the enemy's cavalry walked round it in ſolemn proceſſion.——Gracchus, a man who had debauched Julia. [Vid. Gracchus.]——An eunuch made governor of Rome by Caracalla.——Denſus, a centurion of a pretorian cohort, who defended the perſon of Galba againſt the aſſaſſins. He was killed in the attempt.——The father of the Gracchi. [Vid. Gracchus.]——A cenſor who was alſo ſent as ambaſſador to the court of Egypt.——A tribune of the people, &c. Tacit.--Flor.--Liv.--Plut.--Caſ.--Appian.

SEMURIUM, a place near Rome, where Apollo had a temple.——An emperor. Vid. Saturninus.

SENA, a town of Umbria in Italy, on the Adriatic, built by the Senones, after they had made an irruption into Italy, A. U. C. 396; and on that account called Gallica. There was alſo a ſmall river in the neighbourhood which bore the name of Sena. It was near it that Aſdrubal was defeated by Cl. Nero. C. Nep. in Catone.—Sil. 8, v. 454.

SENATUS, the chief council of the ſtate among the Romans. The members of this body, called ſenators on account of their age, and patres on account of their authority, were of the greateſt conſequence in the republic. The ſenate was firſt inſtituted by Romulus, to govern the city and to preſide over the affairs of ſtate during his abſence. This was continued by his ſucceſſors; but Tarquin the Second diſdained to conſult them, and by having his own council choſen from his favorites, and men who were totally devoted to his intereſt, he diminiſhed the authority and the conſequence of the ſenators, and ſlighted the concurrence of the people. The ſenators whom Romulus created were an hundred, to whom he afterwards added the ſame number when the Sabines had migrated to Rome. Tarquin the ancient made the ſenate conſiſt of 300, and this number remained fixed for a long time; but afterwards it fluctuated greatly, and was encreaſed to 700, and to 900 by J. Cæſar, who filled the ſenate with men of every rank and order. Under Auguſtus the ſenators amounted to 1000, but this number was reduced to 300, which being the cauſe of complaints, induced the emperor to limit the number to 600. The place of a ſenator was always beſtowed upon merit; the monarchs had the privilege of chuſing the members, and after the expulſion of the Tarquins it was one of the rights of the conſuls, till the election of the cenſors, who from their office ſeemed moſt capable of making choice of men whoſe character was irreproachable, whoſe morals were pure, and relations honorable. Sometimes the aſſembly of the people elected ſenators, but it was only upon ſome extraordinary occaſions; there was alſo a dictator choſen to fill up the number of the ſenate, after the battle of Cannæ. Only particular families were admitted into the ſenate; and when the plebeians were permitted to ſhare the honors of the ſtate, it was then required that they ſhould be born of free citizens. It was alſo required that the candidates ſhould be knights before their admiſſion into the ſenate. They were to be above the age of 25, and to have previouſly paſſed through the inferior offices of quæſtor, tribune of the people, edile, pretor, and conſul. Some, however, ſuppoſe that the ſenators whom Romulus choſe were all old men; yet his ſucceſſors neglected this, and often men who were below the age of 25 were admitted by curteſy into the ſenate. The dignity of a ſenator could not be ſupported without the poſſeſſion of 80,000 ſeſterces, or about 700l. Engliſh money, and therefore ſuch as ſquandered away their money, and whoſe fortune was reduced below this ſum, were generally ſtruck out of the liſt of ſenators. This regulation was not made in the firſt ages of the republic, when the Romans boaſted of their poverty. The ſenators were not permitted to be of any trade or profeſſion. They were diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the people by their dreſs; they wore the laticlave, half boots of a black color, with a creſcent or ſilver buckle in the form of a C; but this laſt honor was confined only to the deſcendants of thoſe hundred ſenators who had been elected by Romulus, as the letter C ſeems to imply. They had the ſole right of feaſting publicly in the capitol in ceremonial habits; they ſat in curule chairs, and at the repreſentation of plays and public ſpectacles they were honored with particular ſeats. Whenever they travelled abroad, even on their own buſineſs, they were maintained at the public expence, and always found proviſions for themſelves and their attendants ready prepared on the road; a privilege that was generally termed free legation. On public feſtivals they wore the prætexta or long white robe with purple borders. The right of convocating the ſenate belonged only to the monarchs; and after the expulſion of the Tarquins, to the conſuls, the dictator, maſter of the horſe, governor of Rome, and tribunes of the people; but no magiſtrate could exerciſe this privilege except in the abſence of a ſuperior officer, the tribunes excepted. The time of meeting was generally three times a month on the calends, nones, and ides. Under Auguſtus they were not aſſembled on the nones. It was requiſite that the place where they aſſembled ſhould have been previouſly conſecrated by the augurs. This was generally in the temple of Concord, of Jupiter Capitolinus, Apollo, Caſtor and Pollux, &c. or in the Curiæ called Hoſtilia, Julia Pompeia, &c. When audience was given to foreign ambaſſadors, the ſenators aſſembled without the walls of the city, either in the temples of Bellona or of Apollo; and the ſame ceremony as to their meeting was alſo obſerved when they tranſacted buſineſs with their generals, as the ambaſſadors of foreign nations, and the commanders of armies while in commiſſion were not permitted to appear within the walls of the city. To render their decrees valid and authentic, a certain number of members was requiſite, and ſuch as were abſent without ſome proper cauſe, were always fined. In the reign of Auguſtus, 400 ſenators were requiſite to make a ſenate. Nothing was tranſacted before ſun riſe or after ſun ſet. In their office the ſenators were the guardians of religion, they diſpoſed of the provinces as they pleaſed, they prorogued the aſſemblies of the people, they appointed thankſgivings, nominated their ambaſſadors, diſtributed the public money, and in in short, had the management of every thing political or civil in the republic, except the creating of magistrates, the enacting of laws, and the declarations of war or peace, which were confined to the assemblies of the people. Rank was always regarded in their meetings; the chief magistrates of the state, such as the consuls, the pretors, and censors sat first, after these the inferior magistrates, such as the ediles and questors, and last of all, those that then exercised no office in the state. Their opinions were originally collected, each according to his age; but when the office of censor was instituted, the opinion of the princeps senatus, or the person whose name stood first on the censor's list, was first consulted, and afterwards those who were of consular dignity, each in their respective order. In the age of Cicero, the consuls elect were first consulted; and in the age of Cæsar, he was permitted to speak first till the end of the year, on whom the consul had originally conferred that honor. Under the emperors the same rules were observed, but the consuls were generally consulted before all others. When any public matter was introduced into the senate, which was always called referre ad senatum, any senator whose opinion was asked, was permitted to speak upon it as long as he pleased, and on that account it was often usual for the senators to protract their speeches till it was too late to determine. When the question was put, they passed to the side of that speaker, whose opinion they approved, and a majority of votes was easily collected, without the trouble of counting the numbers. This mode of proceeding was called pedibus in alicujus sententiam ire, and therefore on that account, the senators who had not the privilege of speaking, but only the right of giving a silent vote, such as bore some curule honors, and on that account were permitted to sit in the senate, but not to deliberate, were denominated pedarii senatores. After the majority had been known, the matter was determined, and a senatus consultum was immediately written by the clerks of the house, at the feet of the chief magistrates, and it was signed by all the principal members of the house. When there was not a sufficient number of members to make a senate, the decision was called senatus autoritas, but it was of no consequence if it did not afterwards pass into a senatus consultum. The tribunes of the people, by the word veto, could stop the debates, and the decrees of the assembled senate, as also any one who was of equal authority with him who had proposed the matter. The senatus consulta were left in the custody of the consuls, who could suppress or preserve them; but about the year of Rome 304, they were always deposited in the temple of Ceres, and afterwards in the treasury, by the ediles of the people. The degradation of the senators was made by the censor by omitting their names when he called over the list of the senate. This was called præterire. A senator could be again introduced into the senate if he could repair his character, or fortune, which had been the causes why the censor had lawfully called him unqualified, and had challenged his opposition. The meeting of the senate was often sudden, except the particular times already mentioned, upon any emergency. After the death of J. Cæsar, they were not permitted to meet on the ides of March, which were called parricidium, because on that day the dictator had been assassinated. The sons of senators, after they had put on the toga virilis, were permitted to come into the senate, but this was afterwards limited. [Vid. Papirius.] The rank and the authority of the senators, which were so conspicuous in the first ages of the republic, and which caused the minister of Pyrrhus to declare that the Roman senate was a venerable assembly of kings, dwindled into nothing under the emperors. Men of the lowest characters were admitted into the senate; the emperors took pleasure in robbing this illustrious body of their privileges and authority, and the senators themselves, by their meanness and servility, contributed as much as the tyranny of the sovereign to diminish their own consequence; and by applauding the follies of a Nero, and the cruelties of a Domitian, they convinced the world that they no longer possessed sufficient prudence or authority to be consulted on matters of weight and importance. In the election of successors to the imperial purple after Augustus, the approbation of the senate was consulted, but it was only a matter of curtesy, and the concurrence of a body of men was little regarded who were without power, and under the controul of a mercenary army. The title of Clarissimus was given to the senators, under the emperors, and indeed this was the only distinction they had in compensation for the loss of their independence. The senate was abolished by Justinian, 13 centuries after its first institution by Romulus.

Senna, or Sena, a river of Umbria. Lucan. 2, v. 407.

Seneca, L. Annæus, a native of Corduba in Spain, who married Helvia, a woman of Spain, by whom he had three sons, Seneca the philosopher, Annæus Novatus, and Annæus Mela, the father of the poet Lucan. Seneca made himself known by some declamations of which he made a collection from the most celebrated orators of the age. He left Corduba, and went to Rome, where he became a Roman knight. His son L. Annæus Seneca, who was born about six years before Christ, was early distinguished by his extraordinary talents. He was taught eloquence by his father, and received lessons in philosophy from the best and most celebrated stoics of the age. As one of the followers of the Pythagorean doctrines, Seneca observed the most reserved abstinence, and in his meals never eat the flesh of animals; but this he abandoned at the representation of his father, when Tiberius threatened to punish some Jews and Egyptians, who abstained from certain meats. In the character of a pleader, Seneca appeared with great advantage, but the fear of Caligula, who aspired to the name of an eloquent speaker, and who consequently was jealous of his fame, deterred him from pursuing his favorite study, and he sought a safer employment in canvassing for the honors and offices of the state. He was made quæstor, but the aspersions which were thrown upon him on account of a shameful amour with Julia Livilla, removed him from Rome, and the emperor banished him for some time into Corsica. During this banishment the philosopher wrote some spirited epistles to his mother, remarkable for elegance of language and sublimity, but he soon forgot his philosophy, and disgraced himself by his flatteries to the emperor, and in wishing to be recalled, even at the expence of his innocence and character. The disgrace of Messalina at Rome, and the marriage of Agrippina with Claudius proved favorable to Seneca, and after he had remained five years in Corsica, he was recalled by the empress to take care of the education of her son Nero, who was destined to succeed to the empire. In the honorable duty of preceptor, Seneca gained applause, and as long as Nero followed his advice, Rome enjoyed tranquillity, and believed herself safe and happy under the administration of the son of Agrippina. Some, however, are clamorous against the philosopher, and observe that Seneca initiated his pupil in those unnatural vices, and abominable indulgences, which disgraced him as a monarch and as a man. This may be the language of malevolence, or the insinuation of jealousy. In the corrupted age of Nero, the preceptor had to withstand the clamors of many wicked and profligate ministers, and if he had been the favorite of the emperor, and shared his pleasures, his debauchery and extravagance, Nero would not perhaps have been so anxious of destroying a man whose examples, from vicious inclinations he could not follow, and whose salutary precepts his licentious associates forbad him to obey. Seneca was too well acquainted with the natural disposition of Nero, to think himself secure; he had been accused of having amassed the most ample riches, and of having built sumptuous houses, and adorned beautiful gardens, during the four years in which he had attended Nero as a preceptor, and therefore he desired his imperial pupil to accept of the riches, and the possessions which his attendance on his person had procured, and to permit him to retire to solitude and study. Nero refused with artful duplicity, and Seneca to avoid further suspicions, kept himself at home for some time as if laboring under a disease. In the conspiracy of Piso, which happened some time after, and in which some of the most noble of the Roman senators were concerned, Seneca's name was mentioned by Natalis, and Nero who was glad of an opportunity of sacrificing him to his secret jealousy, ordered him to destroy himself. Seneca very probably was not accessary to the conspiracy, and the only thing which could be produced against him as a crimination, was trivial and unsatisfactory. Piso, as Natalis declared, had complained that he never saw Seneca, and the philosopher had observed in answer, that it was not proper or conducive to their common interest, to see one another often. He further pleaded indisposition, and said that his own life depended upon the safety of Piso's person. Seneca was at table with his wife Paulina and two of his friends, when the messenger from Nero arrived. He heard the words which commanded him to destroy himself, with philosophical firmness, and even with joy, and observed, that such a mandate might have long been expected from a man who had murdered his own mother, and assassinated all his friends. He wished to dispose of his possessions as he pleased, but this was refused, and when he heard this, he turned to his friends who were weeping at his melancholy fate, and told them, that since he could not leave them what he believed his own, he would leave them at least his own life for an example, an innocent conduct which they might imitate, and by which they might acquire immortal fame. Against their tears and wailings he exclaimed with firmness, and asked them whether they had not learnt better to withstand the attacks of fortune, and the violence of tyranny? As for his wife, he attempted to calm her emotions, and when she seemed resolved to die with him, he said he was glad to find his example followed with so much constancy. Their veins were opened at the same moment, but the life of Paulina was preserved, and Nero, who was partial to her, ordered the blood to be stopped, and from that moment, according to some authors, the philosopher's wife seemed to rejoice that she could still enjoy the comforts of life. Seneca's veins bled but slowly, and it has been observed, that the sensible and animated conversation of his dying moments was collected by his friends, and that it has been preserved among his works. To hasten his his death he drank a doſe of poiſon, but it had no effect; and therefore he ordered himſelf to be carried into a hot-bath, to accelerate the operation of the draught, and to make the blood flow more freely. This was attended with no better ſucceſs, and as the ſoldiers were clamorous, he was carried into a ſtove, and ſuffocated by the ſteam, on the 12th of April, in the 65th year of the Chriſtian era, in his 53d year. His body was burnt without pomp or funeral ceremony, according to his will, which he had made when he enjoyed the moſt unbounded favors of Nero. The compoſitions of Seneca are numerous, and chiefly on moral ſubjects. He is admired for his refined ſentiments and virtuous precepts. His ſtile is nervous, it abounds with ornament, and ſeems well ſuited to the taſte of the age in which he lived. The deſire of recommending himſelf and his writings to the world, obliged him too often to depreciate the merit of the antients, and to ſink into obſcurity. His treatiſes are de irâ, de conſolatione, de Providentiâ, de tranquilitate animi, de clementiâ, de ſapientis conſtantiâ, de otio ſapientis, de brevitate vitæ, de beneficiis, de vitâ beatâ, beſides his naturales quæſtiones, ludus in Claudium, moral letters, &c. There are alſo ſome tragedies aſcribed to Seneca. Quinctilian ſuppoſes that the Medea is his compoſition, and, according to others, the Troas and the Hippolytus, were alſo written by him, and the Agamemnon, Hercules furens, Thyeſtes & Hercules in Oeta by his father Seneca the declaimer. The beſt editions of Seneca are thoſe of Antwerp, fol. 1615, and of Gronovius, 3 vols. Amſt. 1672; and thoſe of his tragedies, are that of Schroder's, 4to. Delph. 1728, and the 8vo. of Gronovius, L. Sequinius, a native of Alba, who married one of his daughters to Curiatius of Alba, and the other to Horatius, a citizen of Rome. The two daughters were brought to bed on the ſame day, each of three male children.

Serapio, a ſirname given to one of the Scipios, becauſe he reſembled a ſwine herd of that name.——A Greek poet who floriſhed in the age of Trajan. He was intimate with Plutarch.——An Egyptian put to death by Achillas, when he came at the head of an embaſſy from Ptolemy, who was a priſoner in the hands of J. Cæſar.

Serăpis, one of the Egyptian deities, ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Oſiris. He had a magnificent temple at Memphis, another very rich at Alexandria, and a third at Canopus. The worſhip of Serapis was introduced at Rome, by the emperor Antoninus Pius, A. D. 146, and the myſteries celebrated on the 6th of May, but with ſo much licentiouſneſs that the ſenate were ſoon after obliged to aboliſh it. Herodotus, who ſpeaks in a very circumſtantial manner of the deities, and of the religion of the Egyptians, makes no mention of the god Serapis. Apollodorus says it is the same as the bull Apis. Paus. 1, c. 18. l. 2, c. 34.—Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 83.—Strab. 17.—Martial. 9, ep. 30.

and

Sēres, a nation of Asia, according to Ptolemy, between the Ganges and the eastern ocean. They were naturally of a meek disposition. Silk was brought to Rome from their country, and on that account it received the name of Sericum, and thence a garment or dress of silk is called serica vestis. Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, was the first who wore a silk dress, which at that time was sold for its weight in gold. It afterwards became very cheap, and consequently was the common dress among the Romans. Some suppose that the Seres are the same as the Chinese. Ptol. 6, c. 16.—Horat. 1, Od. 29, v. 9.—Lucan. 1, v. 19. l. 10, v. 142 & 292. Ovid. Am. 1 el. 14, v. 6.—Virg. G. 2, v. 121.

Serbōnis, a lake between Egypt and Palestine.

Serēna, a daughter of Theodosius who married Stilicho. She was put to death, &c.

Serenianus, a favorite of Gallus, the brother of Julian. He was put to death.

Serēnus Samonicus, a physician in the age of the emperor Severus and Caracalla. There remains a poem of his composition on medicine, the last edition of which is that of 1706, in 8vo. Amst.——Vibius, a governor of Spain accused of cruelty in the government of his province, and put to death by order of Tiberius.

Sergestus, a sailor in the fleet of Æneas, from whom the family of the Sergii at Rome were descended. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 121.

Sergia, a Roman matron. She conspired with others to poison their husbands. The plot was discovered, and Sergia, with some of her accomplices, drank poison and died.

Sergius, one of the names of Catiline.——A military tribune at the siege of Veii.

Sergius and Sergiōlus, a deformed youth, greatly admired by the Roman ladies in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 105 & seq.

Seriphus, an island in the Ægean sea, about 36 miles in circumference, according to Pliny only 12, very barren and uncultivated. The Romans generally sent their criminals there in banishment, and it was there that Cassius Severus the orator was exiled, and that he died. According to Ælian, the frogs of this island never croaked, but when they were removed from the island to another place, they were more noisy and clamorous than others, hence the proverb of Seriphia rana, applied to a man who neither speaks nor sings. This however is found to be a mistake by modern travellers. It was on the coast of Seriphos that the chest was discovered in which Acrisius had exposed his daughter Danae, and her son Perseus. Strab. 10.—*Ælian. Seron, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Quintus Sertorius, a Roman general born at Nursia. His first campaign was under the great Marius, against the Teutones and Cimbri. He visited the enemy's camp as a spy, and had the misfortune to lose one eye in the first battle he fought. When Marius and Cinna entered Rome and slaughtered all their enemies, Sertorius accompanied them, but he expressed his sorrow and concern at the melancholy death of so many of his countrymen. He afterwards fled for safety into Spain, when Sylla had proscribed him, and in this distant province he behaved himself with so much address and valor that he was looked upon as the prince of the country. The Lusitanians universally revered and loved him, and the Roman general did not show himself less attentive to their interest, by establishing public schools, and educating the children of the country in the polite arts, and the literature of Greece and Rome. He had established a senate, over which he presided with consular authority, and the Romans who followed his standard, paid equal reverence to his person. They were experimentally convinced of his valor and magnanimity as a general, and the artful manner in which he imposed upon the credulity of his adherents in the garb of religion, did not diminish his reputation. He pretended to hold commerce with heaven by means of a white hind which he had tamed with great success, and which followed him every where, even in the field of battle. The success of Sertorius in Spain, and his popularity among the natives alarmed the Romans. They sent some troops to oppose him, but with little success. Four armies were found insufficient to crush or even hurt Sertorius; and Pompey and Metellus, who never engaged an enemy without obtaining the victory, were driven with dishonor from the field. But the favorite of the Lusitanians was exposed to the dangers which usually attend greatness. Perpenna, one of his officers who was jealous of of his fame, and tired of a ſuperior, conſpired againſt him. At a banquet the conſpirators began to open their intentions by ſpeaking with freedom and licentiouſneſs in the preſence of Sertorius, whoſe age and character had hitherto claimed deference from others. Perpenna overturned a glaſs of wine as a ſignal to the reſt of the conſpirators, and immediately Antonius, one of his officers, ſtabbed Sertorius, and the example was followed by all the reſt, 73 years before Chriſt. Sertorius has been commended for his love of juſtice and moderation. The flattering deſcription he heard of the Fortunate Iſlands when he paſſed into the weſt of Africa, almoſt tempted him to bid adieu to the world, and perhaps he would have retired from the noiſe of war, and the clamors of envy, to end his days in the boſom of a peaceful and ſolitary iſland, had not the ſtronger calls of ambition and the love of fame prevailed over the intruding reflections of a moment. It has been obſerved, that in his latter days Sertorius became indolent, and fond of luxury and wanton cruelty; yet we muſt confeſs, that in affability, clemency, complaiſance, generoſity, and military valor, he not only ſurpaſſed his contemporaries, but the reſt of the Romans. Plut. in vitâ.—Paterc. 2, c. 30, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 21, *&c.—Appian de Civ.—Val. Servæus, a man accuſed by Tiberius of being privy to the conſpiracy of Sejanus.

Serviānus, a conſul in the reign of Adrian. He was a great favorite of the emperor Trajan.

Servilia, a ſiſter of Cato of Utica, greatly enamoured of J. Cæſar, though her brother was one of the moſt inveterate enemies of her lover. To convince Cæſar of her affection, ſhe ſent him a letter filled with the moſt tender expreſſions of regard for his perſon. The letter was delivered to Cæſar in the ſenate houſe, while they were debating about puniſhing the aſſociates of Catiline's conſpiracy; and when Cato ſaw it, he exclaimed that it was a letter from the conſpirators, and inſiſted immediately on its being made public. Upon this Cæſar gave it to Cato, and the ſtern ſenator had no ſooner read its contents, than he threw it back with the words of, take it drunkard. From the intimacy which exiſted between Servilia and Cæſar, ſome have ſuppoſed that the dictator was the father of M. Brutus. Plut. in Cæſ.—C. Nep. in Attic.——Another ſiſter of Cato, who married Silanus. Id.——A daughter of Thraſea, put to death by order of Nero, with her father. Her crime was the conſulting of magicians, only to know what would happen in her family.

Servilia lex de pecuniis repetundis, by C. Servilius the prætor, A. U. C. 653. It puniſhed ſeverely ſuch as were guilty of peculation and extortion in the provinces. Its particulars are not preciſely known.——Another, de judicibus, by Q. Servilius Cæpio, the conſul, A. U. C. 647. It divided the right of judging, between the ſenators and the equites, a privilege, which though originally belonging to the ſenators, had been taken from them and given to the equites.——Another, de civitate, by C. Servilius, ordained that if a Latin accuſed a Roman ſenator, ſo that he was condemned, the accuſed ſhould be honored with the name and the privileges of a Roman citizen.——Another, agraria, by P. Servilius Rullus, the tribune, A. U. C. 690. It required the immediate ſale of certain houſes and lands which belonged to the people, for the purchaſe of others in a different part of Italy. It required that ten commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to ſee it carried into execution, but Cicero prevented its paſſing into a law by the three orations which he pronounced againſt it.

Serviliānus, a Roman conſul defeated by Viriathus, in Spain, &c.

Servilius Quintus, a Roman who in his dictatorſhip defeated the Æqui.——Publius, a conſul who ſupported the cauſe of the people againſt the nobles, and obtained a triumph in ſpite of the oppoſition of the ſenate, after defeating the Volſci. He afterwards changed his opinions, and very violently oppoſed the people, becauſe they had illiberally treated him.——A pro-conſul killed at the battle of Cannæ by Annibal.——Ahala, a maſter of horſe to the dictator Cincinnatus. When Mælius refuſed to appear before the dictator, to anſwer the accuſations which were brought againſt him on ſuſpicion of his aſpiring to tyranny, Ahala ſlew him in the midſt of the people, whoſe protection he claimed. Ahala was accuſed for this murder, and baniſhed, but this ſentence was afterwards repealed. He was raiſed to the dictatorſhip.——Marcus, a man who pleaded in favor of Paulus Æmilius, &c.——An augur proſecuted by Lucullus for his inattention in his office. He was acquitted.——A prætor ordered by the ſenate to forbid Sylla to approach Rome. He was ridiculed and inſulted by the conqueror's ſoldiers.——A man appointed to guard the ſea coaſt of Pontus, by Pompey.——Publius, a pro-conſul of Aſia during the age of Mithridates. He conquered Iſauria, for which ſervice he was ſirnamed Iſauricus, and rewarded with a triumph.——A Roman general who defeated an army of Etrurians.——An informer in the court of Tiberius.——A favorite of Auguſtus.——Geminus, a Roman conſul who opposed Annibal with success.——Nonianus, a Latin historian who wrote an history of Rome in the reign of Nero. There were more than one writer of this name, as Pliny speaks of a Servilius remarkable for his eloquence and learning; and Quintilian mentions another equally illustrious for his genius and literary merit.

Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome, was son of Ocrisia, a slave of Corniculum, by Tullius, a man slain in the defence of his country against the Romans. Ocrisia was given by Tarquin to Tanaquil his wife, and she brought up her son in the king's family, and added the name of Servius to that which he had inherited from his father to denote his slavery. Young Servius was educated in the palace of the monarch with great care, and though originally a slave, he raised himself so much to consequence, that Tarquin gave him his daughter in marriage. His own private merit and virtues recommended him to notice not less than the royal favors, and Servius, become the favorite of the people and the darling of the soldiers, by his liberality and complaisance, was easily raised to the throne on the death of his father-in-law. Rome had no reason to repent of her choice. Servius endeared himself still more as a warrior and a legislator. He defeated the Veientes and the Tuscans, and by a proper act of policy he established the census, which told him that Rome contained about 84 thousand inhabitants. He encreased the number of the tribes, he beautified and adorned the city, and enlarged its boundaries by taking within its walls the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He also divided the Roman people into tribes; and that he might not seem to neglect the worship of the gods, he built several temples to the goddess of fortune, to whom he deemed himself particularly indebted for obtaining the kingdom. He also built a temple to Diana on mount Aventine, and raised himself a palace on the hill Esquilinus. Servius married his two daughters to the grandsons of his father-in-law; the elder to Tarquin, and the younger to Arunx. This union, as might be supposed, tended to ensure the peace of his family; but if such were his expectations, he was unhappily deceived. The wife of Arunx, naturally fierce and impetuous, murdered her own husband to unite herself to Tarquin, who had likewise assassinated his wife. These bloody measures were no sooner pursued than Servius was murdered by his own son-in-law, and his daughter Tullia showed herself so inimical to filial gratitude and piety, that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the mangled body of her father, B. C. 534. His death was universally lamented, and the slaves annually celebrated a festival in his honor, in the temple of Diana, on mount Aventine, the day that he was murdered. Tarquinia his wife buried his remains privately, and died the following day. Liv. 1, c. 41.—Dionys. Hal. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 6.—Cic. de. Div. 2, c. 53.—Val. Max. 1, c. 6.—*Ovid. He was sent as ambassador to M. Antony, and died before his return. Cicero obtained a statue for him from the senate and the Roman people, which was raised in the Campus Martius. His works are lost. Cic. in Brut. Phil. &c.—Plin. 5, ep. 3.——A despicable informer in the Augustan age. Horat. 2. Sat. 1, v. 47.——Honoratus Maurus, a learned grammarian in the age of young Theodosius. He wrote Latin commentaries upon Virgil, still extant.

Sesara, a daughter of Celeus, king of Eleusis, sister to Triptolemus.

Sesostris, a celebrated king of Egypt some ages before the Trojan war. His father ordered all the children in his dominions who were born on the same day with him to be publickly educated, and to pass their youth in the company of his son. This succeeded in the highest degree, and Sesostris had the pleasure to find himself furrounded by a number of faithful ministers and active warriors, whose education and intimacy with their prince rendered them inseparably devoted to his interest. When Sesostris had succeeded on his father's throne, he became ambitious of military fame, and after he had divided his kingdom into 36 different districts, he marched at the head of a numerous army to make the conquest of the world. Libya, Æthiopia, Arabia, with all the islands of the Red Sea, were conquered, and the victorious monarch marched through Asia and penetrated farther in the east than the conqueror of Darius. He also invaded Europe and subdued the Thracians, and that the fame of his conquests might long survive him, he placed columns in the several provinces he had subdued; and many ages after, this pompous inscription was read in many parts of Asia, Sesostris, the king of kings, has conquered this territory by his arms. At his return home the monarch employed his time in encouraging the fine arts and in improving the revenues of his kingdom. He erected 100 temples to the gods for the victories he had obtained, and mounds of earth were heaped up in several parts of Egypt, where cities were were built for the reception of the inhabitants during the inundations of the Nile. Some canals were also dug near Memphis to facilitate navigation and the communication of one province with another. In his old age, Sesostris grown infirm and blind destroyed himself, after a reign of 44 years according to some. His mildness towards the conquered has been admired, while some have upbraided him for his cruelty and insolence in causing his chariot to be drawn by some of the monarchs whom he had conquered. The age of Sesostris is so remote from every authentic record, that many have supported that the actions and conquests ascribed to this monarch are uncertain and totally fabulous. Herodot. 2, c. 102, &c.—Diod. 1.—*Val. Setăbis, a town of Spain between Carthage and Saguntum. There was also a small river of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 16, v. 474.

Sethon, a priest of Vulcan, who made himself king of Egypt after the death of Anysis. He was attacked by the Assyrians and delivered from this powerful enemy by an immense number of rats, which in one night gnawed their bow strings and thongs so that on the morrow their arms were found to be useless. From this wonderful circumstance Sethon had a statue which represented him with a rat in his hand, with the inscription of, Whoever fixes his eyes upon me, let him be pious.——Herodot. 2, c. 141.

Setia, a town of Campania, celebrated for its wines. Martial 13, ep. 112.

Sevēra, Julia Aquilia, a Roman lady, whom the emperor Heliogabalus married. She was soon after repudiated, though possessed of all the charms of mind and body which could captivate the most virtuous.——Valeria, the wife of Valentinian, and the mother of Gratian, was well known for her avarice and ambition. The emperor her husband repudiated her and afterwards took her again. Her prudent advice at last ensured her son Gratian on the imperial throne.——The wife of Philip the Roman emperor.

Severiānus, a governor of Macedonia, father-in-law to the emperor Philip.——A general of the Roman armies in the reign of Valentinian defeated by the Germans.——A son of the emperor Severus.

Sevērus, Lucius Septimius, a Roman emperor born at Leptis in Africa of a noble family. He gradually exercised all the offices of the state, and recommended himself to the notice of the world by an ambitious mind, and a restless activity, that could, for the gratification of avarice, endure the most complicated hardships. After the murder of Pertinax, Severus resolved to remove Didius Julianus who had bought the imperial purple when exposed to sale by the licentiousness of the pretorians, and therefore he proclaimed himself emperor on the borders of Illyricum, where he was stationed against the barbarians. To support himself in this bold measure, he took as his partner in the empire Albinus, who was at the head of the Roman forces in Britain, and immediately marched towards Rome, to crush Didius and all his partizans. He was received as he advanced through the country with universal acclamations, and Julianus himself was soon deserted by his favorites, and assassinated by his own soldiers. The reception of Severus at Rome was sufficient to gratify his pride; the streets were strewed with flowers, and the submissive senate were ever ready to grant whatever honors or titles the conqueror claimed. In professing that he had assumed the purple only to revenge the death of the virtuous Pertinax, Severus gained many adherents, and was enabled not only to disarm, but to banish the pretorians, whose insolence and avarice were become alarming not only to the citizens, but to the emperor. But while he was victorious at Rome, Severus did not forget that there was another competitor for the imperial purple. Pescennius Niger was in the east at the head of a powerful army, and with the name and ensigns of Augustus. Many obstinate battles were fought between the troops and officers of the imperial rivals, till on the plains of Issus, which had been above five centuries before covered with the blood of the Persian soldiers of Darius, Niger was totally ruined by the loss of 20,000 men. The head of Niger was cut off, and sent to the conqueror, who punished in a most cruel manner all the partizans of his unfortunate rival. Severus afterwards pillaged Byzantium, which had shut her gates against him; and after he had conquered several nations in the east, he returned to Rome, resolved to destroy Albinus, with whom he had hitherto reluctantly shared the imperial power.

He

He attempted to aſſaſſinate him by his emiſſaries; but when this had failed of ſucceſs, Severus had recourſe to arms, and the fate of the empire was again decided on the plains of Gaul. Albinus was defeated, and the conqueror was ſo elated with the recollection that he had now no longer a competitor for the purple, that he inſulted the dead body of his rival, and ordered it to be thrown into the Rhone, after he had ſuffered it to putrify before the door of his tent, and to be torn to pieces by his dogs. The family and the adherents of Albinus ſhared his fate; and the return of Severus to the capital exhibited the bloody triumphs of Marius and Sylla. The richeſt of the citizens were ſacrificed, and their money became the property of the emperor. The wicked Commodus received divine honors, and his murderers were puniſhed in the moſt wanton manner. Tired of the inactive life he led in Rome, Severus marched into the eaſt, with his two ſons Caracalla and Geta, and with uncommon ſucceſs made himſelf maſter of Seleucia, Babylon, and Cteſiphon, and advanced without oppoſition far into the Parthian territories. From Parthia the emperor marched towards the more ſouthern provinces of Aſia; after he had viſited the tomb of Pompey the Great, he entered Alexandria; and after he had granted a ſenate to that celebrated city, he viewed with the moſt criticiſing and inquiſitive curioſity the ſeveral monuments and ruins which that antient kingdom contains. The revolt of Britain recalled him from the eaſt. After he had reduced it under his power, he built a wall acroſs the northern parts of the iſland, to defend it againſt the frequent invaſions of the Caledonians. Hitherto ſucceſsful againſt his enemies, Severus now found the peace of his family diſturbed. Caracalla attempted to murder his father as he was concluding a treaty of peace with the Britons; and the emperor was ſo ſhocked at the undutifulneſs of his ſon, that on his return home he called him into his preſence, and after he had upbraided him for his ingratitude and perfidy, he offered him a drawn ſword, adding, If you are ſo ambitious of reigning alone, now imbrue your hands in the blood of your father, and let not the eyes of the world be witneſſes of your want of filial tenderneſs. If theſe words checked Caracalla, yet he did not ſhew himſelf concerned, and Severus worn out with infirmities which the gout and the uneaſineſs of his mind encreaſed, ſoon after died, exclaiming that he had been every thing man could wiſh, but that he was then nothing. Some ſay that he wiſhed to poiſon himſelf, but that when this was denied, he eat to great exceſs, and ſoon after expired at York on the 4th of February, in the 211th year of the chriſtian era in the 66th year of his age, after a reign of 17 years 8 months and 3 days. Severus has been ſo much admired for his military talents, that ſome have called him the moſt warlike of the Roman emperors. As a monarch he was cruel, and it has been obſerved that he never did an act of humanity, or forgave a fault. In his diet he was temperate, and he always ſhowed himſelf an open enemy to pomp and ſplendor. He loved the appellation of a man of letters, and he even compoſed an hiſtory of his own reign, which ſome have praiſed for its correctneſs and veracity. However cruel Severus may appear in his puniſhments and in his revenge, many have endeavoured to exculpate him, and obſerved that there was need of ſeverity in an empire whoſe morals were ſo corrupted, and where no leſs than 3000 perſons were accuſed of adultery during the ſpace of 17 years. Of him, as of Auguſtus, ſome were fond to ſay, that it would have been better for the world, if he had never been born, or had never died. Dio.—Herodian.—Victor, &c.——Alexander, (Marcus Aurelius) a native of Phœnicia, adopted by Heliogabalus. His father's name was Geneſius Marcianus, and his mother's, Julia Mammæa, and he received the ſurname of Alexander, becauſe he was born in a temple ſacred to Alexander the Great. He was carefully educated, and his mother, by paying particular attention to his morals, and the character of his preceptors, preſerved him from thoſe infirmities, and that licentiouſneſs, which old age too often attributes to the depravity of youth. At the death of Heliogabalus, who had been jealous of his virtues, Alexander, though only in the 14th year of his age, was proclaimed emperor, and his nomination was approved by the univerſal ſhouts of the army, and the congratulations of the ſenate. He had not long been on the throne before the peace of the empire was diſturbed by the incurſions of the Perſians. Alexander marched into the eaſt without delay, and ſoon obtained a deciſive victory over the barbarians. At his return to Rome he was honored with a triumph, but the revolt of the Germans ſoon after called him away from the indolence of the capital. His expedition in Germany was attended with ſome ſucceſs, but the virtues and the amiable qualities of Alexander were forgotten in the ſtern and ſullen ſtrictneſs of the diſciplinarian. His ſoldiers, fond of repoſe, murmured againſt his ſeverity; their clamors were fomented by the artifice of Maximinus, and Alexander was murdered in his tent, in the midſt of his camp, after a reign of 13 years and nine days, on the 18th of March, A. D. 235. His mother Mammæa ſhared his fate with all his friends; but but this was no sooner known than the soldiers punished with immediate death all such as had been concerned in the murder, except Maximinus. Alexander has been admired for his many virtues, and every historian, except Herodian, is bold to assert that if he had lived, the Roman empire might soon have been freed from those tumults and abuses which continually disturbed her peace, and kept the lives of her emperors and senators in perpetual alarms. His severity in punishing offences was great, and such as had robbed the public, were they even the most intimate friends of the emperor, were indiscriminately sacrificed to the tranquillity of the state which they had violated. The great offices of the state, which had before his reign been exposed to sale, and occupied by favorites, were now bestowed upon merit, and Alexander could boast that all his officers were men of trust and abilities. He was a patron of literature, and he dedicated the hours of relaxation to the study of the best Greek and Latin historians, orators, and poets; and in the public schools which his liberality and the desire of encouraging learning had founded, he often heard with pleasure and satisfaction the eloquent speeches and declamations of his subjects. The provinces were well supplied with provisions, and Rome was embellished with many stately buildings and magnificent porticos. Aurel. Vict.—Herodian.—Zosim.—Victor.

Sextius, a lieutenant of Cæsar in Gaul.——A seditious tribune in the first ages of the republic. Lucius was remarkable for his friendship with Brutus; he gained the confidence of Augustus, and was consul A. C. 730. Horace, who was in the number of his friends, dedicated 1 od. 4 to him.——The first plebeian consul.——A dictator.——One of the sons of Tarquin. Vid. Tarquinius.

Sextus, a son of Pompey the great. Vid. Pompeius.——A Stoic philosopher, born at Cheronæa in Bœotia. Some suppose that he was Plutarch's nephew. He was preceptor to M. Aurelius, and L. Verus.——A governor of Syria.——A philosopher in the age of Antoninus. He was one of the followers of the doctrines of Pyrrho. Some of his works are still extant. The best edition of the treatise of Sextus Pompeius Festus de verborum significatione is that of Amst. 4to. 1699.

Sibini, a people near the Suevi.

Siburtius, a satrap of Arachosia, in the age of Alexander, &c.

Sibyllæ, certain women inspired by heaven, who flourished in different parts of the world. Their number is unknown. Plato speaks of one, others of two, Pliny of three, Ælian of four, and Varro of ten, an opinion which is universally adopted by the learned.

learned. These ten Sibyls generally resided in the following places, Persia, Libya, Delphi, Cumæ in Italy, Erythræa, Samos, Cumæ in Æolia, Marpessa on the Hellespont, Ancyra in Phrygia, and Tiburtis. The most celebrated of the Sibyls is that of Cumæ in Italy, whom some have called by the different names of Amalthæa, Demophile, Herophile, Daphne, Manto, Phemonoe, and Deiphobe. It is said that Apollo became enamoured of her, and that to make her sensible of his passion, he offered to give her whatever she should ask. The Sibyl demanded to live as many years as she had grains of sand in her hand, but unfortunately forgot to ask for the enjoyment of the health, vigor, and bloom, of which she was then in possession. The god granted her her request, but she refused to gratify the passion of her lover, though he offered her perpetual youth and beauty. Some time after she became old and decrepit, her form decayed, melancholy paleness and haggard looks succeeded to bloom and cheerfulness. She had already lived about 700 years when Æneas came to Italy, and as some have imagined, she had three centuries more to live before her years were as numerous as the grains of sand which she had in her hand. She gave Æneas instructions how to find his father in the infernal regions, and even conducted him to the entrance of hell. It was usual in the Sibyl to write her prophecies on leaves which she placed at the entrance of her cave, and it required particular care in such as consulted her to take up these leaves before they were dispersed by the wind, as their meaning then became incomprehensible. According to the most authentic historians of the Roman republic, one of the Sibyls came to the palace of Tarquin the second, with nine volumes which she offered to sell for a very high price. The monarch disregarded her, and she immediately disappeared, and soon after returned, when she had burned three of the volumes. She asked the same price for the remaining six books; and when Tarquin refused to buy them, she burned three more, and still persisted in demanding the same sum of money for the three that were left. This extraordinary behaviour astonished Tarquin; he bought the books, and the Sibyl instantly vanished, and never after appeared to the world. These books were preserved with great care by the monarch, and called the Sibylline verses. A college of priests was appointed to have the care of them; and such reverence did the Romans entertain for these prophetic books, that they were consulted with the greatest solemnity, and only when the state seemed to be in danger. When the capitol was burnt in the troubles of Sylla, the Sibylline verses which were deposited there, perished in the conflagration; and to repair the loss which the republic seemed to have sustained, commissioners were immediately sent to different parts of Greece, to collect whatever verses could be found of the inspired writings of the Sibyls. The fate of these Sibylline verses, which were collected after the conflagration of the capitol, is unknown. There are now many Sibylline verses extant, but they are universally reckoned spurious; and it is evident that they were composed in the second century, by some of the followers of Christianity, who wished to convince the heathens of their error, by assisting the cause of truth with the arms of pious artifice. The word Sibyl seems to be derived from σιος, Æolice for Διος Jovis, and βουλη consilium. Plat. in Phæd.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 35.—Paus. 10, c. 12, &c.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. SICA, a man who shewed much attention to Cicero in his banishment.

SICAMBRI or SUGAMBRI, a people of Germany conquered by the Romans. They revolted under Augustus, who marched against them, but did not totally reduce them. Drusus conquered them, and they were carried away from their native country to inhabit some of the more westerly provinces of Gaul. Dio. 54.—Strab. 4.—Horat. 4. Od. 2, v. 36, Od. 14, v. 51.—Tacit. 2, Ann. 26.

SICANI, a people of Spain, who left their native country and passed into Italy, and afterwards into Sicily, which they called Sicania. They inhabited the neighbourhood of mount Ætna, where they built some cities and villages. Some reckoned them the next inhabitants of the island after the Cyclops. They were afterwards driven from their antient possessions by the Siculi, and retired into the western parts of the island. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Ovid. Met. 5 & 13.—Virg. Ecl. 10. Æn. 7. v. 795.—Diod. 5.

SICANIA and SICANIA, an antient name of Italy, which it received from the Sicani, or from Sicanus, their king, or from Sicanus, a small river in Spain, in the territory where they lived, as some suppose. The name is also given to Sicily. Vid. Sicani.

SICELIS, (SICELIDES, plur.) an epithet applied to the inhabitants of Sicily. The Muses are called Sicelides by Virgil, because Theocritus was a native of Sicily, whom the Latin poet, as writer of Bucolic poetry, professed to imitate.

SICHÆUS, called also Sicharbas and Aherbas, was a priest of the temple of Hercules in Phœnicia. His father's name was Pistphenes. He married Elisa the daughter of Belus, ſiſter of king Pygmalion, better known by the name of Dido. He was ſo extremely rich, that his brother-in-law murdered him to obtain his poſſeſſions. This murder, Pygmalion concealed from his ſiſter Dido; and he amuſed her by telling her, that her huſband was gone upon an affair of importance, and that he would ſoon return. This would have perhaps ſucceeded had not the ſhades of Sichæus appeared to Dido, and related to her the cruelty of Pygmalion, and adviſed her to fly from Tyre, after ſhe had previouſly ſecured ſome treaſures which, as he mentioned, were concealed in an obſcure and unknown place. According to Juſtin, Acerbas was the uncle of Dido. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 347, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Juſtin. 18. c. 4.

SICILIA, the largeſt and moſt celebrated iſland in the Mediterranean ſea, at the bottom of Italy. It was antiently called Sicania, Trinacria, and Triquetra. It is of a triangular form, and has three celebrated promontories, one looking towards Africa, called Lilybæum; Pachynum looking towards Greece; and Pelorum towards Italy. Sicily is about 600 miles in circumference, celebrated for its fertility, ſo much that it was called one of the granaries of Rome, and Pliny ſays that it rewards the huſbandman an hundred fold. Its moſt famous cities were Syracuſe, Meſſana, Leontini, Lilybæum, Agrigentum, Gela, Drepanum, Eryx, &c. The higheſt and moſt famous mountain in the iſland is Ætna, whoſe frequent eruptions are dangerous, and often fatal to the country and its inhabitants, from which circumſtance the antients ſuppoſed that the forges of Vulcan and the Cyclops were placed there. The poets feign that the Cyclops were the original inhabitants of this iſland, and that after them it came in the poſſeſſion of the Sicani, a people of Spain, and at laſt of the Siculi, a nation of Italy. [Vid. Siculi.] The plains of Enna are well known for their excellent honey, and according to Diodorus the hounds loſt their ſent in hunting on account of the many odoriferous plants that grew every where. Ceres and Proſerpine were the chief deities of the place, and it was there, according to poetical tradition, that the latter was carried away by Pluto. The Phœnicians and Greeks ſettled ſome colonies there, and at laſt the Carthaginians became maſters of the whole iſland, till they were diſpoſſeſſed of it by the Romans in the Punic wars. Some authors ſuppoſe that Sicily was originally joined to the continent, and that it was ſeparated from Italy by an earthquake, and that the ſtreights of the Charybdis were formed. The inhabitants of Sicily were ſo fond of luxury, that Siculæ menſæ became proverbial. Homer. Od. 9, &c.—Juſtin. 4, c. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 414, &c.—Ital. 14, v. 11, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 8, &c.——The iſland of Naxos, in the Ægean, was called little Sicily, on account of its fruitfulneſs.

SICINIUS DENTATUS, a tribune of Rome, celebrated for his valor and the honors he obtained in the field of battle, during the period of 40 years, in which he was engaged in the Roman armies. He was preſent in 121 battles; he obtained 14 civic crowns; 3 mural crowns; 8 crowns of gold; 83 golden collars; 60 bracelets; 18 lances; 25 horſes with all their ornaments, and all as the reward of his uncommon ſervices. He could ſhow the ſcars of 45 wounds, which he had received all in the breaſt, particularly in oppoſing the Sabines when they took the capitol. The popularity of Sicinius became odious to Appius Claudius, who wiſhed to make himſelf abſolute at Rome, and therefore to remove him from the capitol, he ſent him to the army, by which, ſoon after his arrival, he was attacked and murdered. Of 100 men who were ordered to fall upon him, Sicinius killed 15, and wounded 30; and according to Dionyſius, the ſurviving number had recourſe to artifice to overpower him, by killing him with a ſhower of ſtones and darts thrown at a diſtance, about 405 years before the Chriſtian era. For this uncommon courage Sicinius has been called the Roman Achilles. Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—Dionyſ. 8.——Vellutus, one of the firſt tribunes in Rome. He raiſed cabals againſt Coriolanus, and was one of his accuſers. Plut. in Cor.——Sabinus, a Roman general who defeated the Volſci.

SICINUS, a man privately ſent by Themiſtocles to deceive Xerxes, and to adviſe him to attack the combined forces of the Greeks. He had been preceptor to Themiſtocles. Plut.——An iſland, &c.

SICORUS, a river of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, riſing in the Pyrenæan mountains. It was near this river that J. Cæſar conquered the partizans and ſons of Pompey. Lucan. 4, v. 14, 130, &c.

SICULI, a people of Italy, driven from their poſſeſſions by the Opici. They fled into Sicania, or Sicily, where they ſettled in the territories which the Sicani inhabited. They ſoon extended their borders, and after they had conquered their neighbours, the Sicani, they gave their name to the iſland. This, as ſome ſuppoſe, happened about 300 years before Greek colonies ſettled in the iſland, or about 1059 years before the Chriſtian era. Diod. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal.—Strab.

SICYON, a town of Peloponneſus, the capital of Sicyonia. It is celebrated as being the moſt antient kingdom of Greece, which began B. C. 2089, and ended B. C. 1088, under a ſucceſſion of monarchs of whom little is known, except the names; Ægialeus was the first king. Some ages after, Agamemnon made himself master of the place, and afterwards it fell into the hands of the Heraclidæ. It became very powerful in the time of the Achæan league, which it joined B. C. 251, at the persuasion of Aratus. The inhabitants of Sicyon are mentioned by some authors as effeminate, and fond of luxury. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Dem.—Paus. 2, c. 1, &c.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 53.—Virg. G. 2, v. 519.

Sicyonia, a province of Peloponnesus, on the bay of Corinth, of which Sicyon was the capital. It is the most eminent kingdom of Greece, and in its flourishing situation not only its dependent states, but also the whole Peloponnesus were called Sicyonia. The territory is said to abound with corn, wine and olives, and also with iron mines. It produced many celebrated men, particularly artists. Vid. Sicyon.

Side, the wife of Orion, thrown into hell by Jupiter. Apollod.——A daughter of Belus.——A daughter of Danaus.——A town of Pamphylia.

Sidero, the stepmother of Tyro, killed by Pelias.

Sidicinum, a town of Campania, called also Teanum. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727.

Sidon, an antient city of Phœnicia, the capital of the country, with a famous harbour, now called Said. It is situate on the shores of the Mediterranean, at the distance of about 50 miles from Damascus, and 24 from Tyre. The people of Sidon are well known for their industry, their skill in commercial affairs, and sea voyages. They however have the character of being very dishoneft. Their women were peculiarly happy in working embroidery. The invention of glass and linen is attributed to them. The city of Sidon was taken by Ochus, king of Persia, after the inhabitants had burnt themselves and the city B. C. 351; but it was afterwards rebuilt by its inhabitants. Lucan. 3, v. 217, l. 10, v. 141.—Diod. 16.—Justin. 11, c. 10.—Plin. 36, c. 26.—Homer. Od. 15, v. 411.—Mela. 1, c. 12.

Sidoniorum insulæ, islands in the Persian gulf.

Sidonis, is the country of which Sidon was the capital, situate at the west of Syria on the coast of the Mediterranean. Ovid. Met. 2, Fab. 19.

Sidonius Apollinaris, a Christian writer born A. D. 430. He died in the 52d year of his age. There are remaining of his compositions, some letters and different poems, of which the best edition is that of Labbæus, Paris, 4to. 1652.—The epithet of Sidonius is applied not only to the natives of Sidon, but it is used to express the excellence of any thing, especially embroidery or dyed garments. Carthage is called Sidonia urbs, because built by Sidonians. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 682.

Siga, a town of Numidia.

Sigæum, or Sigeum, a town of Troas, on a promontory of the same name, where the Scamander falls into the sea. It was near Sigæum that the greatest part of the battles between the Greeks and Trojans were fought, as Homer mentions, and there Achilles was buried. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312, l. 7, v. 294.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 71.—Lucan. 9, v. 962.—Mela. 1, c. 18.—Strab. 13.—Dictys. Cret. 5, c. 12.

Signia, an antient town of Latium, whose inhabitants were called Signini. The wine of Signia was used by the antients for medicinal purposes. Martial. 13, ep. 116.

Sigovessus, a prince among the Celtæ, in the reign of Tarquin.

Sigyni, Sigunæ, or Sigynnæ, a nation of European Scythia, beyond the Danube. Herodot. 5, c. 9.

Sila, or Syla, a large wood in the country of the Brutii near the Apennines, abounding with much pitch. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 12, v. 715.

Silana Julia, a woman at the court of Nero, remarkable for her licentiousness and impurities. She had married C. Julius, by whom she had been divorced.

Silanus, a son of T. Manlius Torquatus, accused of extortion in the management of the province of Macedonia. The father himself desired to hear the complaints laid against his son, and after he had spent two days in examining the charges of the Macedonians, he pronounced on the third day his son guilty of extortion, and unworthy to be called a citizen of Rome. He also banished him from his presence, and so struck was the son at the severity of his father, that he hanged himself on the following night. Liv. 54.—Cic. de Finib.—Val. Max. 5, c. 8.——C. Junius, a consul under Tiberius, accused of extortion, and banished to the island of Cytheræa. Tacit.——Marcus, a lieutenant of Cæsar's armies in Gaul.——The father-in-law of Caligula.——A. propretor in Spain, who routed the Carthaginian forces there, while Annibal was in Italy.——Turpilius, a lieutenant of Metellus against Jugurtha. He was accused by Marius, though totally innocent, and condemned by the malice of his judges.——Torquatus, a man put to death by Nero.——Lucius, a man betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of Claudius. Nero took Octavia away from him, and on the day of her nuptials, Silanus killed himself.—An augur in the army of the 10,000 Greeks, at their return from Cunaxa.

SILARUS, a river of Picenum, rising in the Apennine mountains, and falling into the Tyrrhene ſea. Its waters, as it is reported, put ified all leaves that fell into it. Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 146.—Plin. 2, c. 103.

SILENUS, a demi-god, who became the nurſe, the preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as ſome ſuppoſe, ſon of Pan, or according to others of Mercury, or of Terra. Malea in Leſbos was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honors, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally repreſented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an aſs, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated. He was once found by ſome peaſants in Phrygia, after he had loſt his way and could not follow Bacchus, and he was carried to king Midas, who received him with great attention. He detained him for ten days, and afterwards reſtored him to Bacchus, for which he was rewarded with the power of turning into gold whatever he touched. Some authors aſſert, that Silenus was a philoſopher, who accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition, and aſſiſted him by the ſoundneſs of his counſels. From this circumſtance therefore, he is often introduced ſpeaking with all the gravity of a philoſopher concerning the formation of the world, and the nature of things. The Fauns in general, and the Satyrs are often called Sileni. Pauſ. 3, c. 25.—Philoſt.—Ovid. Met. 4.—Hygin. fab. 191.—Diod. 3, &c.—Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 48.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 18.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 13.——A Carthaginian hiſtorian who wrote an account of the affairs of his country in the Greek language.——An hiſtorian who wrote an account of Sicily.

SILICENSE, a river of Spain.

C. SILIUS ITALICUS, a Latin poet, who was originally at the bar, where he for ſome time diſtinguiſhed himſelf, till he retired from Rome more particularly to conſecrate his time to ſtudy. He was conſul the year that Nero was murdered. Pliny has obſerved, that when Trajan was inveſted with the imperial purple, Silius refuſed to come to Rome, and congratulate him like the reſt of his fellow citizens, a neglect which was never reſented by the emperor, or inſolently mentioned by the poet. Silius was in poſſeſſion of a houſe, where Cicero had lived, and another in which was the tomb of Virgil, and it has been juſtly remarked, that he looked upon no temple with greater reverence than upon the ſepulchre of the immortal poet, whoſe ſteps he followed, but whoſe fame he could not equal. The birth day of Virgil was yearly celebrated with unuſual pomp and ſolemnity by Silius; and for the partiality, not only to the memory, but to the compoſitions of the Mantuan poet, he has been called the ape of Virgil. Silius ſtarved himſelf when laboring under an impoſthume which his phyſicians were unable to remove, in the beginning of Trajan's reign, about the 75th year of his age. There remains a poem of Italicus, on the ſecond Punic war, greatly commended by Martial. The moderns have not been ſo favorable in their opinions concerning its merit. The poetry is weak and inelegant, yet the author deſerves to be commended for his purity, the authenticity of his narrations, and his intereſting deſcriptions. He has every where imitated Virgil, but with little ſucceſs. Silius was a great collector of antiquities. His ſon was honored with the conſulſhip during his life-time. The beſt editions of Italicus will be found to be Drakenborch's in 4to. Utr. 1717, and that of Cellarius, 8vo. Lipſ. 1695. Mart. 11, ep. 49, &c.——Caius, a man of conſular dignity, greatly loved by Meſſalina for his comely appearance and elegant addreſs. Meſſalina obliged him to divorce his wife that ſhe might enjoy his company without intermiſſion. Silius was forced to comply, though with great reluctance, and he was at laſt put to death for the adulteries which the empreſs obliged him to commit. Tacit.—Suet.—Dio.——A tribune in Cæſar's legions in Gaul.

SILPHIUM, a part of Libya.

SILVĀNUS, a rural deity, ſon of an Italian ſhepherd by a goat. From this circumſtance he is generally repreſented as half a man and half a goat. According to Virgil, he was ſon of Picus, or as others report of Mars, or according to Plutarch, of Valeria Tuſculanaria, a young woman who introduced herſelf into her father's bed, and became pregnant by him. The worſhip of Silvanus was eſtabliſhed only in Italy, where, as ſome authors have imagined, he reigned in the age of Evander. This deity was ſometimes repreſented holding a cypreſs in his hand, becauſe he became enamoured of a beautiful youth called Cypariſſus, who was changed into a tree of the ſame name. Silvanus preſided over gardens and limits, and he is often confounded with the Fauns, Satyrs, and Silenus. Plut. in parall.—Virg. Ecl. 10, G. 1, v. 20, l. 2, v. 493.—Ælian. Anim. 6, c. 42.—Ovid. Met. 10.—Horat. ep. 2.—Dionyſ. Hal.——A man who murdered his wife Apronia, by throwing her down from one of the windows of his chambers.——One of thoſe who conſpired againſt Nero.——An officer of Conſtantius, who revolted and made himſelf emperor. He was aſſaſſinated by his ſoldiers.

SIMBRIVIUS, or SIMBRUVIUS, a lake in the country of the Marſi.

SIMETHUS, or SYMETHUS, a river of Sicily, in whose neighbourhood the gods Palici were born.

Simiæ, a grove at Rome, where the orgies of Bacchus were celebrated.

Similis, one of the courtiers of Trajan, who retired from Rome into the country to enjoy peace and solitary retirement.

Simmias, a philosopher of Thebes, who wrote dialogues. —— A grammarian of Rhodes.——A Macedonian suspected of conspiracy against Alexander, on account of his intimacy with Philotas. Curt.

Simo, a comic character.

Simois (entis,) a river of Troas, which rises in mount Ida, and falls into the Xanthus. It is celebrated by Homer, and most of the antient poets, as in its neighbourhood were fought many battles during the Trojan war. It is found to be but a small rivulet by modern travellers, and even some have disputed its existence. Homer. Il.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 104. l. 3, v. 302, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 324.—Mela. 1, c. 18.

Simoisius, a Trojan prince, son of Anthemion.

Simon, a currier at Athens whom Socrates often visited on account of his great sagacity and genius. He collected all the information he could receive from the conversation of the philosopher, and afterwards published it with his own observations in 33 dialogues. He was the first of the disciples of Socrates who attempted to give an account of the opinions of his master concerning virtue, justice, poetry, music, honor, &c. These dialogues were extant in the age of the biographer Diogenes, who has preserved their title. Diog.——The name of Simon was common among the Jews.

Simonides, a celebrated poet of Cos, who flourished 538 years B. C. His father's name was Leoprepis, or Theoprepis. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and dramatical pieces, esteemed for their elegance and sweetness, and composed also epic poems, one on Cambyses king of Persia, &c. Simonides was universally courted by the princes of Greece and Sicily, and according to one of the fables of Phædrus, he was such a favorite of the gods, that his life was preserved in an entertainment when the roof of the house fell upon all those who were feasting. He obtained a poetical prize in the 80th year of his age, and he lived to his 90th year. The people of Syracuse erected a magnificent monument to his memory. Simonides, according to some, added the four letters η, ω, ξ, ψ, to the alphabet of the Greeks. Some fragments of his poetry are extant. According to some, the grandson of the elegiac poet of Cos was also called Simonides. He flourished a few years before the Peloponnesian war, and was the author of some books of inventions, genealogies, &c. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Phædr. 4, fab. 21, & 24.—Horat. 2, Od. 1, v. 38.—Herodot. 5, c. 102.—Cic. de Orat. &c.—Arist.—*Pindar. Simplicius, a Greek commentator on Aristotle, whose works were all edited in the 16th century, and the latter part of the 15th, but without a Latin version.

Simulus, an antient poet who wrote some verses on the Tarpeian rock. Plut.

Simus, a king of Arcadia after Phialus, Paus. 8, c. 5.

Simyra, a town of Phœnicia. Mela. 1, c. 12.

Sindi, a people of European Scythia, on the Palus Mæotis. Flacc. 6, v. 86.

Singæi, a people on the confines of Macedonia and Thrace.

Sinis, a famous robber. Vid. Scinis.

Sinnaces, a Parthian of an illustrious family, who conspired against his prince, &c. Tacit. 6, Ann.

Sinnacha, a town of Mesopotamia, where Crassus was put to death by Surena.

Sinoe, a nymph of Arcadia who brought up Pan.

Sinon, a son of Sisyphus who accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, and there distinguished himself by his cunning and fraud, and his intimacy with Ulysses. When the Greeks had fabricated the famous wooden horse, Sinon went to Troy with his hands bound behind his back, and by the most solemn protestations, assured Priam, that the Greeks were gone from Asia, and that they had been ordered to sacrifice one of their soldiers, to render the wind favorable to their return, and that because the lot had fallen upon him, at the instigation of Ulysses, he had fled away from their camp, not to be cruelly immolated. These false assertions were immediately credited by the Trojans, and Sinon advised Priam to bring into his city the wooden horse which the Greeks had left behind them, and to consecrate it to Minerva. His advice was followed, and Sinon in the night, to complete his perfidy, opened the side of the horse, from which issued a number of armed Greeks, who surprized the Trojans, and pillaged their city. Dares Phryg.—*Homer. Sinope, a daughter of the Asopus by Methone. She was beloved by Apollo, who carried her away to the borders of the Euxine sea, in Asia Minor, where she gave birth to a son called Syrus. Diod. 4.——A sea-port town of Asia Minor, in Pontus, founded by a colony of Milesians. It was long an independent state, till Pharnaces, king of Pontus, tus, ſeized it. It was the capital of Pontus, under Mithridates, and was the birth place of Diogenes, the cynic philoſopher. It received its name from Sinope, whom Apollo carried there. Ovid. Pont. 1, el. 3, v. 67.—Strab. 2, &c. 12.—Diod. 4.—Mela. 1, c. 19.—— The original name of Sinueſſa.

SINORIX, a governor of Gaul, &c.

SINTII, a nation of Thracians, who inhabited Lemnos, when Vulcan fell there from heaven. Homer. Il. 1, v. 594.

SINUESSA, a town of Campania, originally called Sinope. It was celebrated for its hot-baths and mineral waters, which cured people of inſanity, and rendered women prolific. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 715.—Mela. 2, c. 4. Strab. 5.—Liv. 22, c. 13.—Mart. 6, ep. 42, l. 11, ep. 8.

SIPHNOS, one of the Cyclades, ſituate at the weſt of Paros, twenty miles in circumference according to Pliny, or, according to modern travellers, 40. Siphnos had many excellent harbours, and produced great plenty of delicious fruit. The inhabitants were very depraved, ſo that their licentiouſneſs became proverbial. There were ſome gold mines in Siphnos, of which Apollo demanded the tenth part. When the inhabitants refuſed to continue to offer part of their gold to the god of Delphi, the iſland was inundated, and the mines diſappeared. The air is ſo wholeſome, that many of the natives live to their 120th year. Pauſ. 10, c. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

SIPONTUM, SIPUS, or SEPUS, a maritime town of Apulia in Italy, founded by Diomedes, after his return from the Trojan war. Strab. 6.—Lucan. 5, v. 377.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

SIPYLUM and SIPYLUS, a town of Lydia with a mountain of the ſame name near the Meander, formerly called Ceraunius. The town was deſtroyed by an earthquake with 12 others in the neighbourhood, in the reign of Tiberius. Strab. 1, & 12.—Pauſ. 1, c. 20.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Homer. Il. 24.—Hygin. fab. 9.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.—— One of Niobe's children, killed by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 6. fab. 6.

SIRENES, ſea nymphs who charmed ſo much with their melodious voice, that all forgot their employments to liſten with more attention, and at laſt died for want of food. They were daughters of the Achelous, by the Muſe Calliope, or, according to others, by Melpomene or Terpſichore. They were three in number, Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucoſia, and uſually lived in a ſmall iſland near the cape Pelorus in Sicily. Some authors ſuppoſe that they were monſters, and had the body of a woman above the waiſt, and the reſt of the body like that of a bird; or rather that the whole body was covered with feathers, and had the ſhape of a bird, except the head, which was that of a beautiful female. This monſtrous form they had received from Ceres, who wiſhed to puniſh them, becauſe they had not aſſiſted her daughter when carried away by Pluto. But according to Ovid, they were ſo diſconſolate at the rape of Proſerpine, that they prayed the gods to give them wings that they might ſeek her in the ſea as well as by land. The Sirens were informed by the oracle, that as ſoon as any perſon paſſed by them without ſuffering themſelves to be charmed by their ſongs, they ſhould periſh; and their melody had prevailed in calling the attention of all paſſengers, till Ulyſſes, informed of the power of their voice by Circe, ſtopped the ears of his companions with wax, and ordered himſelf to be tied to the maſt of his ſhip, and no attention to be paid to his commands, ſhould he wiſh to ſtay and liſten to the ſong. This was a ſalutary precaution, Ulyſſes made ſigns for his companions to ſtop, but they were diſregarded, and the fatal coaſt was paſſed with ſafety. Upon this artifice of Ulyſſes, the Sirens were ſo diſappointed, that they threw themſelves into the ſea and periſhed. Some authors ſay, that the Sirens challenged the Muſes to a trial of ſkill in ſinging, and that the latter proved victorious, and plucked the feathers from the wings of their adverſaries, with which they made themſelves crowns. The place where the Sirens deſtroyed themſelves, was afterwards called Sirenis, on the coaſt of Sicily. Virgil however, Æn. 5, v. 864, places the Sirenum Scopuli on the coaſt of Italy, near the iſland of Caprea. Some ſuppoſe that the Sirens were a number of laſcivious women in Sicily, who proſtituted themſelves to ſtrangers, and made them forget their purſuits while drowned in unlawful pleaſures. The Sirens are often repreſented holding, one a lyre, a ſecond a flute, and the third ſinging. Pauſ. 10, c. 6.—*Homer. SIRIS, a town of Magna Græcia, at the mouth of a river of the ſame name. There was a battle fought near it between Pyrrhus and the Romans. Dionyſ. Perieg. v. 221. ——A town of Pæonia in Thrace.

SIRIUS, the dog-ſtar, whoſe appearance, as the antients ſuppoſed, always cauſed great heat on the earth. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 141.

SIRMIUM, a town of Pannonia, very celebrated during the reign of the Roman emperors.

SISAMNES, a judge flead alive for his partiality, by order of Cambyſes. His ſkin was nailed on the bench of the other judges to incite them to act with candor and impartiality. Herodot. 5, c. 25.

SISAPHO, a Corinthian who murdered his brother, because he had put his children to death. Ovid in Ib.

SISENES, a Persian deserter who conspired against Alexander, &c.

L. SISENNA, an antient historian among the Romans, 91 B. C. He wrote an account of the republic, of which Cicero speaks with great warmth. Some fragments of his compositions are quoted by different authors. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 443.—Cic. in Brut. 64 & 67. Paterc. 2, c. 9.——Corn. a Roman, who on being reprimanded in the senate for the ill conduct and depraved manners of his wife, accused publicly Augustus of unlawful commerce with her. Dio. 54.——The family of the Cornelii and Apronii received the firname of Sisenna. They are accused of intemperate loquacity in the Augustan age, by Horat. 1, Sat. 7, v. 8.

SISIGAMBIS or SISYGAMBIS, the mother of Darius the last king of Persia. She was taken prisoner by Alexander the great, at the battle of Issus with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with uncommon tenderness and attention; he saluted her as his own mother, and what he had sternly denied to the petitions of his favorites and ministers, he often granted to the intercession of Sisygambis. The regard of the queen for Alexander was uncommon, and indeed she no sooner heard that he was dead, than she killed herself, unwilling to survive the loss of so generous an enemy; though she had seen with less concern, the fall of her son's kingdom, the ruin of his subjects, and himself murdered by his servants. She had also lost in one day, her husband and 80 of her brothers, whom Ochus had assassinated to make himself master of the kingdom of Persia. Curt. 4, c. 9, l. 10, c. 5.

SISOCOSTUS, one of the friends of Alexander, entrusted with the care of the rock Aornus. Curt. 8, c. 11.

SISYPHUS, a brother of Athamas and Salmoneus, son of Æolus and Enaretta, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages. He married Merope the daughter of Atlas, or according to others of Pandareus, by whom he had several children. He built Ephyre, called afterwards Corinth, and he debauched Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus, because he had been told by an oracle that his children by his brother's daughter would avenge the injuries which he had suffered from the malevolence of Salmoneus. Tyro, however, as Hyginus says, destroyed the two sons whom she had had by her uncle. It is reported that Sisyphus, mistrusting Autolycus, who stole the neighbouring flocks, marked his bulls under the feet, and when they had been carried away by the dishonesty of his friend, he confounded and astonished the thief by selecting from his numerous flocks those bulls, which by the mark he knew to be his own. The artifice of Sisyphus was so pleasing to Autolycus, who had now found one more cunning than himself, that he permitted him to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, whom a few days after he gave in marriage to Laertes of Ithaca. After his death, Sisyphus was condemned in hell, to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal. The causes of this rigorous sentence are variously reported. Some attribute it to his continual depredations in the neighbouring country, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones on those whom he had plundered, and suffering them to expire in the most agonizing torments. Others, to the insult offered to Pluto, in chaining Death in his palace and detaining her till Mars, at the request of the king of hell, went to deliver her from confinement. Others suppose that Jupiter inflicted this punishment upon him because he told Asopus where his daughter Ægina had been carried away by her ravisher. The more followed opinion, however, is, that Sisyphus, on his death-bed, entreated his wife to leave his body unburied, and when he came into Pluto's kingdom, he received permission of returning upon earth to punish this seeming negligence of his wife, but, however, on promise of immediately returning. But he was no sooner out of the infernal regions, than he violated his engagements, and when he was at last brought back to hell by Mars, Pluto, to punish his want of fidelity and honor, condemned him to roll a huge stone to the top of a mountain. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the antients. Homer. Od. 11, v. 592. —*Virg. SITHON, a king of Thrace.——An island in the Ægean.

SITHONIA, a country of Thrace, between mount Hæmus and the Danube. Sithonia is often applied to all Thrace, and thence the epithet epithet Sithonis, ſo often uſed by the poets. It received its name from king Sithon. Horat. l. od. 18, v. 9.—Ovid Met. 6, v. 588. l. 7, v. 466, l. 13, v. 571.—Herodot. 7, c. 122.

SITIUS, a Roman who aſſiſted Cæſar in Africa with great ſucceſs. He was rewarded with a province of Numidia.

SITONES, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 45.

SMENUS, a river of Laconia riſing in mount Taygetus. Pauſ. 3, c. 24.

SMERDIS, a ſon of Cyrus, put to death by order of his brother Cambyſes. As his execution was not public, and as it was only known to one of the officers of the monarch, one of the Magi of Perſia, who was himſelf called Smerdis, and who greatly reſembled the deceaſed prince, declared himſelf king, at the death of Cambyſes. This uſurpation would not perhaps have been known, had not he taken too many cautions to conceal it. After he had reigned for ſix months with univerſal approbation, ſeven noblemen of Perſia conſpired to dethrone him, and when this had been executed with ſucceſs, they choſe one of their number to reign in the uſurper's place, B. C. 521. This was Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes. Herodot. 3, c. 30.—Juſtin 1, c. 9.

SMILAX, a beautiful ſhepherdeſs who became enamoured of Crocus. She was changed into a flower, as alſo her lover. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 283.

SMILIS, a ſtatuary of Ægina in the age of Dædalus. Pauſ. 7.

SMINDYRIDES, a native of Sybaris, famous for his luxury. Ælian V. H. 9 & 12.

SMINTHEUS, one of the ſirnames of Apollo in Phrygia, where the inhabitants raiſed him a temple, becauſe he had deſtroyed a number of rats that infeſted the country. Theſe rats were called σμινθαι, in the language of Phrygia, whence the ſirname. There is another ſtory ſimilar to this related by the Greek ſcholiaſt of Homer. Il. 1, v. 39.—Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 585.

SMYRNA, a celebrated ſea port town of Ionia in Aſia Minor, built, as ſome ſuppoſe, by Tantalus, or, according to others, by the Æolians. It has been ſubject to many revolutions, and been ſeverally in the poſſeſſion of the Æolians, Ionians, Lydians, and Macedonians. Alexander, or according to Strabo, Lyſimachus rebuilt it 400 years after it had been deſtroyed by the Lydians. It was one of the richeſt and moſt powerful cities of Aſia, and became one of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy. The inhabitants were given much to luxury and indolence, but they were univerſally eſteemed for their valor and intrepidity when called to action. Marcus Aurelius repaired it after it had been deſtroyed by an earthquake, about the 180th year of the chriſtian era. Smyrna ſtill continues to be a very commercial town. The river Meles flows near its walls. The inhabitants of Smyrna believed that Homer was born among them, and to confirm this opinion they ſhowed a place which bore the poet's name, and they had a braſs coin in circulation which was called Homerium. Some ſuppoſe that it was called Smyrna from an Amazon of the ſame name, who took poſſeſſion of it. Herodot. 1, c. 16, &c.—Strab. 12 & 14.—Ital. 8, v. 595.—Pauſ. 3, c. 8.—Mela. 1, c. 17.——A daughter of Thias, mother of Adonis.——An Amazon.——The name of a poem which Cinna, a Latin poet, compoſed in nine years, and which was worthy of admiration, according to Catullus.

SOANA, a river of Albania.

SOANDA, a town of Armenia.

SOANES, a people of Colchis, near Caucaſus, in whoſe territories the rivers abound with golden ſands, which the inhabitants gather in wool ſkins, whence perhaps aroſe the fable of the golden fleece. Strab. 11.

SOCRATES, the moſt celebrated philoſopher of all antiquity, was a native of Athens. His father Sophroniſcus was a ſtatuary, and his mother Phenarete was by profeſſion a midwife. For ſome time he followed the occupation of his father, and ſome have mentioned the ſtatues of the Graces, admired for their ſimplicity and elegance, as the work of his own hands. He was called away from this meaner employment, of which however he never bluſhed, by Crito, who admired his genius, and courted his friendſhip. Philoſophy ſoon became the ſtudy of Socrates, and under Archelaus and Anaxagoras he laid the foundation of that exemplary virtue which ſucceeding ages have ever loved and venerated. He appeared like the reſt of his countrymen in the field of battle; he fought with boldneſs and intrepidity, and to his courage two of his friends and diſciples, Xenophon and Alcibiades, owed the preſervation of their life. But the character of Socrates appears more conſpicuous as a philoſopher and moraliſt than as that of a warrior. He was fond of labor, he inured himſelf to ſuffer hardſhips, and he acquired that ſerenity of mind and firmneſs of countenance which the moſt alarming dangers could never deſtroy, or the moſt ſudden calamities alter. If he was poor, it was from choice, and not the effects of vanity, or the wiſh of appearing ſingular. He bore injuries with patience, and the inſults of malice or reſentment he not only treated with contempt, but even received with a mind that expreſſed ſome concern, and felt compaſſion for the depravity of human nature. So ſingular and ſo venerable a character was admired by the moſt enlightened of the Athenians. Socrates was attended by a number of illuſtrious pupils, whom he inſtructed by his exemplary life, as well as by his doctrines. He had no particular place where to deliver his lectures, but as the good of his countrymen, and the reformation of their corrupted morals, and not the aggregation of riches, was the object of his ſtudy, he was preſent every where, and drew the attention of his auditors either in the groves of Academus, the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilyſſus. He ſpoke with freedom on every ſubject, religious as well as civil, and had the courage to condemn the violence of his countrymen, and to withſtand the torrent of reſentment, by which the Athenian generals were capitally puniſhed for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginuſæ. This independance of ſpirit, and that viſible ſuperiority of mind and genius over the reſt of his countrymen, created many enemies to Socrates, but as his character was irreproachable, and his doctrines pure, and void of all obſcurity, the voice of malevolence was ſilent. Yet Ariſtophanes ſoon undertook, at the inſtigation of Melitus, in his comedy of the clouds, to ridicule the venerable character of Socrates on the ſtage; and when once the way was open to calumny and defamation, the fickle and licentious populace paid no reverence to the philoſopher whom they had before regarded as a being of a ſuperior order. When this had ſucceeded, Melitus ſtood forth to criminate him, together with Anitus and Lycon, and the philoſopher was ſummoned before the tribunal of the five hundred. He was accuſed of making innovations in the religion of the Greeks, and of ridiculing the many gods which the Athenians worſhipped; yet falſe as this might appear, the accuſers relied for the ſucceſs of their cauſe upon the perjury of falſe witneſſes, and the envy of the judges, whoſe ignorance would readily yield to miſrepreſentation, and be influenced and guided by eloquence and artifice. In this their expectations were not fruſtrated, and while the judges expected ſubmiſſion from Socrates, and that meanneſs of behaviour and ſervility of defence which diſtinguiſhed criminals, the philoſopher perhaps accelerated his own fall by the firmneſs of his mind, and his uncomplying integrity. Lyſias, one of the moſt celebrated orators of the age, compoſed an oration in a labored and pathetic ſtile, which he offered to his friend to be pronounced as his defence in the preſence of his judges, but Socrates refuſed it, and obſerved that a philoſopher ought to be conſpicous for magnanimity and firmneſs of ſoul. In his apology he ſpoke with great animation, and confeſſed that while others boaſted that they were acquainted with every thing, he himſelf knew nothing. The whole diſcourſe was full of ſimplicity and noble grandeur, the energetic language of offended innocence. He modeſtly ſaid, that what he poſſeſſed was applied for the ſervice of the Athenians; it was his wiſh to make his fellow citizens happy, and it was a duty which he performed by the ſpecial command of the gods, whoſe authority, ſaid he emphatically, to his judges, I regard more than yours. Such language from a man who was accuſed of a capital crime, aſtoniſhed and irritated the judges. Socrates was condemned, but only by a majority of three voices; and when he was demanded, according to the ſpirit of the Athenian laws, to paſs ſentence on himſelf, and to mention the death he preferred, the philoſopher ſaid, For my attempts to teach the Athenian youth juſtice and moderation, and to render the reſt of my countrymen more happy, let me be maintained at the public expence the remaining years of my life in the Prytaneum, an honor, O Athenians, which I deſerve more than the victors of the Olympic games. They make their countrymen more happy in appearance, but I have made you ſo in reality. This exaſperated the judges in the higheſt degree, and he was condemned to drink hemlock. Upon this he addreſſed the court, and more particularly the judges who had decided in his favor, in a pathetic ſpeech. He told them that to die was a pleaſure, ſince he was going to hold converſe with the greateſt heroes of antiquity; he recommended to their paternal care his defenceleſs children, and as he returned to the priſon, he exclaimed: I go to die, you to live; but which is the beſt the divinity alone can know. The ſolemn celebration of the Delian feſtivals [Vid. Delia] prevented his execution for 30 days, and during that time he was confined in the priſon and loaded with irons. His friends, and particularly his diſciples, were his conſtant attendants, he diſcourſed with them upon different ſubjects with all his uſual chearfulneſs and ſerenity. He reproved them for their ſorrow, and when one of them was uncommonly grieved becauſe he was to ſuffer tho' innocent, the philoſopher replied, would you then have me die guilty? With this compoſure did he ſpend his laſt days, he continued to be a preceptor till the moment of his death, and inſtructed his pupils on queſtions of the greateſt importance; he told them his opinions in ſupport of the immortality of the ſoul, and reprobated with acrimony the prevalent cuſtom of ſuicide. He diſregarded the interceſſion of his friends, and when it was in his power to make his eſcape out of priſon he refuſed it, and aſked with his uſual pleaſantry, where he could eſcape death; where, ſays he to Crito, who had

bribed the gaoler, and made his eſcape certain, where ſhall I fly to avoid this irrevocable doom paſſed on all mankind? When the hour to drink the poiſon was come, the executioner preſented him the cup with tears in his eyes. Socrates received it with compoſure, and after he had made a libation to the gods, he drank it with an unaltered countenance, and a few moments after he expired. Such was the end of a man whom the uninfluenced anſwer of the oracle of Delphi had pronounced the wiſeſt of mankind. Socrates died about 400 years before Chriſt, in the 70th year of his age. He was no ſooner buried than the Athenians repented of their cruelty, his accuſers were univerſally deſpiſed and ſhunned, one ſuffered death, ſome were baniſhed, and others with their own hands put an end to the life, which their ſeverity to the beſt of the Athenians had rendered inſupportable. The actions, ſayings, and opinions of Socrates have been faithfully recorded by two of the moſt celebrated of his pupils Xenophon and Plato, and every thing which relates to the life and circumſtances of this great philoſopher is now minutely known. To his poverty, his innocence, and his example, the Greeks were particularly indebted for their greatneſs and ſplendor; and the learning which was univerſally diſſeminated by his pupils, gave the whole nation a conſciouſneſs of their ſuperiority over the reſt of the world, not only in the polite arts, but in the more laborious exerciſes, which their writings celebrated. The philoſophy of Socrates, forms an intereſting epoch in the hiſtory of the human mind. The ſon of Sophroniſcus derided the more abſtruſe enquiries and metaphyſical reſearches of his predeceſſors, and by firſt introducing moral philoſophy, he induced mankind to conſider themſelves, their paſſions, their opinions, their duties, actions, and faculties. From this it was ſaid, that the founder of the Socratic ſchool drew philoſophy down from heaven upon the earth. In his attendance upon religious worſhip, Socrates was himſelf an example, he believed the divine origin of dreams and omens, and publicly declared that he was accompanied by a dæmon or inviſible conductor [Vid. Dæmon] whoſe frequent interpoſition ſtopped him from the commiſſion of evil, or guilt of miſconduct. This familiar ſpirit however, according to ſome, was nothing more than a ſound judgment aſſiſted by prudence and long experience, which warned him at the approach of danger, and from a general ſpeculation of mankind could foreſee what ſucceſs would attend an enterprize, or what calamities would follow an ill managed adminiſtration. As a ſupporter of the immortality of the ſoul, he allowed the perfection of a ſupreme knowledge, from which he deduced the government of the univerſe. From the reſources of experience as well as nature and obſervation, he perceived the indiſcriminate diſpenſation of good and evil to mankind by the hand of heaven, and he was convinced that nothing but the moſt inconſiderate would incur the diſpleaſure of their creator to avoid poverty or ſickneſs, or gratify a ſenſual appetite, which muſt at the end harraſs their ſoul with remorſe and the conſciouſneſs of guilt. From this natural view of things, he perceived the relation of one nation with another, and how much the tranquility of civil ſociety depended upon the proper diſcharge of theſe reſpective duties. The actions of men furniſhed materials alſo for his diſcourſe; to inſtruct them was his aim, and to render them happy was the ultimate object of his daily leſſons. From principles like theſe, which were inforced by the unparalleled example of an affectionate huſband, a tender parent, a warlike ſoldier, and a patriotic citizen in Socrates, ſoon after the celebrated ſects of the Platoniſts, the Peripatetics, Academics, Cyrenaics, Stoics, &c. aroſe. Socrates never wrote for the public eye, yet many ſupport that the tragedies of his pupil Euripides were partly compoſed by him. He was naturally of a licentious diſpoſition, and a phyſiognomiſt obſerved in looking in the face of the philoſopher, that his heart was the moſt depraved, immodeſt, and corrupted that ever was in the human breaſt. This nearly coſt the ſatyriſt his life, but Socrates upbraided his diſciples, who wiſhed to puniſh the phyſiognomiſt, and declared that his aſſertions were true, but that all his vicious propenſities had been duly corrected and curbed by means of reaſon. Sol (the ſun) was an object of veneration among the antients. It was particularly worſhipped by the Perſians, under the name of Mithras. The Maſſagetæ ſacrificed horſes to the ſun on account of their ſwiftneſs. According to ſome of the antient poets, Sol and Apollo were two different perſons. Apollo, however, and Phœbus and Sol, are univerſally ſuppoſed to be the ſame deity.

Solnus, (C. Julius) a grammarian at the end of the firſt century, who wrote a book called Polybiſtor, which is a collection of hiſtorical remarks and geographical annotations on the moſt celebrated places of every country. He has been called Pliny's ape, becauſe he imitated that well known naturaliſt. The laſt edition of the Polyhiſtor is that of Norimb. ex editione Salmaſii. 1777.

Solon, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, was born at Salamis and educated at Athens. His father's name was Euphorion, or Execheſtides, one of the deſcendants of king Codrus, and by his mother's ſide he reckoned among his relations the celebrated Piſiſtratus. After he had devoted part of his time to philoſophical and political ſtudies, Solon travelled over the greateſt part of Greece; but at his return home he was diſtreſſed with the diſſenſions which were kindled among his countrymen. All fixed their eyes upon Solon as a deliverer, and he was unanimouſly elected archon and ſovereign legiſlator. He might have become abſolute, but he refuſed the dangerous office of king of Athens, and in the capacity of lawgiver he began to make a reform in every department. The complaints of the poorer citizens found redreſs, all debts were remitted, and no one was permitted to ſeize the perſon of his debtor if unable to make a reſtoration of his money. After he had made the moſt ſalutary regulations in the ſtate, and bound the Athenians by a ſolemn oath, that they would faithfully obſerve his laws for the ſpace of 100 years, Solon reſigned the office of legiſlator, and removed himſelf from Athens. He viſited Egypt, and in the court of Crœſus king of Lydia, he convinced the monarch of the inſtability of fortune, and told him, when he wiſhed to know whether he was not the happieſt of mortals, that Tellus, an Athenian who had always ſeen his country in a floriſhing ſtate, who had ſeen his children lead a virtuous life, and who had himſelf fallen in defence of his country, was more entitled to happineſs than the poſſeſſor of riches, and the maſter of empires. After ten year's abſence Solon returned to Athens, but he had the mortification to find the greateſt part of his regulations diſregarded by the factious ſpirit of his countrymen, and the uſurpation of Piſiſtratus. Not to be longer a ſpectator of the diviſions that reigned in his country, he retired to Cyprus, where he died at the court of king Philocyprus, in the 80th year of his age, 558 years before the chriſtian era. The ſalutary conſequences of the laws of Solon can be diſcovered in the length of time they were in force in the republic of Athens. For above 400 years they floriſhed in full vigor, and Cicero, who was himſelf a witneſs of their benign influence, paſſes the higheſt encomiums upon the legiſlator, whoſe ſuperior wiſdom framed ſuch a code of regulations. It was the intention of Solon to protect the poorer citizens, and by dividing the whole body of the Athenians into four claſſes, three of which were permitted to diſcharge the moſt important offices and magiſtracies of the ſtate, and the laſt to give their opinion in the aſſemblies, but not have a ſhare in the diſtinctions and honors of their ſuperiors, the legiſlator gave the populace a privilege which, though at firſt ſmall and inconſiderable, ſoon rendered them maſters of the republic, and of all the affairs of government. He made a reformation in the Areopagus, he encreaſed the authority of the members, and permitted them them yearly to enquire how every citizen maintained himſelf, and to puniſh ſuch as lived in idleneſs and were not employed in ſome honorable and lucrative profeſſion. He alſo regulated the Prytaneum, and fixed the number of its judges to 400. The ſanguinary laws of Draco were all cancelled, except that againſt murder, and the puniſhment denounced againſt every offender was proportioned to his crime, but Solon made no law againſt paricide or ſacrilege. The former of theſe crimes, he ſaid, was too horrible to human nature for a man to be guilty of it, and the latter could never be committed, becauſe the hiſtory of Athens had never furniſhed a ſingle inſtance. Such as had died in the ſervice of their country, were buried with great pomp, and their family was maintained at the public expence; but ſuch as had ſquandered away their eſtates, ſuch as refuſed to bear arms in defence of their country, or paid no attention to the infirmities and diſtreſs of their parents, were branded with infamy. The laws of marriage were newly regulated, it became an union of affection and tenderneſs, and no longer a mercenary contract. To ſpeak with ill language againſt the dead as well as the living, was made a crime, and the legiſlator wiſhed that the character of his fellow citizens ſhould be freed from the aſperſions of malevolence and envy. A perſon that had no children, was permitted to diſpoſe of his eſtates as he pleaſed, and the females were not allowed to be extravagant in their dreſs or expences. To be guilty of adultery was a capital crime, and the friend and aſſociate of lewdneſs and debauchery was never permitted to ſpeak in public, for, as the philoſopher obſerved, a man who has no ſhame, is not capable of being intruſted with the people. Theſe celebrated laws were engraved on ſeveral tables, and that they might be the better known and more familiar to the Athenians, they were written in verſe. The indignation which Solon expreſſed on ſeeing the tragical repreſentations of Theſpis, is well known, and he ſternly obſerved, that if falſehood and fiction were tolerated on the ſtage, they would ſoon find their way in the common occupations of men. According to Plutarch, Solon was reconciled to Piſiſtratus, but this ſeems to be falſe, as the legiſlator refuſed to live in a country where the privileges of his fellow citizens were trampled upon by the uſurpation of a tyrant. Vid. Lycurgus. Plut. in Sol.—Herodot. 1, c. 29.—Diog. 1.—Pauſ. 1, c. 40.—Cic.

Solonium, a town of Latium on the borders of Etruria. Plut. in Mar.

Solus, a maritime town of Sicily. Strab. 14.

Solyma, and Solymæ, a town of Lycia. The inhabitants called Solymi were anciently called Milyades, and afterwards Termili and Lycians. Sarpedon ſettled among them. Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 6.—Plin. 5, c. 27, & 29.——An antient name of Jeruſalem. Juv. 6, v. 543.

Somnus, ſon of Erebus and Nox, was one of the infernal deities, and preſided over ſleep. His palace, according to ſome mythologiſts, is a dark cave, where the ſun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and ſomniferous herbs. The god himſelf is repreſented as aſleep on a bed of feathers with black curtains. The dreams ſtand by him, and Morpheus as his principal miniſter watches to prevent the noiſe from awaking him. Heſiod. Theog.—Homer Il. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 893.—Ovid. Met. 11.

Sonchis, an Egyptian prieſt in the age of Solon. It was he who told that celebrated philoſopher a number of traditions, particularly about the Atlantic iſles, which he repreſented as more extenſive than the continent of Africa and Aſia united. This iſland diſappeared, as it is ſaid, in one day and one night. Plut. in Iſid. &c.

Sontiates, a people in Gaul.

Sopater, a philoſopher of Apamea, in the age of the emperor Conſtantine. He was one of the diſciples of Iamblicus, and after his death he was at the head of the Platonic philoſophers.

Sophax, a ſon of Hercules who founded the kingdom of Tingis, in Mauritania. Strab. 3.

Sophene, a country of Armenia, on the borders of Meſopotamia. Lucan. 2, v. 593.

Sophocles, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens, educated in the ſchool of Æſchylus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf not only as a poet, but alſo as a ſtateſman. He commanded the Athenian armies, and in many battles he ſhared the ſupreme command with Pericles, and exerciſed the office of archon with credit and honor. The firſt appearance of Sophocles as a poet, reflects great honor on his abilities. The Athenians had taken the iſland of Scyros, and to celebrate that memorable event, a yearly conteſt for tragedy was inſtituted. Sophocles on this occaſion obtained the prize over many competitors, in the number of whom was Æſchylus, his friend and his maſter. This ſucceſs contributed to encourage the poet, he wrote for the ſtage with applauſe, and obtained the poetical prize 20 different times. Sophocles was the rival of Euripides for public praiſe, they divided the applauſe of the populace, and while the former ſurpaſſed in the ſublime and majeſtic, the other was not inferior in the tender and pathetic. The Athenians were pleaſed with their contention, and as the theatre was at that time an object of importance and magnitude, and deemed an eſſential and moſt mag-magnificent part of the religious worſhip, each had his admirers and adherents; but the two poets, captivated at laſt by popular applauſe, gave way to jealouſy and rivalſhip. Of 120 tragedies which Sophocles compoſed, only ſeven are extant; Ajax, Electra, Œdipus the tyrant, Antigone, the Trachiniæ, Philoctetes, and Œdipus at Colonos. The ingratitude of the children of Sophocles is well known. They wiſhed to become immediate maſters of their father's poſſeſſions, and therefore tired of his long life, they accuſed him before the Areopagus of inſanity. The only defence the poet made was to read his tragedy of Œdipus at Colonos, which he had lately finiſhed, and then he aſked his judges, whether the author of ſuch a performance could be taxed with inſanity? The father upon this was acquitted, and the children returned home covered with ſhame and confuſion. Sophocles died in the 91ſt year of his age, 406 years before Chriſt, through exceſs of joy, as ſome authors report, of having obtained a poetical prize at the Olympic games. Athenæus has accuſed Sophocles of licentiouſneſs and debauchery, particularly when he commanded the armies of Athens. The beſt editions of Sophocles are thoſe of Capperonier, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1780; of Glaſgow, 2 vols. 12mo. 1745; and of Geneva, 4to. 1603. Cic. in Cat. de Div. 1, c. 25.—Plut. in Cim. &c.—Quintil. 1, c. 10, l. 10, c. 1.—*Val. SOPHONISBA, a daughter of Aſdrubal the Carthaginian, celebrated for her beauty. She married Scyphax, a prince of Numidia, and when her huſband was conquered by the Romans, and Maſiniſſa, ſhe fell a captive into the hands of the enemy. Maſiniſſa became enamoured of her, and married her. This behaviour diſpleaſed the Romans, and Scipio, who at that time had the command of the armies of the republic in Africa, rebuked the monarch ſeverely, and deſired him to part with Sophoniſba. This was an arduous taſk for Maſiniſſa, yet he dreaded the Romans. He entered Sophoniſba's tent with tears in his eyes, and told her that as he could not deliver her from captivity and the jealouſy of the Romans, he recommended her as the ſtrongeſt pledge of his love and affection for her perſon to die like the daughter of Aſdrubal. Sophoniſba obeyed, and drank with uncommon compoſure and ſerenity, the cup of poiſon which Maſiniſſa ſent to her, about 203 years before Chriſt. Liv. 30, c. 12, &c.—Salluſt. de Jug.—Juſtin.

SOPHRON, a comic poet of Syracuſe, ſon of Agathocles and Damaſyllis. His compoſitions were ſo univerſally eſteemed, that Plato is ſaid to have read them with rapture. Val. Max. 8. c. 7.—Quintil. 1, c. 10.

SOPHRONISCUS, the father of Socrates.

SOPHRONIA, a Roman lady whom Maxentius took by force from her huſband's houſe, and married. Sophronia killed herſelf when ſhe ſaw her affections were abuſed by the tyrant.

SOSIA GALLA, a woman at the court of Tiberius, baniſhed, &c.

SOSIBIUS, a grammarian of Laconia, B C. 255. He was a great favorite of Ptolemy Philopator, and adviſed him to murder his brother, and the queen his wife, called Arſinoe. He lived to a great age, and was on that account called Polychronos. He was afterwards permitted to retire from the court, and ſpend the reſt of his days in peace and tranquility, after he had diſgraced the name of miniſter by the moſt abominable crimes, and the murder of many of the royal family. His ſon of the ſame name, was preceptor to king Ptolemy Epiphanes.——The preceptor of Britannicus, the ſon of Claudius.

SOSICLES, a Greek, who behaved with great valor when Xerxes invaded Greece.

SOSICRATES, a noble ſenator among the Achæans, put to death becauſe he wiſhed his countrymen to make peace with the Romans.

C. 284, who built the white tower of Pharos, in the bay of Alexandria. He inscribed his name upon it. Vid. Pharos.——A priest of Venus at Paphos among the favorites of Vespasian.——A favorite of Hercules.——A Greek historian who wrote an account of Etruria.——A poet who wrote a poem on the expedition of Xerxes into Greece. Juv. 10, v. 178.

Sotades, an athlete.——A Greek poet of Thrace. He wrote verses against Philadelphus Ptolemy, for which he was thrown into the sea in a cage of lead. He was called Cinædus, not only because he was addicted to the abominable crime which the surname indicates, but because he wrote a poem in commendation of it. Some suppose, that instead of the word Socraticos in the 2d satyr, verse the 10th, of Juvenal, the word Sotadicos should be inserted, as the poet Sotades and not the philosopher Socrates deserved the appellation of Cinædus. Obscene verses were generally called Sotadea carmina from him. They could be turned and read different ways without losing their measure or sense, such as the following, which can be read backwards:

Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor.
Si bene te tua laus taxat, sua laute tenebis.
Sole modere pede, ede, perede melos.

Soter, a surname of the first Ptolemy.——It was also common to other monarchs.

Soteria, days appointed for thanksgivings and the offering of sacrifices for deliverance from danger. One of these was observed at Sicyon, to commemorate the deliverance of that city from the hands of the Macedonians, by Aratus.

Soterichus, a poet and historian in the age of Diocletian. He wrote a panegyric on that emperor, as also a life of Apollonius Thyanæus. His works were greatly esteemed. They are now lost, except some few fragments preserved by the scholiast of Lycophron.

Sothis, an Egyptian name of the constellation, called Sirius, which received divine honors in that country.

Sotion, a grammarian of Alexandria, B. C. 204.

Sotius, a philosopher in the reign of Tiberius.

Sous, a king of Sparta, who made himself known by his valor, &c.

Sozomen, an ecclesiastical historian who died 450 A. D. His history extends from the year 324 to 439, and is dedicated to Theodosius the younger, being written in a stile of inelegance and mediocrity. The best edition is that of Reading, fol. Cantab. 1720.

Spaco, the nurse of Cyrus. Justin. 1, c. 4.

Sparta, a celebrated city of Peloponnesus, the capital of Laconia, situate on the Eurotas, at the distance of about 30 miles from its mouth. It received its name from Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, who married Lacedæmon. It was also called Lacedæmon. Vid. Lacedæmon.

Spartacus, a king of Pontus.——Another, king of Bosporus, who died B. C. 433. His son and successor of the same name died B. C. 407.——Another who died 284 B. C.——A Thracian shepherd celebrated for his abilities and the victories he obtained over the Romans. Being one of the gladiators who were kept at Capua in the house of Lentulus, he escaped from the place of his confinement with 30 of his companions, and took up arms against the Romans. He soon found himself with 10,000 men equally resolute with himself, and though at first obliged to hide himself in the woods and solitary retreats of Campania, he soon laid waste the country; and when his followers were encreased by additional numbers, and better disciplined, and more completely armed, he attacked the Roman generals in the field of battle. Two consuls and other officers were defeated with much loss, and Spartacus, superior in counsel and abilities, appeared more terrible, though often often deſerted by his fickle attendants. Craſſus was ſent againſt him, but this celebrated general at firſt deſpaired of ſucceſs. A bloody battle was fought, in which at laſt the gladiators were defeated. Spartacus behaved with great valor; when wounded in the leg, he fought on his knees, covering himſelf with his buckler in one hand, and uſing his ſword with the other; and when at laſt he fell, he fell upon a heap of Romans, whom he had ſacrificed to his fury, B. C. 71. In this battle no leſs than 40,000 of the rebels were ſlain, and the war totally finiſhed. Flor. 3, c. 20.—Liv. 95.—Eutrop. 6, c. 2.—Plut. in Craſſ.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.—Appian.

Spartāni, or Spartiātæ, the inhabitants of Sparta. Vid. Sparta, Lacedæmon.

Spartianus Ælius, a Latin hiſtorian, who wrote the lives of all the Roman emperors, from J. Cæſar to Diocleſian. He dedicated them to Diocleſian, to whom, according to ſome, he was related. Of theſe compoſitions only the life of Adrian, Verus, Didius Julianus, Septimius Severus, Caracalla, and Geta are extant, publiſhed among the Scriptores Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ. Spartianus is not eſteemed as an hiſtorian or biographer.

Spechia, an antient name of the iſland of Cyprus.

Spendius, a Campanian deſerter, who rebelled againſt the Romans, and raiſed tumults, and made war againſt Amilcar, the Carthaginian general.

Spendon, a poet of Lacedæmon.

Sperchius, a river of Theſſaly, riſing on mount Œta, and falling into the ſea in the bay of Malia, near Anticyra. The name is ſuppoſed to be derived from its rapidity (σπερχειν feſtinare). Peleus vowed to the god of this river, the hair of his ſon Achilles, if ever he returned ſafe from the Trojan war. Herodot. 7, c. 198.—Strab. 9.—*Homer. Spermatophăgi, a people who lived in the extremeſt parts of Egypt. They fed upon the fruits that fell from the trees.

Speusippus, an Athenian philoſopher, nephew, as alſo ſucceſſor of Plato. His father's name was Eurymedon, and his mother's Potone. He preſided in Plato's ſchool for eight years, and diſgraced himſelf by his extravagance and debauchery. Plato attempted to check him, but to no purpoſe. He died of the louſy ſickneſs, or killed himſelf according to ſome accounts, B. C. 339. Plut. in Lyſ.—Diog. 4.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.

Sphacteriæ, three ſmall iſlands oppoſite Pylos, on the coaſt of Meſſenia. They are alſo called Sphagiæ.

Spherus, an arm bearer of Pelops, ſon of Tantalus. He was buried in a ſmall iſland near the Iſthmus of Corinth, which from him was called Spheria. Pauſ. 5, c. 10.——A Greek philoſopher, diſciple to Zeno of Cyprus, 243 B. C. He came to Sparta in the age of Agis and Cleomenes, and opened a ſchool there. Plut. in Ag.—Diod.

Sphinx, a monſter which had the head and breaſts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a ſerpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and an human voice. It ſprang from the union of Orthos with the Chimæra, or of Typhon with Echidna. The Sphinx had been ſent into the neighbourhood of Thebes by Juno, who wiſhed to puniſh the family of Cadmus, which ſhe perſecuted with immortal hatred, and it laid this part of Bœotia under continual alarms by propoſing enigmas, and devouring the inhabitants if unable to explain them. In the midſt of their conſternation the Thebans were told by the oracle, that the Sphinx would deſtroy herſelf as ſoon as one of the enigmas ſhe propoſed was explained. In this enigma ſhe wiſhed to know what animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening. Upon this Creon, king of Thebes, promiſed his crown and his ſiſter Jocaſta in marriage to him who could deliver his country from the monſter by a ſucceſsful explanation of the enigma. It was at laſt happily explained by Œdipus, who obſerved that man walked on his hands and feet when young or in the morning of life, at the noon of life he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he ſupported his infirmities upon a ſtick. [Vid. Œdipus.] The Sphinx no ſooner heard this explanation than ſhe daſhed her head againſt a rock and immediately expired. Some mythologiſts wiſh to unriddle the fabulous traditions about the Sphinx by the ſuppoſition that one of the daughters of Cadmus, or Laius, infeſted the country of Thebes by her continual depredations, becauſe ſhe had been refuſed a part of her father's poſſeſſions. The lion's paw expreſſed, as they obſerve, her cruelty, the body of the dog her laciviouſneſs, her enigmas the ſnares ſhe laid for ſtrangers and travellers, and her wings the diſpatch ſhe uſed in her expeditions. Plut.—*Heſiod. Stasileus, an Athenian, killed at the battle of Marathon. He was one of the 10 prætors.

Statilia, a woman who lived to a great age, as mentioned by Seneca, ep. 77.—— Another. Vid. Meſſalina.

Statilius, a young Roman celebrated for his courage and conſtancy. He was an inveterate enemy to Cæſar, and when Cato murdered himſelf, he attempted to follow his example, but was prevented by his friends. The conſpirators againſt Cæſar wiſhed him to be in the number, but the anſwer which he gave diſpleaſed Brutus. He was at laſt killed by the army of the triumvirs. Plut. ——Lucius, one of the friends of Catiline. He joined in his conſpiracy, and was put to death.——A young general in the war which the Latins undertook againſt the Romans. He was killed with 25,000 of his troops.—— —A general who fought againſt Antony.—— —Taurus, a pro-conſul of Africa. He was accuſed of conſulting magicians, upon which he put himſelf to death.

Statinæ, iſlands on the coaſt of Campania, raiſed from the ſea by an earthquake.

Statīra, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander. The conqueror had formerly refuſed her, but when ſhe had fallen into his hands at Iſſus, the nuptials were celebrated with uncommon ſplendor. No leſs than 9000 perſons attended, to each of whom Alexander gave a golden cup to be offered to the gods. Statira had no children by Alexander. She was cruelly put to death by Roxana, after the conqueror's death. Juſtin. 12, c. 12.——A ſiſter of Darius, the laſt king of Perſia. Statius, STATIUS, (Cæcilius) a comic poet in the age of Ennius. He was a native of Gaul, and originally a slave. His latinity was bad, yet he acquired great reputation by his comedies. He died a little after Ennius. Cic. de sen.——Annæus, a friend of the philosopher Seneca.——P. Papinius, a poet born at Naples in the reign of the emperor Domitian. His father's name was Statius of Epirus, and his mother's Agelina. Statius has made himself known by two epic poems, the Thebais in 12 books, and the Achilleis in two books, which remained unfinished on account of his premature death. There are besides other pieces composed on several subjects, which are extant, and well known under the name of Sylvæ, divided into four books. The two epic poems of Statius are dedicated to Domitian, whom the poet ranks among the gods. They were universally admired in his age at Rome, but the taste of the times was corrupted, though some of the moderns have called them inferior to no Latin composition except Virgil's. The stile of Statius is bombastic and affected, he often forgets the poet to become the declaimer and the historian. In his Sylvæ, which were written generally extempore, are many beautiful expressions and strokes of genius. Statius, as some suppose, was poor, and he was obliged to maintain himself by writing for the stage. None of his dramatic pieces are extant. Martial has satyrized him, and what Juvenal has written in his praise, some have interpreted as an illiberal reflection upon him. Statius died about the 100th year of the Christian era. The best editions of his works are that of Barthius, 2 vols. 4to. Cyg. 1664, and that of the Variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1671; and of the Thebais, separate, that of Warrington, 2 vols. 12mo. 1778.——Domitius, a tribune in the age of Nero, deprived of his office when Piso's conspiracy was discovered.——A general of the Samnites.——An officer of the prætorian guards, who conspired against Nero.

STASICRĂTES, a statuary and architect in the wars of Alexander, who offered to make a statue of mount Athos, which was rejected by the conqueror, &c.

STATOR, a surname of Jupiter, given him by Romulus, because he stopped (sto) the flight of the Romans in a battle against the Sabines. The conqueror erected him a temple under that name.

STELLATIS, a field remarkable for its fertility, in Campania. Sueton.

STELLIO, a youth turned into an elf by Ceres, because he derided the goddess. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 445.

STENOBŒA. Vid. Sthenobœa.

STENOCRĂTES, an Athenian who conspired to murder the commander of the garrison which Demetrius had placed in the citadel, &c. Polyæn. 5.

STENTOR, one of the Greeks who went to the Trojan war. His voice alone was louder than that of 50 men together. Homeri Il. 5, v. 784.—Juv. 13, v. 112.

STEPHĂNUS, a musician of Media, upon whose body Alexander made an experiment in burning a certain sort of bitumen called naphthe. Strab. 16.—Plut. in Alex.——A Greek writer of Byzantium, known for his dictionary giving an account of the towns and places of the antient world, of which the best edition is that of Gronovius, 2 vols. fol. L. Bat. 1694.

STĔROPE, one of the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas. She married Œnomaus, king of Pisæ, by whom she had Hippodamia, &c.——A daughter of Parthaon, supposed by some to be the mother of the Sirens.——A daughter of Cepheus.——A daughter of Pleuron,——of Acastus,——of Danaus,——of Cebrion.

STEROPES, one of the Cyclops. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

STESICHŎRUS, a lyric Greek poet of Himera, in Sicily. He was originally called Tisias, and obtained the name of Stesichorus, from the alterations he made in music and dancing. His compositions were written in the Doric dialect, and comprised in 26 books, all now lost except a few fragments. Some say he lost his eye sight for writing invectives again Helen, and that he received it only upon making a recantation of what he had said. He was the first inventor of that fable of the horse and the stag, which Horace and some other poets have imitated, and this he wrote to prevent his countrymen from making an alliance with Phalaris. According to some he was the first who wrote an epithalamium. He flourished 556 B. C. and died at Catana in the 85th year of his age. Isocrat. in Hel.—Aristot. rhet.—Strab. 3.—Lucian in Macr.—Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 35.—Plut. de Mus.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paus. 3, c. 19. l. 10, c. 26.

STESAGŎRAS, a brother of Miltiades. Vid. Miltiades.

STESILĔA, a beautiful woman of Athens, &c.

STESIMBRŎTUS, an historian very inconsistent in his narrations. He wrote an account of Cimon's exploits.——A son of Epaminondas put to death by his father, because he had fought the enemy without his orders, &c.——A musician of Thasos.

STHENĔLE,

Sthenĕle, a daughter of Acaſtus.——a daughter of Danaus.

Sthenĕlus, a king of Mycenæ, ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda. He married Nicippe the daughter of Pelops, by whom he had two daughters, and a ſon called Euryſtheus, who was born, by Juno's influence, two months before the natural time, that he might obtain a ſuperiority over Hercules, as being older. Sthenelus made war againſt Amphitryon, who had killed Electryon and ſeized his kingdom. He fought with ſucceſs, and took his enemy priſoner, whom he tranſmitted to Euryſtheus. Homer. Il. 19, v. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.——One of the ſons of Ægyptus.——A ſon of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni, and of the ſuitors of Helen. He went to the Trojan war, and was one of thoſe who were ſhut up in the wooden horſe, according to Virgil. Pauſ. 2, c. 18.—Virg. Æn. 2 & 10.——A ſon of Androgeus the ſon of Minos. Hercules made him king of Thrace.——A king of Argos, who ſucceeded his father Crotopus. Pauſ. 2, c. 16.——A ſon of Actor, who accompanied Hercules in his expedition againſt the Amazons. He was killed by one of theſe females.

Sthenis, a ſtatuary of Olynthus.——An orator of Himera, in Sicily, during the civil wars of Pompey. Plut in Pomp.

Stheno, one of the three Gorgons.

Sthenoboea, a daughter of Jobates, king of Lycia, who married Prœtus, king of Argos. She became enamoured of Bellerophon, who had taken refuge at her huſband's court, after the murder of his brother, and when he refuſed to gratify her criminal paſſion, ſhe accuſed him before Prœtus of attempts upon her virtue. Homer. Il. 6, v. 162.—Hygin. fab. 57.——Many mythologiſts call her Antæa.

Stilbe or Stilbia, a daughter of Peneus by Creuſa, who became mother of Centaurus and Lapithus, by Apollo. Diod. 4.

Stilĭcho, a general of the emperor Theodoſius the Great. He behaved with much courage, but under the emperor Honorius he ſhowed himſelf turbulent and diſaffected. As being of barbarian extraction, he wiſhed to ſee the Roman provinces laid deſolate by his countrymen, but in this he was diſappointed. Honorius diſcovered his intrigues, and ordered him to be beheaded, about the year of Chriſt 408. His family were involved in his ruin.

Stilpo, a celebrated philoſopher of Megara, who flouriſhed 336 years before Chriſt, and was greatly eſteemed by Ptolemy Soter. He was naturally addicted to riot and debauchery, but he reformed his manners when he opened a ſchool at Megara. He was univerſally reſpected, his ſchool was frequented, and Demetrius, when he plundered Megara, ordered the houſe of the philoſopher to be left ſafe and unmoleſted. It is ſaid that he intoxicated himſelf when ready to die, to alleviate the terrors of death. He was one of the chiefs of the Stoics. Plut. in Dem.—Diog. 2.—Seneca de Conſt.

Stimĭcon, a ſhepherd's name in Virgil's eclogues.

Stiphĭlus, one of the Lapithæ, killed in the houſe of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12.

Stobæus, a Greek writer who flouriſhed A. D. 405. His work is valuable for the precious relics of antient literature he has preſerved. The beſt edition is that of Aurel. Allob. fol. 1609.

Stœchădes, an iſland in the Mediterranean, on the coaſt of Gaul.

Stoĭci, a celebrated ſect of philoſophers founded by Zeno of Citium. They received their name from the portico, στοα, where the philoſopher delivered his lectures. They preferred virtue to every thing elſe, and whatever was oppoſite to it, they looked upon as the greateſt of evils. They required as well as the diſciples of Epicurus, an abſolute command over the paſſions, and they ſupported that man alone, in the preſent ſtate of his exiſtence, could attain perfection and felicity. They encouraged ſuicide, and believed that the doctrine of future puniſhments and rewards was unneceſſary to excite or intimidate their followers. Vid. Zeno.

Strabo, a name among the Romans, given to ſuch as were naturally deformed. Pompey's father was diſtinguiſhed by that name.——A native of Amaſia, on the borders of Cappadocia, who flouriſhed in the age of Auguſtus and Tiberius. He firſt ſtudied under Xenarchus, the peripatetic, and afterwards warmly embraced the tenets of the Stoics. Of all his compoſitions nothing remains but his geography, divided into 17 books, a work juſtly celebrated for its elegance, purity, the erudition and univerſal knowledge of the author. It contains an account in Greek, of the moſt celebrated places of the world, the origin, the manners, religion, prejudices, and government of nations; the foundation of cities, and the accurate hiſtory of each ſeparate province. Strabo travelled over great part of the world in queſt of information, and to examine with the moſt critical enquiry, not only the ſituation of the places, but alſo the manners of the inhabitants, whoſe hiſtory he meant to write. In the two firſt books the author wiſhes to ſhew the neceſſity of geography; in the 3d he gives a deſcription of Spain; in the 4th of Gaul and the Britiſh iſles. The 5th and 6th contain an account of Italy and the neighbouring iſlands; the 7th, which is mutilated at the end, gives a full deſcription of Germany, and the country of the Getæ, Illyricum, Taurica Cherſoneſus, and Epirus. The affairs of Greece and the adjacent iſlands are ſeparately treated in the 8th, 9th, and 10th; and in the four next, Aſia with mount Taurus; and in the 15th and 16th, Aſia without Taurus, India, Perſia, Syria, and Arabia; the laſt book gives an account of Egypt, Æthiopia, Carthage, and other places of Africa. Among the books of Strabo which have been loſt, were hiſtorical commentaries. This celebrated geographer died A. D. 25. The beſt editions of his geography are thoſe of Caſaubon, fol. Paris, 1620; of Amſt. 2 vols. fol. 1707.——A Sicilian ſo clear ſighted that he could diſtinguiſh objects at the diſtance of 130 miles, with the ſame eaſe as if they had been near.

STRATARCHAS, the grandfather of the geographer Strabo. His father's name was Dorylaus.

STRATO, or STRATON, a king of the iſland Aradus, received into alliance by Alexander.——A king of Sidon, dependent upon Darius. Alexander depoſed him, becauſe he refuſed to ſurrender. Curt.——A philoſopher of Lampſacus, diſciple and ſucceſſor in the ſchool of Theophraſtus, about 289 years before the Chriſtian era. He applied himſelf with uncommon induſtry to the ſtudy of nature, and after the moſt mature inveſtigations, he ſupported that nature was inanimate, and that there was no god but nature. He was appointed preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who not only revered his abilities and learning, but alſo rewarded his labors with unbounded liberality. He wrote different treatiſes, all now loſt. Diog. 5.——A phyſician.——A peripatetic philoſopher.——A native of Epirus, very intimate with Brutus, the murderer of Cæſar. He killed his friend at his own requeſt.——A rich Orchomenian who deſtroyed himſelf becauſe he could not obtain in marriage a young woman of Haliartus. Plut.——A Greek hiſtorian, who wrote the life of ſome of the Macedonian kings.——An athlete of Achaia, twice crowned at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 7, c. 23.

Antiochus, her huſband's ſon by a former wife, became enamoured of her, and married her by his father's conſent, when the phyſicians had told him, that if he did not comply, his ſon's health would be impaired. Plut. in Dem.—Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—A concubine of Mithridates, king of Pontus. Plut. in Pomp.——The wife of Antigonus, mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes.——A town of Caria.——Another in Meſopotamia.——And a third near mount Taurus.

STRATONICUS, an opulent perſon in the reign of Philip, and of his ſon Alexander. Plut.——A muſician of Athens in the age of Demoſthenes.

STRONGYLE, one of the iſlands called Æolides in the Tyrrhene ſea, near the coaſt of Sicily. It had a volcano. Mela. 2, c. 7. Strab. 6.

STROPHADES, two iſlands in the Ionian ſea, on the weſtern coaſts of the Peloponneſus. They were antiently called Plotæ, and received the name of Strophades from στρεφω, verto, becauſe Zethes and Calais, the ſons of Boreas returned from thence by order of Jupiter, after they had driven the Harpyies there from the tables of Phineus. The fleet of Æneas ſtopped near the Strophades. The largeſt of theſe two iſlands is not above five miles in circumference. Hygin. fab. 19.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 709.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 210.—Strab. 8.

STROPHIUS, a ſon of Criſus, king of Phocis. He married a ſiſter of Agamemnon, called Anaxibia, or Aſtyochia, or, according to others, Cyndragora, by whom he had Pylades, celebrated for his friendſhip with Oreſtes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemneſtra and Ægyſthus, the king of Phocis, educated at his own houſe with the greateſt care, his nephew, whom Electra had ſecretly removed from the dagger of his mother, and her adulterer. Oreſtes was enabled by means of Strophius to revenge the death of his father. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Hygin. fab. 1, 17.——A ſon of Pylades by Electra the ſiſter of Oreſtes.

STRUTHOPHAGI, a people of Æthiopia, who feed on ſparrows as their name ſignifies.

STRUTHUS, a general of Artaxerxes againſt the Lacedæmonians, B. C. 393.

STRYMA, a town of Thrace, founded by a Thaſian colony.

STRYMNO, a daughter of the Scamander, who married Laomedon.

STRYMON, a river which ſeparates Thrace from Macedonia, and falls into a part of the Ægean ſea, which has been called Strymonicus ſinus. A number of cranes, as the poets ſay, reſorted on its banks in the ſummer time. Its eels were excellent. Mela 2, c. 2.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 120, l. 4, v. 508. Æn. 10, v. 265.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 251.

STYMPHALIA,

STYMPHALIA, or STYMPHĀLIS, a part of Macedonia. Liv. 45, c. 30.——A ſirname of Diana.

STYMPHĀLUS, a king of Arcadia, ſon of Elatus and Laodice. He made war againſt Pelops, and was killed in a truce. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Pauſ. 8, c. 4.——A town, river, lake, and fountain of Arcadia, which receives its name from king Stymphalus. The neighbourhood of the lake Stymphalus was infeſted by a number of voracious birds, which fed upon human fleſh, and which were called Stymphalides. They were at laſt deſtroyed by Hercules, with the aſſiſtance of Minerva. Some have confounded them with the Harpyies, while others pretend that they never exiſted but in the imagination of the poets. Pauſanias however, ſupports, that there were carnivorous birds like the Stymphalides in Arabia. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 2984.——A lofty mountain of Peloponneſus in Arcadia.

STYGNE, a daughter of Danaus.

STYRA, a town of Eubœa.

STŸRUS, a king of Aſbania, to whom Æetes promiſed his daughter Medea in marriage, to obtain his aſſiſtance againſt the Argonauts. Flacc. 3, v. 497.

STYX, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married Pallas, by whom ſhe had three daughters, Victory, Strength, and Valor. Heſiod. Theog. 363 & 384.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.——A celebrated river of hell, round which it flows nine times. According to ſome writers the Styx was a ſmall river of Nonacris in Arcadia, whoſe waters were ſo cold and venomous, that they proved fatal to ſuch as drank them. They even conſumed iron, and broke all veſſels. The wonderful properties of this water ſuggeſted the idea, that it was a river of hell, eſpecially, when it diſappeared in the earth a little below its fountain head. The gods held the waters of the Styx in ſuch veneration, that they always ſwore by them; an oath which was inviolable. If any of the gods had perjured themſelves, Jupiter obliged them to drink the waters of the Styx, which lulled them for one whole year in a ſenſeleſs ſtupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambroſia and the nectar of the gods, and after the expiration of the years of their puniſhment, they were reſtored to the aſſembly of the deities, and all their original privileges. It is ſaid that this veneration was ſhewn to the Styx, becauſe it received its name from the nymph Styx, who with her three daughters aſſiſted Jupiter in his war againſt the Titans. Heſiod. Theog. v. 384, 775.—Homer. Od. 10, v. 513.—Herodot. 6, c. 74.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 323, 439, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 29, &c.—Lucan. 6, v. 378, &c.—Pauſ. 8, c. 17 & 18.

SUARDONES, a people of Germany.

SUBATRII, a people of Germany, over whom Druſus triumphed.

SUBLICIUS, the firſt bridge erected at Rome over the Tiber. Vid. Pons.

SUBOTA, ſmall iſlands near Chios.

SUBURRA, a ſtreet in Rome where all the licentious, diſſolute, and laſcivious Romans and courtezans reſorted. It was ſituate between mount Viminalis and Quirinalis. Varro. de L. L. 4, c. 8.—Martial. 6, ep. 66.—Juv. 3, v. 5.

SUCRO, a river of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, celebrated for a battle fought there between Sertorius and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. Plut.——A Rutulian killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 505.

SUESSA, a town of Campania, called alſo Aurunca, to diſtinguiſh it from Sueſſa Pometia, the capital of the Volſci. Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4.—Liv. 1 & 2.

SUESSŌNES, a powerful nation of Belgic Gaul, reduced by J. Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. G.

SUETONIUS, C. Paulinus, the firſt Roman general who croſſed mount Atlas with an army. He wrote an account of his expedition. He preſided over Britain as governor for about 20 years, and was afterwards made conſul. He forſook the intereſt of Otho, and attached himſelf to Vitellius.——C. Tranquillus, a Latin hiſtorian, ſon of a Roman knight of the ſame name. He was favored by Adrian, and became his ſecretary, but he was afterwards baniſhed from the court for want of attention and reſpect to the empreſs Sabina. In his retirement Suetonius enjoyed the friendſhip and correſpondence of Pliny the younger, and dedicated his time to ſtudy. He wrote an hiſtory of the Roman kings, divided into three books; a catalogue of all the illuſtrious men of Rome, a book on the games and ſpectacles of the Greeks, &c. which are all now loſt. The only one of his compoſitions extant is the lives of the twelve firſt Cæſars, and ſome fragments of his catalogue of celebrated grammarians. Suetonius, in his lives, is praiſed for his impartiality and correctneſs. His expreſſions, however, are often too indelicate, and it has been juſtly obſerved, that while he expoſed the deformities of the Cæſars, he wrote with all the licentiouſneſs and extravagance with which they lived. The beſt editions of Suetonius are that of Pitiſcus, 4to. 2 vols. Leovard. 1714; that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1751; and that of Erneſti, 8vo. Lipſ. 1775. Plin. 1, ep. 18, l. 5, ep. 11, &c.

SUEVI, a people of Germany who made frequent excurſions upon the territories of Rome under the emperors. Lucan 2, v. 51.

Suilius, an informer in the court of Claudius, baniſhed under Nero, by means of Seneca.

Suiones, a nation of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. c. 44.

Sulchi, a town of Sardinia.

Sulcius, an informer whom Horace deſcribes as hoarſe with the number of defamations he daily gave. Horat. 1 Sat. 4, v. 65.

Sulmo, or Sulmona, an antient town of the Peligni, at the diſtance of about 90 miles from Rome, founded by one of the followers of Æneas. Ovid was born there. Ovid. paſſim.—Ital. 8, v. 511.——A Latian chief killed in the night by Niſus, as he was going with his companions to deſtroy Euryalus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 412.

Sulpitia, a daughter of Paterculus, who married Fulvius Flaccus. She was ſo famous for her chaſtity, that ſhe conſecrated a temple to Venus Verticordia, a goddeſs who was implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue.——A poeteſs in the age of Domitian, againſt whom ſhe wrote a poem, becauſe he had baniſhed the philoſophers from Rome. This compoſition is ſtill extant. She had alſo written a poem on conjugal affection, commended by Martial, now loſt.

Sulpitia Lex, militaris, by C. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665, inveſted Marius with the full power of the war againſt Mithridates, of which Sylla was to be deprived.——Another, de ſenatu, by Servius Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It required that no ſenator ſhould owe more than 2000 drachmæ.——Another, de civitate, by P. Sulpicius the tribune, A. U. C. 665. It ordered that the new citizens who compoſed the eight tribes lately created, ſhould be divided among the 35 old tribes, as a greater honor.——Another called alſo Sempronia de religione, by P. Sulpicius Saverrio and P. Sempronius Sophus, conſuls, A. U. C. 449. It forbad any perſon to conſecrate a temple or altar without the permiſſion of the ſenate and the majority of the tribunes.——Another to empower the Romans to make war againſt Philip of Macedonia.

Sulpitius, or Sulpicius, an illuſtrious family at Rome, of whom the moſt celebrated are—Peticus, a man choſen dictator againſt the Gauls. His troops mutinied when firſt he took the field, but ſoon after he engaged the enemy and totally defeated them.——Saverrio, a conſul who gained a victory over the Æqui.——C. Paterculus, a conſul ſent againſt the Carthaginians. He conquered Sardinia and Corſica, and obtained a complete victory over the enemy's fleet. He was honored with a triumph at his return to Rome.——Spurius, one of the three commiſſioners whom the Romans ſent to collect the beſt laws which could be found in the different cities and republics of Greece.——One of the firſt conſuls who received intelligence that a conſpiracy was formed in Rome to reſtore the Tarquins to power, &c.——A prieſt who died of the plague in the firſt ages of the republic at Rome.——P. Galba, a Roman conſul who ſignalized himſelf greatly during the war which his countrymen waged againſt the Achæans and the Macedonians.——Severus, a writer. Vid. Severus.——Publius, one of the aſſociates of Marius, well known for his intrigues and cruelty. He made ſome laws in favor of the allies of Rome, and he kept about 3000 young men in continual pay, whom he called his anteſenatorial band, and with theſe he had often the impertinence to attack the conſuls in the popular aſſemblies. He became at laſt ſo ſeditious, that he was proſcribed by Sylla's adherents, and immediately murdered. His head was fixed on a pole in the roſtrum, where he had often made many ſeditious ſpeeches in the capacity of tribune.——A Roman conſul who fought againſt Pyrrhus and defeated him.——C. Longus, a Roman conſul, who defeated the Samnites, and killed 30,000 of their men. He obtained a triumph for this celebrated victory. He was afterwards made dictator to conduct a war againſt the Etrurians.——Rufus, a lieutenant of Cæſar in Gaul.——One of Meſſalina's favorites, put to death by Claudius.——P. Quirinus, a conſul in the age of Auguſtus.——Camerinus, a pro-conſul of Africa, under Nero, accuſed of cruelty, &c.——Gallus, a celebrated aſtrologer in the age of Paulus. He accompanied the conſul in his expedition againſt Perſeus, and told the Roman army that the night before the day on which they were to give the enemy battle, there would be an eclipſe of the moon. This explanation encouraged the ſoldiers, which on the contrary would have intimidated them, if not previouſly acquainted with the cauſes of it. Sulpitius was univerſally regarded, and he was honored a few years after with the conſulſhip.——Apollinaris, a grammarian in the age of the emperor M. Aurelius. He left ſome letters and a few grammatical obſervations now loſt. Cic.—Liv.—Plut.—Polyb.—Flor.—Eutrop.

Summanus, a ſirname of Pluto, as prince of the dead, ſummus manium. He had a temple temple at Rome, and the Romans believed that the thunder-bolts of Jupiter were in his power during the night. Cic. de div. 1, c. 10.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 731.

Sunici, a people of Germany on the ſhores of the Rhine.

Sunides, a ſoothſayer in the army of Eumenes.

Sunium, a promontory of Attica, about 45 miles diſtant from the Piræus. There was there a ſmall harbour, as alſo a town. Minerva had there a beautiful temple, whence ſhe was called Sunias. There are ſtill extant ſome ruins of this temple. Plin. 4. c. 7.—Strab. 9.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1.—Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3, l. 13, ep. 10.

Suovetaurilia, a ſacrifice among the Romans, which conſiſted of the immolation of a ſow (ſus,) a ſheep (ovis), and a bull (taurus,) whence the name. It was generally obſerved every fifth year.

Superum mare, a name of the Adriatic ſea, becauſe it was ſituate above Italy. Cic. pro. Cluent. &c.

Sura, Æmylius, a Latin writer, &c.——L. Licinius, a favorite of Trajan, honored with the conſulſhip.——A writer in the age of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote an hiſtory of the reign of the emperor.——A city on the Euphrates.——Another in Iberia.

Surena, a powerful officer in the armies of Orodes king of Parthia. His family had the privilege of crowning the kings of Perſia. He was appointed to conduct the war againſt the Romans, and to protect the kingdom of Parthia againſt Craſſus, who wiſhed to conquer it. He defeated the Roman triumvir, and after he had drawn him perfidiouſly to a conference, he ordered his head to be cut off. He afterwards returned to Parthia, mimicking the triumphs of the Romans. Orodes ordered him to be put to death, B. C. 52. Surena has been admired for his valor, his ſagacity as a general, and his prudence and firmneſs in the execution of his plans; but his perfidy, his effeminate manners, and his laſciviouſneſs, have been deſervedly cenſured. Polyæn. 7.—Plut. in Craſſ.

Surus, one of the Ædui, who made war againſt Cæſar.

Susa (ōrum,) a celebrated city of Aſia, the chief town of Suſiana, and the capital of the Perſian empire, built by Tithonus the father of Memnon. Cyrus took it. The walls of Suſa were above 120 ſtadia in circumference. The treaſures of the kings of Perſia were generally kept there, and the royal palace was built with white marble, and its pillars were covered with gold and precious ſtones. It was uſual with the kings of Perſia to ſpend the ſummer at Ecbatana, and the winter at Suſa, becauſe the climate was more warm there than at any other royal reſidence. It has been called Memnonia, or the palace of Memnon, becauſe that prince reigned there. Plin. 6, c. 26, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 49.—Strab. 15.—Xenoph. Cyr.—Propert. 2, el. 13.—Claudian.

Susăna, a town of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis. Sil. 3, v. 384.

Susiāna, or Susis, a country of Aſia, of which the capital was called Suſa. It was ſituate at the eaſt of Aſſyria. Lilies grow in great abundance in Suſiana, and it is from that plant that the province received its name, according to ſome, as Suſan is the name of a lily in Hebrew.

Susarion, a Greek poet of Megara, who is ſuppoſed with Dolon to be the inventor of comedy, and to have firſt introduced it at Athens on a moveable ſtage, B. C. 562.

Susidæ pylæ, narrow paſſes over mountains, from Suſiana into Perſia.

Sutrium, a town of Etruria.

Syăgrus, a poet, the firſt who wrote on the Trojan war. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 22.

Syăris, a river of Lucania in Italy, whoſe waters were ſaid to render men more ſtrong and robuſt. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 11, l. 31, c. 2.——There was a town of the ſame name, on its banks on the bay of Tarentum, which had been founded by a colony of Achæans. Sybaris became very powerful, and in its moſt floriſhing ſituation it had the command of 25 towns, and could ſend an army of three hundred thouſand men into the field. In a more recent age, the inhabitants became ſo effeminate, that the word Sybarite became proverbial to intimate a man devoted to pleaſure. It made a long and vigorous reſiſtance againſt the neighbouring town of Crotona, till it was at laſt totally reduced by the diſciples of Pythagoras B. C. 508. Sybaris was deſtroyed no leſs than five times, and always repaired. There was a ſmall town built in the neighbourhood about 444 years before the Chriſtian era, and called Thurium, from a ſmall fountain called Thuria, where it was built. Diod. 12.—Strab. 6.—*Ælian. Sycinnus, a ſlave of Themiſtocles, ſent by his maſter to engage Xerxes to fight againſt the fleet of the Peloponneſians.

Syedra, a town of Cilicia.

Syene, a town of Thebais, on the extremities of Egypt. Juvenal the poet was baniſhed there on pretence of commanding a prætorian cohort ſtationed in the neighbourhood. It was famous for its quarries of marble. Strab. 1, & 2.—Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 8.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 5, v. 79. Met. 5, v. 74.

Syenesius, a Cilician who with Labinetus of Babylon, concluded a peace between Alyattes, king of Lydia, and Cyaxares, king of Media, while both armies were terrified by a ſudden eclipſe of the ſun, B. C. 585. Herodot. 1, c. 74.

Syennesis, a ſatrap of Cilicia, when Cyrus made war againſt his brother Artaxerxes. He wiſhed to favor both the brothers by ſending one of his ſons in the army of Cyrus, and another to Artaxerxes.

Sylea, a daughter of Corinthus.

Syleus, a king of Aulis.

Sylla, (L. Cornelius) a celebrated Roman of a noble family. The poverty of his early years was relieved by the liberality of the courteſan Nicopolis, who left him heir to a large fortune; and with the addition of the immenſe wealth of his mother in law, he ſoon appeared one of the moſt opulent of the Romans. He firſt entered the army under the great Marius, whom he accompanied in Numidia, in the capacity of queſtor. He rendered himſelf conſpicuous in military affairs; and Bocchus, one of the princes of Numidia, delivered Jugurtha into his hands for the Roman conſul. The riſing fame of Sylla gave umbrage to Marius, who was always jealous of an equal, as well as of a ſuperior; but the ill language which he might uſe, rather inflamed than extinguiſhed the ambition of Sylla. He left the conqueror of Jugurtha, and carried arms under Catulus. Some time after, he obtained the pretorſhip, and was appointed by the Roman ſenate to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, againſt the views and intereſt of Mithridates, king of Pontus. This he eaſily effected, one battle left him victorious; and before he quitted the plains of Aſia, the Roman pretor had the ſatisfaction to receive in his camp the ambaſſadors of the king of Parthia, who wiſhed to make a treaty of alliance with the Romans. Sylla received them with haughtineſs, and behaved with ſuch arrogance, that one of them exclaimed, Surely this man is maſter of the world, or doomed to be ſuch! At his return to Rome, he was commiſſioned to finiſh the war with the Marſi, and when this was ſucceſsfully ended, he was rewarded with the conſulſhip, in the 50th year of his age. In this capacity he wiſhed to have the adminiſtration of the Mithridatic war; but he found an obſtinate adverſary in Marſus, and he attained the ſummit of his wiſhes only when he had entered Rome ſword in hand. After he had ſlaughtered all his enemies, ſet a price upon the head of Marius, and put to death the tribune Sulpitius, who had continually oppoſed his views, he marched towards Aſia, and diſregarded the flames of diſcord which he left behind him unextinguiſhed. Mithridates was already maſter of the greateſt part of Greece; and Sylla, when he reached the coaſt of Peloponneſus, was delayed by the ſiege of Athens, and of the Piræus. His operations were carried on with vigor, and when he found his money fail, he made no ſcruple to take the riches of the temples of the gods, to bribe his ſoldiers and render them devoted to his ſervice. His boldneſs ſucceeded, the Piræus ſurrendered; and the conqueror, as if ſtruck with reverence at the beautiful porticoes where the philoſophic followers of Socrates and Plato had often diſputed, ſpared the city of Athens, which he had devoted to deſtruction, and forgave the living for the ſake of the dead. Two celebrated battles at Cheronæa and Orchomenos, rendered him maſter of Greece. He croſſed the Helleſpont, and attacked Mithridates in the very heart of his kingdom. The artful monarch, who well knew the valor and perſeverance of his adverſary, made propoſals of peace; and Sylla, whoſe intereſt at home was then decreaſing, did not heſitate to put an end to a war which had rendered him maſter of ſo much territory, and which enabled him to return to Rome like a conqueror, and to diſpute with his rival the ſovereignty of the republic with a victorious army. Muræna was left at the head of the Roman forces in Aſia, and Sylla haſtened to Italy. In the plains of Campania he was met by a few of his adherents, whom the ſucceſs of his rivals had baniſhed from the capital, and he was ſoon informed, that if he wiſhed to contend with Marius, he muſt encounter fifteen generals, followed by 25 well diſciplined legions. In theſe critical circumſtances he had recourſe to artifice, and while he propoſed terms of accommodation to his adverſaries, he ſecretly ſtrengthened himſelf, and ſaw with pleaſure his armies daily encreaſe, by the revolt of ſoldiers whom his bribes or promiſes had corrupted. Pompey, who afterwards merited the ſirname of great, embraced his cauſe, and marched to his camp with three legions. Soon after he appeared in the field with advantage; the confidence of Marius decayed with his power, and Sylla entered Rome like a tyrant and and a conqueror. The ſtreets were daily filled with dead bodies, and 7000 citizens, to whom the conqueror had promiſed pardon, were ſuddenly maſſacred in the circus. The ſenate, at that time aſſembled in the temple of Bellona, heard the ſhrieks of their dying countrymen; and when they enquired into the cauſe of it, Sylla coolly replied, They are only a few rebels whom I have ordered to be chaſtiſed. If this had been the laſt and moſt diſmal ſcene, Rome might have been called happy; but it was only the beginning of her misfortunes, each ſucceeding day exhibited a greater number of ſlaughtered bodies, and when one of the ſenators had the boldneſs to aſk the tyrant when he meant to ſtop his cruelties, Sylla, with an air of unconcern, anſwered, that he had not yet determined, but that he would take it into his conſideration. The ſlaughter was continued, a liſt of ſuch as were proſcribed was daily ſtuck in the public ſtreets. The ſlave was rewarded to bring his maſter's head, and the ſon was not aſhamed to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father for money. No leſs than 4700 of the moſt powerful and opulent were ſlain, and Sylla wiſhed the Romans to forget his cruelties in aſpiring to the title of perpetual dictator. In this capacity he made new laws, abrogated ſuch as were inimical to his views, and changed every regulation where his ambition was obſtructed. After he had finiſhed whatever the moſt abſolute ſovereign may do, from his own will and authority, Sylla abdicated the dictatorial power, and retired to a ſolitary retreat at Puteoli, where he ſpent the reſt of his days, if not in literary eaſe and tranquillity, yet far from the noiſe of arms, in the midſt of riot and debauchery. The companions of his retirement were the moſt baſe and licentious of the populace, and Sylla took pleaſure ſtill to wallow in voluptuouſneſs, tho' on the verge of life, and covered with infirmities. His intemperance haſtened his end, his blood was corrupted, and an impoſthume was bred in his bowels. He at laſt died in the greateſt torments of the louſy diſeaſe, about 78 years before Chriſt, in the 60th year of his age; and it has been obſerved, that like Marius, on his death-bed, he wiſhed to drown the ſtings of conſcience and remorſe by being in a continual ſtate of intoxication. His funeral was very magnificent; his body was attended by the ſenate and the veſtal virgins, and hymns were ſung to celebrate his exploits and to honor his memory. A monument was erected in the field of Mars, on which appeared an inſcription written by himſelf, in which he ſaid, the good ſervices he had received from his friends, and the injuries of his enemies, had been returned with uncommon uſury. The character of Sylla is that of an ambitious, diſſimulating, credulous, tyrannical, debauched, and reſolute commander. He was revengeful in the higheſt degree, and the ſirname of Felix, or the fortunate, which he aſſumed, ſhowed that he was more indebted to fortune than to valor for the great fame he had acquired. But in the midſt of all this, who cannot admire the moderation and philoſophy of a man, who when abſolute maſter of a republic, which he has procured by his cruelty and avarice, ſilently abdicates the ſovereign power, challenges a critical examination of his adminiſtration, and retires to live ſecurely in the midſt of thouſands whom he has injured and offended? The Romans were pleaſed and aſtoniſhed at his abdication; and when the inſolence of a young man had been vented againſt the dictator, he calmly anſwered, This uſage may perhaps deter another to reſign his power to follow my example, if ever he becomes abſolute. Sylla has been commended for the patronage he gave to the arts and ſciences. He brought from Aſia the extenſive library of Apellicon, the Peripatetic philoſopher, in which were the works of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, and he himſelf compoſed 22 books of memoirs concerning himſelf. *Cic. in Verr. &c.—C. Syrbæum, a town of the Brutii in Italy. Liv. 30, c. 19.

Syraces, one of the Sacæ, who mutilated himself, and by pretending to be a deserter, brought Darius, who made war against his country, into many difficulties.

Syracosia, festivals at Syracuse, celebrated during ten days, in which women were busily employed in offering sacrifices.——Another yearly observed near the lake of Syracuse, where, as they supposed, Pluto had disappeared with Proserpine.

Syracūse, a celebrated city of Sicily, founded about 732 years before the christian era, by Archias, a Corinthian, and one of the Heraclidæ. It was divided into four different districts, which were of themselves separate cities, and it was fortified with three citadels, and three-folded walls. It had two capacious harbours separated from one another by the island of Ortygia. The greatest harbour was above 5000 paces in circumference, and its entrance 500 paces wide. The people of Syracuse were very opulent and powerful, and though subject to tyrants, they were masters of vast possessions and dependent states. The city of Syracuse was well built, its houses were stately and magnificent; and it has been said, that it produced the best and most excellent of men when they were virtuous, but the most wicked and depraved when addicted to vicious pursuits. The women of Syracuse were not permitted to adorn themselves with gold, or wear costly garments, except such as prostituted themselves. Syracuse gave birth to Theocritus and Archimedes. It was under different governments; and after being freed from the tyranny of Thrasybulus, B. C. 446, it enjoyed security for 63 years, till the usurpation of the Dionysii, who were expelled by Timoleon, B. C. 343. In the age of the elder Dionysius, an army of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and 400 ships, were kept in constant pay. It fell into the hands of the Romans, under the consul Marcellus, after a siege of 3 years, B. C. 212. Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 52 & 53.—Strab. 1 & 8.—*C. Syria, a large country of Asia, whose boundaries are not accurately ascertained by the antients. Syria, generally speaking, was bounded on the east by the Euphrates, north by mount Taurus, west by the Mediterranean, and south by Arabia. It was divided into several districts and provinces, among which were Phœnicia, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Babylon, and Assyria. It was also called Assyria; and the words Syria and Assyria, though distinguished and defined by some authors, were often used indifferently. Syria was subjected to the monarchs of Persia; but after the death of Alexander the great, gnat, Seleucus, firnamed Nicator, who had received this province as his lot in the diviſion of the Macedonian dominions, raiſed it into an empire, known in hiſtory by the name of the kingdom of Syria or Babylon, B. C. 312. Seleucus died after a reign of 32 years, and his ſucceſſors, firnamed the Seleucidæ, aſcended the throne in the following order: Antiochus, ſirnamed Soter, 280 B. C. Antiochus Theos, 261; Seleucus Callinicus, 246; Seleucus Ceraunus, 226; Antiochus the Great, 223; Seleucus Philopator, 187; Antiochus Epiphanes, 175; Antiochus Eupator, 164; Demetrius Soter, 162; Alexander Balas, 150; Demetrius Nicator, 146; Antiochus the Sixth, 144; Diodotus Tryphon, 143; Antiochus Sidetes, 139; Demetrius Nicator reſtored, 130; Alexander Zebina, 127, who was dethroned by Antiochus Grypus, 123; Antiochus Cyzicenus, 112, who takes part of Syria, which he calls Cœleſyria; Philip and Demetrius Eucerus, 93, and in Cœleſyria, Antiochus Pius; Aretas was king of Cœleſyria, 85; Tigranes, king of Armenia, 83; and Antiochus Aſiaticus, 69, who was dethroned by Pompey, B. C. 65; in conſequence of which, Syria became a Roman province. Herodot. 2, 3, & 7.—Apollon. 1, Arg.—Strab. 12 & 16.—C. Nep. in Dat.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.—Curt. 6.—*Dionyſ. Syriăcum mare, that part of the Mediterranean ſea which is on the coaſt of Phœnicia and Syria.

Syrinx, a nymph of Arcadia, daughter of the river Ladon. Pan became enamoured of her, and attempted to offer her violence; but Syrinx eſcaped, and at her own requeſt was changed by the gods into a reed called Syrinx by the Greeks. The god made himſelf a pipe with the reeds, into which his favorite nymph had been changed. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 691.

Syrophœnix, the name of an inhabitant of the maritime coaſt of Syria.

Syros, one of the Cyclades in the Ægean ſea, about 20 miles in circumference, very fruitful in wine and corn of all ſorts. The inhabitants lived to a great old age, becauſe the air was wholeſome. Homer. Od. 15, v. 504.—Strab. 10.—Mela. 2, c. 7.——A town of Caria. Pauſ. 3, c. 26.

Syrtes, two large ſand banks in the Mediterranean, on the coaſt of Africa, one of which was near Leptis, and the other near Carthage. As they often changed places, and were ſometimes very high or very low under the water, they were deemed moſt dangerous in navigation, and proved fatal to whatever ſhips touched upon them. Mela. 1, c. 7, l. 2, c. 7.—*Virg. Taburnus, a mountain of Campania, which abounded with olives. Virg. G. 2, v. 38.

Tacfarinas, a Numidian who commanded an army againſt the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had formerly ſerved in the Roman legions, but in the character of an enemy, he diſplayed the moſt inveterate hatred againſt his benefactor. After he had ſeverally defeated the officers of Tiberius, he was at laſt routed and killed in the field of battle, fighting with uncommon fury, by Dolabella. Tacit. Ann. 2, &c.

Tachampso, an iſland in the Nile, near Thebais. The Egyptians held one half of this iſland, and the reſt was in the hands of the Æthiopians. Herodot. 2.

Tachos or Tachus, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, againſt whom he ſuſtained a long war. He was aſſiſted aſſiſted by the Greeks, but his confidence in Ageſilaus, king of Lacedæmon, proved fatal to him. Chabrias, the Athenian, had been entruſted with the fleet of the Egyptian monarch, and Ageſilaus was left with the command of the mercenary army. The Lacedæmonian diſregarded his engagements, and by joining with Nectanebus who had revolted from Tachus, he ruined the affairs of the monarch, and obliged him to ſave his life by flight. Some obſerve that Ageſilaus acted with that duplicity to avenge himſelf upon Tachus, who had inſolently ridiculed his ſhort and deformed ſtature. The expectations of Tachus had been raiſed by the fame of Ageſilaus; but when he ſaw the lame monarch, he repeated on the occaſion the fable of the mountain which brought forth a mouſe, upon which Ageſilaus replied with aſperity, that though he called him a mouſe, yet he ſoon ſhould find him to be a lion. C. Nep. in Ageſ.

TACITA, a goddeſs who preſided over ſilence. Numa, as ſome ſay, paid particular veneration to this divinity.

TACITUS, (C. Cornelius) a celebrated Latin hiſtorian, born in the reign of Nero. His father was a Roman knight, who had been appointed governor of Belgic Gaul. The native genius, and the riſing talents of young Tacitus were beheld with rapture by the emperor Veſpaſian, and as he wiſhed to protect and patronize merit, he raiſed the young hiſtorian to places of truſt and honor. The ſucceeding emperors were not leſs partial to Tacitus, and Domitian ſeemed to forget his cruelties, when virtue and innocence claimed his patronage. Tacitus was honored with the conſulſhip, and he gave proofs of his eloquence at the bar, by ſupporting the cauſe of the injured Africans againſt the proconſul Marius Priſcus, and in cauſing him to be condemned for his avarice and extortion. The friendly intercourſe of Pliny and Tacitus has often been admired, and many have obſerved, that the familiarity of theſe two great men, aroſe from ſimilar principles, and a perfect conformity of manners and opinions. Yet Tacitus was as much the friend of a republican government, as Pliny was an admirer of the imperial power, and of the ſhort lived virtues of his patron Trajan. Pliny gained the heart of his adherents by affability, and all the elegant graces which became the courtier and the favorite, while Tacitus conciliated the eſteem of the world by his virtuous conduct, which prudence, and love of honor ever guided. The friendſhip of Tacitus and of Pliny almoſt became proverbial, and one was ſcarce mentioned without the other, as the following inſtance may indicate. At the exhibition of the ſpectacles in the circus, Tacitus held a long converſation on different ſubjects with a Roman knight, with whom he was unacquainted; and when the knight aſked him whether he was a native of Italy, the hiſtorian told him that he was not unknown to him, and that for their diſtant acquaintance, he was indebted to literature. Then you are, replied the knight, either Tacitus or Pliny. The time of Tacitus was not employed in trivial purſuits, the orator might have been now forgotten if the hiſtorian had not floriſhed. Tacitus wrote a treatiſe on the manners of the Germans, a compoſition admired for the fidelity and exactneſs with which it is executed, though ſome have declared that the hiſtorian delineated manners and cuſtoms with which he was not acquainted, and which never exiſted. His life of Cn. Julius Agricola, whoſe daughter he had married, is celebrated for its purity, elegance, and the many excellent inſtructions and important truths which it relates. His hiſtory of the Roman emperors is imperfect; of the 28 years of which it treated, that is from the 69th to the 96th year of the Chriſtian era, nothing remains but the year 69th, and part of the 70th. His annals were the moſt extenſive and complete of his works. The hiſtory of the reign of Tiberius, Caius, Claudius and Nero was treated with accuracy and attention, yet we are to lament the loſs of the hiſtory of the reign of Caius, and the beginning of that of Claudius. Tacitus had reſerved for his old age, the hiſtory of the reign of Nerva and Trajan, and he alſo propoſed to give to the world an account of the intereſting adminiſtration of Auguſtus; but theſe important ſubjects never employed the pen of the hiſtorian, and as ſome of the antients obſerve, the only compoſitions of Tacitus were contained in 30 books, of which we have now left only 16 of his annals, and five of his hiſtory. The ſtile of Tacitus has always been admired for peculiar beauties; the thoughts are great, there is ſublimity, force, weight and energy, every thing is treated with preciſion and dignity, yet many have called him obſcure, becauſe he was fond of expreſſing his ideas in few words. This was the fruit of experience and judgment, the hiſtory appears copious and diffuſe, while the annals, which were written in his old age, are leſs flowing, as to ſtile, more conciſe, and more heavily labored. His Latin is remarkable for being pure and claſſical; and though a writer in the decline of the Roman empire, he has not uſed obſolete words, antiquated phraſes, or barbarous expreſſions, but with him every thing is ſanctioned by the authority of the writers of the Auguſtan age. In his biographical ſketches, he diſplays an uncommon knowledge of human nature, he paints every every ſcene with a maſterly hand, and gives each object its proper ſize and becoming colors. Affairs of importance are treated with dignity, the ſecret cauſes of events and revolutions are inveſtigated from their primeval ſource, and the hiſtorian every where ſhows his reader that he was a friend of public liberty and national independence, a lover of truth, and of the general good and welfare of mankind, and an inveterate enemy of oppreſſion, and of a tyrannical government. The hiſtory of the reign of Tiberius is his maſter-piece, the deep policy, the diſſimulation and various intrigues of this celebrated prince, are painted with all the fidelity of the hiſtorian, and Tacitus boaſted in ſaying, that he neither would flatter the follies or maliciouſly or partially repreſent the extravagance of the ſeveral characters he delineated. Candor and impartiality were his ſtandard, and his claim to theſe eſſential qualifications of an hiſtorian have never been diſputed. It is ſaid, that the emperor Tacitus, who boaſted in being one of the deſcendants of the hiſtorian, ordered the works of his anceſtor to be placed in all public libraries, and directed that ten copies well aſcertained for accuracy and exactneſs, ſhould be yearly written, that ſo great and ſo valuable a work might not be loſt. Some eccleſiaſtical writers have exclaimed againſt Tacitus for the partial manner in which he ſpeaks of the Jews and Chriſtians; but it ſhould be remembered, that he ſpoke the language of the Romans, and that the peculiarities of the Chriſtians could not but draw upon them the odium and the ridicule of the Pagans, and the imputation of ſuperſtition. Among the many excellent editions of Tacitus, theſe may paſs for the beſt; that of Rome, fol. 1515; that in 8vo. 2 vols. L. Bat. 1673; that in uſum Delphini 4 vols. 4to. Paris, 1682; that of Lipſ. 2 vols. 8vo. 1714; of Gronovius, 2 vols. 4to. 1721; that of Brotier, 7 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1776; and Barbou's, 3 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1760. —— M. Claudius, a Roman elected emperor by the ſenate, after the death of Aurelian. He would have refuſed this important and dangerous office, but the preſſing ſolicitations of the ſenate prevailed, and in the 70th year of his age, he complied with the wiſhes of his countrymen, and accepted the purple. The time of his adminiſtration was very popular, the good of the people was his care, and as a pattern of moderation, economy, temperance, regularity, and impartiality, Tacitus found no equal. He aboliſhed the ſeveral brothels which under the preceding reigns had filled Rome with licentiouſneſs and obſcenity; and by ordering all the public baths to be ſhut at ſun ſet, he prevented the commiſſion of many irregularities, which the darkneſs of the night had hitherto ſanctioned. The ſenators under Tacitus ſeemed to have recovered their antient dignity, and long loſt privileges. They were not only the counſellors of the emperor, but they even ſeemed to be his maſters; and when Florianus, the brother-in-law of Tacitus, was refuſed the conſulſhip, the emperor ſaid, that the ſenate, no doubt, could fix upon a more deſerving object. As a warrior, Tacitus is inferior to few of the Romans, and during a ſhort reign of about ſix months, he not only repelled the barbarians who had invaded the territories of Rome in Aſia, but he prepared to make war againſt the Perſians and Scythians. He died in Cilicia as he was on his expedition, of a violent diſtemper, or, according to ſome, he was deſtroyed by the ſecret dagger of an aſſaſſin, on the 13th of April, in the 276th year of the Chriſtian era. Tacitus has been commended for his love of learning, and it has been obſerved, that he never paſſed a day without conſecrating ſome part of his time to reading or writing. He has been accuſed of ſuperſtition, and authors have recorded, that he never ſtudied on the ſecond day of each month, a day which he deemed inauſpicious and unlucky. Tacit vita.—Zoſim.

TÆDIA, a proſtitute at Rome, &c. Juv. 2, v. 49.

TÆNĂRUS, a promontory of Laconia where Neptune had a temple. There was there a large and deep cavern whence iſſued a black and unwholeſome vapor, from which circumſtance the poets have imagined that it was one of the entrances of hell, through which Hercules dragged Cerberus from the infernal regions. This fabulous tradition ariſes, according to Pauſanias, from the continual reſort of a large ſerpent near the cavern of Tænarus, whoſe bite was mortal. This ſerpent, as the geographer obſerves, was at laſt killed by Hercules, and carried to Euryſtheus. The town of Tænarus was at the diſtance of about 40 ſtadia from the promontory. This town, as well as the promontory, received its name from Tænarus, a ſon of Neptune. There were ſome feſtivals celebrated there called Tænaria, in honor of Neptune, ſirnamed Tænarius. Homer Hymn. 413.—Pauſ. 3, c. 14.—Lucan. 6, v. 648.—*Ovid. TÆNIAS, a part of the lake Mæotis.

TAGES, a ſon of Genius, grandſon of Jupiter, was the firſt who taught the 12 nations of the Etrurians the ſcience of augury and divination. It is ſaid that he was found by a Tuſcan ploughman in the form of a clod, and that he aſſumed an human ſhape to inſtruct ſtruct this nation which became ſo celebrated for their knowledge of omens and incantations. Cic. de div. 2, c. 23.—Ovid. Met. 23, v. 558.—Lucan. 1, v. 673.

TAGONIUS, a river of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis.

TAGUS, a river of Spain which falls into the Atlantic after it has croſſed Luſitania, and now bears the name of Tajo. The ſands of the Tagus, according to the poets, were covered with gold. Mela. 3, c. 1.—Ovid Met. 2, v. 251.—Lucan. 7, v. 755.—Martial 4, ep. 55, &c.——A Latian chief killed by Niſus. *Virg. TALASIUS. Vid. Thalaſius.

TALAUS, a ſon of Bias and Pero, father of Adraſtus by Lyſimache. He was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 6.

TALAYRA, the ſiſter of Phœbe. She is alſo called Hilaira. Vid. Phœbe.

TALÆTUM, a temple ſacred to the ſun on mount Taygetus in Laconia. Horſes were generally offered there for ſacrifice.

TALTHYBIUS, a herald in the Grecian camp during the Trojan war, the particular miniſter and friend of Agamemnon. He brought away Briſeis from the tent of Achilles, by order of his maſter. Talthybius died at Ægium in Achaia. Homer. Il. 1, v. 320, &c.——Pauſ. 7, c. 23.

TALUS, a youth, ſon of the ſiſter of Dædalus, who invented the ſaw, compaſſes, and other mechanical inſtruments. His uncle became jealous of his growing fame, and murdered him privately; or, according to others, he threw him down from the citadel of Athens. Talus was changed into a partridge by the gods. He is alſo called Calus, Acalus, Perdix, and Taiiris. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Pauſ. 1.—Ovid Met. 8.——A ſon of Œnopion.——A ſon of Creſ, the founder of the Cretan nation.——A friend of Æneas killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 513.

TAMARUS, a mountain of Epirus.

TAMOS, a native of Memphis, made governor of Ionia, by young Cyrus. After the death of Cyrus, Tamos fled into Egypt, where he was murdered on account of his immenſe treaſures. Died.——A promontory of India near the Ganges.

TAMASEA, a beautiful plain of Cyprus, ſacred to the goddeſs of beauty. It was in this place that Venus gathered the golden apples with which Hippomanes was enabled to overtake Atalanta. Ovid Met. 10.—Plin. 5.

TAMPIUS, a Roman hiſtorian.

TAMYRAS, a river of Phœnicia, between Tyre and Sidon.

TAMYRIS, a queen. Vid. Thomyris.

TANAGRA, a famous town of Bœotia, near the Euripus, between the Aſopus and Thermodon. It was founded by Pœmandros, a ſon of Chærefilaus, the ſon of Jaſius who married Tanagra, the daughter of Æolus; or, according to ſome, of the Aſopus. Corinna was a native of Tanagra. Strab. 9.—Pauſ. 9, c. 20 & 22.—Ælian. V. H. 13, v. 25.

TANAGRUS, or TANAGER, a river of Lucania in Italy. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.

TANAIS, an eunuch, freed man to Mæcenas. Horat. 1, Sat. 1, v. 105.——A river of Scythia, which divides Europe from Aſia, and falls into the Palus Mæotis after a rapid courſe, and after it has received the additional ſtreams of many ſmall rivulets. It is now called the Don. Mela. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 11 & 16.—Curt. 6, c. 2.—Lucan. 3, 8, &c.——A deity among the Perſians and Armenians, who patronized ſlaves; ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Venus. The daughters of the nobleſt of the Perſians and Armenians proſtituted themſelves in honor of this deity, and were received with greater regard and affection by their ſuitors. Artaxerxes, the ſon of Darius was the firſt who raiſed ſtatues to Tanais. Strab. 11.——A city of Egypt.——Another on the Boſporus.

TANAQUIL, called alſo Caia Cæcilia, was the wife of Tarquin the 5th king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, where ſhe married Lucumon, better known by the name of Tarquin, which he aſſumed after he had come to Rome at the repreſentation of his wife, whoſe knowledge of augury promiſed him ſomething uncommon. Her expectations were not fruſtrated; her huſband was raiſed to the throne, and ſhe ſhared with him the honors of royalty. After the murder of Tarquin, Tanaquil raiſed her ſon-in-law Servius Tullius to the throne and enſured him the ſucceſſion. She diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her liberality; and the Romans in ſucceeding ages had ſuch a veneration for her character, that the embroidery ſhe had made, her girdle, as alſo the robe of her ſon-in-law, which ſhe had worked with her own hands, were preſerved with the greateſt ſanctity. Juvenal beſtows the appellation of Tanaquil on all ſuch women as were imperious, and had the command of their huſbands. Liv. 1, c. 34, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 3. c. 59.—Flor. 1, c. 5 & 8.——Ital. 13, v. 818.

TANTALIDES, a patronymic applied to the deſcendants of Tantalus.

TANTALUS, a king of Lydia, ſon of Jupiter, by a nymph called Pluto. He was father of Niobe, Pelops, &c. by Dione, one of the Atlantides, called by ſome Euryanaſſa. Tantalus is repreſented by the poets as puniſhed in hell, with an inſatiable thirſt, and placed up to the chin in the midſt of a pool of of water, which, however, flows away as ſoon as he attempts to taſte it. There hangs alſo above his head, a bough, richly loaded with delicious fruit; which, as ſoon as he attempts to ſeize, is carried away from his reach by a ſudden blaſt of wind. According to ſome mythologiſts, his puniſhment is to ſit under a huge ſtone hung at ſome diſtance over his head, and as it ſeems every moment ready to fall, he is kept under continual alarms and never ceaſing fears. The cauſes of this eternal puniſhment are variouſly explained. Some declare that it was inflicted upon him becauſe he ſtole a favorite dog, which Jupiter had entruſted to his care to keep his temple in Crete. Others ſay that he ſtole away the nectar and ambroſia from the tables of the gods when he was admitted into the aſſemblies of heaven, and that he gave it to mortals on earth. Others ſupport that this proceeds from his cruelty and impiety in killing his ſon Pelops, and in ſerving his limbs as food before the gods, whoſe divinity and power he wiſhed to try, when they had ſtopped at his houſe as they paſſed over Phrygia. There are alſo others who impute it to his laſciviouſneſs in carrying away Ganymedes to gratify the moſt unnatural of paſſions. Pindar. Olymp. 1. —Homer Od. 11, v. 581.—Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 5, l. 4, c. 16.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Propert. 2. el. 1, v. 66.—Horat. 1, Sat. 1, v. 68. ——A ſon of Thyeſtes, the firſt huſband of Clytemneſtra. Pauſ. 2.——One of Niobe's children. Ovid Met. 6, fab. 6.

TANUSIUS GERMINUS, a Latin hiſtorian intimate with Cicero. Seneca.

TAPHIÆ, iſlands in the Ionian ſea between Achaia and Leucadia. They were alſo called Teleboides. They received theſe names from Taphius and Telebous, the ſons of Neptune who reigned there. The Taphians made war againſt Electryon king of Mycenæ and killed all his ſons; upon which the monarch promiſed his kingdom and his daughter in marriage to whoever could avenge the death of his children upon the Taphians. Amphitryon did it with ſucceſs, and obtained the promiſed reward. The Taphians were expert ſailors, but too fond of plunder and piratical excurſions. Homer Od. 1, v. 181, & 419. l. 15, v. 426.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

TAPHIUS, a ſon of Neptune by Hippothoe the daughter of Neſtor. He was king of the Taphiæ to which he gave his name. Strab. 10.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.

TAPHIUS, or TAPHIASSUS, a mountain of Locris on the confines of Ætolia.

TAPROBĂNE, an Iſland in the Indian ocean, now called Ceylon. Its inhabitants were very rich, and lived to a great age. Strab. 2.—Ovid ex Pont. 8, el. 5, v. 80.

TAPSUS, a maritime town of Africa.—— A ſmall and lowly ſituated peninſula on the eaſtern coaſt of Sicily. Virg. Æn. 3. v. 689.

TAPYRI, a people near Hyrcania.

TARĂNIS, a name of Jupiter among the Gauls. They offered human ſacrifices to this god. Lucan. 1, v. 446.

TARAS, a ſon of Neptune who built Tarentum as ſome ſuppoſe.

TARAXIPPUS, a deity worſhipped at Elis. His ſtatue was placed near the race ground; and his protection was implored, that no harm might happen to the horſes during the games. Pauſ. 6, c. 20, &c.

TARBELLI, a people of Gaul.

TARCHETIUS, an impious king of Alba.

TARCHON, an Etrurian chief who aſſiſted Æneas againſt the Rutuli. Some ſuppoſe that he founded Mantua. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 603. ——A prince of Cilicia. Lucan. 9, v. 219.

TARENTUM, or TARENTUS, a town of Calabria, ſituate on a bay of the ſame name, near the mouth of the river Galeſus. It was founded, or rather repaired, by a Lacedæmonian colony, about 707 years before Chriſt, under the conduct of Phalanthus. It was long independent, and could once arm 100,000 foot, and 3,000 horſe. The people of Tarentum were very indolent, and as they were eaſily ſupplied with all neceſſaries, as well as luxuries from Greece, they gave themſelves up to voluptuouſneſs, ſo that the delights of Tarentum became proverbial. The war which they ſupported againſt the Romans, with the aſſiſtance of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, and which has been called the Tarentine war, is greatly celebrated in hiſtory. This war, which had been undertaken B. C. 281 by the Romans to avenge the inſults the Tarentines had offered to their ſhips when near their harbours, was terminated after ten years; 30,000 priſoners were taken, and Tarentum became ſubject to Rome. The government of Tarentum was democratical, there were, however, ſome monarchs who reigned there. It was for ſome time the reſidence of Pythagoras, who inſpired the citizens with the love of virtue, and rendered them ſuperior to their neighbours, in the cabinet as well as in the field of battle. The large, beautiful, and capacious harbour of Tarentum is greatly commended by antient hiſtorians. Flor. 1, c. 18. —*Val. TARNÆ, a town mentioned by Homer, Il. 5.——A fountain of Lydia.

TARPA, (Spurius Mætius) a critic at Rome in the age of Auguſtus. He was appointed with four others in the temple of Apollo to examine the merit of every poetical compoſition, which was to be depoſited in the temple of the Muſes. In this office he acted with great impartiality, though many taxed him with want of candor. All the pieces that were repreſented on the Roman ſtage had previouſly received his approbation. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 38.

TARPEIA, the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel of Rome, promiſed to open the gates of the city to the Sabines, provided they gave her their gold bracelets, or, as ſhe expreſſed it, what they carried on their left hands. Tatius, the king of the Sabines, conſented, and as he entered the gates, to puniſh her perfidy, he threw not only his bracelet but his ſhield upon Tarpeia. His followers imitated his example, and Tarpeia was cruſhed under the weight of the bracelets and ſhields of the Sabine army. She was buried in the capitol, which from her has been called the Tarpeian rock, and there afterwards many of the Roman malefactors were thrown down a deep precipice. Plut. in Rom.—Ovid. Æn. 11, v. 656.

TARPEIA LEX, was enacted A. U. C. 269, by Sp. Tarpeius, to empower all the magiſtrates of the republic to lay fines on offenders. This power belonged before only to the conſuls. The fine was not to exceed 2 ſheep and 30 oxen.

SP. TARPEIUS, the governor of the citadel of Rome, under Romulus. His deſcendants were called Montani and Capitolini.

TARPEIUS MONS, a hill at Rome which received its name from Tarpeia, who was buried there. It is the ſame as the Capitoline hill. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 347 & 652.

TARQUINII, a town of Etruria, built by Tarchon, who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. Tarquinius Priſcus was educated there, and he made it a Roman colony when he aſcended the throne. Strab. 5.—Plin. 2, c. 95.

TARQUINIA, a daughter of Tarquinius Priſcus, who married Servius Tullius. When her huſband was murdered by Tarquinius Superbus, ſhe privately conveyed away his body by night and buried it. This preyed upon her mind, and the following night ſhe died. Some have attributed her death to exceſs of grief, or ſuicide, while others, perhaps more juſtly, have ſuſpected Tullia, the wife of young Tarquin, with the murder.——A veſtal virgin who, as ſome ſuppoſe, gave the Roman people a large piece of land, which was afterwards called the Campus Martius.

TARQUINIUS PRISCUS, the 5th king of Rome, was ſon of Demaratus, a native of Greece. His firſt name was Lucumon, but this he changed when by the advice of his wife Tanaquil, he had come to Rome. He called himſelf Lucius, and aſſumed the ſirname of Tarquinius, becauſe born in the town of Tarquinii in Etruria. At Rome he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much by his liberality and engaging manners, that Ancus Martius, the reigning monarch, nominated him at his death, the guardian of his children. This was inſufficient to gratify the ambition of Tarquin; the princes were young, and an artful oration delivered to the people immediately transferred the crown of the deceaſed monarch on the head of Lucumon. The people had every reaſon to be ſatisfied with their choice, Tarquin reigned with moderation and popularity. He encreaſed the number of the ſenate, and made himſelf friends by electing 100 new ſenators from the plebeians, whom he diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of Patres minorum gentium, from thoſe of the patrician body, who were called Patres majorum gentium. The glory of the Roman arms, which was ſupported with ſo much dignity by the former monarchs, was not neglected in this reign, and Tarquin ſhowed that he poſſeſſed vigor and military prudence in the victories which he obtained over the united forces of the Latins and Sabines, and in the conqueſt of the 12 nations of Etruria. He repaired, in the time of peace, the walls of the capital, the public places were adorned with elegant buildings and uſeful ornaments, and many centuries after, ſuch as were ſpectators of the ſtately manſions and golden palaces of Nero, viewed with more admiration and greater pleaſure the more ſimple, though not leſs magnificent, edifices of Tarquin. He laid the foundations of the capitol, and to the induſtry and the public ſpirit of this monarch, the Romans were indebted for their aqueducts and ſubterraneous ſewers, which ſupplied the city with freſh and wholeſome water, and removed all the filth and ordure, which in a great capital too often breed peſtilence and diſeaſes. Tarquin was the firſt who introduced among the Romans the cuſtom to canvaſs for offices of truſt and honor; he diſtinguiſhed the monarch, the ſenators, and other inferior magiſtrates with particular robes and ornaments, with ivory chairs at ſpectacles, and the hatchets carried before the public magiſtrates, were by his order ſurrounded with bundles of ſticks, to ſtrike more terror, and to be viewed with greater reverence. Tarquin was aſſaſſinated by the two ſons of his predeceſſor, in the 80th year of his age, 38 of which he had ſat on the throne, 578 years before Chriſt. Dionyſ. Hal. 3, c. 59.—Val. Max. 1, c. 4.

l. 3, c. 2.—Flor. 1, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 817.——The ſecond Tarquin, ſirnamed Superbus, from his pride and inſolence, was grandſon of Tarquinius Priſcus. He aſcended the throne of Rome after his father-in-law Servius Tullius, and was the ſeventh and laſt king of Rome. He married Tullia, the daughter of Tullius, and it was at her inſtigation that he murdered his father-in-law, and ſeized the kingdom. The crown which he had obtained with violence, he endeavoured to keep by a continuation of tyranny. Unlike his royal predeceſſors, he paid no regard to the deciſions of the ſenate, or the approbation of the public aſſemblies, and by wiſhing to diſregard both, he incurred the jealouſy of the one and the odium of the other. The public treaſury was ſoon exhauſted by the continual extravagance of Tarquin, and to ſilence the murmurs of his ſubjects, he reſolved to call their attention to war. He was ſucceſsful in his military operations, the neighbouring cities ſubmitted; but while the ſiege of Ardea was continued, the wantonneſs of the ſon of Tarquin at Rome, for ever ſtopped the progreſs of his arms; and the Romans, whom a ſeries of barbarity and oppreſſion had hitherto provoked, no ſooner ſaw the virtuous Lucretia ſtab herſelf, not to ſurvive the loſs of her honor, [Vid. Lucretia] than the whole city and camp aroſe with indignation againſt the monarch. The gates of Rome were ſhut againſt him, and Tarquin was for ever baniſhed from his throne, in the year of Rome 244. Unable to find ſupport from even one of his ſubjects, Tarquin retired among the Etrurians, who attempted in vain to replace him on his throne. The republican government was eſtabliſhed at Rome, and all Italy refuſed any longer to ſupport the cauſe of an exiled monarch againſt a nation, who heard the name of Tarquin, king, and tyrant mentioned with horror and indignation. Tarquin died in the 90th year of his age, about 14 years after his expulſion from Rome. He had reigned about 25 years. Though Tarquin appeared ſo odious among the Romans, his reign was not without its ſhare of glory. His conqueſts were numerous; to beautify the buildings and porticos at Rome was his wiſh, and with great magnificence and care he finiſhed the capitol, which his predeceſſor of the ſame name had begun. He alſo bought the Sibylline books which the Romans conſulted with ſuch religious ſolemnity. [Vid. Sibyllæ.] Cic. pro Rab. &c.—Liv. 1, c. 46, &c.—Dionyſ. Æn. 6, v. 817.—Eutrop.——(Collatinus) one of the relations of Tarquin the proud, who married Lucretia. [Vid. Collatinus.]——Sextius, the eldeſt of the ſons of Tarquin the proud, rendered himſelf well known by a variety of adventures. When his father beſieged Gabii, young Tarquin publicly declared that he was at variance with the monarch, and the report was the more eaſily believed when he came before Gabii with his body all mangled and bloody with ſtripes. This was an agreement between the father and the ſon, and Tarquin had no ſooner declared that this proceeded from the tyranny and oppreſſion of his father, than the people of Gabii entruſted him with the command of their armies, fully convinced that Rome could never have a more inveterate enemy. When he had thus ſucceeded, he diſpatched a private meſſenger to his father, but the monarch gave no anſwer to be returned to his ſon. Sextius inquired more particularly about his father, and when he heard from the meſſenger that when the meſſage was delivered, Tarquin cut off with a ſtick the talleſt poppies in his garden, the ſon followed the example by putting to death the moſt noble and powerful citizens of Gabii. The town ſoon fell into the hands of the Romans. The violence which ſome time after Tarquinius offered to Lucretia, was the cauſe of his father's exile, and the total expulſion of his family from Rome. [Vid. Lucretia.] Sextius was at laſt killed, bravely fighting in a battle during the war which the Latins ſuſtained againſt Rome in the attempt of reeſtabliſhing the Tarquins on their throne. *Ovid. Tarsius, a river of Troas.

Tarsus or Tarsos, a town of Cilicia, on the Cydnus, founded by Triptolemus and a colony of Argives, or, as others say, by Sardanapalus. Tarsus was celebrated for the great men it produced. It was once the rival of Alexandria and Athens in literature and the study of the polite arts. The people of Tarsus wished to ingratiate themselves into the favor of J. Cæsar by giving the name of Juliopolis to their city, but it was soon lost. Lucan. 3, v. 225.—Mela. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 14.

Tartărus, one of the regions of hell, where, according to the antients, the most impious and guilty among mankind were punished. It was surrounded with a brazen wall, and its entrance was continually hidden from the sight by a cloud of darkness, which is represented three times more gloomy than the obscurest night. According to Hesiod it was a separate prison, at a greater distance from the earth than the earth is from the heavens. Virgil says that it was surrounded by three impenetrable walls, and by the impetuous and burning streams of the river Phlegethon. The entrance is by a large and lofty tower, whose gates are supported by columns of adamant, which neither gods nor men can open. In Tartarus, according to Virgil, were punished such as had been disobedient to their parents, traitors, adulterers, faithless ministers, and such as had undertaken unjust and cruel wars, or had betrayed their friends for the sake of money. It was also the place where Ixion, Tityus, the Danaides, Tantalus, Sisyphus, &c. were punished, according to Ovid. Hesiod. Theog. v. 720.—Sil. 13, v. 591.—Virg. Æn. 6.—Homer. Od. 11.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13.

Tartessus, a town in Spain near the columns of Hercules, on the Mediterranean. Some suppose that it was afterwards called Carteia, and it was better known by the name of Gades, when Hercules had set up his columns on the extremity of Spain and Africa. There is also a town called Tartessus, in a small island formed by a river of the same name, near Gades in Iberia. Tartessus has been called the most distant town in the extremities of Spain, by the Romans. Mela. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 6, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 416.—Strab. 3.

Tatienses, a name given to one of the tribes of the Roman people by Romulus, in honor of Tatius, king of the Sabines. The Tatienses, who were partly the antient subjects of the king of the Sabines, lived on mount Capitolinus and Quirinalis.

Tatius, (Titus) king of Cures among the Sabines, made war against the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. The gates of the city were betrayed into his hands by Tarpeia, and the army of the Sabines advanced as far as the Roman forum, where a bloody battle was fought. The cries of the Sabine virgins at last stopped the fury of the combatants, and an agreement was made between the two nations. Tatius consented to leave his antient possessions, and with his subjects, the inhabitants of Cures, to come and live in Rome. He shared the royal authority with Romulus, and lived in the greatest union. He was murdered about six years after at Lanuvium, B. C. 742, for an act of cruelty to the ambassadors of the Laurentes. This was done by order of his royal colleague, according to some authors. Liv. 1, c. 10, &c.—Plut. in Rom.—Cic. pro Balb.—Ovid Met. 14, v. 804.—Flor. 1, c. 1.

Tauromĭnium, a town of Sicily, between Messana and Catana, built by the Zancleans, Zancleans, Sicilians, and Hybleans, in the age of Dionyſius the tyrant of Syracuſe. The hills in the neighbourhood were famous for the fine grapes which they produced. There is a ſmall river near it called Tauromínius. Diod. 16.

TAURUS, the largeſt mountain of Aſia, in its extent. One of its extremities is in Caria, and it extends not only as far as the moſt eaſtern extremities of Aſia, but it alſo branches in ſeveral parts, and runs far in the north. Mount Taurus was known by ſeveral names, particularly in different countries. In Cilicia, where it reaches as far as the Euphrates, it was called Taurus. It was known by the name of Amanus from the bay of Iſſus as far as the Euphrates; of Antitaurus from the weſtern boundaries of Cilicia up to Armenia; of Montes Matieni in the country of the Leucoſyrians; of Mons Moſchicus at the ſouth of the river Phaſis; of Amaranta at the north of the Phaſis, of Caucaſus between the Hyrcanian and Euxine ſea; of Hyrcanii Montes near Hyrcania; of Imaus in the more eaſtern parts of Aſia. The word Taurus was more properly confined to the mountains that ſeparate Phrygia and Pamphylia from Cilicia. The ſeveral paſſes which were opened in the mountain were called Pylæ, and hence frequent mention is made in antient authors of the Armenian Pylæ, Cilician Pylæ, &c. Mela. 1, c. 13. l. 3, c. 7 & 8.—Plin. 5, c. 27.——A mountain in Germany. *Tacit. TEIUM, a town of Paphlagonia on the Euxine ſea.

TELĂMON, a king of the iſland of Salamis, ſon of Æacus and Endeis. He was brother to Peleus and father to Teucer and Ajax, who on that account is often called Telamonius heros. He fled from Megara his native country, after he had accidentally murdered his brother Phocus in playing with the quoit, and he ſailed to the iſland of Salamis, where he ſoon after married Glauce, the daughter of Cychreus, the king of the place. At the death of his father-in-law, who had no male iſſue, Telamon became king of Salamis. He accompanied Jaſon in his expedition to Colchis, and was arm-bearer to Hercules, when that hero took Laomedon priſoner, and deſtroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his ſervices with the hand of Heſione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the ſpoils of Troy, and with her he returned to Greece. He alſo married Peribœa, whom ſome call Eribœa. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 151.—Sophocl. in Aj.—Pindar Iſthm. 6.—Stat. Theb. 6.—Apollod. 1, 2, &c.—Pauſ. in Cor.—Hygin. Fab. 97, &c.

TELAMONIĂDES, a patronymic given to the deſcendants of Telamon.

TELCHĪNES, a people of Rhodes, ſaid to have been originally from Crete. They were the inventors of many uſeful arts, and according to Diodorus, paſſed for the ſons of the ſea. They were the firſt who raiſed ſtatues to the gods. They had the power of changing themſelves into whatever ſhape they pleaſed, and according to Ovid they could poiſon and faſcinate all objects with their eyes, and cauſe rain and hail to fall at pleaſure. The Telchinians inſulted Venus, for which the goddeſs inſpired them with a ſudden fury, ſo that they committed the groſſeſt crimes, and offered violence even to their own mothers. Jupiter deſtroyed them all by a deluge. Diod.—Ovid Met. 7, v. 365, &c.

TELCHĪNIA, a ſirname of Minerva.—Alſo a ſirname of Juno in Rhodes, where ſhe had a ſtatue at Ialyſus raiſed by the Telchinians, who ſettled there.

TELECLĪDES, an Athenian comic poet in the age of Pericles.

TELĔGŌNUS, a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe, born in the iſland of Ææa, where he was educated. When arrived to the years of manhood, he went to Ithaca to make himſelf known to his father, but he was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt, and being deſtitute of proviſions, he plundered ſome of the inhabitants of the iſland. Ulyſſes and Telemachus came to defend the property of their ſubjects againſt this unknown invader; a quarrel aroſe, and Telegonus killed his father without knowing who he was. He afterwards returned to his native country, and according to Hyginus he carried thither his father's body, where it was buried. Telemachus and Penelope alſo accompanied him in his return, and ſoon after the nuptials of Telegonus with Penelope were celebrated by order of Minerva. Penelope had by Telegonus a ſon called Italus, who gave his name to Italy. Telegonus founded Tuſculum in Italy, and according to ſome he left one daughter called Mamilia, from whom the noble family of the Mamilii at Rome were deſcended. Horat. 3, od. 29. v. 8.—Ovid. Faſt. 3 & 4. Triſt. 1, el. 1.—Plut. in Par.—Hygin. fab. 127.—Scil. 7.——A ſon of Proteus killed by Hercules.——A king of Egypt who married Io after ſhe had been reſtored to her original form by Jupiter.

TELĔMĂCHUS, a ſon of Ulyſſes and Penelope. He was ſtill in the cradle when his father went with the reſt of the Greeks to the Trojan war. At the end of this celebrated war, Telemachus, anxious to ſee his father, went to ſeek him, and as the place of his reſidence, and the cauſe of his long abſence were then unknown, he viſited the court of Menelaus and Neſtor to obtain information. He afterwards returned to Ithaca, ca, where the ſuitors of his mother Penelope had conſpired to murder him, but he avoided their ſnares, and by means of Minerva, he diſcovered his father, who had arrived in the iſland two days before him, and was then in the houſe of Eumæus. With this faithful ſervant and Ulyſſes, Telemachus concerted how to deliver his mother from the importunities of her ſuitors, and it was effected with great ſucceſs. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the iſland of Ææa, where he married Circe, or according to others Caſſiphone, the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a ſon called Latinus. He ſome time after had the misfortune to kill his mother-in-law Circe, and fled to Italy, where he founded Cluſium. Telemachus was accompanied in his viſit to Neſtor and Menelaus by the goddeſs of wiſdom, under the form of Mentor. It is ſaid, that when a child, Telemachus fell into the ſea, and that a dolphin brought him ſafe to ſhore, after he had remained ſome time under water. From this circumſtance Ulyſſes had the figure of a dolphin engraved on the ſeal which he wore on his ring. Hygin. fab. 95 & 125.—Ovid. Heroid. 1, v. 98.—Horat. 1. ep. 7, v. 41.—Homer. Od. 2, &c.—Lycophr. in Caſſ.

TELEPHASSA, the mother of Cadmus, Phœnix and Cilix, by Agenor. She died in Thrace, as ſhe was ſeeking her daughter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away.

TELĔPHUS, a king of Myſia, ſon of Hercules and Auge, the daughter of Aleus. He was expoſed as ſoon as born on mount Parthenius, but his life was preſerved by a goat, and by ſome ſhepherds. According to Apollodorus he was expoſed not on a mountain, but in the temple of Minerva at Tega, or according to a tradition mentioned by Pauſanias, he was left to the mercy of the waves with his mother, by the cruelty of Aleus, and carried by the winds to the mouth of the Caycus, where he was found by Teuthras, king of the country, who married, or rather adopted as his daughter, Auge, and educated her ſon. Some, however, ſuppoſe that Auge fled to Teuthras to avoid the anger of her father, on account of her amour with Hercules. Yet others declare that Aleus gave her to Nauplius to be ſeverely puniſhed for her incontinence, and that Nauplius unwilling to injure her, ſent her to Teuthras, king of Bithynia, by whom ſhe was adopted. Telephus, according to the more received opinions, was ignorant of his origin, and he was ordered by the oracle, if he wiſhed to know his parents, to go to Myſia. Obedient to this injunction, he came to Myſia, where Teuthras offered him his crown, and his adopted daughter Auge in marriage, if he would deliver his country from the hoſtilities of Idas, the ſon of Aphareus. Telephus readily complied, and at the head of the Myſians he ſoon routed the enemy, and received the promiſed reward. As he was going to unite himſelf to Auge, the ſudden appearance of an enormous ſerpent ſeparated the two lovers; Auge implored the aſſiſtance of Hercules, and was ſoon informed by the god that Telephus was her own ſon. When this was known, the nuptials were not celebrated, and Telephus ſome time after married one of the daughters of king Priam. As one of the ſons of the Trojan monarch, Telephus prepared to aſſiſt Priam againſt the Greeks, and with uncommon fury he attacked them when they had landed on his coaſts. The carnage was great, and Telephus was victorious, had not Bacchus, who protected the Greeks, ſuddenly raiſed a vine from the earth, which entangled the feet of the monarch, and laid him flat on the ground. Achilles immediately ruſhed upon him, and wounded him ſo ſeverely, that he was carried away from the battle. The wound was mortal, and Telephus was informed by the oracle, that he alone who had inflicted it, could totally cure it. Upon this, applications were made to Achilles, but in vain; the hero obſerved that he was no phyſician, till Ulyſſes, who knew that Troy could not be taken without the aſſiſtance of one of the ſons of Hercules, and who wiſhed to make Telephus the friend of the Greeks, perſuaded Achilles to obey the directions of the oracle. Achilles conſented, and as the weapon which had given the wound could alone cure it, the hero ſcraped the ruſt from the point of his ſpear, and by applying it to the ſore gave it immediate relief. It is ſaid that Telephus ſhowed himſelf ſo grateful to the Greeks, that he accompanied them to the Trojan war, and fought with them againſt his father-in-law. Hygin. fab. 101.—Pauſ. 8, c. 48.—Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—*Ælian. TEMNOS, a town of Æolia, at the mouth of the Hermus.

TEMPE, a valley in Theſſaly, between mount Olympus at the north, and Oſſa at the ſouth, through which the river Peneus flows into the Ægean. The poets have deſcribed it as the moſt delightful ſpot on the earth, with continually cool ſhades, and verdant walks, which the warbling of birds rendered dered more pleaſant and romantic. Tempe extended about five miles in length, but was ſcarce one acre and a half wide. All vallies that are pleaſant, either for their ſituation or the mildneſs of their climate, are called Tempe by the poets. Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Diod. 4.—Dionyſ. Perieg. 219.—*Ælian. V. Tenĕdos, a ſmall and fertile iſland of the Ægean ſea, oppoſite Troy, at the diſtance of about 12 miles from Sigæum, and 56 miles north from Leſbos. It was antiently called Leucophrys, till Tenes, the ſon of Cycnus ſettled there and built a town which he called Tenedos, from which the whole iſland received its name. It became famous during the Trojan war, as it was there that the Greeks concealed themſelves the more effectually to make the Trojans believe that they were returned home without finiſhing the ſiege. Homer. Od. 3, v. 59.—Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 540. l. 12, v. 109.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

Tenes, a ſon of Cycnus and Proclea. He was expoſed on the ſea on the coaſt of Troas, by his father, who credulouſly believed his wife Philonome, who had fallen in love with Cycnus, and accuſed him of attempts upon her virtue, when he refuſed to gratify her paſſion. Tenes arrived ſafe in Leucophrys, which he called Tenedos, and of which he became the ſovereign. Some time after, Cycnus diſcovered the guilt of his wife Philonome, and as he wiſhed to be reconciled to his ſon whom he had ſo groſsly injured, he went to Tenedos. But when he had tied his ſhip to the ſhore, Tenes cut off the cable with a hatchet, and ſuffered his father's ſhip to be toſſed about in the ſea. From this circumſtance the hatchet of Tenes is become proverbial to intimate a reſentment that cannot be pacified. This hatchet was carefully preſerved at Tenedos, and afterwards depoſited in the temple of Delphi, where it was ſtill ſeen in the age of Pauſanias. Tenes, as ſome ſuppoſe, was killed by Achilles, as he defended his country againſt the Greeks, and he received divine honors after death. His ſtatue was carried away by Verres. Strab. 13.—Pauſ. 10, c. 14.——A general of 3000 mercenary Greeks ſent by the Egyptians to aſſiſt the Phœnicians. Diod. 16.

Teos, or Teios, a maritime town on the coaſt of Ionia in Aſia Minor, oppoſite Samos. It was one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, and gave birth to Anacreon and Hecataeus, who is by ſome deemed a native of Miletus. According to Pliny, Teos was an iſland. Auguſtus repaired Teos, whence he is often called the founder of it in ancient medals. Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 17.—Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 5.—Horat. 1, Od. 17, v. 18.—Plin. 5, c. 31.

Terēdon, a town on the Arabian gulf.

Terentia, the wife of Cicero. She became mother of M. Cicero, and of a daughter called Tulliola. Cicero repudiated her, becauſe ſhe had been faithleſs to his bed, when he was baniſhed in Aſia. Terentia married Salluſt, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Meſſala Corvinus. She lived to her 103d, or according to Pliny to her 117th year. Plut. in Cic.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Cic. ad Attic. 11, ep 16, &c.——The wife of Scipio Africanus.——The wife of Mecænas, with whom it was ſaid that Auguſtus carried on an intrigue.

Terentia lex, called alſo Caſſia, frumentaria, by M. Terentius Varro Lucullus, and C. Caſſius, A. U. C. 680. It ordered that the ſame price ſhould be given for all corn bought in the provinces, to hinder the exactions of the quæſtors.——Another by Terentius the tribune, A. U. C. 291, to elect five perſons to define the power of the conſuls, leſt they ſhould abuſe the public confidence by violence or rapine.

Terentiānus, a Roman to whom Longinus dedicated his treatiſe on the ſublime.——Maurus, a writer who floriſhed A. D. 240. The laſt edition of his treatiſe de literis, ſyllabis, & metris Horatii, is by Mycillus, Francof. 8vo. 1584.

Terentius Publius, a native of Africa, celebrated for the comedies he wrote. He was ſold as a ſlave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman ſenator, who educated him with great care, and manumitted him for the brilliancy of his genius. He bore the name of his maſter and benefactor, and was called Terentius. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Greek comedy with uncommon aſſiduity, and merited the friendſhip and patronage of the learned and powerful. Scipio, the elder Africanus, and his friend Lælius, have been ſuſpected, on account of their intimacy, of aſſiſting the poet in the compoſition of his comedies; and the fine language, the pure expreſſions, and delicate ſentiments with which the plays of Terence abound, ſeem perhaps to favor the ſuppoſition. Terence was in the 25th year of his age, when his firſt play appeared on the Roman ſtage. All his compoſitions were received with great applauſe; but when the words were repeated, the plaudits were reiterated, and the audience, though compoſed of foreigners, conquered nations, allies, and citizens of Rome, were unanimous in applauding the poet, who ſpoke with ſuch elegance and ſimplicity, the language of nature, and ſupported the native independence of man. The talents of Terence were employed rather in tranſlating than in ſearch of originality. It is ſaid that he tranſlated 108 of the comedies of the poet Menander, ſix of which only are extant, his Andria, Eunuch, Heautontimorumenos, Adelphi, Phormio and Hecyra. Terence is admired for the purity of his language, and the artleſs elegance and ſimplicity of his diction, and for a continued delicacy of ſentiments. There is more originality in Plautus, more vivacity in the intrigues, and more ſurpriſe in the cataſtrophes of his plays; but Terence will ever be admired for his taſte, his expreſſions, and his faithful pictures of nature and manners, and the becoming dignity of his ſeveral characters. Quintilian, who candidly acknowledges the deficiencies of the Roman comedy, declares that Terence was the moſt elegant and refined of all the comedians whoſe writings appeared on the ſtage. The time and the manner of his death are unknown. He left Rome in the 35th year of his age, and never after appeared there. Some ſuppoſe that he was drowned in a ſtorm as he returned from Greece, about 159 years before Chriſt. The beſt editions of Terence are thoſe of Weſterhovius, 2 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1726; of Edinb. 12mo. 1758; of Cambridge, 4to. 1723; and Hawkey's, 12mo. Dublin, 1745. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 3—Paterc. 1, c. 17.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 59.——Culeo, a Roman ſenator taken by the Carthaginians, and redeemed by Africanus. When Africanus triumphed, Culeo followed his chariot with a pileus on his head. He was ſometime after appointed judge between his deliverer and the people of Aſia, and had the meanneſs to condemn him and his brother Aſiaticus, though both innocent. Liv. 30, c. 45.——A tribune who wiſhed the number of the citizens of Rome to be increaſed.——Evocatus, a man who as it was ſuppoſed murdered Galba. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 41.——Lentinus, a Roman knight condemned for perjury.——Varro, a writer, vid. Varro.——A conſul with Æmilius Paulus at the battle of Cannæ. He was the ſon of a butcher, and had followed for ſome time the profeſſion of his father. He placed himſelf totally in the power of Hannibal, by making an improper diſpoſition of his army. After he had been defeated, and his colleague ſlain, he retired to Canuſium, with the remains of his ſlaughtered countrymen, and ſent word to the Roman ſenate of his defeat. He received the thanks of this venerable body, becauſe he had engaged the enemy however improperly, and not deſpaired of the affairs of the republic. He was offered the dictatorſhip, which he declined. Plut.—Liv. 22, &c.——An ambaſſador ſent to Philip king of Macedonia.——Maſſaliora, an edile of the people, &c.——Marcus, a friend of Sejanus, accuſed before the ſenate for his intimacy with that diſcarded favorite. TERMESUS, a river of Arcadia.

TERMINALIA, annual feſtivals at Rome, obſerved in honor of the god Terminus, in the month of February. It was then uſual for peaſants to aſſemble near the principal land marks which ſeparated their fields, and after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, wine, and to ſacrifice a lamb or a young pig. They were firſt eſtabliſhed by Numa, and though at firſt it was forbidden to ſhed the blood of victims, yet in proceſs of time land-marks were plentifully ſprinkled with it. Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 641.—Cic. Phil. 12, c. 10.

TERMINĀLIS, a ſirname of Jupiter, becauſe he preſided over the boundaries and lands of individuals before the worſhip of the god Terminus was introduced. Dionyſ. Hal. 2.

TERMĬNUS, a divinity at Rome who was ſuppoſed to preſide over bounds and limits, and to puniſh all unlawful uſurpation of land. His worſhip was firſt introduced at Rome by Numa, who perſuaded his ſubjects that the limits of their lands and eſtates were under the immediate inſpection of heaven. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was repreſented with an human head without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved, wherever he was placed. The people of the country aſſembled once a year with their families, and crowned with garlands and flowers the ſtones which ſeparated their different poſſeſſions, and offered victims to the god who preſided over their boundaries. It is ſaid that when Tarquin the proud wiſhed to build a temple on the Tarpeian rock to Jupiter, the god Terminus refuſed to give way, though the other gods reſigned their ſeats with cheerfulneſs; whence Ovid has ſaid, Reſtitit, & magno cum Jove templa tenet.

TEUCER, a king of Phrygia, ſon of the Scamander by Idea. According to ſome authors, he was the firſt who introduced among his ſubjects the worſhip of Cybele, and the dances of the Corybantes. The country where he reigned was from him called Teucria, and his ſubjects Teucri. His daughter Batea, married Dardanus, a Samothracian prince, who ſucceeded him in the government of Teucria. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 108.——A ſon of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Heſione the daughter of Laomedon. He was one of Helen's ſuitors, and accordingly accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, where he ſignalized himſelf by his valor and intrepidity. It is ſaid that his father refuſed to receive him into his kingdom, becauſe he had left the death of his brother Ajax unrevenged. This ſeverity of the father did not diſhearten the ſon; he left Salamis, and retired to Cyprus, where, with the aſſiſtance of Belus king of Sidon he built a town, which he called Salamis, after his native country. He attempted to no purpoſe to recover the iſland of Salamis after his father's death. He built a temple to Jupiter in Cyprus, on which a man was annually ſacrificed till the reign of the Antonines. Some ſuppoſe that Teucer did not return to Cyprus, but that, according to a leſs received opinion, he went to ſettle in Spain, and thence into Galatia. Homer. Il. 8, v. 281.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 623.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Juſtin. 44, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 1.——One of the ſervants of Phalaris of Agrigentum.

THALASSIUS, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of theſe virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her raviſher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed as he carried her away, that it was for Thalaſſius. The name of Thalaſſius was no ſooner mentioned, than all were eager to preſerve ſo beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with ſo much happineſs, that it was ever after uſual at Rome to make uſe of the word Thalaſſius at nuptials, and to wiſh thoſe that were married the felicity of Thalaſſius. He is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſame as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.

THALES, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. He was deſcended from Cadmus: his father's name was Examius, and his mother's Cleobula. Like the reſt of the antients, he travelled in queſt of knowledge, and for ſome time reſided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the prieſts of Memphis he was taught geometry, aſtronomy, and philoſophy, and enabled to meaſure with exactneſs the vaſt height and extent of a pyramid. His diſcoveries in aſtronomy were great and ingenious; he was the firſt who calculated with accuracy a ſolar eclipſe. He diſcovered the ſolſtices and equinoxes, he divided the heavens into five zones, and recommended the diviſion of the year into 365 days, which was univerſally adopted by

by the Egyptian philoſophy. Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of every thing. He was the founder of the Ionic ſect, which diſtinguiſhed itſelf for its deep and abſtruſe ſpeculations under the ſucceſſors and pupils of the Mileſian philoſopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus the maſter of Socrates. Thales was never married, and when his mother preſſed him to chuſe a wife, he ſaid he was too young. The ſame exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philoſopher eluded them by obſerving, that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial ſtate. He died in the 96th year of his age, about 548 years before the Chriſtian era. His compoſitions on philoſophical ſubjects are loſt. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—Plato.—Diog. 1.—*Cic. de Nat. THALASSIUS, a beautiful young Roman in the reign of Romulus. At the rape of the Sabines, one of theſe virgins appeared remarkable for beauty and elegance, and her raviſher, afraid of many competitors, exclaimed as he carried her away, that it was for Thalaſſius. The name of Thalaſſius was no ſooner mentioned, than all were eager to preſerve ſo beautiful a prize for him. Their union was attended with ſo much happineſs, that it was ever after uſual at Rome to make uſe of the word Thalaſſius at nuptials, and to wiſh thoſe that were married the felicity of Thalaſſius. He is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſame as Hymen, as he was made a deity. Plut. in Rom.—Martial. 3, ep. 92.

THALES, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, born at Miletus in Ionia. He was deſcended from Cadmus: his father's name was Examius, and his mother's Cleobula. Like the reſt of the antients, he travelled in queſt of knowledge, and for ſome time reſided in Crete, Phœnicia, and Egypt. Under the prieſts of Memphis he was taught geometry, aſtronomy, and philoſophy, and enabled to meaſure with exactneſs the vaſt height and extent of a pyramid. His diſcoveries in aſtronomy were great and ingenious; he was the firſt who calculated with accuracy a ſolar eclipſe. He diſcovered the ſolſtices and equinoxes, he divided the heavens into five zones, and recommended the diviſion of the year into 365 days, which was univerſally adopted by

by the Egyptian philoſophy. Like Homer, he looked upon water as the principle of every thing. He was the founder of the Ionic ſect, which diſtinguiſhed itſelf for its deep and abſtruſe ſpeculations under the ſucceſſors and pupils of the Mileſian philoſopher, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, and Archelaus the maſter of Socrates. Thales was never married, and when his mother preſſed him to chuſe a wife, he ſaid he was too young. The ſame exhortations were afterwards repeated, but the philoſopher eluded them by obſerving, that he was then too old to enter the matrimonial ſtate. He died in the 96th year of his age, about 548 years before the Chriſtian era. His compoſitions on philoſophical ſubjects are loſt. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—Plato.—Diog. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. &c.——A lyric poet intimate with Lycurgus. He prepared by his rhapſodies the minds of the Spartans to receive the rigorous inſtitutions of his friend, and inculcated a reverence for the peace of civil ſociety.

THALESTRIA, or THALESTRIS, a queen of the Amazons, who came 35 days journey to meet Alexander in his Aſiatic conqueſts, to raiſe children by a man whoſe fame was ſo great, and courage ſo uncommon. Curt. 6, c. 5.—Strab. 11.

THAMŸRAS, a Cilician who firſt introduced the art of augury in Cyprus, where it was religiouſly preſerved in his family for many years. Tacit. 2, Hiſt. c. 3.

THAMŸRAS, or THAMYRIS, a celebrated muſician of Thrace. His father's name was Philammon, and his mother's Argiope. He became enamoured of the Muſes, and challenged them to a trial of ſkill. His challenge was accepted, and it was mutually agreed, that the conquered ſhould be totally at the diſpoſal of his victorious adverſary. He was conquered, and the Muſes deprived him of his eye-ſight and his melodious voice, and broke his lyre. His poetical compoſitions are loſt. Some accuſed him of having firſt introduced into the world the unnatural vice of which Sotades is accuſed. Homer. Il. 2, v. 594, l. 5, v. 599.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid, Amor. 3, el. 7, v. 62, Art. am. 3, v. 399.—Pauſ. 4, c. 33.

THASIUS, or THRASIUS, a famous ſoothſayer of Cyprus, who told Buſiris, king of Egypt, that to ſtop a dreadful plague which afflicted his country, he muſt offer a foreigner to Jupiter. Upon this the tyrant ordered him to be ſeized and ſacrificed to the god, as he was not a native of Egypt. Ovid. de art. am. 1, v. 649.——A ſurname of Hercules, who was worſhipped at Thaſos.

THASOS, or THASUS, a ſmall iſland in the Ægean, on the coaſt of Thrace, oppoſite the mouth of the Neſtus, antiently known by the name of Æria, Odonis, Æthria, Acte, Ogygia, Chryſe, and Cereſis. It received that of Thaſos from Thaſus the ſon of Agenor, who ſettled there when he deſpaired of finding his ſiſter Europa. It was about 40 miles in circumference, and ſo uncommonly fruitful, that the fertility of Thaſos became proverbial. Its wine was univerſally eſteemed. Its marble quarries were alſo in great repute, as well as its mines of gold and ſilver. The capital of the iſland was alſo called Thaſos. Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 5, c. 25.—Ælian. V. H. 4, &c.—Virg. G. 2, v. 91.

Theatetes, a Greek epigrammatist.

Theba, or Thebe, a town of Cilicia. Vid. Thebæ.

Thebæ (arum) a celebrated city, the capital of Bœotia, situate on the banks of the river Ismenus. The manner of its foundation is not precisely known. Cadmus is supposed to have first begun to found it by building the citadel Cadmea. It was afterwards finished by Amphion and Zethus, but according to Varro, it owed its origin to Ogyges. The government of Thebes was monarchical, and many of the sovereigns are celebrated for their misfortunes, such as Laius, Œdipus, Polynices, Eteocles, &c. The war which Thebes supported against the Argives, is famous as well as that of the Epigoni. The Thebans were looked upon as an indolent and sluggish nation, and the words of Theban pig, became poverbial to express a man remarkable for stupidity and inattention. This however was not literally true, under Epaminondas, the Thebans, though before dependent, became masters of Greece, and every thing was done according to their will and pleasure. When Alexander invaded Greece, he ordered Thebes to be totally demolished, because it had revolted against him, except the house where the poet Pindar had been born and educated. Thebes was afterwards repaired by Cassander, the son of Antipater. The monarchical government was abolished there at the death of Xanthus, about 1190 years before Christ, and Thebes became a republic. It received its name from Thebe the daughter of Asopus, to whom the founder Amphion was nearly related. Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c. —Mela. 2, c. 3.—Paus. 2, c. 6, l. 9, c. 5. Strab. 9.—Plut. in Pel. Flam. & Alex. —C. Nep. in Pel. Epam. &c.—Horat. art Poet. 394.—Ovid Met.——A town at the south of Troas, built by Hercules, and also called Placia and Hypoplacia. It fell into the hands of the Cilicians, who occupied it during the Trojan war. Curt. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 11.——An antient celebrated city of Thebais in Egypt, called also Hecatompylos, on account of its hundred gates, and Diospolis, as being sacred to Jupiter. In the time of its splendor, it extended above 23 miles, and upon any emergency could send into the field by each of its hundred gates 20,000 fighting men, and 200 chariots. Thebes was ruined by Cambyses king of Persia. Juv. 15.—Plin. 36.—Tacit. Ann. 2.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Diod. 2.—*Homer. Themĕnus, a ſon of Ariſtomachus, better known by the name of Temenus.

Themīson, a famous phyſician of Laodicea, diſciple to Aſclepiades. He was founder of a ſect called methodiſts, becauſe he wiſhed to introduce methods to facilitate the learning and the practice of phyſic. He floriſhed in the Auguſtan age. Plin. 29, c. 1.——One of the generals of Antiochus the Great. He was born at Cyprus. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

Themista or Themistis, a goddeſs, the ſame as Themis.

Themistius, a celebrated philoſopher of Paphlagonia in the age of Conſtantius, greatly eſteemed by the Roman emperors, and called the fine ſpeaker from his eloquent and commanding delivery. He was made a Roman ſenator, and always diſtinguiſhed for his liberality and munificence. His ſchool was greatly frequented. He wrote when young ſome commentaries on Ariſtotle, fragments of which are ſtill extant, and 33 of his orations. He profeſſed himſelf to be an enemy to flattery, and though he often deviates from this general rule in his addreſſes to the emperors, yet he ſtrongly recommends humanity, wiſdom, and clemency. The beſt edition of Themiſtius, is that of Harduin, fol. Paris, 1684.

Themisto, daughter of Hypſeus, was the third wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, by whom ſhe had four ſons, called Ptous, Leucon, Schœneus, and Erythroes. She endeavoured to kill the children of Ino, her huſband's ſecond wife, but ſhe killed her own by means of Ino, who lived in her houſe in the diſguiſe of a ſervant maid, and to whom ſhe entruſted her bloody intentions. Pauſ. 9, c. 23.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.——A woman mentioned by Polyænus.——The mother of the poet Homer, according to a tradition mentioned by Pauſanias 10, c. 24.

Themistŏcles, a celebrated general born at Athens. His father's name was Neocles, and his mother's Euterpe, or Abrotonum, a native of Halicarnaſſus, or of Thrace, or Acarnania. The beginning of his youth was marked by vices ſo flagrant, and an inclination ſo incorrigible, that his father diſinherited him. This, which might have diſheartened others, rouſed the ambition of Themiſtocles, and the protection which he was denied at home he ſought in courting the favors of the populace, and in having a ſhare in the adminiſtration of public affairs. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Themiſtocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was entruſted to his care. While the Lacedæmonians under Leonidas were oppoſing the Perſians at Thermopylæ, the naval operations of Themiſtocles, and the combined fleet of the Peloponneſians were directed to deſtroy the armament of Xerxes, and to ruin his maritime power. The obſtinate wiſh of the generals to command the Grecian fleet, might have proved fatal to the intereſt of the allies, had not Themiſtocles freely relinquiſhed his pretenſions, and by nominating his rival Eurybiades maſter of the expedition, ſhown the world that his ambition could ſtoop when his country demanded his aſſiſtance. The Perſian fleet was diſtreſſed at Artemiſium by a violent ſtorm, and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but a deciſive battle had never been fought, if Themiſtocles had not uſed threats and entreaties, and even called religion to his aid, and the favorable anſwers of the oracle to ſecond his meaſures. The Greeks actuated by different views, were unwilling to make head by ſea againſt an enemy whom they ſaw victorious by land, plundering their cities, and deſtroying all by fire and ſword; but before they were diſperſed, Themiſtocles ſent intelligence of their intentions to the Perſian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet in the bay of Salamis, prevented their eſcape, and while he wiſhed to cruſh them all at one blow, he obliged them to fight for their ſafety, as well as for the honor of their country. This battle which was fought near the iſland of Salamis, B. C. 480, was decisive, the Greeks obtained the victory, and Themistocles the honor of having destroyed the formidable navy of Xerxes. Further to ensure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch, that the Greeks had conspired to cut the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. This met with equal success, Xerxes hastened away from Greece, and while he believed, on the words of Themistocles, that his return would be disputed, he left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the victorious Greeks. These signal services to his country, endeared Themistocles to the Athenians, and he was universally called the most warlike and most courageous of all the Greeks who fought against the Persians. He was received with the most distinguishing honors, and by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, her Pireus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet in the midst of that glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen, which had proved so fatal to many of his illustrious predecessors. He was banished from the city, and after he had sought in vain a safe retreat among the republics of Greece, and the barbarians of Thrace, he threw himself into the arms of a monarch, whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, received the illustrious Athenian with kindness; and though he had formerly set a price upon his head, yet he made him one of his greatest favorites, and bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine and meat. Such kindnesses from a monarch, from whom he perhaps expected the most hostile treatment, did not alter the sentiments of Themistocles. He still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and therefore his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain, and while some affirm that he poisoned himself, others declare that he fell a prey to a violent distemper in the city of Magnesia, where he had fixed his residence, while in the dominions of the Persian monarch. His bones were conveyed to Attica, and honored with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who began to repent too late of their cruelty to the savior of his country. Themistocles died in the 65th year of his age, about 449 years before the Christian era. He has been admired as a man naturally courageous, of a disposition fond of activity, ambitious of glory and enterprize. Blessed with a provident and discerning mind, he seemed to rise superior to misfortunes, and in the midst of adversity, possessed of resources which could enable him to regain his splendor, and even to command fortune. Plut. & C. Nep. in Vitâ.—Paus. 1, c. 1, l. 8, c. 52.—Elian. V. H. 2, c. 12, l. 9, c. 18, l. 13, c. 40.——A writer, some of whose letters are extant.

Theocritus, a Greek poet who flourished at Syracuse in Sicily, 282 B. C. His father's name was Praxagoras, and his mother's Philina. He lived in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, whose praises he sang, and whose favors he enjoyed. Theocritus distinguished himself by his poetical compositions, of which 30 idyllia and some epigrams are extant, written in the Doric dialect, and admired for their beauty, elegance and simplicity. Virgil in his eclogues has imitated and often copied him. Theocritus has been blamed for the many indelicate and obscene expressions which he uses; and while he introduces shepherds and peasants with all the rusticity and ignorance of nature, he often disguises their character by making them speak of high and exalted subjects. It is said he wrote some invectives against Hiero king of Syracuse, who ordered him to be strangled. The best editions of Theocritus are Warton's, 2 vols, 4to. Oxon, 1770; that of Heinsius, 8vo. Oxon, 1699; that of Valkenaer, 8vo. L. Bat. 1781; and that of Reiske, 2 vols, 4to. Lipsi. 1760. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Laert. 5.——A Greek historian of Chios, who wrote an account of Libya. Plut.

THEODOSIOPŌLIS, a town of Armenia, built by Theodoſius, &c.

THEODOSIUS FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor ſirnamed Magnus, from the greatneſs of his exploits. He was inveſted with the imperial purple by Gratian, and appointed over Thrace and the eaſtern provinces, which had been in the poſſeſſion of Valentinian. The firſt years of his reign were marked by different conqueſts over the barbarians. The Goths were defeated in Thrace, and 4000 of their chariots, with an immenſe number of priſoners of both ſexes were the reward of the victory. This glorious campaign intimidated the inveterate enemies of Rome; they ſued for peace, and treaties of alliance were made with diſtant nations, who wiſhed to gain the favors and the friendſhip of a prince whoſe military virtues were ſo conſpicuous. Some conſpiracies were formed againſt the emperor, but Theodoſius totally diſregarded them; and while he puniſhed his competitors for the imperial purple, he thought himſelf ſufficiently ſecure in the love and the affection of his ſubjects. His reception at Rome was that of a conqueror, he triumphed over the barbarians, and reſtored peace in every part of the empire. He died of a dropſy at Milan, in the 60th year of his age, after a reign of 16 years, the 17th of January, A. D. 395. His body was conveyed to Conſtantinople, and buried by his ſon Arcadius, in the tomb of Conſtantine. Theodoſius was the laſt of the emperors who was the ſole maſter of the whole Roman empire. He left three children, Arcadius and Honorius who ſucceeded him, and Pulcheria. Theodoſius has been commended by antient writers as a prince bleſſed with every virtue, and debaſed by no vicious propenſity. Though maſter of the world he was a ſtranger to that pride and arrogance which too often diſgrace the monarch; he was affable in his behaviour, benevolent and compaſſionate, and it was his wiſh to treat his ſubjects as himſelf was treated when a private man, and a dependant. Men of merit were promoted to places of truſt and honor, and the emperor was fond of patronizing the cauſe of virtue and learning. His zeal as a follower of Chriſtianity has been applauded by all the eccleſiaſtical writers, and it was the wiſh of Theodoſius to ſupport the revealed religion, as much by his example, meekneſs, and Chriſtian charity, as by his edicts and eccleſiaſtical inſtitutions. His want of clemency, however, in one inſtance was too openly betrayed, and when the people of Theſſalonica had unmeaningly perhaps, killed one of his officers, the emperor ordered his ſoldiers to put all the inhabitants to the ſword, and no leſs than 6000 perſons, without diſtinction of rank, age or ſex, were cruelly butchered in that town in the ſpace of three hours. This violence irritated the eccleſiaſtics, and Theodoſius was compelled by St. Ambroſe to do open penance in the church, and publicly to make atonement for an act of barbarity which had excluded him from the boſom of the church and the communion of the faithful. In his private character Theodoſius was an example of ſoberneſs and temperance, his palace diſplayed becoming grandeur, but ſtill with moderation. He never indulged luxury or countenanced ſuperfluities. He was fond of bodily exerciſe, and never gave himſelf up to pleaſure and enervating enjoyments. The laws and regulations which he introduced in the Roman empire, were of the moſt ſalutary nature. Socrat. 5, &c.—Zoſim. 4, &c.—Ambroſ. Auguſtin. Claudian. &c.——The 2d, ſucceeded his father Arcadius as emperor of the weſtern Roman empire, though only in the 8th year of his age. He was governed by his ſiſter Pulcheria, and by his miniſters and eunuchs, in whoſe hands was the diſpoſal of the offices of ſtate, and all places of truſt and honor. He married Eudoxia, the daughter of a philoſopher called Leontius, a woman remarkable for her virtues and piety. The territories of Theodoſius were invaded by the Perſians, but the emperor ſoon appeared at the head of a numerous force, and the two hoſtile armies met on the frontiers of the empire. The conſternation was univerſal on both ſides; without even a battle, the Perſians fled, and no leſs than 100,000 were loſt in the waters of the Euphrates. Theodoſius raiſed the ſiege of Niſibis, where his operations failed of ſucceſs, and he averted the fury of the Huns and Vandals by bribes and promiſes. He died on the 29th of July, in the 49th year of his age, A. D. 450, leaving only one daughter Licinia Eudoxia, whom he had married to the emperor Valentinian 3d. The careleſſneſs and inattention of Theodoſius to public affairs is well known. He ſigned all the papers that were brought to him without even opening them or reading them, till his ſiſter appriſed him of his negligence, and rendered him more careful and diligent, by making him ſign a paper, in which he delivered into her hands Eudoxia his wife as a ſlave and menial ſervant. The laws and regulations which were promulgated under him, and ſelected from the moſt uſeful and ſalutary inſtitutions of his imperial predeceſſors, have been called the Theodoſian code. Theodoſius was a warm advocate for the Chriſtian religion, but he has been blamed for his partial attachment to thoſe who oppoſed the orthodox faith. Soxom.—Socrates, &c.——A lover of Antonina the wife of Beliſarius.——A mathematician of Tripoli, who floriſhed 75 B. THEODŌTA, a courtezan of Elis, in the age of Socrates.——A Roman empreſs, &c.

THEODOTIAN, an interpreter, in the reign of Commodus.

THEODŌTUS, an admiral of the Rhodians, ſent by his countrymen to make a treaty with the Romans.——A native of Chios, who adviſed Ptolemy to murder Pompey. He carried the head of the unfortunate Roman to Cæſar. He was at laſt put to death by Brutus.——A Syracuſan accuſed of a conſpiracy againſt Hieronymus the tyrant of Syracuſe.——A governor of Bactriana in the age of Antiochus, who revolted and made himſelf king, B. C. 250.——A friend of the emperor Julian.——A Phœnician hiſtorian.——One of the generals of Alexander.

THEOGNĒTES, a Greek tragic poet.

THEOGNIS, a Greek poet of Megara, who floriſhed about 549 years before Chriſt. He wrote ſeveral poems, of which only a few ſentences are now extant, quoted by Plato and other Greek hiſtorians and philoſophers. The beſt edition of Theognis, is that of Blackwall, 12mo. London 1706.——There was alſo a tragic poet of the ſame name, whoſe compoſitions were ſo lifeleſs and inanimated, that they procured him the name of Chion or ſnow.

THEOMNESTUS, a rival of Nicias in the adminiſtration of public affairs at Athens. Strab. 14.——A ſtatuary of Sardinia. Paſ. 6, c. 15.——An Athenian philoſopher among the followers of Plato's doctrines. He had Brutus, Cæſar's murderer, among his pupils.——A painter. Plin. 35.

THEON, a philoſopher who uſed frequently to walk in his ſleep.——An aſtronomer of Smyrna, in the reign of Adrian.——A painter of Samos. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 44.——Another philoſopher. Diog.——An infamous reviler. Horat. 1, ep. 19.

THEONOE, a daughter of Theſtor, ſiſter to Calchas. She was carried away by ſea pirates and ſold to Icarus, king of Caria, &c. Hygin. fab. 190.——A daughter of Proteus, who became enamoured of Canobus, the pilot of a Trojan veſſel, &c.

THEOPE, one of the daughters of Leos.

THEOPHĀNE, a daughter of Biſaltus, whom Neptune changed into a ſheep, to remove her from her numerous ſuitors. The god afterwards aſſumed the ſhape of a ram, and under this transformation he had by the nymph a ram with a golden fleece, which carried Phryxus to Colchis. Ovid. Met. 6, c. 177.—Hygin. fab. 188.

THEOPHĀNES, a Greek hiſtorian born at Mitylene. He was very intimate with Pompey, and from his friendſhip with the Roman general his countrymen derived many advantages. After the battle of Pharſalia he adviſed Pompey to retire to the court of Egypt. Cic. pro Arch. &c.—Paterc. Plu.

THEOPHANIA, feſtivals celebrated at Delphi in honor of Apollo.

THEOPHĬLUS, a comic poet of Athens.——A governor of Syria in the age of Julian.——A friend of Piſo.——A phyſician whoſe treatiſe de Urinis is beſt edited by Guidotius, L. Bat. 1728, and another by Morell, 8vo. Paris 1556.——One of the Greek fathers, whoſe work ad Autolycum is beſt edited in 12mo. by Wolf, Hamb. 1724.——The name of Theophilus is common among the primitive Chriſtians.

THEOPHRASTUS, a native of Ereſus, in Leſbos, ſon of a fuller. He ſtudied under Plato, and afterwards under Ariſtotle, whoſe friendſhip he gained, and whoſe warmeſt commendations he deſerved. His original name was Tyrtamus, but this the philoſopher made him exchange for that of Euphraſtus, to intimate his excellence in ſpeaking, and afterwards for that of Theophraſtus, which he deemed ſtill more expreſſive of his eloquence, the brilliancy of his genius, and the elegance of his language. After the death of Socrates, when the malevolence of the Athenians drove all the philoſopher's friends from the city, Theophraſtus ſucceeded Ariſtotle in the Lyceum, and rendered himſelf ſo conſpicuous that in a ſhort time the number of his auditors was encreaſed to two thouſand. Not only his countrymen courted his applauſe, but kings and princes were deſirous of his friendſhip; and Caſſander and Ptolemy, two of the moſt powerful of the ſucceſſors of Alexander, regarded him with uncommon tenderneſs. Theophraſtus compoſed many books, and Diogenes has enumerated the titles of above 200 treatiſes, which he wrote with great elegance and copiouſneſs. Some of theſe are ſtill extant, among which are his hiſtory of ſtones, his treatiſe on plants, and his characters, an excellent moral treatiſe, which was begun in the 99th year of his age. He died loaded with years and infirmities in the 107th year of his age, B. C. 288, lamenting the ſhortneſs of life, and complaining of the partiality of nature in granting longevity to the crow and to the ſtag, but not to mankind. To his care we are indebted for the works of Ariſtotle, which the dying philoſopher entruſted to him. The beſt edition of Theophraſtus is that of Heinſius, fol. L. Bat. 1613; and of his characters, that of Needham, 8vo. Cantab. 1712. Cic. Tuſc. 3, c. 28. in Brut. c. 31. in Orat, 19, &c.—Strab. 13.—*Diog. in vitâ.—Ælian. V. THEOPOLĔMUS, a man who with his brother Hiero plundered Apollo's temple at Delphi, and fled away for fear of being puniſhed. Cic. in Verr. 5.

THEOPOMPUS, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ, who ſucceeded his father Nicander, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the many new regulations he introduced. He created the Ephori, and died after a long and peaceful reign, B. C. 723. While he ſat on the throne the Spartans made war againſt Meſſenia. Plut. in Lyc.—Pauſ. 3, c. 7.——A famous Greek hiſtorian of Chios, diſciple of Iſocrates, who floriſhed B. C. 354. All his compoſitions are loſt, except a few fragments quoted by antient writers. He is compared to Thucydides and Herodotus, as an hiſtorian, yet he is ſeverely cenſured for his ſatirical remarks and illiberal reflections. He obtained a prize in which his maſter was a competitor, and he was liberally rewarded for compoſing the beſt funeral oration in honor of Mauſolus. His father's name was Damaſiſtratus. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—Plut. in Lyſ.—C. Nep. 7.—Pauſ. 6, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——An Athenian who attempted to deliver his countrymen from the tyranny of Demetrius. Polyæn. 5.——A comic poet in the age of Menander. He wrote 24 plays, all loſt.——A ſon of Demaratus who obtained ſeveral crowns at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 6, c. 10.——An orator and hiſtorian of Cnidus, very intimate with J. Cæſar. Strab. 14.——A Spartan general, killed at the battle of Tegyra.——A philoſopher of Cheronæa, in the reign of the emperor Philip.

THEOPHYLACTUS SIMOCATTA, a Byzantine hiſtorian, whoſe works were edited fol. Paris, 1647.——One of the Greek fathers, who floriſhed, A. D. 1070. His works were edited at Venice, 4 vols. 1754 to 1763.

THEORIUS, a ſirname of Apollo at Trœzene. It ſignifies clear ſighted.

THEOTĪMUS, a wreſtler in the age of Alexander. Pauſ. 6, c. 17.—— A Greek who wrote an hiſtory of Italy.

THEOXĔNA, a woman who threw herſelf into the ſea, when unable to eſcape from the ſoldiers of king Philip, who purſued her.

THEOXENIA, a feſtival celebrated in honor of all the gods in every city of Greece, but eſpecially at Athens. The Dioſcuri eſtabliſhed a feſtival of the ſame name, in honor of the gods who had viſited them at one of their entertainments.

THEOXENIUS, a ſirname of Apollo.

THERA, a daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Hygin. fab. 69.——One of the Sporades in the Ægean ſea, antiently called Calliſta. It was firſt inhabited by the Phœnicians, who were left there under Membliares by Cadmus, when he went in queſt of his ſiſter Europa. It was called Thera by Theras, the ſon of Auteſion, who ſettled there with a colony from Lacedæmon. Pauſ. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 4.—Strab. 8.

THERAMBUS, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

THERAMĔNES, an Athenian philoſopher and general in the age of Alcibiades. His father's name was Agnon. He was one of the 30 tyrants at Athens, but he had no ſhare in the cruelties and oppreſſion which diſgraced their adminiſtration. He was accuſed by Critias, one of his colleagues, becauſe he oppoſed their views, and he was condemned to drink hemlock, though defended by his own innocence, and the friendly interceſſion of the philoſopher Socrates. He drank the poiſon with great compoſure, and poured ſome of it on the ground, with the ſarcaſtical exclamation of, This is to the health of Critias. This happened about 404 years before the Chriſtian era. Theramenes has been called Cothurnus, on account of the fickleneſs of his diſpoſition. Cic. de orat. 3, c. 16.—Plut. in Alcib. &c.—C. Nep.

THERAPNE, or TERAPNE, a town of Laconia, at the weſt of the Eurotas, where Apollo had a temple called Phœbeum. It was at a very ſhort diſtance from Lacedæmon, and indeed ſome authors have confounded it with the capital of Laconia. It received its name from Therapne, a daughter of Lelex. Pauſ. 3, c. 14.—Ovid Faſt. 5, v. 223.

THERAS, a ſon of Auteſion of Lacedæmon, who conducted a colony to Calliſta, to which he gave the name of Thera. He received divine honors after death. Pauſ. 3, c. 1, & 15.

THERIPPIDAS, a Lacedæmonian, &c. Diod. 15.

THERITAS, a ſirname of Mars in Laconia.

THERMA, a town of Africa.——A town of Macedonia, afterwards called Theſſalonica, in honor of the wife of Caſſander. The bay in the neighbourhood of Therma is called Thermæus, or Thermaicus ſinus, and advances far into the country, ſo much that Pliny has named it Macedonicus ſinus, by way of eminence, to intimate its extent. Strab.—Tacit. an. 5, c. 10.—Herodot.

THERMŌDON, a famous river of Cappadocia, in the antient country of the Amazons, falling into the Euxine ſea near Themiſcyra. There was alſo a ſmall river of the ſame name in Bœotia, near Tanagra, which was afterwards called Hæmon. Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 19.—Pauſ. 1, c. 1, l. 9, c. 19.—Plut. in Dem.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 659.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 249, &c.

THERMOPYLÆ, a ſmall paſs leading from Theſſaly into Locris and Phocis. It has a large ridge of mountains on the weſt, and the ſea on the eaſt, with deep and dangerous marſhes, being in the narroweſt part only 25 feet in breadth. Thermopylæ receives its name from the hot baths which are in the neighbourhood. It is celebrated for a battle which was fought there, B. C. 480, on the 7th of Auguſt, between Xerxes and the Greeks, in which 300 Spartans reſiſted for three ſucceſſive days repeatedly the attacks of the moſt brave and courageous of the Perſian army, which according to ſome hiſtorians amounted to five millions. There was alſo another battle fought there between the Romans and Antiochus, king of Syria. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 36, c. 15.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plut. in Cat. &c.—Pauſ. 7, c. 15.

THERMUS, a man accuſed in the reign of Tiberius, &c.——A man put to death by Nero.——A town of Ætolia, the capital of the country.

THERODĂMAS, a king of Scythia, who as ſome report, fed lions with human blood, that they might be more cruel. Ovid. Ib. 383.

THERON, a tyrant of Agrigentum, who died 472 B. C.——One of Actæon's dogs. Ovid.——A Rutulian who attempted to kill Æneas. He periſhed in the attempt. Æn. 10, v. 312.——A prieſt in the temple of Hercules at Saguntum, &c. Sil. 2, v. 149.——A Theban deſcended from the Spartæ. Stat. Theb. 2, v. 572.——A daughter of Phylas beloved by Apollo. Pauſ. 9, c. 40.

THERPANDER, a celebrated poet and muſician of Leſbos, about 650 years before the Chriſtian era, who ſeveral times obtained the prize in the different muſical conteſts of the Greeks. He was fined by the Ephori at Lacedæmon, becauſe he had added one ſtring more to the lyre. His poetical compoſitions are loſt.

THERSANDER, a ſon of Polynices and Argia. He accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, but he was killed in Myſia by Telephus, before the confederate army reached the enemy's country. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.—Apolled. 3, c. 7.——A ſon of Siſyphus, king of Corinth.——A muſician of Ionia.

THERSĬLŎCHUS, a leader of the Pæonians in the Trojan war, killed by Achilles. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.——A friend of Æneas killed by Turnus. Id. 12, v. 363.——An athlete of Corcyra, crowned at the Olympic games. Pauſ. 6, c. 13.

THERSIPPUS, a ſon of Agrius, who drove Œneus from the throne of Calydon.——A man who carried a letter from Alexander to Darius. Curt.——An Athenian author who died 954 B. C.

THERSITES, an officer the moſt deformed

ld and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow ſoldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulyſſes. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fiſt, becauſe he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthefilea. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 13, v. 15.—— Apollod. 3, c. 8.—Homer. Il. 2, 212, &c.

THESEIDÆ, a patronymic given to the Athenians from Theſeus, one of their kings. Virg. G. 2, v. 383.

THESEIS, a poem written by Codrus, containing an account of the life and actions of Theſeus, and now loſt. Juv. 1, v. 2.

THESEUS, king of Athens, and ſon of Ægeus by Æthra the daughter of Pittheus, was one of the moſt celebrated of the heroes of antiquity. He was educated at Trœzene in the houſe of Pittheus, and as he was not publicly acknowledged to be the ſon of the king of Athens, he paſſed for the ſon of Neptune. When he came to the years of maturity, he was ſent by his mother to his father, and a ſword was given him, by which he might make himſelf known to Ægeus in a private manner. [Vid. Ægeus.] His journey to Athens was not acroſs the ſea, as it was uſual with travellers, but Theſeus determined to ſignalize himſelf in going by land, and encountering difficulties. The road which led from Trœzene to Athens was infeſted with robbers and wild beaſts, and rendered impaſſable, but theſe obſtacles were eaſily removed by the courageous ſon of Ægeus. He deſtroyed Corynetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procuſtes, and the celebrated Phæa. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial, Medea lived there with Ægeus, and as ſhe knew that her influence would fall to the ground if Theſeus was received in his father's houſe, ſhe attempted to deſtroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himſelf to give the cup of poiſon to this unknown ſtranger at a feaſt, but the ſight of his ſword on the ſide of Theſeus, reminded him of his amours with Æthra. He knew him to be his ſon, and the people of Athens were glad to find that this illuſtrious ſtranger who had cleared Attica from robbers and pirates, was the ſon of their monarch. The Pallantides, who expected to ſucceed their uncle Ægeus on the throne, as he had no children, attempted to aſſaſſinate Theſeus, but they fell a prey to their own barbarity, and were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon next engaged the attention of Theſeus. The labor ſeemed arduous, but he caught the animal alive, and after he had led it through the ſtreets of Athens, he ſacrificed it to Minerva, or the god of Delphi. After this, Theſeus went to Crete among the ſeven choſen youths whom the Athenians yearly ſent to be devoured by the Minotaur. The wiſh to deliver his country from ſo dreadful a tribute, engaged him to undertake this expedition. He was ſucceſsful, by means of Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, who was enamoured of him, and after he had eſcaped from the labyrinth with a clue of thread and killed the Minotaur, [Vid. Minotaurus] he ſailed from Crete with the ſix boys and ſeven maidens, whom his victory had equally redeemed from death. In the iſland of Naxos, where he was driven by the winds, he had the meanneſs to abandon Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his ſafety. The rejoicings which his return might have occaſioned at Athens, were intercepted by the death of Ægeus, who threw himſelf into the ſea, when he ſaw his ſon's ſhip return with black ſails, which was the ſignal of ill-ſucceſs. [Vid. Ægeus.] His aſcenſion on his father's throne was univerſally applauded, B. C. 1235. The Athenians were governed with mildneſs, and Theſeus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The number of the inhabitants of Athens was encreaſed by the liberality of the monarch, religious worſhip was attended with more than uſual ſolemnity, a court was inſtituted which had the care of all civil affairs, and Theſeus made the government democratical, while he reſerved for himſelf, only the command of the armies. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, made his alliance courted; but Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, alone wiſhed to gain his friendſhip, by meeting him in the field of battle. He invaded the territories of Attica, and when Theſeus had marched out to meet him, the two enemies, ſtruck at the ſight of each other, ruſhed between their two armies to embrace one another in the moſt cordial and affectionate manner, and from that time began the moſt ſincere and admired friendſhip which has become proverbial. Theſeus was preſent at the nuptials of his friend, and he was the moſt eager and courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia, and her female attendants, againſt the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. When Pirithous had loſt Hippodamia, he agreed with Theſeus, whoſe wife was alſo dead, to carry away ſome of the daughters of the gods. Their firſt attempt was upon Helen, the daughter of Leda, and after they had obtained this beautiful prize, they caſt lots, and ſhe became the property of Theſeus. The Athenian monarch entruſted her to the care of his mother Æthra at Aphidnæ, till ſhe was of nubile years, but the reſentment of Caſtor and Pollux, ſoon obliged him to reſtore her ſafe into their hands. Helen, before ſhe reached Sparta, became mother of a daughter by Theſeus, but this tradition, confirmed by ſome antient mythologiſts, is confuted by others, who affirm, that ſhe was but nine years old when carried away by the two royal friends, and Ovid introduces her in one of his epiſtles, ſaying, Excepto redii paſſa timore nihil. Some time after Theſeus aſſiſted his friend in procuring a wife, and they both deſcended into the infernal regions to carry away Proſerpine. Pluto, apprized of their intentions, ſtopped them. Pirithous was placed on his father's wheel, and Theſeus was tied to a huge ſtone, on which he had ſat to reſt himſelf. Virgil repreſents him in this eternal ſtate of puniſhment, repeating to the ſhades in Tartarus, the words of Diſcite juſtitiam moniti, & non temnere divos. Appollodorus however, and others declare, that he was not long detained in hell; when Hercules came to ſteal the dog Cerberus, he tore him away from the ſtone, but with ſuch violence, that his ſkin was left behind. The ſame aſſiſtance was given to Pirithous, and the two friends returned upon the earth by the favors of Hercules, and the conſent of the infernal deities, not, however, without ſuffering the moſt excruciating torments. During the captivity of Theſeus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mneſtheus, one of the deſcendants of Erechtheus, ingratiated himſelf into the favors of the people of Athens, and obtained the crown in preference to the children of the abſent monarch. At his return Theſeus attempted to eject the uſurper, but to no purpoſe. The Athenians had forgotten his many ſervices, and he retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the iſland of Scyros. After paying him much attention, Lycomedes, either jealous of his fame, or bribed by the preſents of Mneſtheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of ſhewing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. Some ſuppoſe that Theſeus inadvertently fell down this precipice, and that he was cruſhed to death without receiving any violence from Lycomedes. The children of Theſeus after the death of Mneſtheus, recovered the Athenian throne, and that the memory of their father might not be without the honors due to a hero, they brought his remains from Scyros, and gave them a magnificent burial. They alſo raiſed ſtatues and a temple, and faſtivals and games were publicly inſtituted to commemorate the actions of a hero, who had rendered ſuch ſervices to the people of Athens. Theſe feſtivals were ſtill celebrated with original ſolemnity in the age of Pauſanias and Plutarch, about 1200 years after the death of Theſeus. The hiſtorians diſagree from the poets in their accounts about this hero, and they all ſuppoſe, that inſtead of attempting to carry away the wife of Pluto, the two friends wiſhed to ſeduce a daughter of Aidoneus, king of the Moloſſi. This daughter, as they ſay, bore the name of Proſerpine, and the dog which kept the gates of the palace was called Cerberus, and hence perhaps ariſes the fiction of the poets. Pirithous was torn to pieces by the dog, but Theſeus was confined in priſon, from whence he made his eſcape ſome time after, by the aſſiſtance of Hercules. Some authors place Theſeus and his friend in the number of the Argonauts, but they were both detained, either in the infernal regions, or in the country of the Moloſſi, in the time of Jaſon's expedition to Colchis. Plut. in vitâ.—Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 14, & 79.—Pauſ. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Ovid. THESIDÆ, a name given to the people of Athens, becauſe they were governed by Theſeus.

THESIDES, a patronymic, applied to the children of Theſeus, eſpecially Hippolytus. Ovid. Her. 4, v. 65.

THESMOPHŎRA, a ſirname of Ceres, as law giver, in whoſe honor feſtivals were inſtituted called Theſmophoria. The Theſmophoria were inſtituted by Triptolemus, or according to ſome by Orpheus, or the daughters of Danaus. The greateſt part of the Grecian cities, eſpecially Athens obſerved them with great ſolemnity. The worſhippers were free born women, whoſe huſbands were obliged to defray the expences of the feſtival. They were aſſiſted by a prieſt called στεφανοφορος, becauſe he carried a crown on his head. There were alſo certain virgins who officiated, and were maintained at the public expence. The free born women were dreſſed in white robes to intimate their ſpotleſs innocence; they were charged to obſerve the ſtricteſt chaſtity during three or five days before the celebration, and during the four days of the ſolemnity, and on that account it was uſual for them to ſtrew their bed with agnus caſtus, fleabane, and all ſuch herbs as were ſuppoſed to have the power of expelling all venereal propenſities. They were alſo charged not to eat pomegranates, or to wear garlands on their heads, as the whole was to be obſerved with the greateſt ſigns of ſeriouſneſs and gravity, without any diſplay of wantonneſs or levity. It was however uſual to jeſt at one another, as the goddeſs Ceres had been made to ſmile by a merry expreſſion when ſhe was ſad and melancholy for the recent loſs of her daughter Proſerpina.

Three days were required for the preparation, and upon the 11th of the month called Pyanepſion, the women went to Eleuſis, carrying books on their heads, in which the laws which the goddeſs had invented were contained. On the 14th of the ſame month the feſtival began, on the 16th day a faſt was obſerved, and the women ſat on the ground in token of humiliation. It was uſual during the feſtival to offer prayers to Ceres, Proſerpine, Pluto, and Calligenia, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be the nurſe or favorite maid of the goddeſs of corn, or perhaps one of her ſirnames. There were ſome ſacrifices of a myſterious nature, and all perſons whoſe offence was ſmall were releaſed from confinement. Such as were initiated at the feſtivals of Eleuſis aſſiſted at the Theſmophoria. The place of high prieſt was hereditary in the family of Eumolpus. *Ovid. THESMOTHĔTÆ, a name given to the laſt ſix Archons among the Athenians, becauſe they took particular care to enforce the laws, and to ſee juſtice impartially adminiſtered. They were at that time nine in number.

THESPIA, a town of Bœotia, at the foot of mount Helicon, which received its name from Theſpia, the daughter of Aſopus, or from Theſpius. Pauſ. 9, c. 26.—Strab. 9.

THESPIĂDÆ, the ſons of the Theſpiades. Vid. Theſpius.

THESPIĂDES, a name given to the 50 daughters of Theſpius. [Vid. Theſpius.—— Alſo a ſirname of the nine muſes, becauſe they were held in great veneration in Theſpia.

THESPIS, a Greek poet of Attica, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the inventor of tragedy, 536 years before Chriſt. His repreſentations were very ruſtic and imperfect. He went from town to town upon a cart, on which was erected a temporary ſtage, where two actors, whoſe faces were daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral ſongs, &c. Solon was a great enemy to his dramatic repreſentations. Horat. art. P. 276. Diog.

THESPIUS or THĔSTIUS, a king of Theſpia in Bœotia, ſon of Erechtheus according to ſome authors. He was deſirous that his fifty daughters ſhould have children by Hercules, and therefore when that hero was at his court he permitted him to enjoy their company. This, which according to ſome was effected in one night, paſſes for the 13th and moſt arduous of the labors of Hercules, as the two following lines from the arcana arcaniſſima indicate:

Tertius hinc decimus labor eſt duriſſimus, unâ
Quinquaginta ſimul ſtrupravit nocte puellas.

All the daughters of Theſpius brought male children into the world, and ſome of them twins, particularly Procris the eldeſt, and the youngeſt. Some ſuppoſe that one of the Theſpiades refuſed to admit Hercules to her arms; for which the hero condemned her to paſs all her life in continual celibacy, and to become the prieſteſs of a temple he had at Theſpia. The children of the Theſpiades, called Theſpiadæ, went to Sardinia, where they made a ſettlement with Iolaus, the friend of their father. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Pauſ. 9, c. 26 & 27.—Plut.

THESPRŌTIA, a country of Epirus, at the weſt of Ambracia, bounded on the ſouth by the ſea. It is watered by the rivers Acheron and Cocytus, which the poets, after Homer, have called ſtreams of hell. The oracle of Dodona was in Theſprotia. Homer. Od. 14, v. 315.—Strab. 7, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 17.—Lucan. 3, v. 179.

THESPRŌTUS, a ſon of Lycaon king of Arcadia. Apollod. 3, c. 8.

THESSĂLIA, a country of Greece, whoſe boundaries have been different at different periods. Properly ſpeaking, Theſſaly was bounded on the ſouth by the ſouthern parts of Greece, or Græcia propria; eaſt, by the Ægean; north by Macedonia and Mygdonia; and weſt, by Illyricum and Epirus. It was generally divided into four ſeparate provinces, Theſſaliotis, Pelaſgiotis, Iſtiæotis, and Phthiotis, to which, ſome add Magneſia. It has been ſeverally called Æmonia, Pelaſgicum, Argos, Hellas, Argeia, Dryopis, Pelaſgia, Pyrrhæa, &c. The name of Theſſalia is derived from Theſſalus, one of its monarchs. Theſſaly is famous for a deluge which happened there in the age of Deucalion. Its mountains and cities are alſo celebrated, ſuch as Olympus, Pelion, Oſſa, Lariſſa, &c. The Argonauts were partly natives of Theſſaly. The inhabitants of the country paſſed for a treacherous nation, ſo that falſe money was called Theſſalian coin; and a perfidious action, a Theſſalian deceit. Theſſaly was governed by kings, till it became ſubject to the Macedonian monarchs. The cavalry was univerſally eſteemed, and the people were ſuperſtitious, and addicted to the ſtudy of magic and incantations. Theſſaly is now called Janna. Lucan. 6, v. 438, &c.—Dionyſ. 210.—Curt. 3, c. 2.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c 1.—Pauſ. 4, c. 36, l. 10, c. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Juſtin. 7, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

THESSĂLION, a ſervant of Mentor, of Sidon, &c.

THESSALIOTIS, a part of Theſſaly at the ſouth of the river Peneus.

THESSALONĪCA, an antient town of Macedonia, first called Therma, and Theſſalonica after Theſſalonica, the wife of Caſſander. According to antient writers it was once very powerful, and it ſtill continues to be a place of note. Strab. 7.—Dionyſ.—Cic. in Piſ. c. 17.—Mela. 2, c. 3.——A daughter of Philip, king of Macedonia, ſiſter to Alexander the Great. She married Caſſander, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Antipater, who put her to death. Pauſ. 8, c. 7.

THESSĂLUS, a ſon of Æmon.——A ſon of Hercules and Calliope, daughter of Euryphilus. Theſſaly received its name from one of theſe.——A phyſician who invited Alexander to a feaſt at Babylon to give him poiſon.——A phyſician of Lydia in the age of Nero. He gained the favors of the great and opulent of Rome, by the meanneſs and ſervility of his behaviour. He treated all phyſicians with contempt, and thought himſelf ſuperior to all his predeceſſors.——A ſon of Cimon, who accuſed Alcibiades becauſe he imitated the myſteries of Ceres.——A ſon of Piſiſtratus.——A player in the age of Alexander.

THESTE, a ſiſter of Dionyſius the elder, tyrant of Syracuſe. She married Philoxenus, and was greatly eſteemed by the Sicilians.

THESTIA, a town of Acarnania.

THESTIĂDÆ & THESTIĂDES. Vid. Theſpiadæ & Theſpiades.

THESTIAS, a patronymic of Althæa, daughter of Theſtius. Ovid. Met. 8.

THESTIĂDÆ, the ſons of Theſtius, Toxeus & Plexippus. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 286.

THESTIS, a fountain in the country of Cyrene.

THESTIUS, a ſon of Parthaon, father to Toxeus, Plexippus, and Althæa.——A king of Theſpia. [Vid. Theſpius.]——The ſons of Theſtius were killed by Meleager at the chace of the Calydonian boar.

THESTOR, a ſon of Idmon, father to Calchas. From him Calchas is often called Theſtorides. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 19. Stat. 3, Ach. v. 497.—Apollon. 1, v. 239.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 69.

THESTŸLIS, a country woman mentioned in Theocritus and Virgil.

THETIS, one of the ſea deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris, often confounded with Tethys, her grand mother. She was courted by Neptune and Jupiter, but when the gods were informed that the ſon ſhe ſhould bring forth muſt become greater than his father, their addreſſes were ſtopped, and Peleus, the ſon of Æacus, was permitted to ſolicit her hand. Thetis refuſed him, but the lover had the artifice to catch her when aſleep, and by binding her ſtrongly, he prevented her from eſcaping from his graſp, in aſſuming different forms. When Thetis found that ſhe could not elude the vigilance of her lover, ſhe conſented to marry him, though much againſt her inclination. Their nuptials were celebrated on mount Pelion, with great pomp; all the deities attended except the goddeſs of diſcord, who puniſhed the negligence of Peleus, by throwing into the midſt of the aſſembly a golden apple, to be given to the faireſt of all the goddeſſes. [Vid. Diſcordia.] Thetis became mother of ſeveral children by Peleus, but all theſe ſhe deſtroyed by fire in attempting to ſee whether they were immortal. Achilles muſt have ſhared the ſame fate, if Peleus had not ſnatched him from her hand as ſhe was going to repeat the cruel operation. She afterwards rendered him invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which ſhe held him. As Thetis well knew the fate of her ſon, ſhe attempted to remove him from the Trojan war by concealing him in the court of Lycomedes. This was uſeleſs, he went with the reſt of the Greeks. The mother, ſtill anxious for his preſervation, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him a ſuit of armour; but when it was done, ſhe refuſed the god the favors which ſhe had promiſed him. When Achilles was killed by Paris, Thetis iſſued out of the ſea with the Nereides to mourn his death, and after ſhe had collected his aſhes in a golden urn, ſhe raiſed a monument to his memory, and inſtituted feſtivals in his honor. Heſiod Theog. v. 244, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 2 & 9. l. 3, c. 13.—Hygin. fab. 54.—Homer Il. 1, &c. Od. 24, v. 55. Pauſ. 5, c. 18, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 7, l. 12, fab. 1, &c.

THEUTIS, or TEUTHIS, a prince of a town of the ſame name in Arcadia, who went to the Trojan war. He quarrelled with Agamemnon at Aulis, and when Minerva attempted to pacify him he ſtruck the goddeſs and returned home. Some ſay that the goddeſs appeared to him and ſhowed him the wound which he had given her in the thigh, and that he died ſoon after. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

THIA, the mother of the ſun, moon, and Aurora, by Hyperion. [Vid. Thea.]. Heſiod. Theog. v. 371.——One of the Sporades, inundated in the age of Pliny. Plin. 27, c. 12.

THIAS, a king of Aſſyria.

THIMBRON, a Lacedæmonian, choſen general to conduct a war againſt Perſia. He was recalled and afterwards re-appointed. He died, B. C. 391. Diod. 17.——A friend of Harpalus.

THIODĂMAS, the father of Hylas. Vid. Theodamas.

THISBE, a beautiful woman of Babylon. [Vid. Pyramus.]——A town of Bœotia between two mountains. Pauſ. 9, c. 32.

THISIAS, a Sicilian writer.

Thisoa, one of the three nymphs who fed Jupiter in Arcadia. She built a town which bore her name in Parrhasia. Paus. 8, c. 38.

Thoantium, a place on the sea coast at Rhodes.

Thoas, a king of Taurica Chersonesus in the age of Orestes and Pylades. He would have immolated these two celebrated strangers on Diana's altars, according to the barbarous customs of the country, had they not been delivered by Iphigenia. [Vid. Iphigenia.] According to some, Thoas was the son of Borysthenes.——A king of Lemnos, son of Bacchus and Ariadne the daughter of Minos. He had been made king of Lemnos by Rhadamanthus. He was still alive when the Lemnian women conspired to kill all the males in the island, but his life was spared by his only daughter Hipsipyle, in whose favor he had resigned the crown. Hipsipyle obliged her father to depart secretly from Lemnos, to escape from the fury of the women, and he arrived safe in a neighbouring island which some call Chios, though many suppose that Thoas was assassinated by the enraged females before he had left Lemnos. Some mythologists confound the king of Lemnos with that of Chersonesus, and suppose that they were one and the same man. According to their opinion, Thoas was very young when he retired from Lemnos, and after that he went to Taurica Chersonesus, where he settled. Flacc. 8, v. 208.—Hygin. fab. 74, 120.—Ovid in Ib. 384. Heroid. 6, v. 114.—*Stat. He went to the Trojan war on 15 or rather 40 ships. Homer Il. 2, &c.—Dictys Cret. 1.—Hygin. fab. 97.——A famous huntsman. Diod. 4.——A son of Icarius. Apollod. 3, c. 10.——A son of Jason and Hipsipyle queen of Lemnos. Stat. Theb. 6, v. 342.——A son of Ornytion, grandson of Sisyphus.——A king of Assyria, father of Adonis and Myrrha, according to Apollod. 3, c. 14.——A man who made himself master of Miletus.——An officer of Ætolia, who strongly opposed the views of the Romans, and favored the interest of Antiochus, B. C. 193.——One of the friends of Æneas in Italy, killed by Halesus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 415.

Thoe, one of the Nereides. Hesiod.——One of the horses of Admetus.——One of the Amazons, &c.

Thomyris, called also Tamyris, Tameris, Thamyris, and Tomeris, was queen of the Massagetæ. After her husband's death she marched against Cyrus, who wished to invade her territories, cut his army to pieces, and killed him on the spot. The barbarous queen ordered the head of Cyrus to be cut off and thrown into a vessel full of human blood, with the insulting words of satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Her son had been conquered by Cyrus before she marched herself at the head of her armies. Herodot. 1, c. 205.—Justin. 1, c. 8.

Tholus, a town of Africa.

Thon, an Egyptian physician, &c.

Thonis, a courtezan of Egypt.

Thoon, a Trojan chief killed by Ulysses, Ovid. Met. 13, v. 259.——One of the giants who made war against Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 6.

Thoötes, one of the Grecian heralds.

Thoranius, a general of Metellus, killed by Sertorius. Plut.

Thorax, a mountain near Magnesia, in Ionia.——A Lacedæmonian officer who served under Lysander, and was put to death by the Ephori.——A man of Larissa, who paid much attention to the dead body of Antigonus, &c. Plut. in Lys. &c.

Thoria lex, agraria, by Sp. Thorius, the tribune. It ordained that no person should pay any rent for the land which he possessed. It also made some regulations about grazing and pastures.

Thornax, a mountain of Argolis. It received its name from Thornax, a nymph who became mother of Buphagus, by Japetus. The mountain was afterwards called Coccygia, because Jupiter changed himself there into a cuckow. Paus. 8, c. 27.

Thorsus, a river of Sardinia. Paus. 10, c. 17.

Thoth, an Egyptian deity, the same as Mercury.

Thous, a Trojan chief, &c.——One of Actæon's dogs.

Thrace, a daughter of Titan.

Thraces, the inhabitants of Thrace. Vid. Thracia.

Thracia, a large country of Europe, at the south of Scythia, bounded by mount Hemus. It had the Ægean sea on the south, on the west Macedonia and the river Strymon, and on the east the Euxine sea, the Propontis, and the Hellespont. Its western boundaries extended as far as the Ister, according to Pliny and others. The Thracians were looked upon as a cruel and barbarous nation, they were naturally brave and warlike, addicted to drinking and venereal pleasures, and they sacrificed without the smallest humanity their enemies on the altars of their gods. Their government was originally monarchical, and divided among a number of independent princes. Thrace is barren, as to its ſoil. It received its name from Thrax, the ſon of Mars, the chief deity of the country. The firſt inhabitants lived upon plunder, and on the milk and fleſh of ſheep. It forms now the province of Romania. Herodot. 4, c. 99. l. 5, c. 3.—Strab. 1, &c.—*Virg. THRACIDÆ, an illuſtrious family at Delphi, deſtroyed by Philomelus, becauſe they oppoſed his views.

THRACIS, a town of Phocis. Pauſ. 10, c. 3.

THRĂSEAS, or Thraſius, a ſoothſayer. [Vid. Thaſius.]——Pætus, a ſtoic philoſopher of Patavium, in the age of Nero, famous for his independence and generous ſentiments; he died A. D. 66.

THRASIDEUS, ſucceeded his father Theron as tyrant of Agrigentum. He was conquered by Hiero, and ſoon after put to death.

THRASIUS, a general of a mercenary band in Sicily, who raiſed a ſedition againſt Timoleon. Diod. 16.——A ſpendthrift at Rome, &c. Horat. 2, Sat. 2, v. 99.

THRASO, a painter.——A favorite of Hieronymus, who eſpouſed the intereſt of the Romans. He was put to death by the tyrant.

THRASYBŪLUS, a famous general of Athens who began the expulſion of the 30 tyrants of his country, though he was only aſſiſted by 30 of his friends. His efforts were attended with ſucceſs, B. C. 401, and the only reward he received for this patriotic action was a crown made with two twigs of an olive branch; a proof of his own diſintereſtedneſs and the virtue of his countrymen. The Athenians employed a man whoſe abilities and humanity were ſo conſpicuous, and Thraſybulus was ſent with a powerful fleet to recover their loſt power in the Ægean, and on the coaſt of Aſia. After he had gained many advantages, this great man was killed in his camp by the inhabitants of Aſpendus, whom his ſoldiers had plundered without his knowledge, B. C. 391. Diod. 14.—C. Nep. in vitâ.—Cic. Phil.—Val. Max. 4, c. 1.——A tyrant of Miletus, B. C. 466.——An Athenian in the army of the Perſians, who ſupported the ſiege of Halicarnaſſus.

THRASYDÆUS, a king of Theſſaly, &c.

THRASYLLUS, a man of Attica ſo diſordered in his mind, that he believed all the ſhips which entered the Piræus to be his own. He was cured by means of his brother, whom he liberally reproached for depriving him of that happy illuſion of mind. Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 25.——A general of the Athenians in the age of Alcibiades, with whom he obtained a victory over the Perſians.——A Greek Pythagorean philoſopher and mathematician, who enjoyed the favour and the friendſhip of Auguſtus and Tiberius. Suet. in Tib.

THRASYMĂCHUS, a native of Carthage who became the pupil of Iſocrates and of Plato. Though he was a public teacher at Athens, he ſtarved for want of bread, and at laſt hanged himſelf. Juv. 7, v. 204.

THRASYMĒDES, a ſon of Neſtor, king of Pylos, by Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Hygin. fab. 27.—Pauſ. 2, c. 26.——A ſon of Philomelus, who carried away a daughter of Piſiſtratus, whom he married.

THRĂSYMĒNUS, a lake of Italy near Perufium, celebrated for a battle fought there between Annibal and the Romans, under Flaminius, B. C. 217. No leſs than 15,000 Romans were left dead on the field of battle, and 10,000 taken priſoners, or according to Livy 6,000, or Polybius 15,000. The loſs of Annibal was about 1500 men. About 10,000 Romans made their eſcape all covered with wounds. This lake is now called the lake of Perugia. Strab. 5.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 765.—Plut.

THREICIUS, of Thrace. Orpheus is called by way of eminence Threicius Sacerdos. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 645.

THREISSA, an epithet applied to Harpulyce, a native of Thrace. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 320.

THREPSIPPAS, a ſon of Hercules and Panope.

THRIAMBUS, one of the ſirnames of Bacchus.

THRONIUM, a town of Phocis.——Another of Theſprotia.

THRYON, a town of Meſſenia, near the Alpheus.

THRYUS, a town of Peloponneſus near Elis.

THUCYDIDES, a celebrated Greek hiſtorian, born at Athens. His father's name was Olorus, and among his anceſtors he reckoned the great Miltiades. His youth was diſtinguiſhed by an eager deſire to excel in the vigorous exerciſes and gymnaſtic amuſements, which called the attention of his contemporaries, and when he had reached the years of manhood, he appeared in the Athenian armies. During the Peloponneſian war he was commiſſioned by his countrymen to relieve Amphipolis; but the quick march of Braſidas, the Lacedæmonian general, neral, defeated his operations, and Thucydides, unſucceſsful in his expedition, was baniſhed from Athens. This happened in the eighth year of this celebrated war, and in the place of his baniſhment the general began to write an impartial hiſtory of the important events which had happened during his adminiſtration, and which ſtill continued to agitate the ſeveral ſtates of Greece. This famous hiſtory is continued only to the 21ſt year of the war, and the remaining part of the time till the demolition of the walls of Athens was deſcribed by the pen of Theopompus and Xenophon. Thucydides wrote in the Attic dialect, as poſſeſſed of more vigor, purity, elegance, and energy. He ſpared neither time nor money to procure authentic materials; and the Athenians, as well as their enemies, furniſhed him with many valuable communications, which contributed to throw great light on the different tranſactions of the war. His hiſtory has been divided into eight books, the laſt of which is imperfect, and ſuppoſed to have been written by his daughter. The character of this intereſting hiſtory is well known, and the noble emulation of the writer will ever be admired, who ſhed tears when he heard Herodotus repeat his hiſtory of the Perſian wars at the public feſtivals of Greece. The hiſtorian of Halicarnaſſus, has often been compared with the ſon of Olorus, but each has his peculiar excellence. Sweetneſs of ſtile, grace, and elegance of expreſſion, may be called the characteriſtics of the former, while Thucydides ſtands unequalled for the fire of his deſcriptions, the conciſeneſs, and at the ſame time, the ſtrong and energetic manner of his narratives. His relations are authentic, as he himſelf was intereſted in the events he mentions; his impartiality is indubitable, as he no where betrays the leaſt reſentment againſt his countrymen, and the factious partizans of Cleon, who had baniſhed him from Athens. Many have blamed the hiſtorian for the injudicious diſtribution of his ſubject, and while for the ſake of accuracy, the whole is divided into ſummers and winters, the thread of the hiſtory is interrupted, the ſcene continually ſhifted; and the reader, unable to purſue events to the end, is tranſported from Aſia to Peloponneſus, or from the walls of Syracuſe to the coaſt of Corcyra. The animated harangues of Thucydides have been univerſally admired; he found a model in Herodotus, but he greatly ſurpaſſed the original, and ſucceeding hiſtorians have adopted, with ſucceſs, a peculiar mode of writing which introduces a general addreſſing himſelf to the paſſions and the feelings of his armies. The hiſtory of Thucydides was ſo admired, that Demoſthenes, to perfect himſelf as an orator, tranſcribed it eight different times, and read it with ſuch attention, that he could almoſt repeat it by heart. Thucydides died at Athens, where he had been recalled from his exile, in his 80th year, 391 years before Chriſt. The beſt editions of Thucydides are thoſe of Duker, fol. Amſt. 1731; of Glaſgow, 12mo. 8 vols. 1759; of Hudſon, fol. Oxon. 1696, and the 8vo. of Bipont. 1788. Cic. de orat, &c.—Diod. 12—Dionyſ. Hal. de Thuc.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 50.—Quintil.——A ſon of Mileſias, in the age of Pericles. He was baniſhed for his oppoſition to the meaſures of Pericles, &c.

Thŭle, an iſland in the moſt northern parts of the German ocean, to which on account of its great diſtance from the continent, the antients gave the epithet of ultima. Its ſituation was never accurately aſcertained, hence its preſent name is unknown by modern hiſtorians. Some ſuppoſe that it is the iſland now called Iceland, or part of Greenland. Strab. 1.—Mela. 3, c. 6.—Tacit. Agric. 10.—Plin. 2, c. 75, l. 4, c. 16.—Virg. G. 1, v. 30.

Thuriæ, or Thurium, a town of Lucania in Italy, built by a colony of Athenians, near the ruins of Sybaris, B. C. 444. In the number of this Athenian colony were Lyſias and Herodotus. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.——A town of Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4, c. 31.

Thyana, a town of Cappadocia.

Thyatira, a town of Lydia.

Thybarni, a people near Sardes.

Thyesta, a ſiſter of Dionyſius, the tyrant of Syracuſe.

Thyestes, ſon of Pelops and Hippodamia, and grandſon of Tantalus, debauched Ærope, the wife of his brother Ægeus, becauſe he refuſed to take him as his colleague on the throne of Argos. This was no ſooner known, than Atreus divorced Ærope, and baniſhed Thyeſtes from his kingdom, but ſoon after, the more effectually to puniſh his infidelity, he expreſſed a wiſh to be reconciled to him, and recalled him to Argos. Thyeſtes was received by his brother at an elegant entertainment, but he was ſoon informed that he had been feeding upon the flesh of one of his own children. This Atreus took care to communicate to him by showing him the remains of his son's body. This action appeared so barbarous, that, according to the antient mythologists, the sun changed his usual course, not to be a spectator of so bloody a scene. Thyestes escaped from his brother, and fled to Epirus. Some time after he met his daughter Pelopeia in a grove sacred to Minerva, and he offered her violence without knowing who she was. This incest, however, according to some, was intentionally committed by the father, as he had been told by an oracle, that the injuries he had received from Atreus would be avenged by a son born from himself and Pelopeia. The daughter, pregnant by her father, was seen by her uncle Atreus and married, and sometime after she brought into the world a son, whom she exposed in the woods. The life of the child was preserved by goats; he was called Ægysthus, and presented to his mother, and educated in the family of Atreus. When grown to years of maturity, the mother gave her son Ægysthus a sword, which she had taken from her unknown ravisher in the grove of Minerva, with hopes of discovering who he was. Meantime Atreus, intent to punish his brother, sent Agamemnon and Menelaus to pursue him, and when at last they found him, he was dragged to Argos, and thrown into a close prison. Ægysthus was sent to murder Thyestes, but the father recollected the sword, which was raised to stab him, and a few questions convinced him that his assassin was his own son. Pelopeia was present at this discovery, and when she found that she had committed incest with her father, she asked Ægysthus to examine the sword, and immediately plunged it into her own breast. Ægysthus rushed from the prison to Atreus, with the bloody weapon, and murdered him near an altar, as he wished to offer thanks to the gods on the supposed death of Thyestes. At the death of Atreus, Thyestes was placed on his brother's throne by Ægysthus, from which he was soon after driven by Agamemnon and Menelaus. He retired from Argos, and was banished into the island of Cythera by Agamemnon, where he died. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Sophocl. in Ajac.—Hygin. fab. 86, &c.—Ovid. in Ib. 359.—Lucan. 1, v. 544. l. 7, v. 451.—Senec. in Thyest.

THYMBRA, a small town of Lydia, near Sardes, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between Cyrus and Crœsus, in which the latter was defeated. The troops of Cyrus amounted to 196,000 men, besides chariots, and that of Crœsus was twice as numerous. There was at Thymbra a temple sacred to Apollo, who is thence called Thymbræus. TIBERIS, Tyberis, Tiber, or Tibris, a river of Italy, on whoſe banks the city of Rome was built. It was originally called Albula, from the whiteneſs of its waters, and afterwards Tiberinus, when the king of that name had been drowned there. It was alſo named Tyrrhenus, becauſe it watered Etruria, and Lydius, becauſe the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were ſuppoſed to be of Lydian origin. The Tiber riſes in the Apennines, and falls into the Tyrrhene ſea, 16 miles below Rome, after dividing Latium from Etruria. *Ovid. TIBERIAS, a town of Judæa, near the ſea coaſt.

TIBERIUS, (Claudius Druſus Nero) a Roman emperor after the death of Auguſtus, deſcended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the populace with magnificent ſhows and fights of gladiators, and he gained ſome applauſe in the funeral oration which he pronounced over his father, though only nine years old. His firſt appearance in the Roman armies was under Auguſtus, in the war againſt the Cantabri, and afterwards in the capacity of general, he obtained victories in different parts of the empire, and was rewarded with a triumph. Yet, in the midſt of his glory, Tiberius fell under the diſpleaſure of Auguſtus, and retired to Rhodes, where he continued for ſeven years as in exile, till by the influence of his mother Livia with the emperor, he was recalled. His return to Rome was the more glorious; he had the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and ſeemed to divide the ſovereign power with Auguſtus. At the death of this celebrated emperor, Tiberius, who had been adopted, aſſumed the reins of government; and while with diſſimulation and affected modeſty he wiſhed to decline the dangerous office, he found time to try the fidelity of his friends, and to make the greateſt part of the Romans believe that he was inveſted with the purple, not from his own choice, but by the recommendation of Auguſtus, and the urgent entreaties of the Roman ſenate. The beginning of his reign ſeemed to promiſe tranquillity to the world; Tiberius was a watchful guardian of the public peace, he was the friend of juſtice, and never aſſumed the ſounding titles which muſt diſguſt a free nation, but he was ſatisfied to ſay of himſelf that he was the maſter of his ſlaves, the general of his ſoldiers, and the father of the citizens of Rome. That ſeeming moderation, however, which was but the fruit of the deepeſt policy, ſoon diſappeared, and Tiberius was viewed in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, to whoſe intrigues he was indebted for the purple, his cruelty to his wife Julia, and his tyrannical oppreſſion and murder of many noble ſenators, rendered him odious to the people, and ſuſpected even by his moſt intimate favorites. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany, but the tumults were ſilenced by the prudence of the generals and the fidelity of the officers, and the factious demagogues were abandoned to their condign puniſhment. This acted as a check upon Tiberius in Rome; he knew from thence, as his ſucceſſors experienced, that his power was precarious, and his very exiſtence in perpetual danger. He continued as he had begun, to pay the greateſt deference to the ſenate, all libels againſt him he diſregarded, and obſerved, that in a free city, the thoughts and the tongues of every man ſhould be free. The taxes were gradually leſſened, and luxury reſtrained by the ſalutary regulations, as well as by the prevailing example and frugality of the emperor. While Rome exhibited a ſcene of peace and public tranquillity, the barbarians were ſeverally defeated on the borders of the empire, and Tiberius gained new honors, by the activity and valor of Germanicus and his other faithful lieutenants. Yet the triumphs of Germanicus were beheld with jealouſy. Tiberius dreaded his power, he was envious of his popularity, and the death of that celebrated general in Antioch was, as ſome ſuppoſe, accelerated by poiſon, and the ſecret reſentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent were ſacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was ſcarce in Rome one ſingle family that did not reproach Tiberius for the loſs of a brother, a father, or a huſband. He at laſt retired to the iſland of Capreæ, on the coaſt of Campania, where he buried himſelf in unlawful pleaſures. The care of the empire was entruſted to favorites, among whom Sejanus for a while ſhone with uncommon ſplendor. In his ſolitary retreat the emperor propoſed rewards to ſuch as invented new pleaſures, or could produce freſh luxuries. He forgot his age as well as his dignity, and diſgraced himſelf by the moſt unnatural vices and enormous indulgencies which can draw a bluſh, even upon the countenance of the moſt debauched and abandoned. While the emperor was loſt to himſelf and the world, the provinces were harraſſed on every ſide by the barbarians, and Tiberius found himſelf inſulted by thoſe enemies whom hitherto he had ſeen fall proſtrate at his feet with every mark of ſubmiſſive adulation. At laſt grown weak and helpleſs through infirmities, he thought of his approaching diſſolution; and as he well knew that Rome could not exiſt without a head, he nominated as his ſucceſſor, Caius Caligula. Many might enquire, why a youth naturally ſo vicious and abandoned as Caius was choſen to be the maſter of an extenſive empire; but Tiberius wiſhed his own cruelties to be forgotten in the barbarities which might be diſplayed in the reign of his ſucceſſor, whoſe natural propenſities he had well defined, in ſaying of Caligula that he bred a ſerpent for the Roman people, and a Phaeton for the reſt of the empire. Tiberius died at Miſenum the 16th of March, A. D. 37, in the 78th year of his age, after a reign of 22 years, ſix months, and 26 days. Caligula was accuſed of having haſtened his end by ſuffocating him. The joy was univerſal when his death was known; and the people of Rome, in the midſt of ſorrow, had a moment to rejoice, heedleſs of the calamities which awaited them in the ſucceeding reigns. The body of Tiberius was conveyed to Rome, and burnt with great ſolemnity. A funeral oration was pronounced by Caligula, who ſeemed to forget his benefactor while he expatiated on the praiſes of Auguſtus, Germanicus, and his own. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by hiſtorians, and his reign is the ſubject of the moſt perfect and elegant of all the compoſitions of Tacitus. When a private man, Tiberius was univerſally eſteemed; when he had no ſuperior, he was proud, arrogant, jealous, and revengeful. If he found his military operations conducted by a warlike general, he affected moderation and virtue; but when he got rid of the powerful influence of a favorite, he was tyrannical and diſſolute. If, as ſome obſerve, he had lived in the times of the Roman republic, he might have been as conſpicuous as his great anceſtors; but the ſovereign power lodged in his hands, rendered him vicious and oppreſſive. Yet, though he encouraged informers and favored flattery, he bluſhed at the mean ſervilities of the ſenate, and derided the adulation of his courtiers, who approached him, he ſaid, as if they approached a ſavage elephant. He was a patron of learning, he was an eloquent and ready ſpeaker, and dedicated ſome part of his time to ſtudy. He wrote a lyric poem, entitled, A Complaint on the Death of Lucius Cæſar, as alſo ſome Greek pieces in imitation of ſome of his favorite authors. He avoided all improper expreſſions, and all foreign words he totally wiſhed to baniſh from the Latin tongue. As inſtances of his humanity, it has been recorded that he was uncommonly liberal to the people of Aſia Minor, whoſe habitations had been deſtroyed by a violent earthquake, A. D. 17. One of his officers wiſhed him to encreaſe the taxes, No, ſaid Tiberius, a good ſhepherd muſt ſhear, not flay his ſheep. The ſenators wiſhed to call the month of November, in which he was born, by his name, in imitation of J. Cæſar and Auguſtus, in the months of July and Auguſt; but this he refuſed, ſaying, What will you do, conſcript fathers, if you have thirteen Cæſars? Like the reſt of the emperors, he received divine honors after death, and even during his life. It has been wittily obſerved by Seneca, that he never was intoxicated but once all his life, for he continued in a perpetual ſtate of intoxication from the time he gave himſelf to drinking till the laſt moment of his life. Sueton. in vitâ. &c. — Tacit. Ann. 6, &c. — Dion. Caſſ. —— A friend of Julius Cæſar, whom he accompanied in the war of Alexandria. Tibris. Vid. Tiberis.

Tibullus (Aulus Albius) a Roman knight celebrated for his poetical compoſitions. He followed Meſſala Corvinus into the iſland of Corcyra, but he was ſoon diſſatisfied with the toils of war, and retired to Rome, where he gave himſelf up to literary eaſe and indolence. His firſt compoſition was to celebrate the virtues of his friend Meſſala, but his more favorite ſtudy was writing love verſes, in which he was the moſt correct of the Romans. He loſt his poſſeſſions when the ſoldiers of the triumvirate were rewarded with lands; but he might have recovered them, if he had condeſcended, like Virgil, to make his court to Auguſtus. Four books of elegies are the only remaining pieces of his compoſition. They are uncommonly elegant and beautiful, and poſſeſſed with ſo much grace and purity of ſentiment, that the writer is deſervedly ranked as the prince of elegiac poets. Tibullus was intimate with the literary men of his age, and he for ſome time had a poetical conteſt with Horace, in gaining the favors of an admired courtezan. Ovid has written a beautiful a beautiful elegy on the death of his friend. The poems of Tibullus are generally published with thoſe of Propertius and Catullus, of which the beſt editions are, that of Vulpius, Patavii, 1737, 1749, 1755; and that of Barbou, 12mo. TIFERNUM, a name common to three towns of Italy. One of them, for diſtinction's ſake, is called Metaurenſe, near the Metaurus in Umbria; the other, Tiberinum, on the Tiber; and the third, Samniticum, in the country of the Sabines. Liv. 10, c. 14.

TIGASIS, a ſon of Hercules.

TIGELLĪNUS, a Roman celebrated for his intrigues and perfidy in the court of Nero. He was appointed judge at the trial of the conſpirators who had leagued againſt Nero, for which he was liberally rewarded with triumphal honors. He afterwards betrayed the emperor, and was ordered to deſtroy himſelf, 68 A. D. Tacit.—Plut.

TIGELLIUS, a native of Sardinia, who became the favorite of J. Cæſar, of Cleopatra, and Auguſtus, by his mimicry and facetiouſneſs. He was celebrated for the melody of his voice, yet he was of a mean and ungenerous diſpoſition, and of unpleaſing manners, as Horace, 1 Sat. 2, v. 3, and ſeq. inſinuates.

TIGRĀNES, a king of Armenia, who made himſelf maſter of Aſſyria and Cappadocia. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Mithridates, and by the advice of his father-in-law, he declared war againſt the Romans. He deſpiſed theſe diſtant enemies, and even ordered the head of the meſſenger to be cut off who firſt told him that the Roman general was boldly advancing towards his capital. His pride, however, was ſoon abated, and though he ordered the Roman conſul Lucullus, to be brought alive into his preſence, he fled with precipitation from his capital, and was ſoon after defeated near mount Taurus. This totally diſheartened him, he refuſed to receive Mithridates into his palace, and even ſet a price upon his head. His mean ſubmiſſion to Pompey, the ſucceſſor of Lucullus in Aſia, inſured him on his throne, and he received a garriſon in his capital, and continued at peace with the Romans. His ſecond ſon of the ſame name revolted againſt him, and attempted to dethrone him with the aſſiſtance of the king of Parthia, whoſe daughter he had married. This did not ſucceed, and the ſon had recourſe to the Romans, by whom he was put in poſſeſſion of Sophene, while the father remained quiet on the throne of Armenia. The ſon was afterwards ſent in chains to Rome for his inſolence to Pompey. Cic. pro Man.—Val. Max. 5, c. 1.—Paterc. 2, c, 33 & 37.—Juſtin. 40, c. 1 & 2.—*Plut. in Luc. TIGRANOCERTA, the capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes, during the Mithridatic war, on a hill between the ſprings of the Tigris and mount Taurus. Lucullus, during the Mithridatic war, took it with difficulty, and found in it immenſe riches, and no leſs than 8000 talents in ready money.

TIGRES, a river of Peloponneſus.

TIGRIS, a rapid river of Aſia, riſing on mount Niphate in Armenia, and falling into the Perſian gulph. It is the eaſtern boundary of Meſopotamia. The Tigris now falls into the Euphrates, though in the age of Pliny the two ſeparate channels of theſe rivers could be eaſily traced. Plin. 6, c. 27.—Juſtin. 42, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 256.

TIGURĪNI, a warlike people among the Helvetii. Cæſ. bell. G.

TILATÆI, a people of Thrace.

TIMÆA, the wife of Agis, king of Sparta, was debauched by Alcibiades, by whom ſhe had a ſon. This child was rejected in the ſucceſſion to the throne, though Agis, on his death bed, declared him to be legitimate. Plut. in Ag.

TIMÆUS, a friend of Alexander, who came came to his assistance when he was alone surrounded by the Oxydracæ. He was killed in the encounter. Curt. 9, c. 5.——An historian of Sicily, who flourished about 262 B. C. and died in the 96th year of his age. His father's name was Andromachus. He was banished from Sicily by Agathocles. His general history of Sicily, and that of the wars of Pyrrhus, were in general esteem, and his authority was great, except when he treated of Agathocles. All his compositions are lost. Plut. in Nic. Cic. de Orat.—Diod. 5.—C. Nep.——A writer who published some treatises concerning antient philosophers. Diog. in Emp.——A Pythagorean philosopher, born at Locris. He followed the doctrines of the founder of the metempsychosis, but in some parts of his system of the world he differed from him. TIMANDRĬDES, a Spartan, celebrated for his virtues.

TIMANTHES, a painter of Sicyon, in the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the great. His painting of Iphigenia going to be immolated, was greatly admired. He obtained a prize, for which the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was in painting an Ajax with all the fury which his disappointments could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Cic. de Orat.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 11.——An athlete of Cleone, who burnt himself when he perceived that his strength began to fail. Paus. 6, c. 8.

TIMARCHUS, a philosopher of Alexandria, intimate with Lamprocles, the disciple of Socrates. Diog.——A rhetorician, who hung himself when accused of licentiousness by Æschines.——A Cretan, accused before Nero of oppression.——An officer in Ætolia, &c. Polyæn.——A king of Salamis.——A tyrant of Miletus, in the age of Antiochus, &c.

TIMARĒTA, a priestess of the oracle of Dodona. Herodot. 2, c. 94.

TIMASION, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, &c.

TIMASITHEUS, a prince of Lipara, who obliged a number of pirates to spare some Romans who were going to make an offering to the god of Delphi. The Roman senate rewarded him very liberally, and their generosity was long extended to his descendants. Diod. 14.—Plut.

TĪMĀVUS, a broad river of Italy, rising from a mountain, and after running a short space, falling by nine mouths into the Adriatic sea. There are at the mouth of the Timavus, small islands with hot springs of water. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Virg. ecl. 8, v. 6, Æn. 1, v. 248.—Strab. 5.

TIMESIUS, a native of Clazomenæ, who began to build Abdera. He was prevented by the Thracians, but honored as a hero at Abdera. Herodot. 1, c. 168.

TIMOCHĂRIS, an astronomer of Alexandria, 294 B. C.

TIMOCLĒA, a Theban lady, sister to Theagenes, who was killed at Cheronæa. One of Alexander's soldiers offered her violence, after which she led her ravisher to a well, and while he believed that immense treasures were concealed there, Timoclea threw him into it. Alexander commended her virtue, and forbad his soldiers to hurt the Theban females. Plut. in Alex.

TIMOCRĂTES, a Greek philosopher of uncommon austerity.——A Syracusan, who married Arete when Dion had been banished into Greece by Dionysius. He commanded the forces of the tyrant.

TIMOCREON, a comic poet of Rhodes, who obtained poetical, as well as gymnastic prizes at Olympia. He lived about 476 years before Christ, distinguished for his voracity, and resentment against Simonides and Themistocles. The following epitaph was written on his grave:

Multa libens, & multa vorans, mala denique dicens
Multis, hic jaceo Timocreon Rhodius.

TIMODĒMUS, the father of Timoleon.

TIMOLĀUS, a Spartan, intimate with Philopœmen, &c.——A son of the celebrated Zenobia.——A general of Alexander, put to death by the Thebans.

TIMOLEON, a celebrated Corinthian, ſon of Timodemus and Demariſte. He was ſuch an enemy to tyranny, that he did not heſitate to murder his own brother Timophanes, when he attempted, againſt his repreſentations, to make himſelf abſolute in Corinth. This was viewed with pleaſure by the friends of liberty; but the mother of Timoleon conceived the moſt inveterate averſion for her ſon, and for ever baniſhed him from her ſight. This proved painful to Timoleon; a ſettled melancholy dwelt upon his mind, and he refuſed to accept of any offices in the ſtate. When the Syracuſans, oppreſſed with the tyranny of Dionyſius the younger, and of the Carthaginians, had ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the Corinthians, all looked upon Timoleon as a proper deliverer, but all applications would have been diſregarded, if one of the magiſtrates had not awakened in him the ſenſe of natural liberty. Timoleon, ſays he, if you accept of the command of this expedition, we will believe that you have killed a tyrant; but if not, we cannot but call you your brother's murderer. This had due effect, and Timoleon ſailed for Syracuſe in ten ſhips, accompanied by about 1000 men. The Carthaginians attempted to oppoſe him, but Timoleon eluded their vigilance. Icetas, who had the poſſeſſion of the city was defeated, and Dionyſius, who deſpaired of ſucceſs, gave himſelf up into the hands of the Corinthian general. This ſucceſs gained Timoleon adherents in Sicily, many cities which hitherto had looked upon him as an impoſtor, claimed his protection, and when he was at laſt maſter of Syracuſe by the total overthrow of Icetas, and of the Carthaginians, he razed the citadel which had been the ſeat of tyranny, and erected on the ſpot a common hall. Syracuſe was almoſt deſtitute of inhabitants, and at the ſolicitation of Timoleon, a Corinthian colony was ſent to Sicily; the lands were equally divided among the citizens, and the houſes were ſold for a thouſand talents, which were appropriated to the uſe of the ſtate, and depoſited in the treaſury. When Syracuſe was thus delivered from tyranny, the conqueror extended his benevolence to the other ſtates of Sicily, and all the petty tyrants were reduced and baniſhed from the iſland. A code of ſalutary laws was framed for the Syracuſans; and the armies of Carthage, which had attempted again to raiſe commotions in Sicily, were defeated, and peace was at laſt re-eſtabliſhed. The gratitude of the Sicilians was ſhewn every where to their deliverer. Timoleon was received with repeated applauſe in the public aſſemblies, and though a private man, unconnected with the government, he continued to enjoy his former influence at Syracuſe; his advice was conſulted on matters of importance, and his authority reſpected. He ridiculed the accuſations of malevolence, and when ſome informers had charged him with oppreſſion, he rebuked the Syracuſans who were going to put the accuſers to immediate death. A remarkable inſtance of his providential eſcape from the dagger of an aſſaſſin, has been recorded by one of his biographers. As he was going to offer a ſacrifice to the gods after a victory, two aſſaſſins, ſent by the enemies, approached his perſon in diſguiſe. The arm of one of the aſſaſſins was already lifted, when he was ſuddenly ſtabbed by an unknown perſon, who made his eſcape from the camp. The other aſſaſſin, ſtruck at the fall of his companion, fell before Timoleon, and confeſſed, in the preſence of the army, the conſpiracy that had been formed againſt his life. The unknown aſſaſſin was mean time purſued, and when he was found, he declared, that he had committed no crime in avenging the death of a beloved father, whom the man he had ſtabbed had murdered in the town of Leontini. Enquiries were made, and his confeſſions were found to be true. Timoleon died at Syracuſe about 337 years before the Chriſtian era. His body received an honorable burial, but the tears of a grateful nation were more convincing proofs of the public regret, than the inſtitution of feſtivals, and games yearly to be obſerved on the day of his death. *C. TIMOMĂCHUS, a painter of Byzantium, in the age of Sylla and Marius. Plin. 35, c. 11.——A general of Athens, ſent to aſſiſt the Thabans. Xenoph.

TIMON, a native of Athens, called Miſanthrope, for his unconquerable averſion to mankind and all ſociety. He was fond of another Athenian, whoſe character was ſimilar to his own, and he ſaid that he had ſome partiality for Alcibiades, becauſe he was one day to be his country's ruin. Once he went into the public aſſembly, and told his countrymen, that he had a fig-tree on which many had ended their life with a halter, and that as he was going to cut it down to raiſe a building on the ſpot; he adviſed all ſuch as were inclined to deſtroy themſelves, to haſten and go and hang themſelves in his garden. Plut. in Alc. &c.—Lucian. in Tim.—Pauſ. 6, c. 12.——A Greek poet, ſon of Timarchus, in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote ſeveral dramatic pieces all now loſt, and died in the 90th year of his age. Diog.—Athen. 6, & 13.——An athlete of Elis. Pauſ. 6, c. 12.

TIMOPHĂNES, a Corinthian, brother to Timoleon. He attempted to make himſelf tyrant tyrant of his country, by means of the mercenary ſoldiers with whom he had fought againſt the Argives and Cleomenes. Timoleon wiſhed to convince him of the impropriety of his meaſures, and when he found him unmoved, he cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated. Plut. & C. Nep. in Tim.—A man of Mitylene, celebrated for his riches, &c.

TIMOTHEUS, a poet and muſician of Miletus. He was received with hiſſes the firſt time he exhibited as muſician in the aſſembly of the people, and further applications would have totally been abandoned, had not Euripides diſcovered his abilities, and encouraged him to follow a profeſſion in which he afterwards gained ſo much applauſe. He received an immenſe ſum of money from the Epheſians, becauſe he had compoſed a poem in honor of Diana. He died about the 90th year of his age, two years before the birth of Alexander the great. There was alſo another muſician of Bœotia in the age of Alexander, often confounded with the muſician of Miletus. He was a great favorite of the conqueror of Darius. Pauſ. 3, c. 12.—Plut. de muſic. de fort. &c.——An Athenian general, ſon of Conon. He ſignalized himſelf by his valor and magnanimity, and ſhewed that he was not inferior to his great father in military prudence. He ſeized Corcyra, and obtained ſeveral victories over the Thebans, but his ill ſucceſs in one of his expeditions diſguſted the Athenians, and Timotheus, like the reſt of his noble predeceſſors, was fined a large ſum of money. He retired to Chalcis, where he died. He was ſo diſintereſted, that he never appropriated any of the plunder to his own uſe, but after one of his expeditions, he filled the treaſury of Athens with 1200 talents. Some of the antients, to intimate his continual ſucceſſes, have repreſented him ſleeping by the ſide of Fortune. Pauſ. 1, c. 29.—Plut. in Syll. &c.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 10, & 18, l. 3, c. 16.—C. Nep.——A Greek ſtatuary. Pauſ. 2, c. 32.——A tyrant of Heraclea.——A king of the Sapæi.

TIMOXENUS, a governor of Sicyon, who betrayed his truſt, &c. Polyæn.——A general of the Achæans.

TINGIS, a maritime town of Africa in Mauritania, built by the giant Antæus. Sertorius took it, and as the tomb of the founder was near the place, he cauſed it to be opened, and found in it a ſkeleton ſixty cubits long. This increaſed the veneration of the people for their founder. Tingis is now called Tangier. Plut. in Sert.—Mela. 2, c. 5.

TIPHA, a town of Bœotia where Hercules had a temple. Pauſ. 9, c. 32.

TIPHYS, the pilot of the ſhip of the Argonauts, was ſon of Hagnius, or, according to ſome, of Phorbas. He died before the Argonauts reached Colchis, at the court of Lycus in the Propontis, and Erginus was choſen in his place. Orph.—Apolled. 1, c. 9.—Apollon.—Val. Flacc.—Pauſ. 9, c. 32.—Hygin. fab. 14 & 18.

TIPHYSA, a daughter of Theſtius.

TIRESIAS, a celebrated prophet of Thebes, ſon of Everus and Chariclo. He lived to a great age, which ſome authors have called as long as ſeven generations of men, others ſix, and others nine, during the time that Polydorus, Labdacus, Laius, Œdipus, and his ſons, ſat on the throne of Thebes. It is ſaid that in his youth he found two ſerpents in the act of copulation on mount Cyllene, and that when he had ſtruck them with a ſtick to ſeparate them, he found himſelf ſuddenly changed into a girl. Seven years after he found again ſome ſerpents together in the ſame manner, and he recovered his original ſex, by ſtriking them a ſecond time with his wand. When he was a woman, Tireſias had married, and it was from thoſe reaſons, according to ſome of the antients, that Jupiter and Juno referred to his deciſion, a diſpute in which the deities wiſhed to know, which of the ſexes received greater pleaſure from the connubial ſtate. Tireſias, who could ſpeak from actual experience, decided in favor of Jupiter, and declared, that the pleaſure which the female received, was ten times greater than that of the male. Juno, who ſupported a different opinion, and gave the ſuperiority to the male ſex, puniſhed Tireſias by depriving him of his eye-ſight. But this dreadful loſs was in ſome meaſure repaired by the humanity of Jupiter, who beſtowed upon him the gift of prophecy, and permitted him to live ſeven times more than the reſt of men. Theſe cauſes of the blindneſs of Tireſias, which are ſupported by the authority of Ovid, Hyginus and others, are contradicted by Apollodorus, Callimachus, Propertius, &c. who declare that this was inflicted upon him as a puniſhment, becauſe he had ſeen Minerva bathing in the fountain Hippocrene, on mount Helicon. Chariclo, who accompanied Minerva, complained of the ſeverity with which her ſon was treated; but the goddeſs, who well knew that this was the irrevocable puniſhment inflicted by Saturn on ſuch mortals as fix their eyes upon a goddeſs without her conſent, alleviated the misfortunes of Tireſias, by making him acquainted with futurity, and giving him a ſtaff which could conduct his ſteps with as much ſafety as if he had the uſe of his eye-ſight. During his life-time, Tireſias was an infallible oracle to all Greece. The generals, during the Theban

Theban war, consulted him, and found his predictions verified. He drew his prophecies sometimes from the flight or the language of birds, in which he was assisted by his daughter Manto, and sometimes he drew the manes from the infernal regions to know futurity with mystical ceremonies. He at last died, after drinking the waters of a cold fountain, which froze his blood. He was buried with great pomp, by the Thebans, and honored as a god. His oracle at Orchomenos was in universal esteem. Homer represents Ulysses as going to the infernal regions to consult Tiresias concerning his return to Ithaca. Apollod. 3, c. 6.—*Theocrit. Tiribăzes, an officer of Artaxerxes, killed by the guards for conspiring against the king's life, B. C. 394. Plut. in Art.

Tiridātes, a king of Parthia, after the expulsion of Phraates by his subjects. He was soon after deposed and fled to Augustus. Horat. 1, Od. 26.——A man made king of Parthia by Tiberius, after the death of Phraates, in opposition to Artabanus.—Tacit. ann. 6, &c.——A keeper of the royal treasures at Persepolis, who offered to surrender to Alexander the great. Curt. 5, c. 5, &c.——A king of Armenia, in the reign of Nero.——A son of Phraates, &c.

Tiris, a general of the Thracians, who opposed Antiochus.

Tiro, Tullius, a freedman of Cicero, greatly esteemed by his master for his learning and good qualities. It is said that he invented short-hand writing among the Romans. He wrote the life of Cicero, and other treatises now lost. Cic. ad Att. &c.

Tirynthia, a name given to Alcmena, because she lived at Tirynthus. Ovid Met. 6.

Tirynthus, a town of Argolis in the Peloponnesus, founded by Tirynx, son of Argus. Hercules generally resided there, whence he is called Tirynthius heros. Paus. 2, c, 16 & 25.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 15 & 49.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 662.—Sil. 8, v. 217.

Tisæum, a mountain of Thessaly.

Tisagŏras, a brother of Miltiades, called also Stesagoras. C. Nep. in Milt.

Tisamĕnes, or Tisamĕnus, a son of Orestes and Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, who succeeded on the throne of Argos and Lacedæmon. The Heraclidæ entered his kingdom in the third year of his reign, and he was obliged to retire with his family into Achaia. He was some time after killed in a battle against the Ionians, near Helice. Apolled. 2, c. 7.—Paus. 3, c. 1, l. 7, c. 1.——A king of Thebes, son of Thessander, and grandson of Polynices. The furies who continually persecuted the house of Œdipus, permitted him to live in tranquillity, but they tormented his son and successor Autesion, and obliged him to retire to Doris. Paus. 3, c. 5, l. 9, c. 6.—A native of Elis, crowned twice at the Olympic games. Paus. 3, c. 12.

Tisandrus, one of the Greeks concealed with Ulysses in the wooden horse. Some suppose him to be the same as Thersander, the son of Polynices. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 261.

Tisarchus, a friend of Agathocles, by whom he was murdered, &c.

Tisiarus, a town of Africa.

Tisiphŏne, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, who was the minister of Divine vengeance upon mankind, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand, serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms instead of bracelets. By Juno's directions she attempted to prevent the landing of Io in Egypt, but the god of the Nile repelled her, and obliged her to retire to hell. Stat. Theb. 1, v. 59.—Virg. G. 3, v. 552. Æn. 6, v. 555.—Horat. 1, Sat. 8, v. 34.——A daughter of Alcmæon and Manto.

Tisiphŏnus, a man who conspired against Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, &c.

Tissa, a town of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 268.

Tissamĕnus. Vid. Tisamenes.

Tissaphernes, an officer of Darius.—A satrap of Persia, commander of the forces of Artaxerxes, at the battle of Cunaxa, against Cyrus. It was by his valor and intrepidity that the king's forces gained the victory, and for this he obtained the daughter of Artaxerxes in marriage, and all the provinces of which Cyrus was governor. His popularity did not long continue, and the king ordered him to be put to death when he had been conquered by Agesilaus, 395 B. C. C. Nep.——An officer in the army of Cyrus, killed by Artaxerxes at the battle of Cunaxa. Plut.

Titæa, the mother of the Titans. She is supposed to be the same as Thea, Rhea, Terra, &c.

Titan, or Titānus, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus; but he gave his brother Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he raised no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and imprisoned him till he was replaced on his throne by his son Jupiter. This tradition is recorded by Lactantius, a Christian writer, who took it from the dramatic compositions of Ennius, now lost. None of the antient antient mythologiſts, ſuch as Apollodorus, Heſiod, Hyginus, &c. have made mention of Titan. Titan is a name applied to Saturn by Orpheus and Lucian; to the ſun by Virgil and Ovid; and to Prometheus by Juvenal. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 10.—Juv. 14, v. 35.—Diod. 5.—Pauſ. 2, c. 11.—Orpheus Hymn. 13.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 119.

TITĂNA, a town of Sicyonia in Peloponneſus. Titanus reigned there.——A man ſkilled in aſtronomy. Pauſ. 2, c. 11.

TITĂNES, a name given to the ſons of Cœlus and Terra. They were 45 in number, according to the Egyptians. Apollodorus mentions 13, Hyginus ſix, and Heſiod 20, among whom are the Titanides. The moſt known of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus, to whom Horace adds, Typhoeus, Mimus, Porphyrion, Rhœtus, and Enceladus, who are by other mythologiſts reckoned among the giants. They were all of a gigantic ſtature, and with proportionable ſtrength. They were treated with great cruelty by Cœlus, and confined in the bowels of the earth, till their mother pitied their misfortunes, and armed them againſt their father. Saturn with a ſcythe cut off the genitals of his father, as he was going to unite himſelf to Terra, and threw them into the ſea, and from the froth ſprang a new deity called Venus; as alſo Alecto, Tiſiphone, and Megæra, according to Apollodorus. When Saturn ſucceeded his father, he married Rhea; but he devoured all his male children, as he had been informed, by an oracle, that he ſhould be dethroned by them as a puniſhment for his cruelty to his father. The wars of the Titans againſt the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be obſerved, that the war of the Titans was againſt Saturn, and that of the giants againſt Jupiter. *Heſiod. TITĂNIA, a patronymic applied to Pyrrha, as grand-daughter of Titan. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 395.

TITĂNIDES, the daughters of Cœlus and Terra; ſix in number according to Heſiod, or ſeven according to Orpheus. The moſt celebrated were Tethys, Themis, Dione, Thea, Mnemoſyne, Ops, Cybele, Veſta, Phœbe and Rhea. Heſiod. Theog. 135, &c.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

TITĂNUS, a river in Peloponneſus, with a town and mountain of the ſame name.

TITARESIUS, a river of Theſſaly, flowing into the Peneus. Strab. 8.—Pauſ. 8, c. 18.

TITENUS, a river of Colchis, falling into the Euxine ſea.

TITHENIDIA, a feſtival of Sparta, in which nurſes, τιθναι, conveyed male infants entruſted to their charge, to the temple of Diana, where they ſacrificed young pigs. During the time of the ſolemnity, they generally danced and expoſed themſelves in ridiculous poſtures; there were alſo ſome entertainments given near the temple, where tents were erected. Each had a ſeparate portion allotted him, together with a ſmall loaf, a piece of new cheeſe, part of the entrails of the victim, and figs, beans, and green vetches, inſtead of ſweet meats.

TITHŌNUS, a ſon of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. He was ſo beautiful that Aurora became enamoured of him, and carried him away. He had by her Memnon and Æmathion. He begged of Aurora to be immortal, and the goddeſs granted it; but as he had forgotten to aſk the vigor, youth, and beauty which he then enjoyed, he ſoon grew old, infirm, and decrepid; and as life became inſupportable to him, he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world. As he could not die, the goddeſs changed him into a cicada, or graſshopper. Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 447, Æn. 4, v. 585, l. 8, v. 384.—Heſiod. Theog. 984.—Diod. 1.—*Ovid. TITIA, a deity among the Mileſians.

TITIĂNA Flavia, the wife of the emperor Pertinax, diſgraced herſelf by her debaucheries and incontinence. After the murder of her huſband ſhe was reduced to poverty, and ſpent the reſt of her life in an obſcure retreat.

TITIĂNUS, Attil. a noble Roman, put to death A. D. 156, by the ſenate, for aſpiring to the purple. He was the only one proſcribed during the reign of Antoninus Pius.

TITIA LEX de magiſtratibus, by P. Titius, the tribune, A. U. C. 710. It ordained that a triumvirate of magiſtrates ſhould be inveſted with conſular power to preſide over the republic for five years. The perſons choſen were Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus.——Another, de provinciis, which required that the provincial queſtors, like the conſuls and prætors, ſhould receive their provinces by lot.

TITII, prieſts of Apollo.

TITHRAUSTES, a Perſian ſatrap, B. C. 395, ordered to murder Tiſſaphernes by Artaxerxes. He ſucceeded to the offices which the ſlaughtered favorite enjoyed. He was defeated by the Athenians under Cimon.—An officer in the Perſian court, &c.

TITINIUS, a tribune of the people in the firſt ages of the republic.——A friend of Caſſius, who killed himſelf.——One of the ſlaves who revolted at Capua. He betrayed his truſt to the Roman generals.

TITIUS, a Roman knight, appointed to watch Meſſalina. Tacit. 11, An. c. 35.——A tribune of the people who enacted the Titian law.——An orator of a very diſſolute character.——One of Pompey's murderers.——One of Antony's officers.——A man who foretold a victory to Sylla.——Septimius, a poet in the Auguſtan age, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his lyric and tragic compoſitions, now loſt. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 9.

TITORMUS, a ſhepherd of Ætolia, called another Hercules, on account of his prodigious ſtrength. He was ſtronger than his contemporary Milo of Crotona, as he could lift on his ſhoulders a ſtone which the Crotonian moved but with difficulty. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 22.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.

TITURIUS, a friend of Julia Silana, who informed againſt Agrippina, &c. Tacit. Ann. 13.——A lieutenant of Cæſar in Gaul, killed by Ambiorix. Cæſar. bell. G. 5, c. 29, &c.

TITUS Veſpaſianus, ſon of Veſpaſian and Flavia Domitilla, became known by his valor in the Roman armies, particularly at the ſiege of Jeruſalem. In the 79th year of the Chriſtian era, he was inveſted with the imperial purple, and the Roman people had every reaſon to expect in him the barbarities of a Tiberius, and the debaucheries of a Nero. While in the houſe of Veſpaſian, Titus had been diſtinguiſhed for his extravagance and incontinence, his attendants were the moſt abandoned and diſſolute, and it ſeemed that he wiſhed to be ſuperior to the reſt of the world in the gratification of every impure deſire, and in every unnatural vice. From ſuch a private character which ſtill might be curbed by the authority and example of a father, what could be expected but tyranny and oppreſſion? Yet Titus became a model of virtue, and in an age and office in which others wiſh to gratify all their appetites, the emperor abandoned his uſual profligacy, he forgot his debaucheries, and Berenice, whom he had loved with uncommon ardor, even to render himſelf deſpiſed by the Roman people, was diſmiſſed from his preſence. When raiſed to the throne, he thought himſelf bound to be the father of his people, the guardian of virtue, and the patron of liberty, and Titus is perhaps the only monarch who when inveſted with uncontrolable power, bade adieu to thoſe vices, luxuries, and indulgences, which as a private man he never ceaſed to gratify. He was moderate in his entertainments, and though he often refuſed the donations which were due to ſovereignty, no emperor was ever more generous and more magnificent than Titus. All informers were baniſhed from his preſence, and even ſeverely puniſhed. A reform was made in the judicial proceedings, and trials were no longer permitted to be poſtponed for years. The public edifices were repaired, and baths were erected for the convenience of the people. Spectacles were exhibited, and the Roman populace were gratified with the ſight of a naval combat in the ancient naumachia, and the ſudden appearance of 5000 wild beaſts brought into the circus for their amuſement. To do good to his ſubjects was the ambition of Titus, and it was at the recollection that he had done no ſervice, or granted no favor one day, that he exclaimed in the memorable words of My friends, I have loſt a day! A continual wiſh to be benevolent and kind, made him popular; and it will not be wondered, that he who could ſay that he had rather die himſelf, than be the cauſe of the deſtruction of one of his ſubjects, was called the love and delight of mankind. Two of the ſenators conſpired againſt his life, but the emperor diſregarded their attempts, he made them his friends by kindneſs, and like another Nerva, preſented them with a ſword to deſtroy him. During his reign, Rome was three days on fire, the towns of Campania were deſtroyed by an eruption of Veſuvius, and the empire was viſited by a peſtilence which carried away an infinite number of inhabitants. In this time of public calamity, the emperor's benevolence and philanthropy were conſpicuous. Titus comforted the afflicted as a father, he alleviated their diſtreſſes by his liberal bounties, and as if they were but one family, he exerted himſelf for the good and preſervation of the whole. The Romans, however, had not long to enjoy the favors of a magnificent prince, Titus was taken ill, and as he retired into the country of the Sabines to his father's houſe, his indiſpoſition was encreaſed by a burning fever. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and with modeſt ſubmiſſion complained of the ſeverity of fate which removed him from the world when young, where he had been employed in making a grateful people happy. He died the 13th of September, A. D. 81, in the 41ſt year of his age, after a reign of two years, two months, and 20 days. The news of his death was received with lamentations; Rome was filled with tears, and all looked upon themſelves as deprived of the moſt benevolent of fathers. After him Domitian aſcended the throne, not without incurring the ſuſpicions of having haſtened his brother's end, by ordering him to be placed, during his agony, in a tub full of ſnow, where he expired. Domitian has alſo been accuſed of raiſing commotions, and of making attempts to dethrone his brother; but Titus disregarded them, and forgave the offender. Suetonius.—Dio, &c.

TITUS Tatius, a king of the Sabines. Vid. Tatius.——Livius, a celebrated historian. Vid. Livius.——A son of Junius Brutus, put to death by order of his father, for conspiring to restore the Tarquins.——A friend of Coriolanus.——A native of Crotona, engaged in Catiline's conspiracy.

TITYRUS, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues, &c.

TITYUS, a celebrated giant, son of Terra; or, according to others, of Jupiter, by Elara, the daughter of Orchomenos. He was of such a prodigious size, that his mother died in travail after Jupiter had drawn her from the bowels of the earth, where she had been concealed during her pregnancy to avoid the anger of Juno. Tityus attempted to offer violence to Latona, but the goddess delivered herself from his importunities, by calling to her assistance her children, who killed the giant with their arrows. He was placed in hell, where a serpent continually devoured his liver; or, according to others, where vultures perpetually fed upon his entrails, which grew again as soon as devoured. It is said that Tityus covered nine acres when stretched on the ground. He had a small chapel with an altar in the island of Eubœa. Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Pind. Pyth. 4.—*Homer. TOLMIDES, an Athenian officer, defeated and killed in a battle in Bœotia, 447 B. C.

TOLOSA, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, which became a Roman colony under Augustus. Minerva had there a temple, which Cæpio the consul plundered. He was never after fortunate. Cæs. bell. G.—Mela. 2, c. 5. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.

TOLUMNUS, an augur in the army of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 429.——A king of Veii, killed by a Roman. He had ordered the ambassadors of the nation to be assassinated. Liv. 4, c. 19.

TOLUS, a man whose head was found in digging for the foundation of the capitol, in the reign of Tarquin, whence the Romans concluded that their city should become the head or mistress of the world.

TOMÆUM, a mountain of Peloponnesus.

TOMARUS. Vid. Tmarus.

TOMISA, a country between Cappadocia and Taurus.

TOMOS or TOMIS, a town situate on the western shores of the Euxine sea. The word is derived from τεμνω, seco, because Medea, as it is said, cut to pieces the body of her brother Absyrtus there. It is celebrated as being the place where Ovid was banished by Augustus. Tomos was the capital of lower Mœsia, founded by a Milesian colony, B. C. 633. Strab. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 2.—Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 14, v. 59. Trist. 3, el. 9, v. 33, &c.

TOMYRIS. Vid. Thomyris.

TONEA, a solemnity observed at Samos. It was usual to carry Juno's statue to the sea shore, and to offer cakes before it, and afterwards to replace it again in the temple. This was in commemoration of the theft of the Tyrrhenians, who attempted to carry away the statue of the goddess, but were detained in the harbour by an invisible force.

TONGILLI, an avaricious lawyer, &c. Juv. 7, v. 130.

Topazos, an island in the Arabian gulf, anciently called Ophiodes from the quantity of serpents that were there.

Topiris, or Toprus, a town of Thrace.

Torini, a people of Scythia.

Torone, a town of Macedonia.

Torquata, one of the vestal virgins, daughter of C. Silanus. She was a vestal for 64 years. Tacit. 3, an. c. 69.

Torquatus, a firname of Titus Manlius. Vid. Manlius.——Silanus, an officer put to death by Nero.——A governor of Oricum, in the interest of Pompey. He surrendered to J. Cæsar, and was killed in Africa. Hirt. Afric. 96.——An officer in Sylla's army.——A Roman sent ambassador to the court of Ptolemy Philometor of Egypt.

Tortor, a firname of Apollo. He had a statue at Rome under that name.

Torus, a mountain of Sicily, near Agrigentum.

Toryne, a small town near Actium. The word in the language of the country signifies a ladle, which gave Cleopatra occasion to make a pun when it fell into the hands of Augustus. Plut. in Ant.

Toxaridia, a festival at Athens, in honor of Toxaris, a Scythian hero who died there.

Toxeus, a son of Œneus, killed by his father.

Toxicrate, a daughter of Thespius.

Q. Trabea, a comic poet at Rome, in the age of Regulus. Some fragments of his poetry remain. Cic. in Tusc.

Trachalus, M. Galerius, a consul in the reign of Nero, celebrated for his eloquence as an orator, and for a majestic and commanding aspect. Quintil.—Tacit.——One of the friends and ministers of Otho.

Trachas, a town of Latium. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 717.

Trachinia, a small country of Phthiotis, on the bay of Malea, near mount Œta. The capital was called Trachis, or Trachina, where Hercules went after he had killed Eunomus. Strab. 9.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 269.

Trachonitis, a part of Judæa.

Tragus, a river of Arcadia, falling into the Alpheus. Paus. 8, c. 33.

Trajanopolis, a town of Thrace.——A name given to Selinus of Cilicia, where Trajan died.

Trajanus, (M. Ulpius Crinitus) a Roman emperor, born at Italica in Spain. His great virtues, and his private as well as public character, and his services to the empire, both as an officer, a governor, and a consul, recommended him to the notice of Nerva, who solemnly adopted him as his son; invested him during his life time with the imperial purple, and gave him the name of Cæsar and Germanicus. A little time after Nerva died, and the election of Trajan to the vacant throne was confirmed by the unanimous rejoicings of the people, and the free concurrence of the armies on the confines of Germany, and the banks of the Danube. The noble and independent behaviour of Trajan evinced the propriety and goodness of Nerva's choice, and the attachment of the legions; and the new emperor seemed calculated to ensure peace and domestic tranquillity to the extensive empire of Rome. All the actions of Trajan shewed a good and benevolent prince, whose virtues truly merited the encomiums which the pen of an elegant and courteous panegyrist has paid. The barbarians continued in quiet, and the hostilities which they generally displayed at the election of a new emperor whose military abilities they distrusted, were now few. Trajan however could not behold with satisfaction and unconcern, the insolence of the Dacians, who claimed from the Roman people a tribute which the cowardice of Domitian had offered. The sudden appearance of the emperor on the frontiers, awed the barbarians to peace, but Decebalus, their warlike monarch, soon began hostilities by violating the treaty. The emperor entered the enemy's country, by throwing a bridge across the rapid streams of the Danube, and a battle was fought in which the slaughter was so great, that in the Roman camp linen was wanted to dress the wounds of the soldiers. Trajan obtained the victory, and Decebalus despairing of success, destroyed himself, and Dacia became a province of Rome. That the ardor of the Roman soldiers in defeating their enemies might not cool, an expedition was undertaken into the east, and Parthia threatened with immediate war. Trajan passed through the submissive kingdom of Armenia, and by his well-directed operations, made himself master of the provinces of Assyria and Mesopotamia. He extended his conquests in the east, he obtained victories over unknown nations, and when on the extremities of India, he lamented that he possessed not the vigor and youth of an Alexander, that he might add unexplored provinces and kingdoms to the Roman empire. These successes in different parts of the world, gained applause, and the senators were profuse in the honors they decreed to the conqueror. This was but the blaze of transient glory. Trajan had no sooner signified his intentions of returning to Italy, than the conquered barbarians appeared again in arms, and the Roman empire did not acquire one single acre of territory from the conquests of her sovereign in the east. The return of the emperor towards Rome was hastened by indisposition, he stopped in Cilicia, and in the town of Selinus, which afterwards was called Trajanopolis, he was ſeized with a flux, and a few days after expired, in the beginning of Auguſt, A. D. 117, after a reign of 19 years, ſix months, and 15 days, in the 64th year of his age. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Adrian, whom the empreſs Plotina introduced to the Roman armies, as the adopted ſon of her huſband. The aſhes of Trajan were carried to Rome, and depoſited under the ſtately column which he had erected a few years before. Under this emperor the Romans enjoyed tranquillity, and for a moment ſuppoſed that their proſperity was complete under a good and virtuous ſovereign. Trajan was fond of popularity, and he merited it. The ſounding titles of Optimus, and the father of his country, were not unworthily beſtowed upon a prince who was equal to the greateſt generals of antiquity, and who to indicate his affability, and his wiſh to liſten to the juſt complaints of his ſubjects, diſtinguiſhed his palace by the inſcription of the public palace. Like other emperors he did not receive with an air of unconcern the homage of his friends, but roſe from his ſeat and went cordially to ſalute them. He refuſed the ſtatues which the flattery of favorites wiſhed to erect to him, and he ridiculed the follies of an enlightened nation, that could pay adoration to cold inanimate pieces of marble. His public entry into Rome gained him the hearts of the people, he appeared on foot, and ſhowed himſelf an enemy to parade, and an oſtentatious equipage. When in his camp, he expoſed himſelf to the fatigues of war, like the meaneſt ſoldier, and croſſed the moſt barren deſerts and extenſive plains on foot, and in his dreſs and food diſplayed all the ſimplicity which once gained the approbation of the Romans in their countryman Fabricius. All the oldeſt ſoldiers he knew by their own name, he converſed with them with great familiarity, and never retired to his tent before he had viſited the camp, and by a perſonal attendance convinced himſelf of the vigilance and the ſecurity of his army. As a friend he was not leſs diſtinguiſhed than as a general. He had a ſelect number of intimates, whom he viſited with freedom and openneſs, and at whoſe tables he partook many a moderate repaſt without form or ceremony. His confidence, however, in the good intentions of others, was perhaps carried to exceſs. His favorite Sura had once been accuſed of attempts upon his life, but Trajan diſregarded the informer, and as he was that ſame day invited to the houſe of the ſuppoſed conſpirator, he went thither early. To try farther the ſincerity of Sura, he ordered himſelf to be ſhaved by his barber, to have a medicinal application made to his eyes by the hand of his ſurgeon, and to bathe together with him. The public works of Trajan are alſo celebrated, he opened free and eaſy communications between the cites of his provinces, he planted many colonies, and furniſhed Rome with all the corn and proviſions which could prevent a famine in the time of calamity. It was by his directions that the architect Apollodorus built that celebrated column which is ſtill to be ſeen at Rome, under the name of Trajan's column. The area on which it ſtands was made by the labors of men, and the height of the pillar proves that a large hill 144 feet high was removed at a great expence, A. D. 114, to commemorate the victories of the reigning prince. His perſecutions of the Chriſtians were ſtopped by the interference of the humane Pliny, but he was uncommonly ſevere upon the Jews, who had barbarouſly murdered 200,000 of his ſubjects, and even fed upon the fleſh of the dead. His vices have been obſcurely ſeen through a reign of continued ſplendor and popularity, yet he is accuſed of incontinence and many unnatural indulgences. He was too much addicted to drinking, and his wiſh to be ſtiled lord has been cenſured by thoſe who admired the diſſimulated moderation, and the modeſt claims of an Auguſtus. Plin. paneg. &c. —Dio. Caſſ.—Eutrop.—Ammian.—Spartian. —Joſeph. bell. J.—Victor.——The father of the emperor who likewiſe bore the name of Trajan, was honored with the conſulſhip, and a triumph, and the rank of a patrician by the emperor Veſpaſian.——A general of the emperor Valens.——A ſon of the emperor Decius.

TRALLES, a town of Lydia. Juv.

TRANSTIBERĪNA, a part of the city of Rome on one ſide of the Tiber. Mount Vatican was in that part of the city. Mart. 1, ep. 109.

TRAPĔZUS, a city of Pontus, built by the people of Sinope, now called Trebizond. It had a celebrated harbour on the Euxine ſea, and became famous under the emperors of the eaſtern empire.——A town of Arcadia near the Alpheus. It received its name from a ſon of Lycaon.

TRASULLUS, a man who taught Tiberius aſtrology at Rhodes, &c.

TRAULUS MONTĀNUS, a Roman knight, one of Meſſalina's favorites.

C. TREBATIUS TESTAS, a man baniſhed by Julius Cæſar for following the intereſt of Pompey, and recalled by the eloquence of Cicero. He was afterwards reconciled to Cæſar. Trebatius was not leſs diſtinguiſhed for his learning than for his integrity, his military experience and knowledge of law. He wrote nine books on religious ceremonies,

nies, and treatiſes on civil law; and the verſes that he compoſed proved him a poet of no inferior conſequence. Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 4.

TREBELLIĀNUS, (C. Annius,) a pirate who proclaimed himſelf emperor of Rome, A. D. 264. He was defeated and ſlain in Iſauria, by the lieutenants of Gallienus.

TREBELLIĒNUS RUFUS, a prætor appointed governor of the children of king Cotys, by Tiberius.——A tribune who oppoſed the Gabinian law.——A Roman who numbered the inhabitants of Gaul. He was made governor of Britain. Tacit.

TREBELLIUS POLLIO, a Latin hiſtorian, who wrote an account of the lives of the emperors. The beginning of this hiſtory is loſt; part of the reign of Valerian, and the life of the two Gallienus's, with the 30 tyrants, are the only fragments remaining. He floriſhed A. D. 305.

TRĔBIA, a river of Ciſalpine Gaul, riſing in the Apennine, and falling into the Po, at the weſt of Placentia. It is celebrated for the victory which Annibal obtained there over the forces of L. Sempronius, the Roman conſul. Sil. 4, v. 486.—Lucan. 2, v. 46.

TREBIUS, an officer in Cæſar's army in Gaul.——A paraſite in Domitian's reign. Juv. 4.

TRĔBŌNIA LEX, de provinciis, by L. Trebonius the tribune, A. U. C. 698. It gave Cæſar the chief command in Gaul for five years longer than was enacted by the Vatinian law, and in this manner prevented the ſenators from recalling or ſuperſeding him.

TRĔBŌNIUS, a ſoldier remarkable for his continence, &c.——One of Cæſar's friends, made through his intereſt prætor and conſul. He was afterwards one of his benefactor's murderers. He was killed by Dolabella at Smyrna. Cæſ. bell. 5, c. 17.—Cic. in Phil. 11.—Horat. 1, Sat. 4, v. 114.——A governor of Africa, put to death by Galba's orders.——A tribune who propoſed a law at Rome, and impriſoned Cato, becauſe he oppoſed it.——One of the adherents of Marius.——A man caught in adultery, and ſeverely puniſhed in the age of Horace.

TREBŬLA, a town of the Sabines, celebrated for cheeſe. Cic. in Agr. 2.—Martial. 5, ep. 72.

TREBUS, a river of Latium, falling into the Liris.

TREVĔRI, a people of Belgium. Mela. 3, c. 2.

TRIARIA, a woman well known for her cruelty. She was the wife of L. Vitellius.

TRIARIUS, an orator, commended by Cicero.——A friend of Pompey. He had for ſome time the care of the war in Aſia againſt Mithridates, whom he defeated and by whom he was afterwards beaten. He was killed in the civil wars of Pompey and Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. Civ. 3, c. 5.

TRIBALLI, a people of Thrace; or, according to ſome, of Lower Mœſia. They were conquered by Philip, the father of Alexander; and ſome ages after, they maintained a long war againſt the Roman emperors.

TRIBOCI, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 28.

TRIBŪNI PLEBIS, magiſtrates at Rome, created in the year U. C. 261, when the people after a quarrel with the ſenators had retired to Mons Sacer. The two firſt were C. Licinius, and L. Albinus, but their number was ſoon after raiſed to five, and 37 years after to 10, which remained fixed. Their office was annual, and as the firſt had been created on the 4th of the ides of December, that day was ever after choſen for the election. Their power, though at firſt ſmall, and granted by the patricians to appeaſe the momentary ſeditions of the populace, ſoon became formidable, and the ſenators ſoon repented of having conſented to elect magiſtrates, who not only preſerved the rights of the people, but could ſummon aſſemblies, propoſe laws, ſtop the conſultations of the ſenate, and even aboliſh their decrees by the word Veto. Their approbation was alſo neceſſary to confirm the ſenatûs conſulta, and this was done by affixing the letter T under it. If any irregularity happened in the ſtate, their power was almoſt abſolute; they criticized the conduct of all the public magiſtrates, and even dragged a conſul to priſon, if the meaſures he purſued were hoſtile to the peace of Rome. The dictator alone was their ſuperior, but when that magiſtrate was elected, the office of tribune was not, like that of all other inferior magiſtrates, aboliſhed while he continued at the head of the ſtate. The people paid them ſo much deference, that their perſon was held ſacred, and thence they were always called Sacroſancti. To ſtrike them was a capital crime, and to interrupt them while they ſpoke in the aſſemblies, called for the immediate interference of power. The marks by which they were diſtinguiſhed from other magiſtrates were not very conſpicuous. They wore no particular dreſs, only a beadle called viator marched before them. They never ſat in the ſenate, though ſome time after, their office entitled them to the rank of ſenators. Yet great as their power might appear, they received a heavy wound from their number, and as their conſultations and their reſolutions were of no effect if they were not all unanimous, the ſenate often took advantage of their avarice, and by gaining one of them by bribes, they as it were, ſuſpended the authority of the reſt. The office of tribune of the people, though at firſt deemed mean and ſervile, was afterwards one of the firſt ſteps that led to more honorable employments, and as no patrician was permitted to canvaſs for the tribuneſhip, we find many that deſcended among the plebeians to exerciſe that important office. From the power with which they were at laſt inveſted by the activity, the intrigues, and continual applications of thoſe who were in office, they became almoſt abſolute in the ſtate, and it has been properly obſerved, that they cauſed far greater troubles than thoſe which they were at firſt created to ſilence. Sylla, when raiſed to the dictatorſhip, gave a fatal blow to the authority of the tribunes, and by one of his decrees, they were no longer permitted to harangue and inflame the people; they could make no laws; no appeal lay to their tribunal, and ſuch as had been tribunes, were not permitted to ſolicit for the other offices of the ſtate. This diſgrace however was but momentary, at the death of the tyrant the tribunes recovered their privileges by means of Cotta and Pompey the great. The office of tribune remained in full force till the age of Auguſtus, who to make himſelf more abſolute, and his perſon ſacred, conferred the power and office upon himſelf, whence he was called tribunitiâ poteſtate donatus. His ſucceſſors on the throne imitated his example, and as the emperor was the real and official tribune, ſuch as were appointed to the office were merely nominal without power or privilege. Under Conſtantine the tribuneſhip was totally aboliſhed. The tribunes were never permitted to ſleep out of the city, except at the Feriæ Latinæ, when they went with other magiſtrates to offer ſacrifices upon a mountain near Alba. Their houſes were always open, and they received every complaint, and were ever ready to redreſs the wrongs of their conſtituents. Their authority was not extended beyond the walls of the city.——There were alſo other officers who bore the name of tribunes, ſuch as the tribuni militum or militares, who commanded a diviſion of the legions. They were empowered to decide all quarrels that might ariſe in the army, they took care of the camp, and gave the watch-word. There were only three at firſt choſen by Romulus, but the number was at laſt encreaſed to ſix in every legion. After the expulſion of the Tarquins, they were choſen by the conſuls, but afterwards the right of electing them was divided between the people and the conſul. They were generally of ſenatorian and equeſtrian families, and the former were called laticlavii, and the latter anguſticlavii from their peculiar dreſs. Thoſe that were choſen by the conſuls were called Rutuli, becauſe the right of the conſuls to elect them was confirmed by Rutulus, and thoſe elected by the people were called Comitiati, becauſe choſen in the comitia. They wore a golden ring, and were in office no longer than ſix months. When the conſuls were elected, it was uſual to chuſe 14 tribunes from the knights, who had ſerved five years in the army, and who were called juniores, and ten from the people who had been in ten campaigns, who were called ſeniores.——There were alſo ſome officers called tribuni militum conſulari poteſtate, elected inſtead of conſuls, A. U. C. 310. They were only three originally, but the number was afterwards encreaſed to ſix, or more, according to the will and pleaſure of the people, and the emergencies of the ſtate. Part of them were plebeians, and the reſt of patrician families. When they had ſubſiſted for about 70 years, not without ſome interruption, the office was totally aboliſhed, as the plebeians were admitted to ſhare the conſulſhip, and the conſuls continued at the head of the ſtate till the end of the common wealth.——The tribuni cohortium prætorianarum, were entruſted with the perſon of the emperor, which they guarded and protected. ——The tribuni ærarii were officers choſen from among the people, who kept the money which was to be applied to defray the expences of the army. The richeſt perſons were always choſen, as much money was requiſite for the pay of the ſoldiers. They were greatly diſtinguiſhed in the ſtate, and they ſhared with the ſenators and Roman knights the privileges of judging. They were aboliſhed by Julius Cæſar, but Auguſtus reeſtabliſhed them, and created 200 more, to decide cauſes of ſmaller importance.—— The tribuni celerum had the command of the guard which Romulus choſe for the ſafety of his perſon. They were 100 in number, diſtinguiſhed for their probity, their opulence, and their nobility.——The tribuni voluptatum were commiſſioned to take care of the amuſements which were prepared for the people, and that nothing might be wanting in the exhibitions. This office was alſo honorable.

TRICASTĪNI, a people of Gallia Narbonenſis. Sil. 3, v. 466.

TRICCÆ, a town of Theſſaly, where Æſculapius had a temple. The inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Liv. 32, c. 13.—Homer. Il.—Plin. 4, c. 8.

TRICLARIA, a yearly feſtival celebrated by the inhabitants of three cities in Ionia, to appeaſe the anger of Diana Triclaria, whoſe temple had been defiled by the adulterous commerce of Menalippus and Cometho. It was uſual to ſacrifice a boy and a girl.

Tricelna, a place of Arcadia, where, according to ſome, Mercury was born. Pauſ. 8, c. 16.

Trieterica, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus, celebrated every three years.

Tripolinus, a mountain of Campania. Mart. 13, ep. 104.

Trinacria, or Trinacris, one of the antient names of Sicily, from its triangular form. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 384, &c.

Trinobantes, a people of Britain. Tacit. ann. 14.

Triocala, or Triocla, a town in the ſouthern parts of Sicily. Sil. 14, v. 271.

Tripas or Tripes, a ſon of Neptune by Canace, the daughter of Æolus. Apollod. 1, c. 7. —— A ſon of Phorbas, father to Algenor and Jaſus. Homer. Hymn. in Ap. 211. ——A ſon of Piranthus.

Triphylia, one of the antient names of Elis. ——A mountain where Jupiter had a temple in Panchaia, whence he is called Triphylius.

Tripolis, an antient town of Phœnicia, built by the liberal contribution of Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus, whence the name. —— A town of Pontus.

Triptolemus, a ſon of Oceanus and Terra, or, according to ſome, of Trochilus, a prieſt of Argos. According to the more received opinion he was ſon of Celeus, king of Attica, by Neæra, whom ſome have called Metanira, Cothonea, Hyona, or Polymnia. He was born at Eleuſis in Attica, and was cured in his youth of a ſevere illneſs by the care of Ceres, who had been invited into the houſe of Celeus by the monarch's children, as ſhe travelled over the country in queſt of her daughter. To repay the kindneſſes of Celeus, the goddeſs took particular notice of her ſon. She fed him with her own milk, and placed him on burning coals during the night, to deſtroy whatever particles of mortality he had received from his parents. The mother was aſtoniſhed at the uncommon growth of her ſon, and ſhe had the curioſity to watch Ceres. She diſturbed the goddeſs by a ſudden cry, when Triptolemus was laid on the burning aſhes, and as Ceres was therefore unable to make him immortal, ſhe taught him agriculture, and rendered him ſerviceable to mankind, by inſtructing him how to ſow corn, and make bread. She alſo gave him her chariot, which was drawn by two dragons, and in this celeſtial vehicle he travelled all over the earth, and diſtributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world. In Scythia the favorite of Ceres nearly loſt his life; but Lyncus, the king of the country, who had conſpired to murder him, was changed into a lynx. At his return to Eleuſis, Triptolemus reſtored Ceres her chariot, and eſtabliſhed feſtivals and myſteries in honor of the deity. He reigned for ſome time, and after death received divine honors. Some ſuppoſe that he accompanied Bacchus in his Indian expedition. Diod. —— Hygin. fab. 147. —— Pauſ. 2, c. 14, l. 8, c. 4. —— Juſtin. 2, c. 6. —— Apollod. 1, c. 5. —— Callim. in Cer. 22. —— Ovid. Met. 5, v. 646. Faſt. 4, v. 501. Triſt. 3, el. 8, v. 1.

Triquetra, a name given to Sicily by the Latins, for its triangular form. Lucret. 1, v. 78.

Trismegistus, a famous Egyptian. Vid. Mercurius.

Tritia, a daughter of the river Triton, mother of Menalippus, by Mars. —A town in Achaia, built by her ſon, bore her name. Pauſ. 7, c. 22.

Tritogenia, a ſirname of Pallas. Heſiod.

Triton, a ſea deity, ſon of Neptune, by Amphitrite; or according to ſome, by Celeno, or Salacia. He was very powerful among the ſea deities, and could calm the ſea and abate ſtorms at pleaſure. He is generally repreſented as blowing a ſhell, his body above the waiſt is like that of a man, and below, a dolphin. Some repreſent him with the fore feet of a horſe. Many of the ſea deities are called Tritons, but the name is generally applied to thoſe only who are half men and half fiſhes. Apollod. 1, c. 4. —Heſiod. Theog. v. 930. —Ovid Met. 1, v. 333. —Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 28. —Virg. Æn. 1, v. 148, l. 6, v. 173. —Pauſ. 9, c. 20. —— A river of Africa, falling into the lake Tritonis, ——One of the names of the Nile. —— A ſmall river of Bœotia.

Tritonis, a lake and river of Africa, near which Minerva had a temple, whence ſhe is ſirnamed Tritonis or Tritonia. Herodot. 4, c. 178. —Pauſ. 9, c. 33. —Virg. Æn. 2, v. 171. —Mela. 1, c. 7. Athens is alſo called Tritonis, becauſe dedicated to Minerva. Ovid. Met. 5.

Triventum, a town of the Samnites.

Trivia, a ſirname given to Diana, becauſe ſhe preſided over all places where three roads met. At the new moon the Athenians offered her ſacrifices, and a ſumptuous entertainment, which was generally diſtributed among the poor. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13, l. 7, v. 774. —Ovid Met. 2, v. 416. Faſt. 1, v. 389.

Triviæ antrum, a place in the valley of Aricia, where the nymph Egeria reſided. Mart. 6, ep. 47.

Triviæ lucus, a place of Campania, in the bay of Cumæ. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 13.

Trivicum, a town in the country of the Hirpini in Italy. Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 79.

Triumviri reipublicæ conſtituendæ, were three magiſtrates appointed equally to govern the Roman ſtate with abſolute power. Theſe officers officers gave a fatal blow to the expiring independence of the Roman people, and became celebrated for their different purſuits, their ambition, and their various fortunes. The firſt triumvirate, B. C. 60, was in the hands of J. Cæſar, Pompey, and Craſſus, who at the expiration of their office, kindled a civil war. The ſecond and laſt triumvirate B. C. 43, was under Auguſtus, M. Antony, and Lepidus, and through them the Romans totally loſt their liberty. Auguſtus diſagreed with his colleagues, and after he had defeated them, he made himſelf abſolute in Rome. The triumvirate was in full force at Rome for the ſpace of about 12 years. ——There were alſo officers who were called triumviri capitales, created A. U. C. 464. They took cognizance of murders and robberies, and every thing in which ſlaves were concerned. Criminals under ſentence of death were entruſted to their care, and they had them executed according to the commands of the prætors.—The triumviri nocturni watched over the ſafety of Rome in the night time, and in caſe of fire were ever ready to give orders, and to take the moſt effectual meaſures to extinguiſh it.——The triumviri agrarii had the care of colonies that were ſent to ſettle in different parts of the empire. They made a fair diviſion of the lands among the citizens, and exerciſed over the new colony all the power which was placed in the hands of the conſuls at Rome. ——The triumviri monetales were maſters of the mint, and had the care of the coin, hence their office was generally intimated by the following letters often ſeen on antient coins and medals; IIIVIR. A. A, A. F. F. i. e. Triumviri auro, argento, ære flando, feriendo. Some ſuppoſe that they were created only in the age of Cicero, as thoſe who were employed before them, were called Denariorum flandorum curatores.——The triumviri valetudinis were choſen when Rome was viſited by a plague or ſome peſtiferous diſtemper, and they took particular care of the temples of health and virtue. —— The triumviri ſenatûs legendi, were appointed to name thoſe that were moſt worthy to be made ſenators from among the plebeians. They were firſt choſen in the age of Auguſtus, as before, this privilege belonged to the kings, and afterwards devolved upon the conſuls, and the cenſors, A. U. C. 310.——The triumviri menſarii were choſen in the ſecond Punic war; to take care of the coin and prices of exchange.

TROADES, the inhabitants of Troas.

TROAS, a country of Phrygia in Aſia Minor, of which Troy was the capital. When Troas is taken for the whole kingdom of Priam, it may be ſaid to contain Myſia and Phrygia Minor; but if only applied to that part of the country where Troy was ſituate, its extent is confined within very narrow limits. Troas was antiently called Dardania. Vid. Troja.

TROCHOIS, a lake in the iſland of Delos, near which Apollo and Diana were born.

TRŒZENE, a town of Argolis, in Peloponneſus near the Saronicus Sinus, which received its name from Trœzen, the ſon of Pelops, who reigned there for ſome time. It is often called Theſeis, becauſe Theſeus was born there. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 81.—Pauſ. 2, c. 50.—Plut in Theſ.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 566, l. 15, v. 296.——Another town at the ſouth of the Peloponneſus.

TROGILUS, a harbour of Sicily.

TROGLODYTÆ, a people of Æthiopia. They were all ſhepherds and had their wives in common. Strab. 1.—Mela. 1, c. 4, & 8.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, a Latin hiſtorian, B. C. 41. His father was one of the friends and adherents of J. Cæſar. Trogus wrote an univerſal hiſtory of all the moſt important events that had happened from the beginning of the world to the age of Auguſtus, divided into 44 books. This hiſtory, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance, was epitomized by Juſtin, and is ſtill extant. Some ſuppoſe that the epitome is the cauſe that the original of Trogus is loſt.

TROJA, a city, the capital of Troas, or according to others, a country of which Ilium was the capital. It was built on a ſmall eminence near mount Ida, and the promontory of Sigæum, at the diſtance of about four miles from the ſea ſhore. Dardanus the firſt king of the country built it, and called it Dardania, and from Tros one of his ſucceſſors it was called Troja, and from Ilus Ilion. Neptune is alſo ſaid to have built, or more properly repaired, its walls, in the age of king Laomedon. This city had been celebrated by the poems of Homer and Virgil, and of all the wars which have been carried on among the antients, that of Troy is the moſt famous. The Trojan war was undertaken by the Greeks, to recover Helen, whom Paris the ſon of Priam king of Troy had carried away from the houſe of Menelaus. All Greece united to avenge the cauſe of Menelaus, and every prince furniſhed a certain number of ſhips and ſoldiers. According to Euripides, Virgil, and Lycophron, the armament of the Greeks amounted to 1000 ſhips. Homer mentions them as being 1186, and Thucydides ſuppoſes that they were 1200 in number. The number of men which theſe ſhips carried is unknown; yet as the largeſt contained about 120 men each, and the ſmalleſt 50, it may be ſuppoſed that no leſs than 100,000 men were engaged in this celebrated expedition. Agamemnon was choſen general of all theſe forces, forces, but the princes and kings of Greece were admitted among his counſellors, and by them all the operations of the war were directed. The moſt celebrated of the Grecian princes that diſtinguiſhed themſelves in this war, were Achilles, Ajax, Menelaus, Ulyſſes, Diomedes, Proteſilaus, Patroclus, Agamemnon, Neſtor, Neoptolemus, &c. The Grecian army was oppoſed by a more numerous force. The king of Troy received aſſiſtance from the neighbouring princes in Aſia Minor, and reckoned among his moſt active generals, Rheſus king of Thrace, and Memnon, who entered the field with 20,000 Aſſyrians and Æthiopians. Many of the adjacent cities were reduced and plundered before the Greeks approached the walls; but when the ſiege was begun, the enemies on both ſides gave proofs of valor and intrepidity. The army of the Greeks, however, was viſited by a plague, and the operations were not leſs retarded by the quarrel of Agamemnon and Achilles. The loſs was great on both ſides; the moſt valiant of the Trojans, and particularly of the ſons of Priam, were ſlain in the field; and indeed, ſo great was the ſlaughter, that the rivers of the country are repreſented as filled with dead bodies and ſuits of armour. After the ſiege had been carried on for ten years, ſome of the Trojans, among whom were Æneas and Antenor, betrayed the city into the hands of the enemy, and Troy was reduced to aſhes. The poets however, ſupport, that the Greeks made themſelves maſters of the place by artifice. They ſecretly filled a large wooden horſe with armed men, and led away their army from the plains, as if to return home. The Trojans brought the wooden horſe into their city, and in the night the Greeks that were confined within the ſides of the animal, ruſhed out and opened the gates to their companions, who had returned from the place of their concealment. The greateſt part of the inhabitants were put to the ſword, and the others carried away by the conquerors. This happened, according to the Arundelian marbles, about 1184 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 3530th year of the Julian period, on the night between the 11th and 12th of June, 408 years before the firſt olympiad. Some time after, a new city was raiſed, about 30 ſtadia from the ruins of the old Troy; but though it bore the antient name, and received ample donations from Alexander the great, when he viſited it in his Aſiatic expedition, yet it continued to be ſmall, and in the age of Strabo it was nearly in ruins. It is ſaid that J. Cæſar, who wiſhed to paſs for one of the deſcendants of Æneas, and conſequently to be related to the Trojans, intended to make it the capital of the Roman empire, and to tranſport there the ſenate and the Roman people. The ſame apprehenſions were entertained in the reign of Auguſtus, and according to ſome, an ode of Horace, Juſtum & tenacem propoſiti virum was written purpoſely to diſſuade the emperor from putting into execution ſo wild a project. Vid. Paris, Æneas, Antenor, Agamemnon, Ilium, Laomedon, Menelaus, &c. Virg. Æn. —Homer.—Ovid.—Diod, &c.

TROJĀNI LUDI, games inſtituted by Æneas or his ſon Aſcanius, to commemorate the death of Anchiſes, and celebrated in the circus at Rome. Boys of the beſt families, dreſſed in a neat manner, and accoutred with ſuitable arms and weapons, were permitted to enter the liſt. Sylla exhibited them in his dictatorſhip, and under Auguſtus they were obſerved with unuſual pomp and ſolemnity. A mock fight on horſe back, or ſometimes on foot, was exhibited. The leader of the party was called princeps juventutis, and was generally the ſon of a ſenator, or the heir apparent to the empire. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 602.

TRŌILUS, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Achilles during the Trojan war. Apollod. 3. c. 12.—Horat. 2, Od. 9, v. 16.

TROMENTĪNA, one of the Roman tribes.

TROPÆA DRUSI, a town of Germany where Druſus died, and Tiberius was ſaluted emperor by the army.

TROPHONIUS, a celebrated architect, ſon of Erginus, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia. He built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the aſſiſtance of his brother Agamedes, and when he demanded of the god a reward for his trouble, he was told by the prieſteſs to wait eight days, and to live during that time with all chearfulneſs and pleaſure. When the days were paſſed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. According to Pauſanias, however, he was ſwallowed up alive in the earth; and when afterwards the country was viſited by a great drought, the Bœotians were directed to apply to Trophonius for relief, and to ſeek him at Lebadea, where he gave oracles in a cave. They diſcovered this cave by means of a ſwarm of bees, and Trophonius told them how to eaſe their misfortunes. From that time Trophonius was honored as a god, he paſſed for the ſon of Apollo, a chapel and a ſtatue were erected to him, and ſacrifices were offered to his divinity, when conſulted to give oracles. The cave of Trophonius became one of the moſt celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required, and the ſuppliant was obliged to make particular ſacrifices, to anoint his body with oil, and to bathe in the waters of certain rivers. He was to be clothed in a linen robe, and with a cake of honey in his hand, he was directed to deſcend into the cave by a narrow entrance, from whence he returned backwards, after he had had received an answer. He was always pale and dejected at his return, and thence it came proverbial to say of a melancholy man, that he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius. There were annually exhibited games in honor of Trophonius at Lebadea. Paus. 9, c. 37, &c.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47.—Plut.—Plin. 34, c. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 3, c. 45.

TROS, a son of Ericthonius, king of Troy, who married Callirhoe, the daughter of the Scamander, by whom he had Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes. He made war against Tantalus, king of Phrygia, whom he accused of having stolen away the youngest of his sons. The capital of Phrygia was called Troja from him, and the country itself Troas. Virg. 3, G. v. 36.—Homer. Il. 20, v. 219.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

TROSSŬLUM, a town of Etruria, which gave the name of Trossuli to the Roman knights who had taken it without the assistance of foot soldiers. Pers. 1, v. 82.

TROTILUM, a town of Sicily.

TRUENTUM, or TRUENTĪNUM, a river of Picenum, falling into the Adriatic. There is also a town of the same name in the neighbourhood. Sil. 8, v. 434.—Mela. 2.

TRYPHERUS, a celebrated cook, &c. Juv. 11.

TRYPHIODŌRUS, a Greek poet in the 6th century, who wrote a poem in 24 books on the destruction of Troy, from which he excluded the α in the first book, the β in the second, and the γ in the third, &c.

TRYPHON, a tyrant of Apamea in Syria, put to death by Antiochus. Justin. 36, c. 1.——A surname of one of the Ptolemies. Ælian. V. H. 14, c. 31.——A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of Augustus.

TUBĔRO, (Q. Ælius) a Roman consul, son in law of Paulus the conqueror of Perseus. He is celebrated for his poverty, in which he seemed to glory, as well as the rest of his family. Sixteen of the Tuberos, with their wives and children, lived in a small house, and maintained themselves with the produce of a little field, which they cultivated with their own hands. The first piece of silver plate that entered the house of Tubero, was a small cup, which his father in law presented to him, after he had conquered the king of Macedonia.——A learned man.——A governor of Africa.——A Roman general who marched against the Germans under the emperors. He was accused of treason, and acquitted.

TUCCA PLAUTIUS, a friend of Horace and Virgil. He was ordered by Augustus, as some report, to revise the Æneid of Virgil, which remained uncorrected on account of the premature death of the poet.

TUCCIA, an immodest woman in Juvenal's age. Juv. 6, v. 64.

TUCIA, a river near Rome. Sil. 13, v. 5.

TUDER, or TUDERTIA, an antient town of Umbria. The inhabitants were called Tudertes. Sil. 4, v. 222.

TUDRI, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

TUGINI, or TUGENI, a people of Germany.

TUGURĪNUS, a Roman knight who conspired against Nero, &c.

TUISTO, a deity of the Germans; the founder of the nation. Tacit de Germ. 2.

TULINGI, a people of Germany between the Rhine and the Danube.

TULLA, one of Camilla's attendants in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 656.

TULLIA, a daughter of Servius Tullius, king of Rome. She married Tarquin the proud, after she had murdered her first husband Arunx, and consented to see Tullius assassinated, that Tarquin might be raised to the throne. It is said that she ordered her chariot to be driven over the body of her aged father, which had been thrown all mangled and bloody in one of the streets of Rome. She was afterwards banished from Rome with her husband. Ovid. in Ib. 363.——Another daughter of Servius Tullius, who married Tarquin the proud. She was murdered by her own husband, that he might marry her ambitious sister of the same name.——A daughter of Cicero. Vid. Tulliola.——A debauched woman. Juv. 6, v. 306.

TULLIA LEX, de senatu, by M. Tullius Cicero, A. U. C. 690, enacted that those who had a libera legatio granted them by the senate, should hold it no more than one year. Such senators as had a libera legatio, travelled through the provinces of the empire without any expence, as if they were employed in the affairs of the state.——Another de ambitu, by the same, the same year. It forbad any person, two years before he canvassed for an office, to exhibit a show of gladiators, unless that case had devolved upon him by will. Senators guilty of the crime of ambitus, were punished with the aquæ & ignis interdictio for ten years, and the penalty inflicted on the commons was more severe than that of the Calpurnian law.

TULLIŎLA, or TULLIA, a daughter of Cicero by Terentia. She married Caius Piso, and afterwards Furius Crassipes, and lastly P. Corn. Dolabella. With this last husband she had every reason to be dissatisfied. Dolabella was turbulent, and consequently the cause of much grief to Tullia and her father. Tullia died in childbed, about 44 years before Christ. Cicero was so inconsolable on this occasion, that some have accused him of an unnatural partiality for his daughter. According to a ridiculous story which some of the moderns report, report, in the age of pope Paul 3d. a monument was discovered on the Appian road, with the superscription of Tulliolæ filiæ meæ. The body of a woman was found in it, which was reduced to ashes as soon as touched; there was also a lamp burning, which was extinguished as soon as the air gained admission there, and which was supposed to have been lighted above 1500 years. Cic.—Plut. in Cic.

Tullius Cimber, the son of a freedman, rose to great honors, and followed the interest of Pompey. He was reconciled to J. Cæsar, whom he murdered with Brutus. Plut.—— Cicero, a celebrated orator. Vid. Cicero.—— The son of the orator Cicero. Vid. Cicero.——Servius, a king of Rome. Vid. Servius.—— Senecio, a man accused of conspiracy against Nero with Piso.——A friend of Otho.——One of the kings of Rome. Vid. Servius.

Tullus Hostilius, the 3d king of Rome after the death of Numa. He was of a warlike and active disposition, and signalized himself by his expedition against the people of Alba, whom he conquered, and whose city he destroyed, after the famous battle of the Horatii and Curiatii. He afterwards carried his arms against the Latins and the neighbouring states with success, and enforced reverence for majesty among his subjects. He died with all his family about 640 years before the Christian era, after a reign of 32 years. The manner of his death is not precisely known. Some suppose that he was killed by lightening, while he was performing some magical ceremonies in his own house; or, according to the more probable accounts of others, he was murdered by Ancus Martius, who set fire to the palace, to make it believed that the impiety of Tullus had been punished by heaven. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 814.—Liv. 1, c. 22.—Plut.——A consul, A. U. C. 686. Horat. 3. od. 8, v. 12.

Tunĕta, or Tunis, a town of Africa, near which Regulus was defeated and taken by Xanthippus. Liv. 30, c. 9.

Tungri, a name given to some of the Germans. Tacit. de Germ. 2.

C. Turanius, a Latin tragic poet in the age of Augustus. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 16, v. 29.

Turbo, a gladiator mentioned Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 310. He was of a small stature, but uncommonly courageous.——A governor of Pannonia, under the emperors.

Turdetāni, a people of Spain.

Turesis, a Thracian, who revolted from Tiberius.

Turius, a corrupt judge in the Augustan age. Horat. 2. Sat. 1. v. 49.

Turnus, a king of the Rutuli, son of Daunus and Venilia. He made war against Æneas, and attempted to drive him away from Italy, that he might not marry the daughter of Latinus, who had been previously engaged to him. His efforts were attended with no success; though supported with great courage and a numerous army. He was conquered and at last killed in a single combat by Æneas. He is represented as a man of uncommon strength. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 56, &c.—Tibul. 2, el. 5, v. 49.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 879. Met. 14, v. 453.

Turŏnes, a people of Gaul.

Turpio. Vid. Ambivius.

Turullius, one of Cæsar's murderers.

Tuscania and Tuscia, a large country at the west of Rome, the same as Etruria. Vid. Etruria.

Tusci, the inhabitants of Etruria.

Tusculānum, a country house of Cicero, near Tusculum.

Tuscŭlum, a town of Latium, about 12 miles from Rome, founded by Telegonus the son of Ulysses and Circe. Cic. ad Attic.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 3, Od. 23, v. 8, &c.

Tuscus, belonging to Etruria. The Tiber is called Tuscus amnis, from its situation. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 199.

Tuscus vicus, a small village near Rome. It received this name from the Etrurians of Porsenna's army, that settled there. Liv. 2, c. 14.

Tuscum mare, a part of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Etruria.

Tuta, a queen of Illyricum, &c.

Tutia, a vestal virgin accused of incontinence. She proved herself to be innocent by carrying water from the Tiber to the temple of Vesta in a sieve, after a solemn invocation to the goddess. Liv. 20.

Tuticum, a town of the Hirpini.

Tyāna, a town at the foot of mount Taurus in Cappadocia, where Apollonius was born. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 719.—Strab. 12.

Tychius, a celebrated artist of Hyle in Bœotia, who made Hector's shield, which was covered with the hides of seven oxen. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 823.—Strab. 9.—Homer. Il. 7, v. 220.

Tyde, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis. Ital. 3, v. 367.

TYDEUS, a ſon of Œneus, king of Calydon. He fled from his country after the accidental murder of one of his friends, and found a ſafe aſylum in the court of Adraſtus, king of Argos, whoſe daughter Deiphyle he married. When Adraſtus wiſhed to replace his ſon-in-law Polynices on the throne of Thebes, Tydeus undertook to go and declare war againſt Eteocles, who uſurped the crown. The reception he met provoked his reſentment; he challenged Eteocles and his officers to ſingle combat, and defeated them. On his return to Argos, he ſlew 50 of the Thebans who had conſpired againſt his life, and laid in an ambuſh to ſurprize him; and only one of the number was permitted to return to Thebes, to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions. He was one of the ſeven chiefs of the army of Adraſtus, and during the Theban war he behaved with great courage. Many of the enemies expired under his blows, till he was at laſt wounded by Melanippus. Though the blow was fatal, Tydeus had the ſtrength to dart at his enemy, and to bring him to the ground, before he was carried away from the fight by his companions. At his own requeſt, the dead body of Melanippus was brought to him, and after he had ordered the head to be cut off, he began to tear out the brains with his teeth. This ſavage barbarity of Tydeus diſpleaſed Minerva, who was coming to bring him relief, and to make him immortal; and the goddeſs left him to his fate, and ſuffered him to die. He was buried at Argos, where his monument was ſtill to be ſeen in the age of Pauſanias. He was father to Diomedes. Some ſuppoſe that the cauſe of his flight to Argos, was the murder of the ſon of Melus, or according to others, of Alcathous his father's brother, or perhaps his own brother Olenius. Homer. Il. 4, v. 365, 387.—Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 6.—Æſchyl. Sept. ante. Theb.—Pauſ. 9, c. 18.—Diod. 2.—Eurip. in Sup.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 479.—Ovid. in Ib. 350, &c.

TYDIDES, a patronymic of Diomedes, as ſon of Tydeus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 101.—Horat. 1, Od. 15, v. 28.

TYMBER, a ſon of Daunus, who aſſiſted Turnus. His head was cut off in an engagement by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 393, &c.

TYMOLUS, a mountain. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 15. Vid. Tmolus.

TYMPANIA, an inland town of Elis.

TYMPHÆI, a people between Epirus and Theſſaly.

TYNDĂRIDES, a patronymic of the children of Tyndarus, as Caſtor, Pollux, and Helen, &c. Ovid. Met. 8.

TYNDĂRIS, a patronymic of Helen, daughter of Tyndarus. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 569.——A town of Sicily near Meſſana, Sil. 14, v. 209.——Horace gives this name to one of his miſtreſſes, as beſt expreſſive of all female accompliſhments, 1, Od. 17, v. 10.

TYNDĂRUS, a ſon of Œbalus and Gorgophone, or, according to ſome, of Perieres. He was king of Lacedæmon, and married the celebrated Leda, who became mother of Pollux and Helen by Jupiter. Vid. Leda, Caſtor, Pollux, Clytemneſtra, &c.

TYNNĪCHUS, a general of Heraclea. Polyæn.

TYPHŒUS, or TYPHON, a famous giant, ſon of Tartarus and Terra, who had a hundred heads like thoſe of a ſerpent or a dragon. Flames of devouring fire were darted from his mouth and from his eyes, and he uttered horrid yells, like the diſſonant ſhrieks of different animals. He was no ſooner born than, to avenge the death of his brothers the giants, he made war againſt heaven, and ſo frightened the gods, that they fled away and aſſumed different ſhapes. Jupiter became a ram, Mercury an ibis, Apollo a crow, Juno a cow, Bacchus a goat, Diana a cat, Venus a fiſh, &c. The father of the gods at laſt reſumed courage, and put Typhœus to flight with his thunderbolts, and cruſhed him under mount Ætna, in the iſland of Sicily, or according to ſome, under the iſland Inarime. Typhœus became father of Geryon, Cerberus, and Orthos, by his union with Echidna. Hygin. fab. 152, & 196.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 325.—Æſchyl. ſept. ante Theb.—Heſiod. Theog. 820.—Homer. Hym.—Herodot. 2, c. 156.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

TYPHON, a giant whom Juno produced by ſtriking the earth. Some of the poets make him the famous Typhœus. Vid. Typhœus.—A brother of Oſiris, who married Nepthys. He laid ſnares for his brother during his expedition, and murdered him. The death of Oſiris was avenged by his ſon Orus, and Typhon was put to death. Vid. Oſiris. He was reckoned among the Egyptians to be the cauſe of every evil, and on that account generally repreſented as a wolf and a crocodile. Plut. in Iſ. & Oſ.—Diod. 1.

TYRANNION, a grammarian of Pontus, intimate with Cicero. His original name was Theophraſtus, and he received that of Tyrannion, from his auſterity to his pupils. He was taken by Lucullus, and reſtored to his liberty by Muræna. He opened a ſchool in the houſe of his friend Cicero, and enjoyed his friendſhip. He was extremely fond of books books, and collected a library of about 30,000 volumes. To his care and induſtry the world is indebted for the preſervation of Ariſtotle's works.——There was alſo one of his diſciples called Diocles, who bore his name. He was a native of Phœnicia, and made priſoner in the war of Auguſtus and Antony. He was bought by Dymes, one of the emperor's favorites, and afterwards by Terentia, who gave him his liberty. He wrote 68 different volumes, in one of which he proved that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek; and another in which Homer's poems were corrected, &c.

Tyrannus, a ſon of Pterelaus.

Tyras, or Tyra, a river of European Sarmatia, falling into the Euxine ſea, between the Danube and the Boryſthenes. Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 50.

Tyres, one of the companions of Æneas in his wars againſt Turnus. He was brother to Teuthras. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 403.

Tyridates, a rich man in the age of Alexander, &c. Curt.

Tyrii, or Tyrus, a town of Magna Græcia.

Tyriotes, an eunuch of Darius, who fled from Alexander's camp, to inform his maſter of the queen's death. Curt. 4, c. 10.

Tyro, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmoneus, king of Elis and Alcidice. She was treated with great ſeverity by her mother-in-law Sidero, and at laſt removed from her father's houſe by her uncle Cretheus. She became enamoured of the Enipeus; and as ſhe often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune aſſumed the ſhape of her favored lover, and gained her affections. She had two ſons, Pelias and Neleus, by Neptune, whom ſhe expoſed, to conceal her incontinence from the world. The children were preſerved by ſhepherds, and when they had arrived to years of maturity, they avenged their mother's injuries by aſſaſſinating the cruel Sidero. Some time after her amour with Neptune, Tyro married her uncle Cretheus, by whom ſhe had Amythaon, Pheres, and Æſon. Tyro is often called Salmonis from her father. Homer. Od. 11, v. 234.—Pindar. Pyth. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Diod. 4.—Propert. 1, el. 13, v. 20, l. 2, el. 30, v. 51, l. 3, el. 19, v. 13.—Ovid. am. 3, el. 6, v. 43.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 42.

Tyros, an iſland of Arabia.——A city of Phœnicia. Vid. Tyrus.

Tyrrheidæ, a patronymic given to the ſons of Tyrrheus, who kept the flocks of Latinus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 484.

Tyrrheni, the inhabitants of Etruria. Vid. Etruria.

Tyrrhenum mare, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coaſt of Etruria.

Tyrrhenus, a ſon of Atys king of Lydia, who came to Italy, where part of the country was called after him. Paterc. 1, c. 1.——A friend of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 612.

Tyrrheus, a ſhepherd of king Latinus, whoſe ſtag being killed by the companions of Aſcanius, was the firſt cauſe of war between Æneas and the inhabitants of Latium. Hence the word Tyrrheides. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 485.——An Egyptian general, B. C. 91.

Tyrsis, a place in the Balearides, ſuppoſed to be the palace of Saturn.

Tyrtæus, a Greek elegiac poet, born in Attica, ſon of Archimbrotus. In the ſecond Meſſenian war, the Lacedæmonians were directed by the oracle to apply to the Athenians for a general, if they wiſhed to finiſh their expedition with ſucceſs, and they received Tyrtæus. The poet, though ridiculed for his many deformities, and his ignorance of military affairs, animated the Lacedæmonians, juſt as they wiſhed to raiſe the ſiege of Ithome, and inſpired them with ſo much courage, that they defeated the Meſſenians. For his ſervices, he was made a citizen of Lacedæmon, and treated with great attention. Of the compoſitions of Tyrtæus, nothing is extant but few fragments. He floriſhed about 684 B. Tyrus, or Tyros, a very antient city of Phœnicia, built by the Sidonians, on a ſmall iſland at the ſouth of Sidon, about 200 ſtadia from the ſhore, and now called Sur. There were, properly ſpeaking, two places of that name, the old Tyros, called Palætyros, on the ſea-ſhore, and the other in the iſland. It was about 19 miles in circumference, including Palætyros, but without it about four miles. Tyre was deſtroyed by the princes of Aſſyria, and afterwards rebuilt. It maintained its independence till the age of Alexander, who took it with much difficulty, and only after he had joined the iſland to the continent by a mole, after a ſiege of ſeven months, on the 20th of Auguſt, B. C. 332. The Tyrians were naturally induſtrious; their city was the emporium of commerce, and they were deemed the inventors of ſcarlet and purple colors. They founded many cities in different parts of the world, ſuch as Carthage, Gades, Leptis, &c. which on that account are often diſtinguiſhed by the epithet Tyria. The buildings of Tyre were very very splendid and magnificent; the walls were 150 feet high, with a proportionable breadth. Hercules was the chief deity of the place. It had two large and capacious harbours, and a powerful fleet. It was built, according to some writers, about 2760 years before the Christian era. Strab. 16.—Herodot. 2, c. 44.—Mela. 1, c. 12.—Curt. 4, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 6. 339, &c.—*Ovid. TYRIAS, a man celebrated by Cicero, as being the inventor of rhetoric. Cic. 2, de Inv.

VACATIONE (lex de) was enacted concerning the exemption from military ſervice, and contained this very remarkable clauſe, niſi bellum Gallicum exoriatur, in which caſe the prieſts themſelves were not exempted from ſervice. This can intimate how apprehenſive the Romans were of the Gauls, by whom their city had once been taken.

VACCA, a town of Numidia.——A river of Spain.

VACCÆI, a people of Spain.

VACCUS, a general, &c. Liv. 8, c. 19.

VAGĒNI, a people of Liguria, at the ſources of the Po. Sil. 8, v. 696.

VALA, (C. Numonius) a friend of Horace, to whom the poet addreſſed 1 ep. 15.

VALENS (Flavius) a ſon of Gratian born in Pannonia. His brother Valentinian took him as his colleague on the throne, and appointed him over the eaſtern parts of the Roman empire. The bold meaſures and the threats of the rebel Procopius, frightened the new emperor; and if his friends had not intervened, he would have willingly reſigned all his pretenſions to the empire, which his brother had entruſted to his care. By perſeverance, however, Valens was enabled to deſtroy his rival, and to diſtinguiſh himſelf in his wars againſt the northern barbarians. But his lenity to theſe ſavage intruders proved fatal to the Roman power; and by permitting ſome of the Goths to ſettle in the provinces of Thrace, and to have free acceſs in every part of the country, Valens encouraged them to make depredations on his ſubjects, and to diſturb their tranquillity. His eyes were opened too late; he attempted to repel them, but he failed in the attempt. A bloody battle was fought, in which the barbarians obtained ſome advantage, and Valens was hurried away by the obſcurity of the night, and the affection of his ſoldiers for his perſon, into a lonely houſe, which the Goths ſet on fire. Valens, unable to make his eſcape, was burnt alive in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of 15 years, A. D. 378. He has been blamed for his ſuperſtition and cruelty, in putting to death all ſuch of his ſubjects whoſe name began by Theod, becauſe he had been informed by his favorite aſtrologers, that his crown would devolve upon the head of an officer whoſe name was begun with theſe letters. Valens did not poſſeſs any of the great qualities which diſtinguiſh a great and powerful monarch. He was illiterate, and of a diſpoſition naturally indolent and inactive. Yet though timorous in the higheſt degree, he was warlike; and though fond of eaſe, he was acquainted with the character of his officers, and preferred none but ſuch as poſſeſſed merit. He was a great friend of diſcipline, a pattern of chaſtity and temperance, and he ſhewed himſelf always ready to liſten to the juſt complaints of his ſubjects, though he gave an attentive ear to flattery and malevolent informations. Ammian. &c. —— Valerius, a proconſul of Achaia, who proclaimed himſelf emperor of Rome, when Macrian, who had been inveſted with the purple in the eaſt, attempted to aſſaſſinate him. He reigned only ſix months, and was murdered by his ſoldiers, A. D. 261.——Fabius, a friend of Vitellius, whom he ſaluted emperor, in oppoſition to Otho. He was greatly honored by Vitellius, &c.——A general of the emperor Honorius.——The name of the ſecond Mercury mentioned by Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22.

VALENTIA, one of the antient names of Rome.——A town of Spain, a little below Saguntum, founded by J. Brutus, and for ſome time known by the name of Julia Colonia.——A town of Italy.

VALENTINIĀNUS 1ſt, a ſon of Gratian; raiſed to the imperial throne by his merit and valor. He kept the weſtern part of the empire for himſelf, and appointed over the eaſt his brother Valens. He gave the moſt convincing proof of his military valor in the victories which he obtained over the barbarians in the provinces of Gaul, the deſarts of Africa, or on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. The inſolence of the Quadi he puniſhed with great ſeverity; and when theſe deſperate and indigent barbarians had deprecated the conqueror's mercy, Valentinian treated them with contempt, and upbraided them with every mark of reſentment. While he ſpoke with ſuch warmth, he broke a blood veſſel, and fell lifeleſs on the ground. He was conveyed into his palace by his attendants, and ſoon after died, after ſuffering the greateſt agonies, violent fits, and contorſions of his limbs, on the 17th of November, A. D. 375. He was then in the 55th year of his age, and had reigned 12 years. He has been repreſented by ſome, as cruel and covetous in the higheſt degree. He was naturally of an irritable diſpoſition, and he gratified his pride in expreſſing a contempt for thoſe who were his equals in military abilities, or who ſhone for gracefulneſs or elegance of addreſs. Valentinian.—About ſix days after the death of Valentinian, his ſecond ſon, Valentinian the ſecond, was proclaimed emperor, tho' only five years old. He ſucceeded his brother, Gratian, A. D. 383, but his youth ſeemed to favor diſſenſion, and the attempts and the uſurpations of rebels. He was robbed of his throne by Maximus, four years after the death of Gratian; and in this helpleſs ſituation he had recourſe to Theodoſius, who was then emperor of the eaſt. He was ſucceſsful in his applications, Maximus was conquered by Theodoſius, and Valentinian entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by his benefactor. He was ſome time after ſtrangled by one of his officers, a native of Gaul, called Arbogaſtes, in whom he had placed too much confidence, and from whom he expected more deference than the ambition of a barbarian could pay. Valentinian reigned nine years. This happened the 15th of May, A. D. 392, at Vienna, one of the modern towns of France. He has been commended for his many virtues, and the applauſe which the populace beſtowed upon him, was beſtowed upon real merit. He aboliſhed the greateſt part of the taxes; and becauſe his ſubjects complained that he was too fond of the amuſements of the circus, he ordered all ſuch feſtivals to be aboliſhed, and all the wild beaſts that were kept for the entertainment of the people to be ſlain. He was remarkable for his benevolence and clemency, not only to his friends but even to ſuch as had conſpired againſt his life; and he uſed to ſay, that tyrants alone are ſuſpicious. He was fond of imitating the virtues and exemplary life of his friend and patron Theodoſius, and if he had lived longer, the Romans might have enjoyed peace and ſecurity.—Valentinian the third, was ſon of Conſtantius and Placidia, the daughter of Theodoſius the Great, and therefore, as related to the imperial family, he was ſaluted emperor in his youth, and publicly acknowledged as ſuch at Rome, the 3d of October, A. D. 423, about the 6th year of his age. He was at firſt governed by his mother, and the intrigues of his generals and courtiers; and when he came to years of diſcretion, he diſgraced himſelf by violence, oppreſſion, and incontinence. He was murdered in the midſt of Rome, A. D. 454, in the 36th year of his age, and 31ſt of his reign, by Petronius Maximus, to whoſe wife he had offered violence. The vices of Valentinian the third were conſpicuous; every paſſion he wiſhed to gratify at the expence of his honor, his health, and character; and as he lived without one ſingle act of benevolence or kindneſs, he died lamented by none, though ſcorned for his imprudence and vicious propenſities. He was the laſt of the family of Theodoſius.——A ſon of the emperor Gratian, who died when very young.——VALERIA, a ſiſter of Publicola, who adviſed the Roman matrons to go and deprecate the reſentment of Coriolanus.——A daughter of Publicola, given as an hoſtage to Porſenna by the Romans. She fled from the enemy's country and ſwam acroſs the Tiber.——A daughter of Meſſala, ſiſter to Hortenſius, who married Sylla.——The wife of the emperor Valentinian.——The wife of the emperor Galerius, &c.——A road in Sicily, which led from Meſſana to Lilybæum.

VALERIA LEX, de provocatione, by P. Valerius Poplicola, the ſole conſul, A. U. C. 243. It permitted the appeal from a magiſtrate to the people, and forbad the magiſtrate to puniſh a citizen for making the appeal.——Another, de debitoribus, by Valerius Flaccus. It required that all creditors ſhould diſcharge their debtors, on receiving a fourth part of the whole ſum.——Another by M. Valerius Corvinus, A. U. C. 453, which confirmed the firſt Valerian law, enacted by Poplicola.——Another, called alſo Horatia, by L. Valerius and M. Horatius the conſuls, A. U. C. 304. It revived the firſt Valerian law, which under the triumvirate had loſt its force.——Another, de magiſtratibus, by P. Valerius Poplicola, ſole conſul A. U. C. 243. It created two queſtors to take care of the public treaſure, which was for the future to be kept in the temple of Saturn.

VALERIĀNUS, (Publius Licinius) a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the armies in Rhætia, A. D. 254. The virtues which ſhone in him when a private man, were loſt when he aſcended the throne. Formerly diſtinguiſhed for his temperance, moderation, and many virtues, which fixed the uninfluenced choice of all Rome upon him, Valerian inveſted with the purple diſplayed inability and meanneſs. He was cowardly in his operations, and though acquainted with war, and the patron of ſcience, he ſeldom acted with prudence, or favored men of true genius and merit. He took his ſon Gallienus as his colleague in the empire, and ſhowed the malevolence of his heart by perſecuting the Chriſtians whom he had for a while tolerated. He alſo made war againſt the Goths and Scythians; but in an expedition which he undertook againſt Sapor, king of Perſia, his arms were attended with ill ſucceſs. He was conquered in Meſopotamia, and when he wiſhed to have a private conference with Sapor, the conqueror ſeized his perſon, and carried him in triumph to his capital, where he expoſed him, and in all the cities of his empire, to the ridicule and inſolence of his ſubjects.

When

When the Perſian monarch mounted on horſeback, Valerian ſerved as foot-ſtool, and the many other inſults which he ſuffered, excited indignation even among the courtiers of Sapor. The monarch at laſt ordered him to be flayed alive, and ſalt to be thrown over his mangled body, ſo that he died in the greateſt torments. His ſkin was tanned and painted in red, and, that the ignominy of the Roman empire might be laſting, it was nailed in one of the temples of Perſia. Valerian died in the 71ſt year of his age, A. D. 260, after a reign of ſeven years.——A grandſon of Valerian the emperor. He was put to death when his father the emperor Gallienus was killed.——One of the generals of the uſurper Niger.——A worthy ſenator put to death by Heliogabalus.

Valerius Publius, a celebrated Roman, ſurnamed Poplicola for his popularity. He was very active in aſſiſting Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and he was the firſt that took an oath to ſupport the liberty and independence of his country, though he had been refuſed the conſulſhip, and had retired with great diſſatisfaction from the public affairs. He was afterwards honored with the conſulſhip, after the expulſion of Collatinus, and he triumphed over the Etrurians, after he had gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the ſons of Tarquin had fallen. Valerius died after he had been four times conſul, and enjoyed the popularity, and received the thanks and the gratitude, which a people redeemed from ſlavery and oppreſſion, uſually pay to their patrons and deliverers. He was ſo poor, that his body was buried at the public expence. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 3, c. 8, &c. ——Corvinus, a tribune of the ſoldiers under Camillus. When the Roman army were challenged by one of the Senones, remarkable for his ſtrength and ſtature, Valerius undertook to engage him, and obtained an eaſy victory, by means of a crow that aſſiſted him, and attacked the face of the Gaul, whence his ſurname of Corvinus. Valerius triumphed over the Etrurians, and the neighbouring ſtates that made war againſt Rome, and was ſixtimes honored with the conſulſhip. He died in the 100th year of his age, admired and regretted for many private and public virtues. Val. Max. 8. c. 13.—Liv. 7, c. 27, &c.—Plut. in Mar.—Cic in Cat. ——Marcus Corvinus Meſſala, a Roman, made conſul with Auguſtus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning as well as military virtues. He loſt his memory about two years before his death, and according to ſome he was even ignorant of his own name. Sueton. in Aug.—Cic. in Brut.——Horatius, a Latin poet, in the age of Julius Cæſar, put to death for betraying a ſecret. He acknowledged no god, but the ſoul of the univerſe.——Maximus, a brother of Poplicola.——A Latin hiſtorian who carried arms under the ſons of Pompey. He dedicated his time to ſtudy, and wrote an account of all the moſt celebrated ſayings and actions of the Romans, and other illuſtrious perſons, which is ſtill extant, and divided into nine books. It is dedicated to Tiberius. Some have ſuppoſed that he lived after the age of Tiberius, from the want of purity and elegance, which ſo conſpicuouſly appear in his writings, unworthy of the correctneſs of the golden age of the Roman literature. The beſt editions of Valerius are thoſe of Torrenius, 4to. L. Bat. 1726, and of Vorſtius, 8vo. Berolin 1672.——Marcus, a brother of Poplicola, who defeated the army of the Sabines in two battles. He was honored with a triumph, and the Romans, to ſhow their ſenſe of his great merit, built him a houſe on mount Palatine, at the public expence.——Potitus, a general who ſtirred up the people and army againſt the decemvirs, and Appius Claudius in particular. He was choſen conſul, and conquered the Volſci and Æqui.—Flaccus, a Roman intimate with Cato the cenſor. He was conſul with him, and cut off an army of 10,000 Gauls in one battle. He was alſo choſen cenſor, and prince of the ſenate, &c.——A Latin poet who floriſhed under Veſpaſian. He wrote a poem in eight books on the Argonautic expedition, but it remained unfiniſhed on account of his premature death. The Argonauts were there left on the ſea in their return home. Some critics have been laviſh in their praiſes upon Flaccus, and have called him the ſecond poet of Rome after Virgil. His poetry however, is deemed by ſome frigid and languiſhing, and his ſtile uncouth and inelegant. The beſt editions of Flaccus are thoſe of Burman, L. Bat. 1724, and 12mo. Utr. 1702.——Aſiaticus, a celebrated Roman, accuſed of having murdered one of the relations of the emperor Claudius. He was condemned, though innocent, and he opened his veins and bled to death. Tacit. Ann.——A friend of Vitellius.——Fabianus, a youth condemned under Nero for counterfeiting the will of one of his friends, &c.——Lævinus, a conſul, who fought againſt Pyrrhus during the Tarentine war. Vid. Lævinus——Præconinus, a lieutenant of Cæsar's army in Gaul, slain in a skirmish.——Paulinus, a friend of Vespasian, &c.

VALERUS, a friend of Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 752.

VALGIUS, a Roman poet in the Augustus age celebrated for his writings. He was very intimate with Horace. Tibull. 3, el 1, v. 180.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 82.

VANDALII, a people of Germany, Tacit. de Germ. c. 3.

VANGIŌNES, a people of Germany.

VANNIUS a king of the Suevi, banished under Claudius, &c.

VARANES, a name common to some of the Persian monarchs in the age of the Roman emperors.

VARDÆI, a people of Spain.

VARIA, a town of Spain.

VARIA LEX de majestate, by the tribune L. Varius, A.U.C. 662. It ordained that all such as had assisted the confederates in their war against Rome, should be publicly tried.—Another de civitate, by Q. Varius Hybrida. It punished all such as were suspected of having assisted or supported the people of Italy in their petition to become free citizes of Rome.

VARINI, a people of Germany.

VARISTI, a people of Germany.

VARIUS, a tragic poet, intimate with Horace and Virgil. He was one of those whom Augustus appointed to revise Virgil's Æneid. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. Besides tragedies, he wrote a panegyric on the emperor. Quintilian says, l. 10, that his Thyestes was equal to any composition of the Greek poets. Horat. 1, Sat. 5. v. 40——One of the friends of Antony, surnamed Cotylon.——A man in the reign of Otho, punished for his adulteries, &c.

VARRO, M. Terentius, a Roman consul defeated at Cannæ, by Annibal. Vid. Terentius——A Latin writer, celebrated for his great learning. He wrote no less than 500 different volumes which are all now lost, except a treatise de re rusticâ, and another de linguâ Latinâ, dedicated to the orator Cicero. He was Pompey's lieutenant in his piratical wars, and obtained a naval crown. In the civil wars he was taken by Cæsar, and proscribed, but he escaped. He has been greatly commended by Cicero for his erudition, and St. Augustin says, that it cannot but be wondered how Varro, who read such a number of books, could find time to compose so many volumes, and how he who composed so many volumes, could be at leisure to peruse such a variety of books, and gain so much literary information. He died B. C. 28, in the 88th year of his age. The best edition of Varro is that of Dordrac. 8vo, 1619. Cic. in Acad. &c. —Quintil.——A native of Gaul, in the age of J. Cæsar. He translated into Latin verse the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius, with great correctness and elegance. He also wrote a poem intitled de bello Sequanico, besides epigrams and elegies. Some fragments of his poetry are still extant. He failed in his attempt to write satire. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 46.

VARUS, (Quintilius) a Roman proconsul, descended from an illustrious family. He was appointed governor of Syria and afterwards made commander of the armies in Germany. He was surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, a crafty and dissimulating chief, and his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that every thing was lost, he killed himself, A. D. 10, and his example was followed by some of his officers. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus at Rome, by one of the Barbarian chiefs, as also his body. The bodies of the slain were left in the field of battle, where they were found six years after by Germanicus, and buried with great pomp. Varus has been taxed with indolence and cowardice, and some have intimated, that if he had not trusted too much to the insinuations of the barbarian chiefs, he might have not only escaped ruin, but awed the Germans to their duty. His avarice was also conspicuous, he went poor to Syria, whence he returned loaded with riches. Horat. 1, Od. 24.—Paterc. 2, c. 117.—Flor. 4. c. 12. Virg. Ecl. 6——A son of Varus, who married a daughter of Germanicus. Tacit. ——The father and grandfather of Varus, who was killed in Germany, slew themselves with their own swords, the one after the battle of Philippi, and the other in the plains of Pharsalia.——Quintilius, a friend of Horace, and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a good judge of poetry, and a great critic, as Horace, arr. P. 438, seems to insinuate. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his 1st book to him, and in the 24th he mourns pathetically his death. Some suppose this Varus to be the person killed in Germany, while others believe him to be a man who devoted his time more to the muses than to war.——Alfrenus, a Roman, who though originally a shoemaker, became consul, and distinguished himself by his abilities as an orator. He was buried at the public expence, an honor granted to few, and only to persons of merit. Horat. 2, Sat. 3.——Accius, one of the friends of Cato in Africa, &c.——A river which separates Liguria from Gallia Narbonenſis. Lucan. 1, v. 404.

VASCONES, a people of Spain.

VATICĀNUS, a hill at Rome, near the Tiber and the Janiculum, which produced wine of no great eſteem. It was diſregarded by the Romans on account of the unwholeſomeneſs of the air, and the continual ſtench of the filth that was there, and of ſtagnated waters. Heliogabalus was the firſt who cleared it of all diſagreeable nuiſances. It is now admired for antient monuments and pillars, and for the palace of the Pope.

VĀTINIA LEX, de provinciis by the tribune P. Vatinius, A. U. C. 694. It appointed Cæſar governor of Gallia Ciſalpina and Illyricum, for five years, without a decree of the ſenate, or the uſual cuſtom of caſting lots. Some perſons were alſo appointed to attend him as lieutenants without the interference of the ſenate. His army was to be paid out of the public treaſury, and he was impowered to plant a Roman colony in the town of Novocomum in Gaul.

VATINIUS, an intimate friend of Cicero, once diſtinguiſhed for his enmity to the orator. He hated the people of Rome for their great vices and corruption.——A ſhoe-maker, ridiculed for his great deformities, and the oddity of his character. He was one of Nero's favorites, and he ſurpaſſed the reſt of the courtiers in flattery and in the commiſſion of every impious deed. Juv.—Mart. 14, ep. 96

VĀTIĒNUS, a river riſing in the Alps and falling into the Po.

VEII, a people of Germany near the Rhine.

VEĂLĔGON, a Trojan chief, praiſed for the ſoundneſs of his counſels and his good intentions. His houſe was firſt ſet on fire by the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 312.—Homer Il. 3, v. 148

VEDRIS, a town of Spain. Hirtius.

VECTIUS, a rhetorician, &c. Juv. 7, v. 150.

VEDIUS POLLIO, a friend of Auguſtus, very cruel to his ſervants, &c. Vid Pollio.

VEGETIUS, a Latin writer, who floriſhed B. C. 386. The beſt edition of his treatiſe de Re militari, together with Modeſtus, is that of Paris, 4to. 1607.

VEIA, a ſorcereſs, in the age of Horace, Ep. 5, v. 29.

VEIANUS, a gladiator, in the age of Horace. 1, ep. 1, v. 4.

VEIENTES, the inhabitants of Veii. They were carried to Rome, where the tribe they compoſed was called Veientina, Vid. Veii.

VEIENTO, Fabr. a Roman, as arrogant as he was ſatirical. Nero baniſhed him for his libellous writings. Juv. 3, v. 185.

VEII, a powerful city of Etruria, at the diſtance of about 12 miles from Rome. It ſuſtained many long wars againſt the Romans, and was at laſt taken and deſtroyed by Camillus after a ſiege of ten years. At the time of its deſtruction, Veii was larger and far more magnificent than the city of Rome. Its ſituation was ſo eligible, that the Romans were long inclined to migrate there and totally abandon their city, and this would have been carried into execution if not oppoſed by the authority and eloquence of Camillus. Ovid 2, Faſt. v. 195.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 44.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 143.—Liv. 5, c. 21, &c.

VEJŎVIS or VEJUPITER, a deity of ill omen at Rome. He had a temple on the Capitoline hill. Some ſuppoſe that he was the ſame as Jupiter the infant, or in the cradle, becauſe he was repreſented without thunder or a ſcepter, and had only by his ſide the goat Amalthæa, and the Cretan nymph who fed him when young. Ovid Faſt. 3, v. 430.

VELABRUM, a marſhy piece of ground on the ſide of the Tiber, which Auguſtus drained, and where he built houſes. The place was frequented as a market, where oil, cheeſe, &c. were expoſed to ſale. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 229.

VELANIUS, one of Cæſar's officers in Gaul, &c.

VELIA, a maritime town of Lucania, founded by a colony of Phoceans, about 600 years after the coming of Æneas into Italy. The port in its neighbourhood was called Velinus portus. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Cic. Phil. 10, c. 4. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 366.

VELICA, or VELLICA, a town of the Cantabri.

VELĪNA, a part of the city of Rome, adjoining mount Palatine. It was alſo one of the Roman tribes. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 52.—Cic. 4, ad Attic. ep. 15.

VELĪNUM, a lake in the country of the Sabines, near Umbria. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 517.

VELIOCASSI, a people of Gaul.

VELITERNA, or VELITRÆ, an antient town of Latium on the Appian road. The inhabitants were called Veliterni. It became a Roman colony. Liv. 8, c. 12; &c.—Sueton in Aug.—Ital. 8, v. 378, &c.

VELLARI, a people of Gaul.

VELLEDA, a woman famous among the Germans, in the age of Veſpaſian, and worſhipped as a deity. Tacit. de Germ. 8.

VELLEIUS Paterculus, a Roman hiſtorian, deſcended from an equeſtrian family of Campania. He was at firſt a military tribune in the Roman armies, and for nine years ſerved under Tiberius in the various expeditions which he undertook in Gaul and Germany. Velleius wrote an epitome of the hiſtory of Greece, and of Rome, and of other nations of the moſt remote antiquity, but of this authentic compoſition there remain only fragments of the hiſtory of Greece and Rome from the conqueſt of Perſeus, by Paulus, to the 27th year of the reign of Tiberius, in two books. It is a judicious account of celebrated men, and illuſtrious cities, the hiſtorian is happy in his deſcriptions, his pictures are true, and his narrations lively and intereſting. The whole is candid and impartial, but only till the reign of the Cæſars, when the writer began to be influenced by the preſence of the emperor, or the power of his favorites. Paterculus is deſervedly cenſured for his invectives againſt Pompey, and his encomiums on the cruel Tiberius, and the unfortunate Sejanus. Some ſuppoſe that he was involved in the ruin of this diſappointed courtier whom he had extolled as a pattern of virtue and morality. The beſt editions of Paterculus are thoſe of Rubnkenius, 8vo. 2. vols. L. Bat. 1779; of Barbou, Paris, 12mo. 1777, and of Burman, 8vo, L. Bat. 1719.——Caius, the grandfather of the hiſtorian of that name, was one of the friends of Livia. He killed himſelf when old and unable to accompany Livia in her flight.

VENAFRUM, a town of Campania abounding in olive trees. It became a Roman colony. It had been founded by Diomedes. Horat. 2, Od. 6, v. 16.—Martial. 13. ep. 98.

VENEMI, a people of Germany. Tacit. de Germ. 46.

VENELI, a people of Gallia Celtica.

VENETI, a people of Italy in Ciſalpine Gaul, near the mouths of the Po. They were deſcended from a nation of Paphlagonia, who ſettled there under Antenor, ſome time after the Trojan war. The Venetians who have been long a powerful and commercial nation, were originally very poor, whence a writer, in the age of the Roman emperors ſaid, that they had no other fence againſt the waves of the ſea than hurdles, no food but fiſh, no wealth beſides their fiſhing-boats, and no merchandize but ſalt. Strab. 4, &c.—Liv. 1, c. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3, l. 3, c. 4.—Cæſar. bell G. 3, c. 8.—Lucan. 4, v. 134.—Ital. 8, v. 605. A nation of Gaul, at the ſouth of Armorica, on the weſtern coaſt.

VENTIDIUS Baſſus, a native of Picenum, born of an obſcure family. When Aſculum was taken, he was carried before the triumphant chariot of Pompeius Strabo; hanging on his mother's breaſt. A bold, aſpiring ſoul, aided by the patronage of the family of Cæſar, raiſed him from the mean occupation of a chairman and muleteer to dignity in the ſtate. He diſplayed valor in the Roman armies, and gradually aroſe to the offices of tribune, prætor, high prieſt and conſul. He made war againſt the Parthians, and conquered them in three great battles, B. C. 39. He was the firſt Roman ever honored with a triumph over Parthia. VENTI, the antients, and eſpecially the Athenians, paid particular attention to the winds, and offered them ſacrifices as to deities, intent upon the deſtruction of mankind, by continually cauſing ſtorms, tempeſts, and earthquakes. The winds were repreſented in different attitudes and forms. The four principal winds were Eurus the ſouth-eaſt; who is repreſented as a young man flying with great impetuoſity, and often appearing in a playſome and wanton humour. Auſter, the ſouth wind, appeared generally as an old man with grey hair, a gloomy countenance, a head covered with clouds, a ſable veſture, and duſky wings. He is the diſpenſer of rain, and of all heavy ſhowers. Zephyrus is repreſented as the mildeſt of all the winds. He is young and gentle, and his lap is filled with vernal flowers. He married Flora the goddeſs, with whom he enjoyed the moſt perfect felicity. Boreas or the north wind, wind, appears always rough and shivering. He is the father of rain, snow, hail, and tempests, and is always represented surrounded with impenetrable clouds. Those of inferior note were, Solanus, whose name it seldom mentioned. He appeared as a young man holding fruit in his lap, such as peaches, oranges, &c. Africus, or south-west, represented with black wings, and a melancholy countenance. Corus, or north-west, drives clouds of snow before him, and Aquilo, the north east, is equally dreadful in appearance. The winds, according to some mythologists, were confined in a large cave, of which Æolus had the management, and without this necessary precaution, they would have overturned the earth, and reduced every thing to its original chaos. *Virg. VENUS, one of the most celebrated deities of the ancients. She was the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of the graces and of pleasures, and the patroness of courtezans. Some mythologists speak of more than one Venus. Plato mentions two, Venus Urania, the daughter of Uranus, and Venus Popularia, the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. Cicero speaks of four, a daughter of Cœlus and Light, one sprung from the froth of the sea, a third, daughter of Jupiter and the Nereid Dione, and a fourth born at Tyre, and the same as the Astarte of the Syrians. Of these however the Venus sprung from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated part of the body of Uranus had been thrown there by Saturn, is the most known, and of her in particular, ancient mythologists as well as painters, make mention. She arose from the sea near the island of Cyprus, or according to Hesiod, of Cythera, whither she was wafted by the zephyrs, and received on the sea shore by the seasons, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. She was soon after carried to heaven, where all the gods admired her beauty, and all the goddesses became jealous of her personal charms. Jupiter attempted to gain her affections and even wished to offer her violence, but Venus refused, and the god, to punish her obstinacy, gave her in marriage to his ugly and deformed son Vulcan. This marriage did not prevent the goddess of Love from gratifying her favorite passions, and she defiled her husband's bed, by her amours with the gods. Her intrigue with Mars is the most celebrated. She was caught in her lover's arms, and exposed to the ridicule and laughter of all the gods. [Vid Alectryon.] Venus became mother of Hermione, Cupid and Anteros, by Mars; by Mercury she had Hermaphroditus: by Bacchus, Priapus; and by Neptune, Eryx. Her great partiality for Adonis, made her abandon the seats of Olympus, [Vid Adonis] and her regard for Anchises, obliged her often to visit the woods and solitary retreats of mount Ida. [Vid. Anchises. Æneas.] The power of Venus over the heart, was supported and assisted by a celebrated girdle, called zone, by the Greeks, and cestus, by the Latins. This mysterious girdle gave beauty, grace and elegance, when worn even by the most deformed; it excited love, and kindled extinguished flames. Juno herself was indebted to this powerful ornament, to gain the favors of Jupiter, and Venus, though herself possessed of every charm, no sooner put on her cestus, than Vulcan, unable to resist the influence of love, forgot all the intrigues and infidelities of his wife, and fabricated arms even for her illegitimate children. The contest of Venus for the golden apple of discord is well known. She gained the prize over Pallas and Juno, [Vid. Paris, Discordia.] and rewarded her impartial judge with the hand of the fairest woman in the world. The worship of Venus was universally established; statues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom, and the antients were fond of paying homage to a divinity who presided over generation, and by whose influence alone, mankind existed. In her sacrifices and in the festivals celebrated in her honor, too much licentiousness prevailed, and public prostitution was often part of the ceremony. Victims were seldom offered to her, or her altars stained with blood, though we find Aspasia making repeated sacrifices. No pigs however, or male animals were deemed acceptable. The rose, the myrtle, and the apple were sacred to Venus, and among birds the dove, the swan, and the sparrow were her favorites, and among fishes, those called the aphya and the lycostomus. The goddess of beauty was represented among the antients in different forms. At Elis she appeared seated on a goat, with one foot resting on a tortoise. At Sparta and Cythera, she was represented armed like Minerva, and sometimes wearing chains on her feet. In the temple of Jupiter

Olympius, she was represented by Phidias, as rising from the sea, received by love, and crowned by the goddess of persuasion. At Cnidos her statue made by Praxiteles, represented her naked, with one hand hiding what modesty keeps concealed. Her statue at Elephantis was the same, with only a naked Cupid by her side. In Sicyon she held a poppy in one hand, and in the other an apple, while on her head she had a crown, which terminated in a point, to intimate the pole. She is generally represented with her son Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves, or at other times by swans or sparrows. The surnames of the goddess are numerous, and only serve to show how well established her worship was all over the earth. She was called Cypria, because particularly worshipped in the island of Cyprus, and in that character she was often represented with a beard, and the male parts of generation, with a sceptre in her hand, and the body and dress of a female, whence she is called duplex Amathusia by Catullus. She received the name of Paphia, because worshipped at Paphos, where she had a temple with an altar, on which rain never fell, though exposed in the open air. Some of the antients called her Apostrophia or Epistrophia, as also Venus Urania, and Venus Pandemos. The first of these she received as presiding over wantonness and incestuous enjoyments; the second because she patronized pure love, and chaste and moderate gratifications; and the third because she favored the propensities of the vulgar, and was fond of sensual pleasures. The Cnidians raised her temples under the name of Venus Acræa, of Doris, and of Euploea. In her temple at Euploea, at Cnidos, was the most celebrated of her statues, being the most perfect piece of Praxiteles. It was made with white marble, and appeared so engaging, and so much like life, that according to some historians, a youth of the place introduced himself in the night into her temple, and attempted to gratify his passions on the lifeless image. Venus was also surnamed Cytheræa, because she was the chief deity of Cythera; Exopolis, because her statue was without the city at Athens; Philomeda, from her affection for the phallus; Philommeis, because the queen of laughter; Telesigama, because she presided over marriage; Coliada, Colotis, or Colias, because worshipped on a promontory of the same name in Attica; Area, because armed like Mars; Verticordia, because she could turn the hearts of women to cultivate chastity; Apaturia, because she deceived; Calva, because she was represented bald; Erycina, because worshipped at Eryx; Etaira, because the patroness of courtezans; Acidalia, because of a fountain of Orchomenos; Basilea, because the queen of love; Myrtea, because the myrtle was sacred to her; Libertina, from her inclinations to gratify lust; Mechanitis, in allusion to the many artifices practised in love, &c. &c. As goddess of the sea, because, born in the bosom of the waters, Venus was called Pontia, Marina Limnesia, Epipontia, Pelagia, Saligena, Pontogenia, Aligena, Thalassia, &c. and as rising from the sea, the name of Anadyomene is applied to her, and rendered immortal by the celebrated painting of Apelles, which represented her as issuing from the bosom of the waves, and wringing her tresses on her shoulder. Vid. Anadyomene. *Cic de Nat. VERUS, (Lucius Ceionius Commodus,) a Roman emperor, ſon of Ælius and Domitia Lucilla. He was adopted in the 7th year of his age by M. Aurelius, at the requeſt of Adrian, and he married Lucilia the daughter of his adopted father, who alſo took him as his colleague on the throne. He was ſent by M. Aurelius to oppoſe the barbarians in the eaſt. His arms were attended with ſucceſs, and he obtained a victory over the Parthians. He was honored with a triumph at his return home, and ſoon after he marched with his imperial colleague againſt the Marcomanni in Germany. He died in this expedition of an apoplexy, in the 39th year of his age, after a reign of eight years, and ſome months. His body was brought back to Rome, and buried by M. Aurelius with great pomp and ſolemnity. Verus has been greatly cenſured for his debaucheries, which appeared more enormous and diſguſting, when compared to the temperance, meekneſs, and popularity of Aurelius. The example of his father did not influence him, and he often retired from the frugal and moderate repaſt of Aurelius, to the profuſe banquets of his own palace, where the night was ſpent in riot and debauchery, with the meaneſt of the populace, with ſtage dancers, buffoons, and laſcivious courtezans. At one entertainment alone, where there were no more than 12 gueſts, the emperor ſpent no leſs than ſix millions of ſeſterces, or about 32,200l. ſterling. But it is to be obſerved, that whatever was moſt ſcarce and coſtly was there; the gueſts never drank twice out of the ſame cup: and whatever veſſels they had touched, they received as a preſent from the emperor when they left the palace. In his Parthian expedition, Verus did not check his vicious propenſities; for four years he left the care of the war to his officers, while he retired to the voluptuous retreats of Daphne, and the luxurious banquets of Antioch. His fondneſs for a horſe has been faithfully recorded. The animal had a ſtatue of gold, he was fed with almonds and raiſins by the hand of the emperor, he was clad in purple, and kept in the moſt ſplendid of the halls of the palace, and when dead, the emperor, to expreſs his ſorrow, raiſed him a magnificent monument on mount Vatican. Some have ſuſpected M. Aurelius of diſpatching Verus to rid the world of his debaucheries, and guilty actions, but this ſeems to be the report of malevolence.——L. Annæus, a ſon of the emperor Aurelius, who died in Paleſtine.—The father of the emperor Verus. He was adopted by the emperor Adrian, but like his ſon he diſgraced himſelf by his debaucheries and extravagance. He died before Adrian.

VESBIUS, or VESUBIUS. Vid. Veſuvius.

VESCIANUM a country houſe of Campania, between Capua and Nola. Cic. 15. ad Attic.

VESPASIANUS, Titus Flavius, a Roman emperor deſcended from an obſcure family at Rieté. He was honored with the conſulſhip, not ſo much by the influence of the imperial courtiers, as by his own private merit and his public ſervices. He accompanied Nero into Greece, but he offended the prince by falling aſleep while he repeated one of his poetical compoſitions. This momentary reſentment of the emperor did not prevent Veſpaſian from being ſent to carry on a war againſt the Jews. His operations were crowned with ſucceſs; many of the cities of Paleſtine ſurrendered, and Veſpaſian began the ſiege of Jeruſalem. This was, however, atchieved by the hands of his ſon Titus, and the death of Vitellius and the affection of his ſoldiers haſtened his riſe, and he was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria. The choice of the army was approved by every province of the empire; but Veſpaſian did not betray any ſigns of pride at ſo ſudden and ſo unexpected an exaltation, and though once employed in the mean office of a horſe doctor, he behaved, when inveſted with the imperial purple, with all the dignity and greatneſs which became a ſucceſſor of Auguſtus. In the beginning of his reign Veſpaſian attempted to reform the manners of the Romans, and he took away an appointment which he had a few days before granted to a young nobleman who approached him to return him thanks, all ſmelling of perfumes and covered with ointment, adding, I had rather you had ſmelt of garlick. He repaired the public buildings, embelliſhed the city, and made the great roads more ſpacious and convenient. After he had reigned with great popularity for 10 years, Veſpaſian died with a pain in his bowels, A. D. 79, in the 70th year of his age. He was the firſt Roman emperor that died a natural death, and he was alſo the firſt who was ſucceeded by his own ſon on the throne. Veſpaſian has been admired for his great virtues. He was clement, he gave no ear to flattery, and for a long time refuſed the title of father of his country, which was often beſtowed upon the moſt worthleſs and tyrannical of the emperors. He deſpiſed informers, and rather than puniſh conſpirators, he rewarded them with great liberality. When the king of Parthia addreſſed him with the ſuperſcription of Arſaces king of kings to Flavius Veſpaſianus, the emperor was no way diſſatisfied with the pride and inſolence of the monarch, and anſwered him again in his own words; Flavius Veſpaſianus to Arſaces king of kings. To men of learning and merit, Veſpaſian was very liberal: one hundred thouſand ſeſterces were annually paid from the public treaſury to the different profeſſors that were appointed to encourage and promote the arts and ſciences. Yet in ſpite of this apparent generoſity ſome authors have taxed Veſpaſian with avarice. According to their accounts he loaded the provinces with new taxes, he bought commodities, that he might ſell them to a greater advantage, and even laid an impoſt upon urine, which gave occaſion to Titus to ridicule the the meanness of his father Vespasian, regardless of his son's observation, was satisfied to shew him the money that was raised from so productive a tax, asking him at the same time whether it smelt offensive? His ministers were the most avaricious of his subjects, and the emperor used very properly to remark that he treated them as sponges, by wetting them when dry, and squeezing them when they were wet. He has been accused of selling criminals their lives, and of condemning the most opulent to make himself master of their possessions. If, however, he was guilty of these meaner practices, they were all under the name of one of his concubines, who wished to enrich herself by the avarice and credulity of the emperor. Sueton. in vitâ.—Tacit. hist. 4.

Vessa, a town of Sicily.

Vesta, a goddess, daughter of Rhea and Saturn, sister to Ceres and Juno. She is often confounded by the mythologists with Rhea, Ceres, Cybele, Proserpine, Hecate, and Tellus. When considered as the mother of the gods, she is the mother of Rhea and Saturn; and when considered as the patroness of the vestal virgins and the goddess of fire, she is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Under this last name she was worshipped by the Romans. Æneas was the first who introduced her mysteries into Italy, and Numa built her a temple where no males were permitted to go. The Palladium of Troy was supposed to be preserved within her sanctuary, and a fire was continually kept lighted by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of the goddess. If the fire of Vesta was ever extinguished, it was supposed to threaten the republic with some sudden calamity. The virgin by whose negligence it had been extinguished was severely punished, and it was kindled again by the rays of the sun. The temple of Vesta was of a round form, and the goddess was represented in a long flowing robe with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared vessel, and in the other a javelin, or sometimes a Palladium. On some medals she appears holding a drum in one hand, and a small figure of victory in the other. *Hesiod. Vestāles, priestesses among the Romans, consecrated to the service of Vesta, as their name indicates. This office was very antient, as the mother of Romulus was one of the vestals. Rhea is supposed to have first chosen the vestals. Numa first appointed four, to which Tarquin added two. They were always chosen by the monarchs, but after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the high priest was entrusted with the care of them. As they were to be virgins, they were chosen young, from the age of six to ten; and if there was not a sufficient number that presented themselves as candidates for the office, twenty virgins were selected, and they upon whom the lot fell were obliged to become priestesses. Plebeians as well as patricians were permitted to propose themselves, but it was required that they should be born of a good family, and be without blemish or deformity in every part of their body. For thirty years they were to remain in the greatest continence: the ten first years were spent in learning the duties of the order, the ten following were employed in discharging them with fidelity and sanctity, and the ten last in instructing such as had entered the noviciate. When the thirty years were elapsed they were permitted to marry, or if they still preferred celibacy; they waited upon the rest of the vestals. As soon as a vestal was initiated, her head was shaved, to intimate the liberty of her person, as she was then free from the shackles of parental authority, and she was permited to dispose of her possessions as she pleased. The employment of the vestals was to take care that the sacred fire of Vesta was not extinguished, for if it ever happened, it was deemed the prognostic of great calamities to the state; the offender was punished for her negligence, and severely scourged by the high priest. In such a case all was consternation at Rome, and the fire was again kindled by glasses with the rays of the sun. Another equally particular charge of the vestals was to keep a sacred pledge, on which depended the very existence of Rome, which according to some, was the Palladium of Troy, or some of the mysteries of the gods of Samothrace. The privileges of the vestals were great, they had the most honorable seats at public games and festivals, a lictor with the fasces always preceded them when they walked in public, they they were carried in chariots when they pleased, and they had the power of pardoning criminals when led to execution, if they declared that their meeting was accidental. Their declarations in trials were received without the formality of an oath, they were chosen as arbiters in causes of moment, and in the execution of wills, and so great was the deference paid them by the magistrates, as well as by the people, that the consuls themselves made way for them, and bowed their fasces when they passed before them. To insult them was a capital crime, and whoever attempted to violate their chastity was beaten to death with scourges. If any of them died while in office, their body was buried within the walls of the city, an honor granted to few. Such of the vestals as proved incontinent were punished in the most rigorous manner. Numa ordered them to be stoned, but Tarquin the elder dug a large hole under the earth, where a bed was placed with a little bread, wine, water, and oil, and a lighted lamp, and the guilty vestal was stripped of the habit of her order, and compelled to descend into the subterraneous cavity, which was immediately shut, and she was left to die through hunger. Few of the vestals were guilty of incontinence, and for the space of one thousand years, during which the order continued established, from the reign of Numa, only 18 were punished for the violation of their vow. The vestals were abolished by Theodosius the Great, and the fire of Vesta extinguished. The dress of the Vestals was peculiar; they wore a white vest with purple borders, a white linen surplice called linteum superum, above which was a great purple mantle which flowed to the ground, and which was tucked up when they offered sacrifices. They had a close covering on their head called infula, from which hung ribbands, or vittæ. Their manner of living was sumptuous, as they were maintained at the public expence, and though originally satisfied with the simple diet of the Romans, their tables soon after displayed the luxuries and the superfluities of the great and opulent. Liv. 2, &c. Plut. in Num. &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 30.—Flor. 1, &c.

VESTĀLIA, festivals in honor of Vesta, observed at Rome on the 9th of June. Banquets were then prepared before the houses, and meat was sent to the vestals to be offered to the gods, millstones were decked with garlands, and the asses that turned them were led round the city covered with garlands. The ladies walked in the procession, barefooted, to the temple of the goddess, and an altar was erected to Jupiter surnamed Pistor.

VESŬVIUS, a mountain of Campania about six miles from Naples, celebrated for its volcano, and now called Mount Soma. The antients, particularly the writers of the Augustan age, spoke of Vesuvius, as a place covered with orchards and vineyards, of which the middle was dry and barren. The first eruption of this volcano was in the 79th year of the Christian era under Titus. It was accompanied by an earthquake, which overturned several cities of Campania, particularly Pompeii and Herculaneum, and the burning ashes which it threw up, were carried not only over the neighbouring country, but as far as the shores of Egypt, Libya, and Syria. This eruption proved fatal to Pliny the naturalist. From that time the eruptions have been frequent, and there now exists an account of twenty-nine of these. Vesuvius continually throws up a smoke, and sometimes ashes and flames. The perpendicular height of this mountain is 3780 feet. Dio. Cass. 46;—*Varro. de R. VICTOR AURELIUS, a writer in the age of Constantius. He gave the world a concise history of the Roman emperors, from the age of Augustus, to his own time, or A. D. 360. He also wrote an abridgement of the Roman history, before the age of Julius Cæsar, which is now extant, and ascribed by different authors to C. Nepos, to Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, &c. Victor was greatly esteemed by the emperors, and honored with the consulship. The best edition of Victor is that of Pitiscus, 8vo. Utr. 1696; and that of Artnzenius, 4to. Amst. 1733.

VICTŌRIA, one of the deities of the Romans, called by the Greeks Nice, supposed to be daughter of Titan and Styx. The goddess of victory was sister to Strength and Valor, and was one of the attendants of Jupiter. She was greatly honored by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. Sylla raised her a temple at Rome, and instituted festivals in her honor. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm-tree in her hand Varro. de L. L.—Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin. præf. fab.—Suet.

VICTŌRIUS, a man of Aquitain, who A. D 463, invented the paschal cycle of 532 years.

VICTORINA, a celebrated matron who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son Victorinus, and her grandson of the same name, were declared emperors, but when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites called Tetricus. She was sometime after poisoned, A. D. 269, and according to some by Tetricus himself.

VICTORINUS, a Christian writer, who composed a worthless epic poem on the death of the seven children mentioned in the Maccabees, and distinguished himself more by the active part he took in his writings against the Arians.

VINDALIUS, a writer in the reign of Constantius, who wrote ten books on Agriculture.

VINDELICI, an antient people of Germany, between the heads of the Rhine and the Danube. Their country, which was called Vindelicia, forms now part of Swabia and Bavaria and their chief town Augusta Vindelicorum, now Ausburgh. Horat. 4, Od. 4, v. 18.

VINDEMIĀTOR, a constellation that rose about the nones of March. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 407.

VINDEX JULIUS, a governor of Gaul, who revolted against Nero, and determined to deliver the Roman empire from his tyranny. He was followed by a numerous army, but at last defeated by one of the emperor's generals. When he perceived that all was lost, he laid violent hands upon himself, 68 A. D. Sueton.

VINDICIUS, a slave who discovered the conspiracy which some of the most noble of the Roman citizens had formed to restore Tarquin to his throne. He was amply rewarded, and made a citizen of Rome. Liv. 2, c. 5.—Plut.

VINDONISSA, a town of Gaul. Tacit. Hist. 4.

VINICIUS, a Roman consul poisoned by Messalina, &c.—A man who conspired against Nero, &c.

VINIDIUS, a miser mentioned by Horace, 1. Sat. 1. v. 95. Some manuscripts read Numidius and Umidius.

VINIUS, a commander in the prætorian guards, intimate with Galba, of whom he became the first minister. He was honored with the consulship, and sometime after murdered. Tacit.—Plut.—A man who revolted from Nero.

VINNIUS, Aſella, a ſervant of Horace, to whom, ep. 13, is addreſſed as injunctions how to deliver to Auguſtus ſome poems from his maſter.

VIPSANIA, a daughter of Agrippa, mother of Druſus. She was the only one of Agrippa's daughters who died a natural death. She was married to Tiberius when a private man, and when ſhe had been repudiated, ſhe married Aſinius Gallus.

VIRBIUS, (qui inter viros his fuit) a name given to Hippolytus, after he had been brought back to life by Æſculapius, at the inſtance of Diana, who pitied his unfortunate end. Virgil makes him ſon of Hippolytus, Æn. 7, v. 762. Ovid Met. 15, v. 544.

PUBL. VIRGILIUS MARO, called the prince of the Latin poets, was born at Andes, a village near Mantua, about 70 years before Chriſt, on the 15th of October. His firſt years were ſpent at Cremona, where his taſte was formed, and his riſing talents firſt exerciſed. The diſtribution of the lands of Cremona to the ſoldiers of Auguſtus, after the battle of Philippi, nearly proved fatal to the poet, and when he attempted to diſpute the poſſeſſion of his fields with a ſoldier, Virgil was obliged to ſave his life from the reſentment of the lawleſs veteran, by ſwimming acroſs a river. This was perhaps the beginning of his greatneſs, he repaired to Rome, where he ſoon formed an acquaintance with Mecænas, and recommended himſelf to the favors of Auguſtus. The emperor reſtored his lands to the poet, whoſe modeſt muſe knew ſo well how to pay the tribute of gratitude, and his firſt bucolic was written to thank the patron, as well as to tell the world that his favors were not unworthily beſtowed. The ten bucolics were written in about three years. The poet ſhewed his countrymen that he could write with graceful ſimplicity, with elegance, delicacy of ſentiments, and with purity of language. Sometime after, Virgil undertook the georgics, a poem the moſt perfect and finiſhed of all Latin compoſitions. The Æneid was begun, as ſome ſuppoſe, at the particular requeſt of Auguſtus, and the poet, while he attempted to prove that the Julian family was lineally deſcended from the founder of Lavinium, viſibly delineated in the pious and benevolent character of his hero, the amiable qualities of his imperial patron. The great merit of this poet is well known, and it will ever remain undecided, which of the two poets, either Homer or Virgil, is more entitled to our praiſe, our applauſe, and our admiration. The writer of the Iliad ſtood as a pattern to the favorite of Auguſtus. The voyage of Æneas is copied from the Odyſſey, and for his battles, Virgil found a model in the wars of Troy, and the animated deſcriptions of the Iliad. The poet died before he had reviſed this immortal work, which had already engaged his time for 11 ſucceſſive years. He had attempted to attend his patron in the eaſt, but he was detained at Naples on account of his ill health. He however went to Athens, where he met Auguſtus in his return, but he ſoon after fell ſick at Megara, and though indiſpoſed, he ordered himſelf to be removed to Italy. He landed at Brunduſium, where a few days after he expired, the 22d of September, in the 51ſt year of his age, B. C. 19. He left the greateſt part of his immenſe poſſeſſions to his friends, particularly to Mecænas, Tucca, and Auguſtus, and he ordered as his laſt will his unfiniſhed poem to be burnt. Theſe laſt injunctions were diſobeyed, and according to the words of an ancient poet, Auguſtus ſaved his favorite Troy from a ſecond and more diſmal conflagration. The poem was delivered by the emperor to three of his literary friends. They were ordered to reviſe and to expunge whatever they deemed improper; but they were ſtrictly enjoined not to make any additions, and hence, as ſome ſuppoſe, the cauſes that ſo many lines of the Æneid are unfiniſhed, particularly in the laſt books. The body of the poet, according to his own directions, was conveyed to Naples, and interred with much ſolemnity in a monument erected on the road that leads from Naples to Puteoli. The following modeſt diſtich was engraved on the tomb, written by the poet ſome few moments before he expired:

Mantua me genuit; Calabri rapuere; tenet nunc
Parthenope: cecini paſcua, rura, duces.

The Romans were not inſenſible of the merit of their poet. Virgil received much applauſe in the capital, and when he entered the theatre, he was aſtoniſhed and delighted to ſee the crouded audience riſe up to him as an emperor, and welcome his approach, by reiterated plaudits. He was naturally modeſt, and of a timorous diſpoſition. When people crouded to gaze upon him, or pointed at him with the finger with raptures, the poet bluſhed, and ſtole away from them, and often hid himſelf in ſhops to be removed from the curioſity and the admiration of the public. The moſt most liberal and gratifying marks of approbation he received were from the emperor and from Octavia. He attempted in his Æneid to paint the virtues, and to lament the premature death of the son of Octavia, and he was desired by the emperor to repeat the lines in the presence of the afflicted mother. He had no sooner begun O nate, &c. than Octavia burst into tears; he continued, but he had artfully suppressed the name of her son, and when he repeated in the 16th line, the well known words Tu Marcellus eris; the princess swooned away, and the poet withdrew, but not without being liberally rewarded. Octavia presented him ten sesterces for every one of his verses in praise of her son, the whole of which was equivalent to 2000l. English money. As an instance of his modesty, the following circumstance has been recorded. Virgil wrote this distich, in which he compared his patron to Jupiter,

Nocte pluit totâ, redeunt spectacula mane,
Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet, and placed it in the night on the gates of the palace of Augustus. Enquiries were made for the author by order of Augustus, and when Virgil had the diffidence not to declare himself, Bathyllus, a contemptible poet of the age, claimed the verses as his own, and was liberally rewarded. This displeased Virgil; he again wrote the verses near the palace, and under them with the beginning of another line in these words

Hos ego versiculos feci, tulit alter honores;

Sic vos non vobis,

four times repeated. Augustus wished the lines to be finished, Bathyllus seemed unable, and Virgil at last, by completing the stanza in the following order—

Sic vos non vobis nidificatis aves;
Sic vos non vobis vellera fertis oves;
Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes;
Sic vos non vobis fertis aratra boves.

proved himself to be the author of the distich, and the poetical usurper became the sport and ridicule of Rome. In the works of Virgil we can find a more perfect and satisfactory account of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Romans, than in all the other Latin poets, Ovid excepted. Every thing he mentions is founded upon historical truth, and though he borrowed much from his predecessors, and even whole lines from Ennius, yet he has had the happiness to make it all his own. He was uncommonly severe in revising his own poetry, and he used often to compare himself to a bear that licks her cubs into shape. In his connections, Virgil was remarkable, his friends enjoyed his unbounded confidence, and his library and possessions seemed to be the property of the public. Like other great men he was not without his enemies and detractors in his life time, but from their aspersions he received additional lustre. Among the very numerous and excellent editions of Virgil, these few may be collected as the best; that of Masvicius, 2 vols. 4to. Leovardiæ, 1717; of Baskerville, 4to. Birmingham, 1757; of the Variorum, in 8vo. L. Bat. 1661; of Heyne, 4 vols. 8vo. Lipsi. 1767; of Edinburgh, 2 vols. 12mo. 1755, and of Glasgow, 12mo. 1758. Paterc. 2, c. 36.—Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 40.—Propert. 2, el. 34. v. 61.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 51.—Mart. 8, ep. 56.—Juv. 11, v. 178.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 3, ep. 21.

VIRGINIA, a daughter of the centurion, L. Virginius. Appius Claudius, the decemvir, became enamoured of her, and attempted to remove her from the place where she resided. She was claimed by one of his favorites as the daughter of a slave, and Appius, in the capacity, and with the authority of judge, had pronounced the sentence, and delivered her into the hands of his friend, when Virginius, informed of his violent proceedings, arrived from the camp. The father demanded to see his daughter, and when this request was granted, he snatched a knife and plunged it in Virginia's breast, exclaiming, This is all, my dearest daughter, I can give thee, to preserve thy chastity from the lust and violence of a tyrant. No sooner was the blow given, than Virginius ran to the camp with the bloody knife in his hand. The soldiers were astonished and incensed, not against the murderer, but the tyrant that was the cause of Virginia's death, and they immediately marched to Rome. Appius was seized, but he destroyed himself in prison, and prevented the execution of the law. Spurius Oppius, another of the decemvirs who had not opposed the tyrant's views, killed himself also, and Marcus Claudius, the favorite of Appius, was put to death, and the decemviral power abolished, about 449 years before Christ. Liv. 3, c. 44, &c.

VIRGINIUS, the father of Virginia made tribune of the people. Vid. Virginia. —A tribune of the people who accuſed Q. Cæſo the ſon of Cincinnatus. He increaſed the number of the tribunes to ten, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſeditions againſt the patricians.—Another tribune in the age of Camillus, fined for his oppoſition to a law which propoſed going to Veii.——An augur who died of the plague.—A pretor of Sicily, who oppoſed the entrance of Cicero into his province, though under many obligations to the orator.—A tribune who encouraged Cinna to criminate Sylla.—— One of the generals of Nero in Germany. He made war againſt Vindex and conquered him. He was treated with great coldneſs by Galba, whoſe intereſt he had ſupported with ſo much ſucceſs. He refuſed all dangerous ſtations, and though twice offered the imperial purple, he rejected it with diſdain. Plut.

VIRIĀTHUS, a mean ſhepherd of Luſitania, who gradually roſe to power, and by firſt heading a gang of robbers, ſaw himſelf at laſt followed by a numerous army. He made war againſt the Romans with uncommon ſucceſs, and for 14 years enjoyed the envied title of protector of public liberty in the provinces of Spain. Many generals were defeated, and Pompey himſelf was aſhamed to find himſelf beaten. Cæpio was at laſt ſent againſt him, but his deſpair of conquering him by force of arms, obliged him to have recourſe to artifice, and he had the meanneſs to bribe the ſervants of Viriathus to murder their maſter. B. C. 140. Flor. 2, c. 17.—Val. Max. 6, c. 4.

VIRIDOMARUS, a young man of great power among the Ædui. Cæſar greatly honored him, but he fought at laſt againſt the Romans. Cæſ. bell. G. 7. c. 39, &c.

VIRIPLACA, a goddeſs among the Romans who preſided over the peace of families, whence her name, (virum placare). If any quarrel happened between a man and his wife, they generally repaired to the temple of the goddeſs, and came back reconciled. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.

VIRRO, a fictitious name introduced in Juvenal's 5 Sat.

VIRTUS, all virtues were made deities among the Romans. Marcellus erected two temples, one to Virtue and the other to Honor. They were built in ſuch a manner, that to ſee the temple of Honor it was neceſſary to paſs through that of Virtue; a happy allegory among a nation free and independent. The principal virtues were diſtinguiſhed, each by their attire. Prudence was known by her rule, and her pointing to a globe at her feet; Temperance had a bridle; Juſtice held an equal balance; and Fortitude leant againſt her ſword; Honeſty was clad in a tranſparent veſt; Modeſty appeared veiled; Clemency wore an olive branch, and Devotion threw incenſe upon an altar; Tranquillity was ſeen to lean on a column; Health was known by her ſerpent, Liberty by her cap, and Gaiety by her myrtle.

VISELLIUS, a lieutenant in Germany under Tiberius.

VISELLUS, a man whoſe father in law the commentators of Horace believe to have been afflicted with a hernia, on their obſervations on this verſe, 1 Sat. 1, v. 105. Eſt inter Tanaim quiddam, ſocerumque Viſelli.

VITELLIA, a Roman colony.

VITELLIUS Aulus, a Roman raiſed by his vices to the throne. He was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families of Rome, and as ſuch he gained an eaſy admiſſion to the palace of the emperors. The greateſt part of his youth was ſpent at Capreæ, where his willingneſs and compliance to gratify the moſt vicious propenſities of Tiberius, raiſed his father to the dignity of conſul and governor of Syria. The applauſe he gained in this ſchool of debauchery, was too great and flattering to induce Vitellius to alter his conduct, and no longer to be one of the votaries of vice. Caligula was pleaſed with his ſkill in driving a chariot. Claudius loved him becauſe he was a great gameſter, and he recommended himſelf to the favors of Nero by wiſhing him to ſing publicly in the crouded theatre. With ſuch an inſinuating diſpoſition, it is not to be wondered that Vitellius became ſo great. He did not fall with his patrons, like the other favorites, but the death of an emperor ſeemed to raiſe him to greater honors, and to procure him freſh applauſe. He paſſed through all the offices of the ſtate, and gained the ſoldiery by donations and liberal promiſes. He was at the head of the Roman legions in Germany when Otho was proclaimed emperor, and the exaltation of his rival was no ſooner heard in the camp, than he was likewiſe inveſted with the purple by his ſoldiers. He accepted with pleaſure the dangerous office, and inſtantly marched againſt Otho. Three battles were fought, and in all Vitellius was conquered. A fourth however, in the plains between Mantua and Cremona left him maſter of the field and of the Roman empire. He feaſted his eyes in viewing the bodies of the ſlain and the ground covered with with blood, and regardless of the misfortunes of the state, proceeding from so many excesses, he told his attendants that the smell of a dead enemy was always sweet. His first care was not like that of a true conqueror, to alleviate the distresses of the conquered, or patronize the friends of the dead, but it was to insult their misfortunes, and to intoxicate himself with the companions of his debauchery in the field of battle. Each successive day exhibited a scene of greater extravagance. Vitellius feasted four or five times a day, and such was his excess, that he was often seen to make himself vomit to begin his repast afresh, and to gratify his palate with more luxury. His food was of the most rare and exquisite nature, the deserts of Libya, the shores of Spain, and the waters of the Carpathian sea were diligently searched to supply the table of the emperor. The most celebrated of his feasts was that with which he was treated by his brother Lucius. The table, among other meats was covered with two thousand different dishes of fish, and seven thousand of fowls, and so expensive was he in every thing, that above seven millions sterling were spent in maintaining his table in the space of four months, and Josephus has properly observed, that if Vitellius had reigned long, the great opulence of all the Roman empire would have been found insufficient to defray the expences of his banquets. This extravagance which delighted the favorites, soon raised the indignation of the people. Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the army, and his minister Primus was sent to destroy the imperial glutton. Vitellius concealed himself under the bed of the porter of his palace, but this obscure retreat betrayed him, he was dragged naked through the streets, his hands were tied behind his back, and a drawn sword was placed under his chin to make him lift his head. After suffering the greatest insults from the populace, he was at last carried to the place of execution, and put to death, with repeated blows. His head was cut off and fixed to a pole, and his mutilated body dragged with a hook, and thrown into the Tiber, A. D. 69, after a reign of one year, except 12 days. Suet.—Tacit. Hist. 2.—Eutrop.—Dio.—Plut.—Lucius, the father of the emperor obtained great honors by his flattery to the emperors. He was made governor of Syria, and in this distant province he obliged the Parthians to sue for peace. His reputation to Messalina is well known, and he obtained as a particular favor the honourable office of putting off the shoes of the empress, &c. Suet. &c.—A brother of the emperor, who enjoyed his favors by encouraging his gluttony, &c.—Publius, an uncle of the emperor of that name. He was accused under Nero of attempts to bribe the people with money from the treasury against the emperor. He killed himself before his trial.—One of the flatterers of Tiberius.—An officer of the pretorians under Otho.—A son of the emperor Vitellius, put to death by one of his father's friends.—Some of the family of the Vitellii conspired with the Aquilii, and other illustrious Romans to restore Tarquin to his throne. Their conspiracy was discovered by the consuls, and they were severely punished. Plut. &c.

VITIA, a mother put to death by Tiberius for weeping at the death of her son, &c. Tacit.

VITĂLICUS, a surname of Mars. Ovid.

M. VITRUVIUS, Pollio, a celebrated architect in the age of Augustus, born at Formiæ. He is known only by his writings, and nothing is recorded in history of his life or private character. He wrote a treatise on his profession, which he dedicated to Augustus, and it is the only book on architecture now extant, written by the antients. In this work he plainly shews that he was master of his profession, and that he possessed both genius and abilities. The best edition of Vitruvuis is that of De Laet, Amst. 1649.

VITŬLA, a deity among the Romans who presided over festivals and rejoicings.

ULPIA TRAJĂNA, a Roman colony planted in Sarmatia by Trajan.

ULPIĂNUS Domitius, a lawyer in the reign of Alexander Severus, of whom he became the secretary and principal minister. He raised a persecution against the Christians, and was at last murdered by the pretorian guards, of which he had the command, A. D. 226. There are some fragments of his compositions on civil law still extant. The Greek commentaries of Ulpian on Demosthenes, were printed in fol. 1527, apud Aldum.—Marcellus, an officer in the age of Commodus.—Julianus, a man sent to oppose Heliogabalus, &c.

ULŬBRÆ, a town of Latium, where Augustus was educated. Juv. 10, v. 102.

ULYSSES, a king of the islands of Ithaca and Dulichium, son of Anticlea and Laertes, or according to some, of Sisyphus. [Vid. Sisyphus & Anticlea.] He became like the other princes of Greece, one of the suitors of Helen, but as he despaired of success in his applications, on account of the great number of his competitors, he solicited ſcited the hand of Penelope, the daughter of Icarius. Tyndarus, the father of Helen, favored the addreſſes of Ulyſſes, as by him he was directed to chuſe one of his daughter's ſuitors without offending the others, and to bind them all by a ſolemn oath, that they would unite together in protecting Helen if any violence was ever offered to her perſon. Ulyſſes had no ſooner obtained the hand of Penelope, than he retired to Ithaca, where his father reſigned him the crown and retired to peace and rural ſolitude. The rape of Helen, however, by Paris, did not long permit him to remain in Ithaca, and as he was bound to defend her againſt every intruder, he was ſummoned to the war with the other princes of Greece. He pretended to be inſane, not to leave his beloved Penelope. He yoked a horſe and a bull together, and ploughed the ſea ſhore, where he ſowed ſalt inſtead of corn. This diſſimulation was ſoon diſcovered, and Palamedes, by placing before the plough of Ulyſſes, his infant ſon Telemachus, convinced the world, that the father was not mad, who had the providence to turn away the plough from the furrow, not to hurt his child. Ulyſſes was therefore obliged to go to the war, but he did not forget him who had diſcovered his pretended inſanity. [Vid. Palamedes.] During the Trojan war, the king of Ithaca was courted for his prudence and ſagacity. By his means Achilles was diſcovered among the daughters of Lycomedes, king of Scyros, [Vid. Achilles.] and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos, and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. [Vid. Philoctetes.] He was not leſs diſtinguiſhed for his activity and valor. With the aſſiſtance of Diomedes he murdered Rheſus, and ſlaughtered the ſleeping Thracians in the midſt of their camp, [Vid. Rheſus & Dolon.] and he introduced himſelf into the city of Priam, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans. [Vid. Palladium.] For theſe eminent ſervices he was univerſally applauded by the Greeks, and he was rewarded with the arms of Achilles, which Ajax had diſputed with him. After the Trojan war Ulyſſes embarked on board his ſhips to return to Greece, but he was expoſed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coaſts of Africa, and viſited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. Polyphemus, who was the king of the Cyclops, ſeized Ulyſſes with his companions, five of whom he devoured, [Vid. Polyphemus.] but the prince of Ithaca intoxicated him and put out his eyes, and at laſt eſcaped from the dangerous cave where he was confined by tying himſelf under the belly of the ſheep of the Cyclops when led to paſture. In Æolia he met with a friendly reception, and Æolus gave him, confined in bags, all the winds which could obſtruct his return to Ithaca, but the curioſity of his companions to know what the bags contained, proved nearly fatal. The winds ruſhed with impetuoſity, and all the fleet was deſtroyed, except the ſhip which carried Ulyſſes. From thence he was thrown upon the coaſts of the Læſtrygones, and of the iſland Æea, where the magician Circe changed all his companions into pigs for their voluptuouſneſs. He eſcaped their fate by means of an herb which he had received from Mercury, and after he had obliged the magician by force of arms to reſtore his companions to their original ſhape, he yielded to her charms, and made her mother of Telegonus. He viſited the infernal regions, and conſulted Tireſias how to return with ſafety to his country, and after he had received every neceſſary information, he returned on earth. He paſſed along the coaſts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe, [Vid. Sirenes.] and eſcaped the whirlpools and ſhoals of Scylla, and Carybdis. On the coaſts of Sicily his companions ſtole and killed ſome oxen that were ſacred to Apollo, for which the God deſtroyed the ſhips, and all were drowned, except Ulyſſes, who ſaved himſelf on a plank, and ſwam to the iſland of Calypſo, in Ogygia. There, for ſeven years, he forgot Ithaca, in the arms of the goddeſs by whom he had two children. The gods at laſt interfered, and Calypſo, by order of Mercury, ſuffered him to depart after ſhe had furniſhed him a ſhip, and every thing requiſite for the voyage. He had almoſt reached the iſland of Corcyra, when Neptune, ſtill mindful that his ſon Polyphemus had been robbed of his ſight by the perfidy of Ulyſſes, raiſed a ſtorm, and ſunk his ſhip. Ulyſſes ſwam with difficulty to the iſland of the Phæacians, where the kindneſs of Nauſicaa, and the humanity of her father, king Alcinous, entertained him for a while. He related the ſeries of his misfortunes to the monarch, and at laſt by his benevolence, he was conducted in a ſhip to Ithaca. The Phæacians laid him on the ſea ſhore as he was aſleep, and Ulyſſes found himſelf ſafely reſtored to his country, after a long abſence of 20 years. He was well informed that his palace was beſieged by a number of ſuitors, who continually diſturbed the peace of Penelope, and therefore he aſſumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and made himſelf known to his ſon, and his faithful ſhepherd Eumæus. With them he took measures to re-establish himself on his throne, he went to the palace, and was personally convinced of the virtues and of the fidelity of Penelope. Before his arrival was publicly known, all the importuning suitors were put to death, and Ulysses restored to the peace and bosom of his family. [Vid. Laertes, Penelope, Telemachus, Eumæus.] He lived about 16 years after his return, and was at last killed by his son Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca, with the hopes of making himself known to his father. This unfortunate event had been foretold to him by Tiresias, who assured him that he should die by the violence of something that was to issue from the bosom of the sea. [Vid. Telegonus.] According to some authors, Ulysses went to consult the oracle of Apollo after his return to Ithaca, and he had the meanness to seduce Erippe, the daughter of a king of Epirus, who had treated him with great kindness. Erippe had a son by him whom she called Euryalus. When come to years of puberty, Euryalus was sent to Ithaca by his mother, but Penelope no sooner knew who he was, than she resolved to destroy him. Therefore when Ulysses returned, he put to immediate death his unknown son, on the crimination of Penelope his wife, who accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The adventures of Ulysses in his return to Ithaca from the Trojan war, are the subject of Homer's Odyssey. Homer. Il. & Od.—Virg. Æn. 2, 3, &c.—Dictys. Cret. 1, &c.—*Ovid. UMBER, a lake of Umbria near the Tiber. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 124.

UMBRA POMPEIA, a portico of Pompey at Rome. Mart. 5, ep. 10.

UMBRIA, a country of Italy, separated from Etruria by the Tiber, bounded on the North by the Adriatic sea, east by Picenum, and the country of the Sabines, and south by the river Nar. Some derive the word Umbria ab imbribus the frequent showers that were supposed to fall there, or from the shadow (umbra) of the Apennines which hung over it. Umbria had many cities of note. The Umbrians opposed the Romans in the infancy of their empire, but afterwards they became their allies, about the year U. C. 434. Catull. 40, v. 11.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 12.—Dionys. Hal.

UMBRICIUS, a soothsayer, who foretold approaching calamities to Galba. Juv. 3, v. 21.

UMBRO, a river of Italy. A general who assisted Turnus against Æneas, and was killed during the war. He could assuage the fury of serpents by his songs, and counteract the poisonous effects of the inbites. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 752. l. 10, v. 544.

UNCA, a surname of Minerva.

UNCHÆ, a town of Mesopotamia.

VOLOGESES, a name common to many of the kings of Parthia, who made war against the Roman emperors.

VOLSCENS, a Latin chief who discovered Nisus and Euryalus as they returned from the Rutulian camp loaded with spoils. He killed Euryalus and was himself immediately stabbed by Nisus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 370 & 442.

VOLSCI or VOLCI, a people of Latium, whose territories are bounded on the south by the Tyrrhene sea, north by the country of the Hernici and Marsi, west by the Latins and Rutulians, and east by Campania. Their chief cities were Antium, Circeæ, Anxur, Anxur, Corioli, Fregellæ, Arpinum, &c. Ancus king of Rome made war againſt them, and in the time of the republic they became formidable enemies, till they were at laſt conquered with the reſt of the Latins. Liv. 3 & 4.—Virg. G. 2, v. 168. Æn. 9, v. 505. l. 11, v. 546, &c.—Strab. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4 & 5.

Volsinium, a town of Etruria in Italy, deſtroyed, according to Pliny 2, c. 53 by fire from heaven. Liv. 7, c. 3.—Juv. 3, v. 191.

Voltinia, one of the Roman tribes.

Volumnæ Fanum, a temple in Etruria, ſacred to the goddeſs Volumna who preſided over the will and over complaiſance. Liv. 4. c. 23.

Volumnia, the wife of Coriolanus.

Volumnus & Volumna, two deities who preſided over the will. They were chiefly invoked at marriages, to preſerve concord between the huſband and wife. They were particularly worſhipped by the Etrurians. Liv. 4, c. 61.

T. Volumnius, a Roman famous for his friendſhip towards M. Lucullus, whom M. Antony had put to death. His great lamentations were the cauſe that he was dragged to the triumvir, of whom he demanded to be conducted to the body of his friend, and there to be put to death. His requeſt was eaſily granted.——A mimic whom Brutus put to death.——An Etrurian who wrote tragedies in his own native language.——A conſul who defeated the Samnites and the Etrurians, &c.——A friend of M. Brutus. He was preſerved when that great republican killed himſelf, and he wrote an account of his death and of his actions, from which Plutarch ſelected ſome remarks.—A preſect of Syria, B. C. 11.

Voluptas & Volupia, the goddeſs of ſenſual pleaſures, worſhipped at Rome, where ſhe had a temple. She was repreſented as a young and beautiful woman, well dreſſed, and elegantly adorned, having Virtue under her feet.

C. Volusenus, a military tribune in Cæſar's army, &c. Cæſ. bell. G. 3.

Volusianus, a Roman taken as colleague on the imperial throne, by his father Gallus. He was killed by his ſoldiers.

Vŏlŭsius, a poet of Patavia who wrote, like Ennius, the annals of Rome in verſe. Seneca, ep. 93.—Catull. 96, v. 7.——Saturninus, a governor of Rome, who died in the 93d year of his age, beloved and reſpected, under Nero. *Tacit. Vopiscus, a native of Syracuſe, 303, A. D. who wrote the life of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmus, Carus, &c. He is one of the ſix authors who are called Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ ſcriptores, but he excells all others in the elegance of his ſtile, and the manner in which he relates the various actions of the emperors. He is not however without his faults. He has not the purity or perſpicuity of the writers of the Auguſtan age.

Vŏrānus, a freed man of Q. Luctatius Catulus, famous for his robberies as well as his cunning, &c. Horat. 1, ſat. 8, v. 39.

Votiēnus, Montanus, a man of learning baniſhed to one of the Baleares for his malevolent reflections upon Tiberius. Ovid has celebrated him as an excellent poet. Tacit.

Urānia, one of the Muſes, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemoſyne, who preſided over aſtronomy. She is generally called mother of Linus, and of the god Hymenæus. She was repreſented as a young virgin dreſſed in an azure colored robe, crowned with ſtars, and holding a globe in her hands, and having many mathematical inſtruments placed round. Heſiod. Theog. 77.—Apollod. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 161.——A ſirname of Venus, the ſame as Celeſtial. She was ſuppoſed, in that character, to preſide over beauty and generation, and was called daughter of Uranus or Cœlus by the Light. Plato in Symp.—*Cic. de Nat. Utĭca, a celebrated city of Africa, on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the same bay as Carthage, founded by a Syrian colony above 287 years before Carthage. It had a large and commodious harbour, and it became the metropolis of Africa, after the destruction of Carthage in the 3d Punic war, and the Romans granted it all the lands situate between Hippo and Carthage. It is celebrated for the death of Cato, who from thence is called Uticensis, or of Utica. Strab. 17.—Lucan. 6, v. 306.—Justin. 18, c. 4.—Plin. 16, c. 40.

Vulcanălia, festivals in honor of Vulcan, brought to Rome from Præneste. They were observed in the month of August. The streets were illuminated, fires kindled every where, and animals thrown into the flames, as a sacrifice to the deity. Varro de L. L. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Columell. 11.—Plin. 18, c. 13.

Vulcāni insula, or Vulcania, a name given to the islands between Sicily and Italy, now called Lipari. Virg. Æn. 8. v. 422. They received it because there were there subterraneous fires, supposed to be excited by Vulcan, the God of fire.

Vulcanius, Terentianus, a Latin historian, who wrote an account of the life of the three Gordians, &c.

Vulcānus, a god of the antients who presided over fire, and was the patron of all artists who worked iron and metals. He was son of Juno alone, who in this wished to imitate Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brains. According to Homer, he was son of Jupiter and Juno, and the mother was so disgusted with the deformities of her son, that she threw him into the sea as soon as born, where he remained for nine years. According to the more received opinion, Vulcan was educated in heaven with the rest of the gods, but his father kicked him down from Olympus, when he attempted to deliver his mother, who had been fastened by a golden chain for her insolence. He was nine days in coming from heaven upon earth, and he fell in the island of Lemnos, where, according to Lucian, the inhabitants seeing him in the air, caught him in their arms. He however broke his leg by the fall, and ever after remained lame of one foot. He fixed his residence in Lemnos, where he built himself a palace, and raised forges to work metals. The inhabitants of the island became sensible of his industry, and were taught all the useful arts which could civilize their rude manners, and render them serviceable to the good of society. The first work of Vulcan was, according to some, a throne of gold with secret springs, which he presented to his mother to avenge himself for her want of disaffection towards him. Juno no sooner sat herself on the throne than she found herself unable to move. The gods attempted to deliver her, by breaking the chains which held her, but to no purpose, and Vulcan alone had the power to set her at liberty. Bacchus intoxicated him and prevailed upon him to come to Olympus, where he was reconciled to his parents. Vulcan has been celebrated by the antient poets for the ingenious works and automatical figures which he made, and many speak of two golden statues which not only seemed animated, but which walked by his side, and even assisted him in the working of metals. It is said, that at the request of Jupiter he made the first woman that ever appeared on earth, well known under the name of Pandora. [Vid Pandora.] The Cyclops of Sicily, were his ministers and attendants, and with him they fabricated, not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but also arms for the gods and the most celebrated heroes. His forges were supposed to be under mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily, as well as in every part of the earth where there were vulcanos. The most known of the works of Vulcan which were presented to mortals are, a collar given to Hermione the wife of Cadmus, and a sceptre, which was in the possession of Agamemnon king of Argos and Mycenæ. The collar proved fatal to all those that wore it, but the sceptre, after the death of Agamemnon was carefully preserved at Cheronæa, and regarded as a divinity. The amours of Vulcan are not numerous. He demanded Minerva from Jupiter, who had promised him in marriage whatever goddess he should chuse, and when she refused his addresses he attempted to offer her violence. Minerva resisted with success, though there remained on her body some marks of Vulcan's passion, which she threw down upon earth wrapped up in wool. [Vid. Erisichthonius.] This disappointment in his love was repaired by Jupiter who gave him one of the Graces. Venus is universally acknowledged to have been the wife of Vulcan; her infidelity is well known, as well as her amours with Mars, which were discovered by Phœbus, and exposed to the gods by her own husband. [Vid Alectryon.] The worship of Vulcan was well established, particularly in Egypt, at Athens,

Athens, and at Rome. It was uſual in the ſacrifices that were offered to him to burn the whole victim and not reſerve part of it as in the immolations to the reſt of the gods. A calf and a boar pig were the principal victims offered to him. Vulcan was repreſented as covered with ſweat, blowing with his nervous arm the fires of his forges. His breaſt was hairy, and his forehead was blackened with ſmoke. Some repreſent him lame and deformed, holding a hammer raiſed in the air, ready to ſtrike; while with the other hand he turns with pincers, a thunderbolt on his anvil. He appears on ſome monuments with a long beard, diſhevelled hair, half naked, and a ſmall round cap on his head, while he holds a hammer and pincers in his hand. The Egyptians repreſented him under the figure of a monkey. Vulcan has received the names of Mulciber, Pamphanes, Clytotechnes, Pandamator, Cyllopodes, Chalaipoda, &c. all expreſſive of his lameneſs and his profeſſion. He was father of Cupid by Venus; of Cæculus, Cecrops, Cacus, Periphetes, Cercyon, Ocriſia, &c. Cicero ſpeaks of more than one deity of the name of Vulcan. One he calls ſon of Cœlus, and father of Apollo by Minerva; the ſecond he mentions is ſon of the Nile, and called Phtas by the Egyptians; the third was ſon of Jupiter and Juno, and fixed his reſidence in Lemnos; and the fourth who built his forges in the Lipari iſlands was ſon of Menalius. Vulcan ſeems to have been admitted into heaven more for ridicule than any other purpoſe. He ſeems to be the great cuckold of Olympus, and even his wife is repreſented as laughing at his deformities, and mimicking his lameneſs to gain the ſmiles of her lovers. *Heſiod. Theog. & in Scut. The inhabitants are celebrated for their love of liberty and national independence. Brutus laid ſiege to their city, and when at laſt they were unable longer to ſupport themſelves againſt the enemy, they ſet fire to their houſes and deſtroyed themſelves. The conqueror wiſhed to ſpare them, but though he offered rewards to his ſoldiers, if they brought any of the Xanthians alive into his preſence, only 150 were ſaved much againſt their will. Appian. 4.—Plut. in Brut.

XANTICLES, one of the leaders of the 10,000 Greeks, after the battle of Cunaxa.

XANTIPPE, a daughter of Dorus who married Pleuron, by whom ſhe had Agenor, &c. Apollod. 1, c. 7.——The wife of Socrates, remarkable for her ill humour and peviſh diſpoſition, which are become proverbial. Some ſuppoſe that the philoſopher was acquainted with her moroſeneſs and inſolence before he married her, and that he took her for his wife to try his patience, and inure himſelf to the malevolent reflections of mankind. She continually tormented him with her impertinence, and one day not ſatisfied with uſing the moſt bitter invectives, ſhe emptied a veſſel of dirty water on his head, upon which the philoſopher coolly obſerved, after thunder there generally falls rain. *Ælian. Xenocrates, an antient philosopher born at Calcedonia, and educated in the school of Plato, whose friendship he gained, and whose approbation he merited. Though of a dull and sluggish disposition, he supplied the defects of nature by unwearied attention and industry, and was at last found capable of succeeding in the school of Plato after Speusippus, about 339 years before Christ. He was remarkable as a disciplinarian, and he required that his pupils should be acquainted with mathematics before they came under his care, and he even rejected some who had not the necessary qualification, saying that they had not yet found the key of philosophy. He did not only recommend himself to his pupils by precepts, but more powerfully by example, and since the wonderful change he had made upon the conduct of one of his auditors, [Vid. Polemon.] his company was as much shunned by the dissolute and extravagant, as it was courted by the virtuous and the benevolent. Philip of Macedon attempted to gain his confidence with money, but with no success. Alexander in this imitated his father and sent some of his friends with 50 talents for the philosopher. They were introduced, and supped with Xenocrates. The repast was small and moderate, elegant without ostentation. On the morrow, the officers of Alexander wished to pay down the 50 talents, but the philosopher asked them whether they had not perceived from the entertainment of the preceeding day, that he was not in want of money, Tell your master, said he, to keep his money, he has more people to maintain than I have. Yet not to offend the monarch, he accepted a small sum about the 200th part of one talent. His character was not less conspicuous in every other particular, and he has been cited as an instance of virtue from the following circumstance: The courtezan Lais had pledged herself to forfeit an immense sum of money, if she did not triumph over the virtue of Xenocrates. She tried every art, assumed the most captivating looks, and used the most tempting attitudes to gain the philosopher, but in vain; and she declared at last, that she had not lost her money, as she had pledged herself to conquer an human being, not a lifeless stone. Though so respected and admired, yet Xenocrates was poor, and he was dragged to prison, because he was unable to pay a small tribute to the state. He was delivered from confinement by one of his friends. His integrity was so well known, that when he appeared in the court as a witness, the judges dispensed with his oath. He died B. C. 314, in his 82d year, after he had presided in the academy for above 25 years. It is said, that he fell in the night with his head into a bason of water, and that he was suffocated. He had written above 60 treatises on different subjects, all now lost. He acknowledged no other deity but heaven, and the seven planets. Diog.—*Cic. ad. XENOPHON, an Athenian, ſon of Gryllus, celebrated as a general, an hiſtorian, and a philoſopher. In the ſchool of Socrates he received thoſe inſtructions and precepts which afterwards ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed him at the head of an army, in literary ſolitude, and as the prudent father of a family. He was invited by Proxenus, one of his intimate friends to accompany Cyrus the younger in an expedition againſt his brother Artaxerxes, king of Perſia, but he refuſed to comply without previouſly conſulting his venerable maſter, and enquiring into the propriety of ſuch a meaſure. Socrates ſtrongly oppoſed it, and obſerved, that it might raiſe the reſentment of his countrymen, as Sparta had made an alliance with the Perſian monarch; but, however, before he proceeded further, he adviſed him to conſult the oracle of Apollo. Xenophon paid due deference to the injunctions of Socrates, but as he was ambitious of glory, and eager to engage in a diſtant expedition, he haſtened with precipitation to Sardis, where he was introduced to the young prince, and treated with great attention. In the army of Cyrus, Xenophon ſhewed that he was a true diſciple of Socrates, and that he had been educated in the warlike city of Athens. After the deciſive battle in the plains of Cunaxa, and the fall of young Cyrus, the prudence and vigor of his mind were called into action. The ten thouſand Greeks who had followed the ſtandard of an ambitious prince, were now at the diſtance of above 600 leagues from their native home, in a country ſurrounded on every ſide by a victorious enemy, without money, without proviſions, and without a leader. Xenophon was ſelected from among the officers, to ſuperintend the retreat of his countrymen, and though he was often oppoſed by malevolence and envy, yet his perſuaſive eloquence and his activity convinced the Greeks that no general could extricate them from every difficulty, better than the diſciple of Socrates. He roſe ſuperior to danger, and though under continual alarms from the ſudden attacks of the Perſians, he was enabled to croſs rapid rivers, penetrate through vaſt deſarts, gain the tops of mountains, till he could reſt ſecure for a while, and refreſh his tired companions. This celebrated retreat was at laſt happily effected, the Greeks returned home after a march of 1155 paraſangs, or leagues, which was performed in 215 days, after an abſence of 15 months. The whole perhaps might now be forgotten, or at leaſt but obſcurely known, if the great philoſopher who planned it, had not employed his pen in deſcribing the dangers which he eſcaped, and the difficulties which he ſurmounted. He was no ſooner returned from Cunaxa, than he ſought new honours in following the fortune of Ageſilaus in Aſia. He enjoyed his confidence, he fought under his ſtandard, and conquered with him in the Aſiatic provinces, as well as at the battle of Coronæa. His fame, however, did not eſcape the aſperſions of jealouſy, he was publicly baniſhed from Athens for accompanying Cyrus againſt his brother, and being now without a home, he retired to Scillus, a ſmall town of the Lacedæmonians, in the neighbourhood of Olympia. In this ſolitary retreat he dedicated his time to literary purſuits, and as he had acquired riches in his Aſiatic expeditions, he began to adorn and variegate by the hand of art, for his pleaſure and enjoyment, the country which ſurrounded Scillus. He built a magnificent temple to Diana, in imitation of that of Epheſus, and ſpent part of his time in rural employments, or in hunting in the woods and mountains. His peaceful occupations, however, were ſoon diſturbed, a war aroſe between the Lacedæmonians and Elis. The ſanctity of Diana's temple, and the venerable age of the philoſopher, who lived in the delightful retreats of Scillus, were diſregarded, and Xenophon, driven by the Elians from his favorite ſpot, where he had compoſed and written for the information of poſterity, and honor of his country retired to the city of Corinth. In this place he died in the 90th year of his age, 359 years before the Chriſtian era. The works of Xenophon are numerous: He wrote an account of the expedition of Cyrus, called the Anabaſis, and as he had no inconſiderable ſhare in the enterprize, his deſcriptions muſt be authentic, as he was himſelf an eye witneſs. Many however have accuſed him of partiality. He appeared often too fond of extolling the virtues of his favorite Cyrus, and while he deſcribes with contempt, the imprudent operations of the Perſians, he does not neglect to ſhow that he was a native of Greece. His Cyropædia, divided into eight books, has given riſe to much criticiſm, and while ſome warmly ly maintain that it is a faithful account of the life and the actions of Cyrus the Great, and declare that it is supported by the authority of ſcripture; others as vehemently deny its authenticity. According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropædia of Xenophon, was a moral romance, and theſe venerable philoſophers ſupport, that the hiſtorian did not ſo much write what Cyrus had been, as what every true good and virtuous monarch ought to be. His Hellenica were written as a continuation of the hiſtory of Thucydides, and in his Memorabilia of Socrates, and in his apology he has ſhewn himſelf, as Valerius Maximus obſerves, a perfect maſter of the philoſophy of that great man, and he has explained his doctrines and moral precepts with all the ſucceſs of perſuaſive eloquence and conſcious integrity. Theſe are the moſt famous of his compoſitions, beſides which there are other ſmall tracts, his eulogium given on Ageſilaus, his œconomics, on the duties of domeſtic life, the dialogue intitled Hiero, in which he happily deſcribes and compares the miſery which attended the tyrant, with the felicity of a virtuous prince; a treatiſe on hunting, the ſympoſium of the philoſophers, on the government of Athens and Sparta, a treatiſe on the revenues of Attica, &c. The ſimplicity and the elegance of Xenophon's diction have procured him the name of Athenian muſe, and the bee of Greece, and they have induced Quintilian to ſay, that the graces dictated his language, and that the goddeſs of perſuaſion dwelt upon his lips. His ſentiments, as to the divinity and religion, were the ſame as thoſe of the venerable Socrates, he ſupported the immortality of the ſoul, and exhorted his friends to cultivate thoſe virtues which enſure the happineſs of mankind, with all the zeal and fervor of a chriſtian. He has been quoted as an inſtance of tenderneſs and of reſignation on providence. As he was offering a ſacrifice, he was informed that Gryllus, his eldeſt ſon, had been killed at the battle of Mantinea. Upon this he tore the garland from his head, but when he was told that his ſon had died like a Greek, and given a mortal wound to the enemy's general, he replaced the flowers on his head, and continued the ſacrifice, exclaiming that the pleaſure he derived from the valor of his ſon, were greater than the grief which his unfortunate death occaſioned. XERXES 1ſt, ſucceeded his father Darius on the throne of Perſia, and though but the ſecond ſon of the monarch, he was preferred to his elder brother Artabazanes. The cauſes alledged for this preference, were, that Artabazanes was ſon of Darius when a private man, and that XERXES was born, after his father had been raiſed on the Perſian throne, of Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus. Xerxes continued the warlike preparations of his father, and added the revolted kingdom of Egypt to his extenſive poſſeſſions. He afterwards invaded Europe, and entered Greece with an army, which, together with the numerous retinue of ſervants, eunuchs, and women that attended it, amounted to no leſs than 5,283,220 ſouls. This multitude, which the fidelity of hiſtorians have not exaggerated, was ſtopped at Thermopylæ, by the valor of 300 Spartans, under king Leonidas. Xerxes aſtoniſhed that ſuch a handful of men ſhould dare to oppoſe his progreſs, ordered ſome of his ſoldiers to bring them alive into his preſence, but for three ſucceſſive days the moſt valiant of the Perſian troops were repeatedly defeated in attempting to execute the monarch's injunctions, and the courage of the Spartans might perhaps have triumphed longer, if a Trachinian had not led a detachment to the top of the mountain, and ſuddenly fallen upon the devoted Leonidas. The king himſelf nearly periſhed on this occaſion, and it has been reported, that in the night, the deſperate Spartans ſought, for a while, the royal tent which they found deſerted, and wandered through the Perſian army, ſlaughtering thouſands before them. The battle of Thermopylæ was the beginning of the diſgrace of Xerxes; the more he advanced, it was to experience new diſappointments, his fleet was defeated at Artemiſium and Salamis, and though he burnt the deſerted city of Athens, and truſted to the artful inſinuations of Themiſtocles, yet he found his millions millions unable to conquer a nation that was ſuperior to him in the knowledge of war and maritime affairs. Mortified with the ill ſucceſs of his expedition, and apprehenſive of imminent danger in an enemy's country, Xerxes haſtened to Perſia, and in 30 days he marched over all that territory which before he had paſſed with much pomp and parade in the ſpace of ſix months. Mardonius, the beſt of his generals, was left behind, with an army of 300,000 men, and the reſt that had ſurvived the ravages of war, of famine, and peſtilence, followed their timid monarch into Thrace, where his ſteps were marked by the numerous birds of prey that hovered round him, and fed upon the dead carcaſes of the Perſians. When he reached the Helleſpont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats which he had erected there, totally deſtroyed by the ſtorms, and he croſſed the ſtraights in a ſmall fiſhing veſſel. Reſtored to his kingdom and ſafety, he forgot his dangers, his loſſes and his defeats, and gave himſelf up to riot and debauchery. His indolence, and luxurious voluptuouſneſs offended his ſubjects, and Artabanus, the captain of his guards, conſpired againſt him, and murdered him in his bed, in the 21ſt year of his reign, about 464 years before the Chriſtian era. The perſonal accompliſhments of Xerxes have been commended by antient authors, and Herodotus obſerves, that there was not one man among the millions of his army, that was equal to the monarch in comelineſs or ſtature, or that was as worthy to preſide over a great and extenſive empire. The picture is finiſhed, and the character of Xerxes completely known, when we hear Juſtin exclaim, that the vaſt armament which invaded Greece, was without a head. Xerxes has been cited as an inſtance of humanity. When he reviewed his millions from a ſtately throne in the plains of Aſia, he ſuddenly ſhed a torrent of tears on the recollection that the multitude of men he ſaw before his eyes, in one hundred years, ſhould be no more. His pride and inſolence have been deſervedly cenſured, he ordered chains to be thrown into the ſea, and the waves to be whipped becauſe the firſt bridge he had laid acroſs the Helleſpont had been deſtroyed by a ſtorm. He cut a channel through mount Athos, and ſaw his fleet ſail in a place which before was dry ground. The very rivers were dried up by his army as he advanced towards Greece and the cities which he entered reduced to want and poverty. Herodot. 1, c. 183, l. 7, c. 2, &c.—Diod. 11.—Strab. 9.—Ælian. 3, *V. ZALEUCUS, a law giver of the Locrians in Italy, and one of the diſciples of Pythagoras, 550 B.C. He was very humane, and at the ſame time very auſtere, and he attempted to enforce his laws more by inſpiring ſhame than dread. He had wiſely decreed, that a perſon guilty of adultery ſhould loſe both his eyes. His philoſophy was called to a trial, when he was informed that his ſon was an adulterer. He ordered the law to be executed, the people interfered but Zaleucus reſiſted, and rather than violate his own inſtitutions, he commanded one of his own eyes, and one of thoſe of his ſon to be put out. This made ſuch an impreſſion upon the people, that while Zaleucus preſided over the Locrians, no perſon was again found guilty of adultery. *Val. ZELES, a town of Spain.

ZELUS, a daughter of Pallas.

ZENO, a philoſopher of Elea or Velia in Italy, the diſciple, or according to ſome, the adopted ſon of Parmenides, and the ſuppoſed inventor of dialectic. His opinions about the univerſe, the unity, incomprehenſibility, and immutability of all things, were the ſame as thoſe of Xenophanes and the reſt of the Elatic philoſophers. It is ſaid, that he attempted to deliver his country from from the tyranny of Nearchus. His plot was discovered, and he was exposed to the most excruciating torments to reveal the name of his accomplices, but this he bore with unparalleled fortitude, and not to be at last conquered by tortures, he cut off his tongue with his teeth and spit it into the face of the tyrant. Some say that he was pounded alive in a mortar, and that in the midst of his torments he called to Nearchus, as if to reveal something of importance; the tyrant approached him, and Zeno, as if willing to whisper to him, caught his ear with his teeth and bit it off. Cic. Tusc. 2, c. 22. de Nat. De. 3, c. 33.—Diod. in Frag.—Val. Max. 3, c. 3.—Diog. 9.——The founder of the sect of the stoics, born at Citium in the island of Cyprus. The first part of his life was spent in commercial pursuits, but he was soon called to more elevated employments. As he was returning from Phœnicia a storm drove his ship on the coast of Attica, and he was shipwrecked near the Piræus. This moment of calamity he regarded as the beginning of his fame. He entered the house of a bookseller, and to dissipate his melancholy reflections he began to read. The book was written by Xenophon, and the merchant was so pleased and captivated by the eloquence and beauties of the philosopher, that from that time he renounced the pursuits of a busy life, and applied himself to the study of philosophy. Ten years were spent in frequenting the school of Crates, and the same number under Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon. Perfect in every branch of knowledge, and improved from experience as well as observation, Zeno opened a school at Athens, and soon saw himself attended by the great, the learned, and the powerful. His followers were called Stoics, because they received the instructions of the philosopher in the portico called στοα. He was so respected during his life time that the Athenians publicly decreed him a brazen statue and a crown of gold. His life was an example of soberness and moderation, his manners were austere, and to his temperance and regularity he was indebted for the continual flow of health which he always enjoyed. After he had taught publicly for 48 years, he died in the 98th year of his age, B. C. 264, a stranger to diseases, and never incommoded by a real indisposition. He was buried in that part of the city called Ceramicus, where the Athenians raised him a monument. The founder of the stoic philosophy shone before his followers as a pure example of imitation. Virtue he perceived to be the ultimate of his researches. He wished to live in the world as if nothing was properly his own; he loved others, and his affections were extended even to his enemies. He felt a pleasure in being kind, benevolent, and attentive, and he found that these sentiments of pleasure were reciprocal. He saw a connection and dependence in the system of the universe, and perceived that from thence arose the harmony of civil society, the tenderness of parents, and filial gratitude. In the attainment of virtue the goods of the mind were to be preferred to those of the body, and when that point was once gained nothing could equal our happiness and perfection, and the stoic could view with indifference health or sickness, riches or poverty, pain and pleasure, which could neither move nor influence the serenity of his mind. Zeno recommended resignation, he knew that the laws of the universe cannot be changed by man, and therefore he wished that his disciples should not, in prayer, deprecate impending calamities, but rather beseech Providence to grant them fortitude to bear the severest trials with pleasure and due resignation to the will of Heaven. An arbitrary command over the passions was one of the rules of stoicism, to assist our friends in the hour of calamity was our duty, but to give way to childish sensations was unbecoming our nature. Pity, therefore, and anger were to be banished from the heart, propriety and decorum were to be the guides in every thing, and the external actions of men were the best indications of their inward feelings, their secret inclinations, and their character. It was the duty of the stoic to study himself; in the evening he was enjoined to review with critical accuracy the events of the day, and to regulate his future conduct with more care, and always to find an impartial witness within his own breast. Such were the leading characters of the stoic philosophy, whose followers were so illustrious, so perfect, and so numerous, and whose effects were productive of such exemplary virtues in the annals of the human mind. Zeno in his maxims used to say, that with virtue men could live happy under the most pressing calamities. He said, that nature had given us two ears, and only one mouth to tell us that we ought to listen more than speak. He compared those whose actions were dissonant with their professions to the coin of Alexandria, which appeared beautiful to the eye, though made of the basest metals. He acknowledged only one God, the soul of the universe which he conceived to be the body, and therefore he believed that those two together united, the soul and the body, formed one perfect animal, which was the god of the stoics. *Cic. C. 207.——The name of Zeno was common to some of the Roman emperors, on the throne of Constantinople in the 5th and 6th centuries.

Zenobia, a queen of Iberia, wife to Rhadamistus. She accompanied her husband when he was banished from his kingdom by the Armenians, but as she was unable to follow him on account of her pregnancy she entreated him to murder her. Rhadamistus long hesitated, but fearful of her falling into the hands of his enemy, he obeyed, and threw her body into the Araxes. Her cloaths kept her up on the surface of the water, where she was found by some shepherds, and as the wound was not mortal, her life was preserved, and she was carried to Tiridates who acknowledged her as queen.——Septimia, a celebrated princess of Palmyra who married Odenatus, whom Gallienus acknowledged as his partner on the Roman throne. After the death of her husband, which, according to some authors, she is said to have hastened, Zenobia reigned in the east as regent of her infant children, who were honored with the title of Cæsars. She assumed the name of Augusta, and she appeared in imperial robes, and ordered herself to be stiled the queen of the east. The troubles which at that time agitated the western parts of the empire, prevented the emperor from checking the insolence and the ambition of this princess, who boasted to be sprung from the Ptolemies of Egypt. Aurelian was no sooner invested with the imperial purple than he marched into the east, determined to punish the pride of Zenobia. He well knew her valor, and he was not ignorant that in her wars against the Persians, she had distinguished herself no less than Odenatus. She was the mistress of the east; Egypt acknowledged her power, and all the provinces of Asia minor were subject to her command. When Aurelian approached the plains of Syria, the Palmyrean queen appeared at the head of 700,000 men. She bore the labors of the field like the meanest of her soldiers, and walked on foot fearless of danger. Two battles were fought, the courage of the queen gained the superiority, but an imprudent evolution of the Palmyrean cavalry ruined her cause; and while they pursued with spirit the flying enemy, the Roman infantry suddenly fell upon the main army of Zenobia, and the defeat was inevitable. The queen fled to Palmyra, determined to support a siege. Aurelian followed her, and after he had almost exhausted his stores, he proposed terms of accommodation, which were rejected with disdain by the warlike princess. Her hopes of victory however soon vanished, and though she harrassed the Romans night and day by continual sallies from her walls, and the working of her military engines, she despaired of success when she heard that the armies which were marching to her relief from Armenia, Persia, and the east, had partly been defeated and partly bribed from her allegiance. She fled from Palmyra in the night, but Aurelian, who was apprized of her escape, pursued her, and she was caught as she was crossing the river Euphrates. She was brought into the presence of Aurelian, and though the soldiers were clamorous for her death, she was reserved to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. She was treated with great humanity, and Aurelian gave her large possessions near Tibur, where she was permitted to live the rest of her days in peace, with all the grandeur and majesty which became a queen of the east and a warlike princess. Her children were patronized by the emperor, and married to persons of the first distinction at Rome. Zenobia has been admired not only for her military abilities, but also for her literary talents. She was acquainted with every branch of useful learning, and spoke with fluency the language of the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Latins. She composed an abridgment of the history of the oriental nations, and of Egypt, which was greatly commended by the antients. She received no less honor from the patronage she afforded to the celebrated Longinus, who was one of her favorites, and who taught her the Greek tongue. She has also been praised for her great chastity, and her constancy, though she betrayed too often her propensities to cruelty and intoxication when in the midst of her officers. She fell into the hands of Aurelian about the 273d year of the Christian æra. Aur. Vict.—Zos. &c.

Zenodorus, a sculptor in the age of Nero. He made a statue of Mercury, as also a colossus for the emperor, which was 110 feet high, and which was consecrated to the sun. The head of this colossus was some ſome time after broken by Veſpaſian, who placed there the head of an Apollo ſurrounded with beams.

Zephyrium, a promontory of Magna Græcia towards the Ionian ſea.

Zephyrus, one of the winds, ſon of Aſtreus and Aurora, the ſame as the Favonius of the Latins. He married a nymph called Chloris or Flora, by whom he had a ſon called Carpos. Zephyr was ſaid to produce flowers and fruits by the ſweetneſs of his breath. He had a temple at Athens, where he was repreſented as a young man of delicate form, with two wings on his ſhoulders, and with his head covered with all ſorts of flowers. He was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the weſt wind. Heſiod. Theog. 377.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 135. l. 2, v. 417. l. 4, v. 223, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 64. l. 15, v. 700.—Propert. 1, el. 16, v. 34, &c.

Zephyrum, a promontory in the iſland of Cyprus, where Venus had a temple built by Ptolemy Philadelphus, whence ſhe was called Zephyria. It was in this temple that Arſinoe made an offering of her hair to the goddeſs of beauty.

Zerynthus, a town of Samothrace, where Venus was called Zerynthia. Ovid. Triſt. 1, el. 9, v. 19.

Zethes, Zetes, or Zetus, a ſon of Boreas king of Thrace and Orithya, who accompanied, with his brother Calais, the Argonauts to Colchis. In Bithynia the two brothers, who are repreſented with wings, delivered Phineus from the continual perſecution of the Harpyes, and drove theſe monſters as far as the iſlands called Strophades, where at laſt they were ſtopped by Iris, who promiſed them that Phineus ſhould no longer be tormented by them. They were both killed, as ſome ſay, by Hercules during the Argonautic expedition, and were changed into thoſe winds which generally blow before the dog ſtar appears, and are called Prodromi by the Greeks. Their ſiſter Cleopatra married Phineus king of Bithynia. Orpheus Arg.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Hygin. fab. 14.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 716.—Pauſ. 3, c. 18.—Val. Flacc.

Zetus or Zethus, a ſon of Jupiter and Antiope, brother to Amphion. The two brothers were born on mount Cithæron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the reſentment of her father Nycteus. When they had attained the years of manhood, they collected a number of their friends to avenge the injuries which their mother had ſuffered from Lycus, the ſucceſſor of Nycteus on the throne of Thebes, and his wife Dirce. Lycus was put to death, and his wife tied to the tail of a wild bull, that dragged her over rocks and precipices till ſhe died. The crown of Thebes was ſeized by the two brothers, not only as the reward of this victory, but as their inheritance, and Zethus ſurrounded the capital of his dominions with a ſtrong wall, while his brother amuſed himſelf with playing on his lyre. Muſic and verſes were diſagreeable to Zethus, and, according to ſome, he prevailed upon his brother no longer to purſue ſo unproductive a ſtudy. Hygin. fab. 7. —Pauſ. 2, c. 6, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 & 10. —Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 41.

Zeugma, a town of Meſopotamia.

Zeus, a name of Jupiter among the Greeks.

Zeuxidamus, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was father of Archidamus, and grandſon of Theopompus, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Archidamus. Pauſ. 3, c. 7.

Zeuxidas, a prætor of the Achæan league, depoſed becauſe he had propoſed to his countrymen an alliance with the Romans.

Zeuxippe, a daughter of Eridanus, mother of Butes, one of the Argonauts, &c. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A daughter of Laomedon. She married Sicyon, who after his father-in-law's death became king of that city of Peloponneſus, which from him has been called Sicyon. Pauſ. 2, c. 6.

Zeuxis, a celebrated painter, born at Heraclea, which ſome ſuppoſe to be the Heraclea of Sicily. He floriſhed about 468 years before the Chriſtian era, and was the diſciple of Apollodorus, and contemporary with Parrhaſius. In the art of painting he not only ſurpaſſed all his contemporaries, but alſo his maſter, and became ſo ſenſible, and at the ſame time ſo proud of the value of his pieces, that he refuſed to ſell them, obſerving that no ſum of money, however great, was ſufficient to buy them. His moſt celebrated paintings were his Jupiter ſitting on a throne, ſurrounded by the gods; his Hercules ſtrangling the ſerpents in the preſence of his affrighted parents; his modeſt Penelope; and his Helen, which was placed in the temple of Juno Lucina, at Agrigentum. This laſt piece he had painted at the requeſt of the Agrigentines, and that he might not be without a model, they ſent him the moſt beautiful of their their virgins. Zeuxis examined their naked beauties, and retained five, from whose elegance and graces united, he conceived in his mind the form of the most perfect woman in the universe, which his pencil at last executed with wonderful success. His contest with Parrhasius is well known; [Vid. Parrhasius.] but though he represented nature in such perfection, and copied all her beauties with such exactness, he often found himself deceived. He painted grapes, and formed an idea of the goodness of his piece from the birds which came to eat the fruit on the canvass. But he soon acknowledged that the whole was an ill executed piece, as the figure of the man who carried the grapes was not done with sufficient expression to terrify the birds. According to some, Zeuxis died from laughing at a comical picture he had made of an old woman. Plut. in Par. &c.—Quintil.

Zeuxo, one of the Oceanides.

Zilia or Zelis, a town in Mauritania.

Zipætes, a king of Bithynia who died in his 70th year, B. C. 279.

Ziobĕris, a town of Hyrcania.

Zōĭlus, a sophist and grammarian of Amphipolis, B. C. 259. He rendered himself known by his severe criticisms on the works of Isocrates and the poems of Homer, for which he received the name of Homeromastic, or the chastiser of Homer. He presented his criticisms to Ptolemy Philadelphus, but they were rejected with indignation, though the author declared that he starved for want of bread. Some say, that Zoilus was cruelly stoned to death, or exposed on a cross, by order of Ptolemy, while others support, that he was burnt alive at Smyrna. The name of Zoilus is generally applied to austere critics. The works of this unfortunate grammarian are lost. Ælian. V. H. 11, c. 10.—Dionys. Hal. —*Ovid. de Rem. Zopȳrio, one of Alexander's officers left in Greece when the conqueror was in Asia, &c.

Zopȳrion, a governor of Pontus, who made war against Scythia, &c. Justin. 2, c. 3.

Zopȳrus, a Persian, son of Megabyzus, who, to shew his attachment to Darius, the son of Hystaspes, while he besieged Babylon, cut off his ears and nose and fled to the enemy, telling them that he had received such a treatment from his royal master because he had advised him to raise the siege, as the city was impregnable. This was credited by the Babylonians, and Zopyrus was appointed commander of all their forces. When he had totally gained their confidence, he betrayed the city into the hands of Darius, for which he was liberally rewarded. The regard of Darius for Zopyrus could never be more strongly expressed than in what he used often to say, that he had rather have Zopyrus not mutilated than twenty Babylons. Herodot. 3, c. 154. &c.—Plut.—Justin. 1, c. 10.——An orator. Quintil.——A physician in the age of Mithridates. Zoroaster, a king of Bactria, supposed to have lived in the age of Ninus king of Assyria, some time before the Trojan war. According to Justin he first invented magic, or the doctrines of the Magi, and rendered himself known by his deep and acute researches in philosophy, the origin of the world, and the study of astronomy. He was respected by his subjects and contemporaries for his abilities as a monarch, a lawgiver, and a philosopher, and though many of his doctrines are puerile and ridiculous, yet his followers are still found in numbers in the wilds of Persia, and the extensive provinces of India. Like Pythagoras, Zoraster admitted no visible object of devotion, except fire, which he considered as the most proper emblem of a supreme being; which doctrines seem to have been preserved by Numa, in the worship, and ceremonies he instituted in honour of Vesta. According to some of the moderns, the doctrines, the laws, and regulations of this celebrated Bactrian are still extant, and they have been lately introduced in Europe in a French translation. The age of Zoroaster is so little known, that many speak of two, three, four, and even six lawgivers of that name. Justin. 1, c. 1.—August. de Civ. —Oros. 1.—Plin. 7, &c.

Zosimus, an officer in the reign of Theodosius the younger, about the year 410 of the Christian era. He wrote the history of the Roman emperors in Greek from the age of Augustus to the beginning of the 5th century, of which only the five first books and and the beginning of the ſixth are extant. In the firſt of theſe he is very ſuccinct in his account from the time of Auguſtus, to the reign of Diocletian, but in the ſucceeding he become more diffuſe and intereſting. His compoſition is written with elegance, but not much fidelity, and the author ſhowed his malevolence againſt the Chriſtians in his hiſtory of Conſtantine, and ſome of his ſucceſſors. The beſt editions of Zoſimus are that of Cellarius 8vo. Jenæ 1728, and that of Reitemier, 8vo. Lipſ. 1784.

The Roman gold coin was the aureus, which generally weighed double the denarius. The value of it, according to the first proportion of coinage, mentioned by Pliny, was — — —

The value of coin underwent many changes during the exiſtence of the Roman republic, and ſtood, as Pliny mentions it, as follows:

In the reign of Servius	— —	The as weighed of braſs	1 pound	A. U. C. 485	— — — The denarius exchanged for 10 aſſes
A. U. C. 490	——		2 ounces	A. U. C. 537	— — — 16 aſſes
A. U. C. 537	—		1 ounce
A. U. C. 586	=		½ ounce

A. U. C. 547, a ſcruple of gold was worth 20 ſeſtertii; coined afterwards of the pound of gold, 20 denarii aurei; and in Nero's reign of the pound of gold, 45 denarii aurei.

N B. In the above tables of money, it is to be obſerved, that the ſilver has been reckoned at 5s. and gold at 4l. per ounce.

A talent of gold among the Jews was worth 5475l. and one of ſilver 342l. 3s 9d.

The greater talent of the Romans was worth 99l. 6s. 8d. and the leſs 60l. or as ſome ſay 75l. and the great talent 112l.

The value of the Roman pondo is not preciſely known, though ſome ſuppoſe it equivalent to an Attic mina, or 3l. 4s. 7d. It is uſed indifferently by antient authors for æs, as, and mina, and was ſuppoſed to conſiſt of 100, or 96 denarii. It is to be obſerved, that whenever the word pondo is joined to numbers, it ſignifies the ſame as libra, but when it is uſed with other words, it bears the ſame ſignification as the σαθμη or ολκη of the Greeks, or the pondus of the Latins. The word nummus, when mentioned as a ſum of money, was ſuppoſed to be equivalent to a ſeſtertius, and though the words ſeſtertius and nummus are often joined together, yet their ſignification is the ſame, and they intimate no more than either does ſeparately.

We muſt particularly remark, that in reckoning their ſeſterces, the Romans had an art which can be rendered intelligible by the obſervation of theſe rules: If a numeral noun agreed in caſe, gender, and number, with the word ſeſtertius, it denoted preciſely as many ſeſtertii, as for example, decem ſeſtertii was ten ſeſtertii. If a numeral noun of another caſe was joined with the genitive plural of ſeſtertius, it denoted ſo many thouſand, as decem ſeſtertium ſignifies ſo many thouſand ſeſtertii. If the adverb numeral was joined, it denoted ſo many hundred thouſand, as decies ſeſtertium was ten hundred thouſand ſeſtertii. If the numeral adverb was put by itſelf, the ſignification was not altered, therefore decies, vigeſies, &c. in a ſentence, imply as many hundred thouſand ſeſtertii, or hundred ſeſtertia, as if the word ſeſtertium was expreſſed.

The denarius, which was the chief ſilver coin uſed at Rome, received its name becauſe it contained denos æris, ten aſſes.

The as is often expreſſed by an L. becauſe it was one pound weight; and the ſeſtertius, becauſe it was equivalent to two pound and a half of braſs, is frequently denoted by H. S. or by L. L. S.

The Roman libra contained twelve ounces of ſilver, and was worth about 3l. ſterling.

The Roman talent was ſuppoſed to be equivalent to twenty-four ſeſtertia, or nearly 193l. ſterling.
